“The loss of bumblebee populations is alarming because they play a central role in pollinating many plants, including key crops such as tomatoes and cranberries. ... The study, which Soroye conducted with colleagues from the University of Ottawa and University College London, compared the observed locations for 66 species of bumblebees between 1901 and 1974 with places where they could be found between 2000 and 2014. They found that nearly half of all regions in North America where bumblebees had been recorded in the earlier period no longer registered bees in the later period.

“It’s unclear whether the bees might recover. Franklin’s bumblebee is a species once found in a narrow region where California and Oregon meet. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service recently proposed an endangered-species listing for the bee but noted that the listing may not actually happen because it’s unclear whether there are any bees left to protect. ... Unlike many other insects, bumblebees are especially sensitive to temperature. Their large, hair-covered bodies give them an ability to internally heat up by flapping their wings at different speeds. But that also makes them vulnerable in hot weather.”

-- Another red flag: “Just days after the earth saw its warmest January on record, Antarctica has broken its warmest temperature ever recorded,” Matthew Cappucci reports. “A reading of 65 degrees was taken at Esperanza Base along Antarctica’s Trinity Peninsula on Thursday, making it the ordinarily frigid continent’s highest measured temperature in history.”

-- Trump will auction the right to drill and graze in areas of southern Utah that were previously protected as two national monuments. Sarah Kaplan and Juliet Eilperin report: “The decision comes more than two years after Trump dramatically cut the size of the monuments, Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante, and is likely to intensify a legal fight over the contested sites. The expanses of wind-swept badlands, narrow slot canyons and towering rock formations are sacred to several Native American nations and prized by scientists and outdoor enthusiasts. Bears Ears contains tens of thousands of cultural artifacts and rare rock art. In the rock layers of Grand Staircase, researchers have unearthed 75 million-year-old dinosaur fossils. But the lands also harbor significant amounts of oil, gas and coal that the administration hopes to develop, as well as grazing land valued by local ranchers. The earliest the government could approve new mining claims and other kinds of development is Oct. 1, because of language Congress adopted in a spending bill.”

-- Trump kept a controversial pesticide on the market. Now its biggest manufacturer is discontinuing it. Brady Dennis and Juliet Eilperin report: “The main manufacturer of a pesticide used for decades on a wide array of crops, including strawberries, corn and citrus, said Thursday it will stop making the product, which some scientists have said is linked to neurological problems in children. Corteva Agriscience, the nation’s largest producer of chlorpyrifos, said the decision was driven by financial considerations, not safety concerns. ... The Trump administration has refused to ban the pesticide, arguing that the science linking chlorpyrifos to health problems, such as neurological impacts in children and respiratory problems in adults, remains unresolved and in need of further study.”

-- “The U.S. economy added 225,000 jobs in January, a surprising sign of continued strength for the economy,” Eli Rosenberg and Heather Long report. “The unemployment rate ticked up slightly to 3.6 percent, mostly due to more people rejoining the labor force. The jobless rate remains near a 50-year low.”

-- “GOP senators are facing a new loyalty test: Whether to approve Trump’s controversial Federal Reserve nominee Judy Shelton.” (Heather Long and Erica Werner)

-- The House passed a bill to rewrite labor laws and strengthen unions. Eli Rosenberg reports: “The Protecting the Right to Organize Act, known as the PRO Act, would amend some of the country’s decades-old labor laws to give workers more power during disputes at work, add penalties for companies that retaliate against workers who organize and grant some hundreds of thousands of workers collective-bargaining rights they don’t currently have. It would also weaken ‘right-to-work’ laws in 27 states that allow employees to forgo participating in and paying dues to unions.”

-- Virginia will probably become the first Southern state to ban LGBT discrimination. Laura Vozzella reports: “Sweeping LGBT rights legislation that bans discrimination in employment, housing and public accommodations sailed out of the Virginia Senate and House on bipartisan votes Thursday. ... The Senate and House bills have to cross over to the opposite chamber and win passage again before Gov. Ralph Northam (D), who requested the legislation, can sign them into law. But those steps were seen as technicalities by advocates cheering what they regard as landmark human rights legislation.”

-- Trump is ramping up border-wall construction ahead of the 2020 election. Nick Miroff and Adrian Blanco report: The Post “has obtained detailed U.S. government data about Trump’s border-wall project, its construction progress and contracts for each segment of the structure. The data shows the Trump administration is far from delivering on the president’s promise to finish more than 500 miles of new barriers by early next year. ... [Still], the Trump administration is installing a structure far more formidable than anything previously in place along the border. The new structure has steel bollards, anchored in concrete, that reach 18 to 30 feet in height and will have lighting, cameras, sensors and improved roads to allow U.S. agents to respond quickly along an expanded ‘enforcement zone.’

“Nearly all of the new fencing the Trump administration has built so far is considered ‘replacement’ fencing, swapping out smaller, older vehicle barriers for a more elaborate — and costly — ‘border wall system.’ The administration has been slower to build new barriers where none currently exist, primarily because those spans require the acquisition of private land. Even with the slated construction goals, most of the southern border will not have a man-made barrier. ... Department of Homeland Security officials have tried to lower expectations, saying they will have 450 miles completed or ‘under construction’ by the end of the year.”

-- Patrick Crusius, the 21-year-old accused of killing 22 people and injuring dozens more during a rampage at an El Paso Walmart last August, was indicted on 90 federal charges,

including dozens of counts of hate crimes. (Robert Moore and Mark Berman)

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

Trump used a curse word while giving a nationally televised post-impeachment speech in the East Room, and only one network actually used the word in the closed captions:

Here's how many times that word has been used in the White House:

Carrie Dann
@CarrieNBCNews

A search of the American Presidency Project finds 6 records of "bullshit" in the 132,480 records in the White House document archive

1 was songwriter Diane Warren

1 was Kanye

Rest are Trump.

RESULTS 1 - 6 of 6 records found

| Date         | Related         | Document Title   |
|--------------|-----------------|--|
| Mar 16, 2016 | Michelle Obama  | Remarks by the First Lady in a Keynote Discussion at South by Southwest Featuring Missy Elliott, Queen Latifah, Sophia Bush, and Diane Warren in Austin, Texasbecause it's all -- can I say bullshit ? (Laughter.) I was trying ... |
| Oct 11, 2018 | Donald J. Trump | Remarks in a Meeting With Musician Kanye O. West and Former National Football League Player Jim Brown and an Exchange With ReportersIndustry guys--nonpolitical, no bullshit --put the beep on it, however ...                      |
| Mar 02, 2019 | Donald J. Trump | Remarks at the Conservative Political Action Conference in Oxon Hill, Marylandtrying to take you out with bullshit . Okay? [ Laughter ] With bullshit . Now, Robert Mueller never ...  |
| May 17, 2019 | Donald J. Trump | Remarks at the National Association of REALTORS Legislative Meetings and Trade Expo  |
| Jun 30, 2019 | Donald J. Trump | Remarks to United States Troops at Osan Air Base in Pyeongtaek, South Koreathe internet and gives more bullshit over the internet than ISIS ...   |
| Jul 17, 2019 | Donald J. Trump | Remarks at a "Keep America Great" Rally in Greenville, North Carolina"If we didn't have the bullshit ," (cheers and applause ...  |

♡ 67 5:43 PM - Feb 6, 2020

💬 76 people are talking about this

No media outlet has called a winner in Iowa, but Yang credited Sanders over Buttigieg:

And Stephen Colbert began questioning all of Iowa's claims:

VIDEOS OF THE DAY:

Colbert thinks Trump may have missed the part of the National Prayer Breakfast where they said "love your enemy":

Seth Meyers broke down Trump's post-impeachment rant:

Our video team made a side-by-side comparison of what Trump said yesterday with what Bill Clinton said after his acquittal by the Senate in 1999. Clinton said he was "profoundly sorry." Trump said "it was all bullshit." Trump spoke for an hour and two minutes. Clinton spoke for one minute and 36 seconds:

A side-by-side look at Clinton and Trump's post-acquittal speeches

And Trevor Noah turned Trump's State of the Union into a telenovela:

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202

Privacy Policy | Help

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Pete Buttigieg is emerging as a unity candidate in New Hampshire – with a bounce from Iowa
Date: Friday, February 7, 2020 10:45:19 AM

---

If you're having trouble reading this, click here.

---

PowerPost

The Daily 202

Morning intelligence for leaders

Share:

 Listen to The Big Idea

Powered by  LiveIntent

Pete Buttigieg is emerging as a unity candidate in New Hampshire – with a bounce from Iowa

Pete Buttigieg holds a town hall on Thursday at American Legion Post 98 in Merrimack, N.H. (Joseph Prezioso/AFP/Getty Images)

BY JAMES HOHMANN
with Mariana Alfaro

THE BIG IDEA:

MERRIMACK, N.H. – An Air Force veteran asked Pete Buttigieg at the American Legion hall here whether he learned any special lessons during his deployment to Afghanistan as a Naval reservist.

“Being in charge is not about being exalted,” answered the 38-year-old Democratic presidential candidate. “I was a pretty junior officer. I was just a lieutenant. But I recognized that the most important thing I could do was to do right by the enlisted people who were calling me

‘sir.’ It’s that basic principle that officers eat last when you’re at chow. And I wish that we had a president who understood that the position at the top of the org chart should also be the position of greatest humility about your need to do right by everybody around you.”

Buttigieg’s nod to the virtue of modesty was the single biggest applause line during his Thursday afternoon town hall meeting, which filled the venue to capacity. It offered a stark contrast to the anything-but-humble victory lap that President Trump took at the White House earlier in the afternoon to celebrate being acquitted by the Senate.

A dozen different voters I interviewed after Buttigieg’s event brought up the moment – including people who are torn between him and Joe Biden, him and Bernie Sanders, him and Elizabeth Warren, as well as him and Amy Klobuchar. These conversations offered a window into Buttigieg’s emergence, ahead of next Tuesday’s New Hampshire primary, as the kind of unity candidate who defies the conventional lanes that pundits try to force candidates into.

Polling shows that Buttigieg has been surging here since his better-than-expected finish in the Iowa caucuses, where he’s neck-and-neck with Sanders and an official winner has not been declared.

A nightly tracking poll of likely Democratic voters in New Hampshire by Suffolk University, in partnership with the Boston Globe and WBZ-TV, has shown the former mayor of South Bend, Ind., gaining ground here every night since Monday. Sanders led last night with 24 percent, followed by Buttigieg with 23 percent (up four points from the night before). The pollsters say Buttigieg’s gains are coming from Biden and Warren. Warren garnered 13 percent and Biden got 11 percent in the latest poll. Everyone else was in single digits. The margin of error is 4.4 percent.

A Monmouth University poll released Thursday puts Sanders in the lead with 24 percent among likely primary voters, followed by Buttigieg at 20 percent, Biden at 17 percent, Warren at 13 percent and Klobuchar at 9 percent. Half of all respondents said they're not firmly decided and could still change their minds. The margin of error is also 4.4 percent.

William Voss, an independent who lives here and voted for Hillary Clinton in the primary four years ago, saw Biden on Tuesday, Warren on Wednesday and Buttigieg on Thursday. He said he'll watch the Democratic debate on Friday night in Manchester before making a final decision over the weekend. "Pete hadn't really been on my list until he greatly surprised me in Iowa," Voss said. "Before Iowa, I perceived him as competing for vice president. Now I'm paying attention to him."

Buttigieg fields a voter's question in Merrimack. (Eric Thayer/Reuters)

Steve Shaw, 76, is a liberal who backed Sanders four years ago when he beat Clinton in the state's Democratic primary by 22 points. He's been trying to decide between supporting the independent senator from Vermont again or breaking for Warren, who represents the neighboring state of Massachusetts in the Senate. But Buttigieg has now entered the mix. "Iowa makes him more credible," said Shaw, a retired state employee who lives in Concord. "He's got a lot of courage in having a husband, too."

Shaw said he wants to support a candidate who feels empathy for the less fortunate, who does not condescend to regular people and who can think quickly on their feet. After the town hall, Shaw gave Buttigieg high marks for all three criteria and said the comments about eating only after his subordinates were "especially terrific."

“In that iconic painting by Edvard Munch called ‘The Scream,’ there are two theories as to what the figure is doing,” he explained. “Is she screaming for herself? Or is she screaming because she hears someone else screaming? In politics, you’re either showing empathy or you’re showing selfishness. There’s far too much selfishness and greed, especially from a president who is Robespierre with a comb-over. That’s why we’re so badly in need of empathy.”

Independents can cast ballots in the Democratic primary in New Hampshire. Without a real contest on the Republican side, that means there will likely be many more moderate-minded voters than four years ago. Bill Mauser, 77, is an independent who voted for John Kasich, the-then Ohio governor, in the GOP primary four years ago. He backed Clinton in the general, although he said it was so tough to decide between her and Trump that he didn’t make up his mind until he was standing in the voting booth. Now he’s trying to decide between Buttigieg and Klobuchar, the three-term senior senator from Minnesota.

“Amy is experienced, coming as she does from the Washington milieu, so she’s got the chops and she’s shown she’s strong enough to stand up to the opposition for what she believes in,” said Mauser, who lives in Merrimack and now enjoys bowling after a career in software development. He served four years on active duty in the Navy and 23 more in the reserves. “Pete is bright, articulate and a veteran, which is very good. The thing is that whoever wins is going to end up in a pit, and then in a brawl, with Donald J. Trump. He’s a no-holds-barred eye-gouger, so we need to pick someone with that in mind.”

In Iowa, promising generational change without an ideological edge, Buttigieg demonstrated an ability to build a broad coalition that transcends the traditional moderate vs. liberal “lanes” that pundits try to force candidates into. Preliminary entrance polls there showed that he tied for first among self-identified moderates (with Biden) and finished second among self-identified liberals (behind Sanders). He led among women and finished a close second among men. He was second among 17-to-29 and 30-to-44-year-olds, and he won among 45-to-64-year-olds. He fared just as well in rural parts of the state as the suburbs and cities over 50,000. Buttigieg even managed to get almost the same level of support among non-college graduates as those who earned degrees.

To be sure, Buttigieg continues to struggle to make inroads with black voters. This remains a challenge to his campaign in South Carolina and across the Southern states that vote on Super Tuesday. Biden is counting on black voters to offer a firewall, and the former vice president has leaned in on the argument that he’s the candidate most likely to defeat Trump in November.

---

Content from Partnership for America’s Health Care Future

American families can’t afford Medicare for All.

Studies confirm that Medicare for All would force Americans to pay more for worse care. Economists agree, there's "no way to pay for Medicare for All without tax increases."

---

Buttigieg speaks in Merrimack. (Eric Thayer/Reuters)

Dave and Alicia Hennessey, of Pelham, went to see Biden in Nashua on Tuesday and Buttigieg in Merrimack on Thursday. They both supported Clinton four years ago. Alicia, who retired from teaching at a computer training school, has decided to go for Buttigieg over Biden. "He's just so reasonable: on health care, on student debt, on the environment," the 70-year-old said. "I knocked on a lot of doors for Hillary. Bernie and Elizabeth are just too radical. ... I think Amy would have done a lot better if Pete wasn't in it."

Dave, a Vietnam veteran who retired last year from the real estate business, remains torn between Biden and Buttigieg. "The big issue is electability,” he said. “We’ve got to get Trump out of there. That’s priority one. While I like Pete – he’s smart and articulate – Joe is familiar, like an old pair of shoes. But he’s nowhere near the speaker that Pete is. And I’m concerned about his age. I’m 73, and I’ve lost a step or two. ... But I’m still concerned about so many morons out there being bigoted [about Buttigieg’s sexuality]. ... Electability is job one. ... I think it’s impressive he was able to do well, but I think the Iowa caucuses are so stupid and dumb.”

Biden’s struggles in Iowa have eroded his electability pitch somewhat, a point Buttigieg has been eager to make during a media blitz in recent days. Yesterday alone, Buttigieg appeared on ABC’s “The View,” CBS’s “Late Show with Stephen Colbert” and finished the night with a CNN town hall moderated by Chris Cuomo. He even talked to TMZ. “If your focus is on electability,” Buttigieg told the gossip site, “the best way, I think, to demonstrate you’re a candidate who can win is to go win.” In another sign that Buttigieg has arrived, the Trump campaign sent out an email attacking him last night.

Tonight’s debate on ABC looms as a pivotal test for Buttigieg. Because he’s rising, he faces almost certain attacks from all directions. Biden has telegraphed a few hits in recent days. Klobuchar did little during a previous debate to hide her resentment that Buttigieg is doing better than she. Warren’s manager accused one of Buttigieg’s strategists of coordinating in plain sight with an allied super PAC, something that the campaign and the group deny. She’s said that a woman with his same background would not have gotten as far.

Buttigieg was widely viewed as a winner of the November debate, but he stumbled badly in the December debate as he struggled to respond to criticism over raising money in a Napa Valley wine cave. He took a hit in the polls after that.

The former mayor, who has shifted more toward the middle over the last year, benefitted during the January debate from the squabbling between Sanders and Warren on the left over whether the Vermont senator told his Massachusetts colleague during a private dinner that a woman cannot win the presidency. Sanders vigorously denied it. Interviews on the ground over the last few weeks suggest that some men who had been intrigued by Warren and attracted to her detailed plans were turned off by what they perceived as her playing the gender card.

A few weeks ago, Warren was pitching herself for this role of unity candidate. Her team hoped she'd come out of Iowa stronger than she did, counting on a much-ballyhooed field program that didn't deliver as promised. They thought she could then sell herself in New Hampshire as both the more pragmatic alternative to Sanders and the more progressive alternative to Biden. Instead, after Warren's distant third-place finish, Buttigieg is slipping into that sweet spot.

Buttigieg said in Merrimack that his campaign had been "absolutely electrified ... by the extraordinary validation of this campaign's vision that we had in Iowa on Monday." He announced yesterday that he's raised $2.73 million and attracted 22,636 donors since caucus night, with an average of $42. "I'm also mindful and humbled by the fact that New Hampshire is New Hampshire," he concluded. "And New Hampshire is not the kind of place to let Iowa or anybody else tell you what to do!"

Bernie Sanders speaks Friday morning at the "Politics and Eggs" breakfast at the New Hampshire Institute of Politics at Saint Anselm College in Manchester, N.H. (Justin Lane/EPA-EFE/Shutterstock)

WHAT ELSE YOU NEED TO KNOW ABOUT 2020:

-- The latest on the Iowa mess: The state Democratic Party last night said it has now released all the results, showing the tightest of races between Buttigieg and Sanders. With 100 percent of precincts reporting, Buttigieg held a narrow lead of 26.2 percent in state delegate equivalents, the traditional metric by which an Iowa winner has been determined. Sanders had 26.1 percent. With continuing confusion and questions about the technical issues, no official winner has been declared by the party or news outlets like the Associated Press. Sanders led in the popular vote by roughly 6,000 votes in the first round and about 2,500 in the second round.

Sanders declared victory in a news conference at his New ### Hampshire headquarters in Manchester on Thursday afternoon.

“When 6,000 more people come out for you in an election than your nearest opponent, we here in northern New England call that a victory,” he said. “Who inches ahead in the end is meaningless,” Sanders added, referring to the delegate count.

His comments came less than an hour after Democratic National Committee Chairman Tom Perez called for a canvass of the results from the caucuses.

“The state party gave no indication it planned to honor Perez’s demand, instead issuing a statement noting that it is the campaigns that are entitled to request a canvass. None has so far made such a request, and Sanders and Buttigieg indicated Thursday they would not,” Isaac Stanley-Becker reports. “A canvass would mean a hand audit of the math worksheets and reporting forms that are completed on caucus night at each of the more than 1,750 precincts across the state. It would differ from a full recount, which involves a hand count of each of the ‘presidential preference cards’ completed by caucus-goers.”

-- Why Buttigieg decided to declare victory on Monday night:

“Unlike a typical election, where ballot choices are secret, the various campaigns received real-time reports of turnout and preference from the state’s 1,681 precincts. The numbers they reported back to Buttigieg in his suite at a downtown Des Moines Marriott cheered everyone in the room,” Michael Scherer, Holly Bailey, Sean Sullivan and Annie Linskey report in a meaty new ticktock. “The political wordsmith with degrees from Oxford and Harvard needed a win in Iowa to propel his campaign forward, so he decided to play a word game: He would declare himself ‘victorious’ without defining what victory meant. His staff uniformly agreed, even though they knew he still might not finish first in the delegate count. ‘It means victorious over a lot of things — victorious because a year ago, it was just four staffers, victorious in terms of overperforming the expectations, and victorious in that we beat a crop of senators and a former vice president,’ said one of the advisers in the room.”

-- Joe Walsh, the former Illinois congressman who has been waging a primary challenge to Trump from his right, ended his long-shot bid for the Republican nomination during an interview on CNN this morning. (Amy Wang)

-- Just five days before the New Hampshire primary, Biden's bus was parked in front of the castle-themed Radisson hotel where he's been staying in Nashua. But the candidate was nowhere to be found. Matt Viser, Cleve Wootson and Michael Scherer report:

“Biden spent Thursday gathered with his top advisers at his home in Wilmington, Del., seeking a reset and perhaps a last-ditch effort to save his candidacy, beginning with a debate Friday night. He held no public events. ... In one troublesome sign for the financially strapped campaign, it canceled nearly $150,000 in television ads in South Carolina, which votes Feb. 29, and moved the spending to Nevada, whose Feb. 22 contest follows New Hampshire’s. The move seemed to acknowledge that Biden’s campaign cannot sustain a continued run of bad news. ... Some of Biden’s supporters were growing agitated with the campaign, struggling to point to any one piece of it that has been successful. His organizing operation struggled in Iowa, his fundraising numbers have never been impressive, and his message is often muddled.

“One person close to the campaign ... expects a dramatic reshuffling of his operation if Biden does not show improvement in New Hampshire. Biden has rarely fired staffers during his decades-long career, so any changes would probably mean internal shifting of responsibilities. Even before then, disputes have emerged among some of his top advisers, who have generally split between an older group that has been with Biden for decades, and a younger group that, while loyal, has joined his staff more recently. There have been disagreements since the start of the campaign over how much to focus on the middle-class economic message that has defined much of Biden’s career and how much to center his message on President Trump.”

-- Dan Balz’s take: “Joe Biden’s campaign has a problem, and it begins with the candidate.”

-- Andrew Yang fired dozens of staffers after his abysmal finish in Iowa. From Politico: “Among those dismissed were the national political and policy directors of the campaign, as well as the deputy national political director — all senior level positions. The people who were fired worked across Yang’s organization, from his headquarters in New York to the now-disbanded Iowa operation. ... According to FEC reports released last week, the Yang campaign had more than 230 people on staff.”

-- A half-dozen women of color left Warren’s Nevada campaign, weeks before the state’s caucuses, complaining of a toxic work environment in which minorities felt tokenized. From Politico: “‘There was definitely something wrong with the culture,’ said Megan Lewis, a field organizer who joined the campaign in May and departed in December. 'I filed a complaint with HR, but the follow-up I received left me feeling as though I needed to make myself smaller or change who I was to fit into the office culture.' Another recently departed staffer, also a field organizer, granted anonymity because she feared reprisal, echoed that sentiment. 'I felt like a problem — like I was there to literally bring color into the space but not the knowledge and voice that comes with it,' she said in an interview. ... [Warren] has spent just 12 days there, another factor that dispirited the state's staff. This week, her campaign also scaled back its television ads in the state by about $140,000."

-- Warren's newest ad, airing in heavy rotation on TV here, features an old clip of Barack Obama praising her in the Rose Garden for her work creating the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau. Biden is also running a commercial with old footage of Obama talking him up. The former president has not endorsed his running mate. (Watch here.)

-- Montana Gov. Steve Bullock (D) met privately with Obama as the deadline for him to file for Senate looms. The former presidential candidate is a sought-after recruit to challenge Republican Sen. Steve Daines. (Politico)

-- "Mike Bloomberg's presidential campaign plagiarized portions of its plans for maternal health, LGBTQ equality, the economy, tax policy, infrastructure, and mental health from research publications, media outlets, and a number of nonprofit, educational, and policy groups," the Intercept reports. "[E]xact passages from at least eight Bloomberg plans or accompanying fact sheets were direct copies of material from media outlets including CNN, Time, and CBS, a research center at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice, the American Medical Association, Everytown for Gun Safety, Building America's Future Educational Fund, and other organizations. The plagiarized sections ranged in length from entire paragraphs to individual sentences and fragments in documents that were between five and 14 pages long. ... By Thursday morning [after a press inquiry], one of the plans was completely taken down, while others were changed. ... The Bloomberg campaign did not deny the plagiarism. In a statement, the campaign said, 'Much of what you flagged were fact sheets that went out via MailChimp' — an online newsletter service — 'which doesn't support footnote formatting.'"

The Daily 202's
BIG IDEA

Get James's insight into Washington every weekday on your smart speaker or favorite podcast player.

Subscribe on Amazon Echo, Google Home, Apple HomePod and other podcast players.

BUILDING A MORE EQUITABLE
HEALTH CARE SYSTEM

BlueCross
BlueShield
Association

PASS THE MOMNIBUS >

Welcome to the Daily 202, PowerPost's morning briefing for decision-makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter.

Republicans say Trump learned a lesson. Trump maintains he did nothing wrong.

IMPEACHMENT FALLOUT:

-- “Lt. Col. Alexander Vindman — a National Security Council aide who testified during House Democrats’ impeachment hearings — will be informed in the coming days, likely on Friday, by administration officials that he is being reassigned to a position at the Defense Department, taking a key figure from the investigation out of the White House,” Josh Dawsey, Bob Costa and Greg Miller report. “Vindman had already informed senior officials at the NSC that he intended to take an early exit from his assignment and leave his post by the end of the month ... but Trump is eager to make a symbol of the Army officer soon after the Senate acquitted him ... Trump has complained about Vindman in private, mocking the way he spoke [and] wore his uniform ... He has discussed with aides removing other national security officials who testified or cooperated with House Democrats, with Trump calling them disloyal and asking whether he should further cull his national security staff after impeachment. He remains incensed that so many people in his administration testified last year ...

“Additionally, Trump sees it as valuable to frame previous investigations as witch hunts because he expects more probes, [informal adviser Jason] Miller and other Trump allies said, and the president has told his aides that Democrats will continue to investigate his finances, his Cabinet officials and his interactions with foreign leaders. ... Trump has been convinced by polling and rallies in recent months that relentlessly attacking [Nancy] Pelosi is key to his reelection success, and he has shown flashes of anger when discussing her ... Republican lawmakers and Trump have also discussed ways to exact revenge on [Adam] Schiff for his leading role in the president’s impeachment...”

-- Trump celebrated his acquittal yesterday afternoon with an angry, raw and vindictive 62-minute rant. David Nakamura reports: “He spoke without a teleprompter. He cursed in the East Room. He called the House speaker a ‘horrible person.’ He lorded his power over a room full of deferential Republicans. He mocked a former GOP presidential nominee and his 2016 Democratic rival. He played the victim again and again. ... Trump was ... aggrieved — reflecting the id of a president who has seethed for months with rage against his enemies. This was the State of Trump. ... ‘We’ve been going through this now for over three years,' [he said.] 'It was evil. It was corrupt. It was dirty cops. It was leakers and liars.' ...

“Trump offered no words of regret, insisting, as he has repeatedly, that he did nothing wrong... The only apology he offered was to his own family, for the ‘phony, rotten’ ordeal that they were put through ... Instead, Trump vented ... ‘You could be George Washington, you could have just won the war, and they’d say, ‘Let’s get him out of office,’” Trump said of his Democratic rivals. ‘They’re vicious as hell.’ ... At one point, he held up a copy of Thursday’s Washington Post with the headline, ‘Trump acquitted,’ and said he might have it framed. ... He was rewarded with a kiss from the first lady and a hug from his eldest daughter, Ivanka, a senior White House adviser. ...

“The White House opened the East Room event to the press corps, and scores of reporters crammed into tight spaces behind the seats for the guests. About an hour before the president was due to start speaking, aides scrambled to rearrange the lectern placement to allow Trump to enter from Cross Hall — producing a dramatic television shot that has traditionally lent gravitas and a presidential air to official statements. (President Barack Obama used that angle to announce the killing of Osama bin Laden in 2011.) ... ‘It’s all bullshit,’ the president said of the 17-month special-counsel investigation of Russian interference in the 2016 presidential election and his campaign’s contacts with Russian operatives.”

-- Trump also took aim at Hunter Biden, calling him “a son that made no money [and] got thrown out of the military” before launching into an attack on the younger Biden’s business activities in Ukraine,

China and elsewhere. (Felicia Sonmez)

-- The president's people at the Treasury Department quickly responded to requests from GOP senators for highly sensitive and closely held financial records about Hunter Biden and his associates, as part of the newly launched Republican inquiry into his business affairs. The Treasury Department still refuses to turn over the president's tax returns, which Congress is legally entitled to review. (Yahoo News)

-- Meanwhile, Ukraine complained the Trump administration is still holding up $30 million of arms and ammunition. Officials said they haven't been able to get any answers from the U.S. government about why the deals haven't been approved in more than a year. (BuzzFeed News)

-- Trump's company charges the Secret Service for the rooms agents use while protecting him at his luxury properties — billing U.S. taxpayers at rates as high as $650 per night, according to federal records and people who have seen receipts. David Fahrenthold, Jonathan O'Connell, Carol D. Leonnig and Josh Dawsey report: “Those charges, compiled here for the first time, show that Trump has an unprecedented — and largely hidden — business relationship with his own government. When Trump visits his clubs in Palm Beach, Fla., and Bedminster, N.J., the service needs space to post guards and store equipment. Trump's company says it charges only minimal fees. But Secret Service records do not show that. At Trump's Mar-a-Lago Club, the Secret Service was charged the $650 rate dozens of times in 2017, and a different rate, $396.15, dozens more times in 2018, according to documents from Trump's visits.

“And at the Trump National Golf Club Bedminster, the Secret Service was charged $17,000 a month to use a three-bedroom cottage on the property, an unusually high rent for homes in that area, according to receipts from 2017. Trump’s company billed the government even for days when Trump wasn’t there. These payments appear to contradict the Trump Organization’s own statements about what it charges members of his government entourage.”

-- Pelosi chided Trump for his behavior, as she defended her decision to tear up a copy of his State of the Union address.

Toluse Olorunnipa and Mike DeBonis report: “During a day that began with the National Prayer Breakfast, Trump questioned the religious sincerity of Pelosi and Sen. Mitt Romney (R-Utah), who voted Wednesday to convict the president on a charge of abuse of power. Pelosi, a Catholic, responded by saying Trump was ignorant about religion. ... Despite the negativity, both Trump and Pelosi used their remarks to make brief nods to the idea of working on bipartisan issues like infrastructure and health care. But such olive branches were dwarfed by a forest of vindictiveness, and continued political battle appeared to be the more likely path forward. ... ‘He’s impeached forever, no matter what he says,’ Pelosi said. ‘You’re never getting rid of that scar.’”

-- A Utah state representative called for a vote to censure Romney after he voted to convict the president on abuse of power. The sponsor of the bill, GOP Rep. Phil Lyman, said he didn’t want Utah’s relationship with Trump to be “damaged” by Romney’s actions. (KSL)

-- Trump's trial may be over, but he and Chief Justice John Roberts aren't done with each other. Robert Barnes reports:

“Currently, the chief justice is either writing or reviewing the Supreme Court's decision on whether Trump acted within his power to end the program protecting young immigrant ‘dreamers’ from deportation. A decision could come at any time before the court's term concludes at the end of June. Next month, Roberts will call the court to order to consider whether Trump may shield his personal financial information from a congressional committee and a New York prosecutor each investigating matters beyond the president's impeachment.”

-- Commentary from The Post's opinion page:

- Dana Milbank: “Meet the new Trump, same as the old Trump.”
- Catherine Rampell: “Worried Trump might weaponize the presidency? He already has, many times.”
- Michael Gerson: “Trump's politicization of the National Prayer Breakfast is unholy and immoral.”
- Henry Olsen: “Trump's address on his acquittal showcases why people hate him. And love him.”
- Max Boot: “The contrast between Romney and [Marco] Rubio shows how low the GOP has sunk.”

-- A bipartisan report released by the Senate Intelligence Committee says the Obama administration mounted an insufficient response to Russia's election interference in 2016. But it concludes these failures were “understandable” because the government lacked information and had limited policy options at the time. Karoun Demirjian and Devlin Barrett report: “The panel recommended that the government develop specific responses to foreign influence campaigns to better safeguard against future incursions and integrate those efforts across agencies and with the governments of other countries contending with Russian aggression. Its report also said the president must be more direct with the American public about the nature of such threats, and ‘separate himself or herself from political considerations’ when handling these issues. ...

“Political concerns, the report found, played an influential role in the Obama administration’s ‘tempered’ response to the Russian threat, as officials’ fears about stoking a politically charged election season with vocal alerts about Russia’s activity created a snowball effect, ultimately allowing the Russian campaign to proliferate relatively unchecked. ... Internally, officials recalled, there was little or no discussion about a ‘pre-election response,’ as the government was ‘concerned about escalation’ with Moscow. Officials ‘did not know the full range of Moscow’s capabilities and were fearful that the Russians might attempt to affect electoral infrastructure,’ the report states. So the response stuck mostly to warnings of largely unspecified ‘consequences,’ communicated by President Obama to Russian President Vladimir Putin...” (Read the full 54-page report here.)

Li Wenliang, who was silenced by police for trying to share news about the coronavirus, shared this photo of himself in January on his Weibo account. That's the Chinese version of Twitter. He died on Thursday. (Li Wenliang/Weibo)

THE NEW WORLD ORDER:

-- “A Chinese doctor who was silenced by police for trying to share news about the new coronavirus long before Chinese health authorities disclosed its full threat died after coming down with the illness, a hospital statement said, triggering an outpouring of anger online toward the ruling Communist Party,” Gerry Shih reports from Hangzhou, China: “Li Wenliang, a 34-year-old ophthalmologist at Wuhan Central Hospital, became a national hero and symbol of the Chinese government’s systemic failings last month. Li had tried to warn his medical school classmates Dec. 30 about the existence of a contagious new virus that resembled the deadly severe acute respiratory syndrome (SARS). Word began to spread in China thanks to Li, but his posts were censored, and he was detained Jan. 1 for ‘rumor-mongering.’ ...

“Li was released from detention Jan. 3 after signing a police document admitting that he committed an illegal act by making ‘untrue statements’ on social media and promising that he would ‘earnestly reflect’ on his mistakes. After they detained Li, Wuhan police appeared on Chinese state television to warn the public about the dangers of spreading rumors. In a coordinated state media push that day, they urged Internet users across the country to not believe online rumors and help build a ‘clear and bright cyberspace.’

“Days after he was released the first week of January, Li returned to work receiving patients who were beginning to flood into Wuhan’s hospitals. He began coughing Jan. 10, he later recalled. This past Saturday, three weeks after he checked himself into his hospital, he told his social media followers that he had finally been tested: He was indeed infected by the coronavirus. As he spent his final days in Wuhan Central's intensive-care unit, Li began publicly sharing how he sought to warn friends about the new virus, his ordeal with the police and his fight with the illness.

“He revealed that he lived with a pregnant wife and young child, and had quickly quarantined himself as soon as he suspected he was infected. His mother and father were now hospitalized for fever, he said without disclosing whether they — or his wife and child — contracted the coronavirus. ... As word of Li's death trickled out Thursday night, his followers left messages on his Weibo account [their version of Twitter] pleading in vain for him to post one last update. Hours after his death was confirmed, Chinese users began repeating a literary verse to express their gratitude for a man they felt their country did not deserve. ‘He who holds the firewood for the masses,’ they wrote, ‘is the one who freezes to death in wind and snow.’”

-- Sadly, the regime in Beijing has not learned its lesson: After Li's death, Communist Party leaders are starting to censor the outpouring of condolences on social media. CNBC reports that the government appears to be cracking down on posts that call Li a “hero” and others that reference the lyrics from "Les Miserables" song “Do You Hear the People Sing?” Weibo is also blocking posts that include the hashtag #IWantFreedomOfSpeech.

-- Luckily, we live in a country where I can write this: Li is a hero. He did exactly what a good doctor is supposed to do. His pregnant wife, young child and his parents – and frankly all Chinese people who want the freedom of speech we so often take for granted – will be in my prayers this weekend.

-- There are now more than 31,000 confirmed cases of coronavirus in mainland China. More than 630 of Li's countrymen have now died from the coronavirus, and the number could be far higher. More foreigners continue being evacuated from the area where the outbreak began. Two U.S. planes carrying more than 300 passengers flew out of Wuhan last night. (Simon Denyer, Karin Brulliard, Adam Taylor, Marisa Iati, Carol Morello)

Powered by  LiveIntent

Onboard a government plane evacuating Americans from the coronavirus epicenter

-- U.S. evacuees quarantined on military bases are resorting to Zumba, stairwell races and accounting classes to try and keep some sense of normalcy. William Wan, Lena H. Sun and Neena Satija report: “Twice a day, the evacuees have their temperatures checked by medical staff in protective gear. They are forbidden to stray from a small patch of land on a base filled with armed military personnel. So they have found creative ways of filling the days. ‘When people hear quarantine, they think of the zombie apocalypse, movies like ‘World War Z,’” said Matthew McCoy, 55, another evacuee. ‘But the reality is it’s what you make of it.’”

-- The number of visitors coming to the U.S. from China could drop by as much as 28 percent this year, according to a new report examining the virus’s impact on the country’s tourism industry. (Lori Aratani)

-- Another 41 people tested positive for coronavirus on board a quarantined cruise ship off the coast of Japan. A total of 61 passengers and crew have been diagnosed with the virus. Only 273 of the 3,711 people aboard have been tested so far. (Denyer and Akiko Kashiwagi)

-- Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe told his nation’s parliament that the Olympic Games will go on as planned this summer despite the virus. (Taylor)

-- The National Symphony Orchestra canceled its tour to China, the homeland of its principal clarinetist. (Peggy McGlone)

-- The virus will likely acquire a new, more easily communicated name in the coming days. It could be a variant of SARS, which scientists have described as a “cousin” of the virus. (Joel Achenbach)

-- The extended shutdown of Chinese factories from the outbreak is already upending supply chains, as manufacturers begin to feel the squeeze from shortages of material and travel restrictions on staff. Michael Tatarski reports: “New restrictions within China could further stress production lines. This week, officials in Zhejiang province announced that only one person per household would be allowed to leave home every two days for necessities. This includes three districts of the city of Hangzhou, home to e-commerce giant Alibaba. ... Although China has largely weathered Trump’s trade war, many economists expect its annual growth to slump to below 4 percent for the first quarter as services halt and consumers avoid going out due to contagion fears.”

-- A federal judge ordered the administration to end visa processing delays for hundreds of Afghan and Iraqi nationals who worked for American war-fighters. Spencer S. Hsu reports: “The ruling Wednesday by U.S. District Judge Tanya S. Chutkan of Washington, D.C., granted class-action status to all applicants whose visa requests have been pending for more than nine months — a deadline set by statute — and followed a September opinion in which the judge called the government’s justification for delays ‘tortured and untenable.’”

-- Venezuelan authorities rounded up U.S. oil executives held under house arrest in Caracas and moved them to a prison after Trump invited opposition leader Juan Guaidó to the White House. The six Citgo employees have been detained since 2017

without a trial. (WSJ)

-- Russia is the clear winner from the U.S. embargo on Venezuelan oil. Anthony Faiola and Karen DeYoung report: “In the year since the Trump administration declared what amounted to economic war against the Venezuelan government of President Nicolás Maduro — an oil embargo that cut it off from its biggest petroleum buyer, the United States — the move has yielded some clear losers, including U.S. investors now shut out of the market. ... U.S. officials, oil industry insiders and analysts say secret deals between Moscow and Caracas to produce, transport and sell oil to other markets have become a cash cow for Russia that is earning its state-controlled enterprises an estimated $120 million a month.”

-- Canada’s oil bust left thousands of abandoned wells behind, and there’s not enough money for a cleanup. (Amanda Coletta)

-- Someone filled an Indian town’s well with alcohol, and now beer is pouring out of people’s taps. (CNN)

A German bumblebee searches for nectar in a still flowering basil plant. (Ulrich Perrey/picture-alliance/dpa/AP)

DOMESTIC DEVELOPMENTS THAT SHOULDN'T BE OVERSHADOWED:

-- Bumblebee populations in North America and Europe have plummeted as a result of extreme temperatures. Chris Mooney reports on a new study in the journal Science: “The number of areas populated by bumblebees has fallen 46 percent in North America and 17 percent in Europe, and the new research found that regions with sharp bee declines also experienced strong variations in climate — and especially higher temperatures and worse heat waves. It’s yet another major piece of bad news for bee populations. Declining colonies of commercial honeybees have been blamed on a strange phenomenon called Colony Collapse Disorder but also probably spring from a bevy of other causes. Now, the new research suggests that bumblebees in the wild are suffering, too. ‘Where temperatures are getting more extreme, bees tend to be disappearing more often,' said Peter Soroye, a researcher at the University of Ottawa and one of the study's authors.

“The loss of bumblebee populations is alarming because they play a central role in pollinating many plants, including key crops such as tomatoes and cranberries. ... The study, which Soroye conducted with colleagues from the University of Ottawa and University College London, compared the observed locations for 66 species of bumblebees between 1901 and 1974 with places where they could be found between 2000 and 2014. They found that nearly half of all regions in North America where bumblebees had been recorded in the earlier period no longer registered bees in the later period.

“It’s unclear whether the bees might recover. Franklin’s bumblebee is a species once found in a narrow region where California and Oregon meet. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service recently proposed an endangered-species listing for the bee but noted that the listing may not actually happen because it’s unclear whether there are any bees left to protect. ... Unlike many other insects, bumblebees are especially sensitive to temperature. Their large, hair-covered bodies give them an ability to internally heat up by flapping their wings at different speeds. But that also makes them vulnerable in hot weather.”

-- Another red flag: “Just days after the earth saw its warmest January on record, Antarctica has broken its warmest temperature ever recorded,” Matthew Cappucci reports. “A reading of 65 degrees was taken at Esperanza Base along Antarctica’s Trinity Peninsula on Thursday, making it the ordinarily frigid continent’s

highest measured temperature in history.”

-- Trump will auction the right to drill and graze in areas of southern Utah that were previously protected as two national monuments. Sarah Kaplan and Juliet Eilperin report: “The decision comes more than two years after Trump dramatically cut the size of the monuments, Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante, and is likely to intensify a legal fight over the contested sites. The expanses of wind-swept badlands, narrow slot canyons and towering rock formations are sacred to several Native American nations and prized by scientists and outdoor enthusiasts. Bears Ears contains tens of thousands of cultural artifacts and rare rock art. In the rock layers of Grand Staircase, researchers have unearthed 75 million-year-old dinosaur fossils. But the lands also harbor significant amounts of oil, gas and coal that the administration hopes to develop, as well as grazing land valued by local ranchers. The earliest the government could approve new mining claims and other kinds of development is Oct. 1, because of language Congress adopted in a spending bill.”

-- Trump kept a controversial pesticide on the market. Now its biggest manufacturer is discontinuing it. Brady Dennis and Juliet Eilperin report: “The main manufacturer of a pesticide used for decades on a wide array of crops, including strawberries, corn and citrus, said Thursday it will stop making the product, which some scientists have said is linked to neurological problems in children. Corteva Agriscience, the nation’s largest producer of chlorpyrifos, said the decision was driven by financial considerations, not safety concerns. ... The Trump administration has refused to ban the pesticide, arguing that the science linking chlorpyrifos to health problems, such as neurological impacts in children and respiratory problems in adults, remains unresolved and in need of further study.”

-- “The U.S. economy added 225,000 jobs in January, a surprising sign of continued strength for the economy,” Eli Rosenberg and Heather Long report. “The unemployment rate ticked up slightly to 3.6 percent, mostly due to more people rejoining the labor force. The jobless rate remains near a 50-year low.”

-- GOP senators are facing a new loyalty test: Whether to approve Trump’s controversial Federal Reserve nominee Judy Shelton. (Heather Long and Erica Werner)

-- The House passed a bill to rewrite labor laws and strengthen unions. Eli Rosenberg reports: “The Protecting the Right to Organize Act, known as the PRO Act, would amend some of the country’s decades-old labor laws to give workers more power during disputes at work, add penalties for companies that retaliate against workers who organize and grant some hundreds of thousands of workers collective-bargaining rights they don’t currently have. It would also weaken ‘right-to-work’ laws in 27 states that allow employees to forgo participating in and paying dues to unions.”

-- Virginia will probably become the first Southern state to ban LGBT discrimination. Laura Vozzella reports: “Sweeping LGBT rights legislation that bans discrimination in employment, housing and public accommodations sailed out of the Virginia Senate and House on bipartisan votes Thursday. ... The Senate and House bills have to cross over to the opposite chamber and win passage again before Gov. Ralph Northam (D), who requested the legislation, can sign them into law. But those steps were seen as technicalities by advocates cheering what they regard as landmark human rights legislation.”

-- Trump is ramping up border-wall construction ahead of the 2020 election. Nick Miroff and Adrian Blanco report: The Post “has obtained detailed U.S. government data about Trump’s border-wall project, its construction progress and contracts for each segment of the structure. The data shows the Trump administration is far from delivering on the president’s promise to finish more than 500 miles of new barriers by early next year. ... [Still], the Trump administration is installing a structure far more formidable than anything previously in place along the border. The new structure has steel bollards, anchored in concrete, that reach 18 to 30 feet in height and will have lighting, cameras, sensors and improved roads to allow U.S. agents to respond quickly along an expanded ‘enforcement zone.’

“Nearly all of the new fencing the Trump administration has built so far is considered ‘replacement’ fencing, swapping out smaller, older vehicle barriers for a more elaborate — and costly — ‘border wall system.’ The administration has been slower to build new barriers where none currently exist, primarily because those spans require the acquisition of private land. Even with the slated construction goals, most of the southern border will not have a man-made barrier. ... Department of Homeland Security officials have tried to lower expectations, saying they will have 450 miles completed or ‘under construction’ by the end of the year.”

-- Patrick Crusius, the 21-year-old accused of killing 22 people and injuring dozens more during a rampage at an El Paso Walmart last August, was indicted on 90 federal charges,

including dozens of counts of hate crimes. (Robert Moore and Mark Berman)

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

Trump used a curse word while giving a nationally televised post-impeachment speech in the East Room, and only one network actually used the word in the closed captions:

Here's how many times that word has been used in the White House:

Carrie Dann
@CarrieNBCNews

A search of the American Presidency Project finds 6 records of "bullshit" in the 132,480 records in the White House document archive

1 was songwriter Diane Warren

1 was Kanye

Rest are Trump.

RESULTS 1 - 6 of 6 records found

| Date         | Related         | Document Title   |
|--------------|-----------------|--|
| Mar 16, 2016 | Michelle Obama  | Remarks by the First Lady in a Keynote Discussion at South by Southwest Featuring Missy Elliott, Queen Latifah, Sophia Bush, and Diane Warren in Austin, Texasbecause it's all -- can I say bullshit ? (Laughter.) I was trying ... |
| Oct 11, 2018 | Donald J. Trump | Remarks in a Meeting With Musician Kanye O. West and Former National Football League Player Jim Brown and an Exchange With ReportersIndustry guys--nonpolitical, no bullshit --put the beep on it, however ...                      |
| Mar 02, 2019 | Donald J. Trump | Remarks at the Conservative Political Action Conference in Oxon Hill, Marylandtrying to take you out with bullshit . Okay? [ Laughter ] With bullshit . Now, Robert Mueller never ...  |
| May 17, 2019 | Donald J. Trump | Remarks at the National Association of REALTORS Legislative Meetings and Trade Expo  |
| Jun 30, 2019 | Donald J. Trump | Remarks to United States Troops at Osan Air Base in Pyeongtaek, South Koreathe internet and gives more bullshit over the internet than ISIS ...   |
| Jul 17, 2019 | Donald J. Trump | Remarks at a "Keep America Great" Rally in Greenville, North Carolina"If we didn't have the bullshit ," (cheers and applause ...  |

♡ 67 5:43 PM - Feb 6, 2020

💬 76 people are talking about this

No media outlet has called a winner in Iowa, but Yang credited Sanders over Buttigieg:

And Stephen Colbert began questioning all of Iowa's claims:

VIDEOS OF THE DAY:

Colbert thinks Trump may have missed the part of the National Prayer Breakfast where they said "love your enemy":

Seth Meyers broke down Trump's post-impeachment rant:

Our video team made a side-by-side comparison of what Trump said yesterday with what Bill Clinton said after his acquittal by the Senate in 1999. Clinton said he was "profoundly sorry." Trump said "it was all bullshit." Trump spoke for an hour and two minutes. Clinton spoke for one minute and 36 seconds:

A side-by-side look at Clinton and Trump's post-acquittal speeches

And Trevor Noah turned Trump's State of the Union into a telenovela:

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202

Privacy Policy | Help

From: The Washington Post

To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov

Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Bernie Sanders is the man to beat in New Hampshire, as the anti-Sanders vote splinters
Date: Monday, February 10, 2020 10:51:58 AM

---

If you're having trouble reading this, click here.

---

PowerPost

The Daily 202

Morning intelligence for leaders

Share:

 Listen to The Big Idea

Powered by  LiveIntent

Bernie Sanders is the man to beat in New Hampshire, as the anti-Sanders vote splinters

Joe Biden holds a town hall meeting in the gym of Alvirne High School in Hudson, N.H., on Sunday night. (Bonnie Jo Mount/The Washington Post)

BY JAMES HOHMANN
with Mariana Alfaro

THE BIG IDEA:

HUDSON, N.H. – Karen Forleo thinks it would be a debacle if Democrats nominate Bernie Sanders. On the eve of the New Hampshire primary, the retired dental hygienist remains undecided between four of his rivals. She loves Pete Buttigieg’s youthful vigor, Joe Biden’s experience, Elizabeth Warren’s plans and Amy Klobuchar’s grit. But the 62-year-old isn’t sure who is the best bet to stop Sanders.

“I know he appeases the young students who have no money. Well, somebody has to pay for everything he wants,” Forleo said Sunday night after watching Biden speak for 90 minutes in a high school gymnasium here. She plans to attend rallies this afternoon for Klobuchar in Exeter and Warren in Portsmouth.

The Democrat from Lyndeborough, who supported Hillary Clinton in the 2016 primary, remains frustrated that Sanders didn’t do more to help her that fall. “If Bernie leads the ticket, I don’t think the American people are going to be ready for that. I don’t think he can beat Donald Trump,” she said. “And if Donald Trump thought he could, Trump would be all over him like he is with Joe Biden.”

The splintering among moderates like Forleo is an important part of the explanation for why Sanders, the independent senator from neighboring Vermont, is the favorite to win Tuesday’s contest. This is my sixth day on the ground here, and I’ve watched all the Democratic contenders interact with voters. Based on dozens of interviews and public polling, there’s a very fluid and incredibly tight three-way battle for third place.

Buttigieg has surged since the Iowa caucuses a week ago into a solid second-place position, prompting attacks from all directions that appear to have slowed his momentum a bit.

Biden has been tanking in the polls since finishing fourth in Iowa, prompting many people who had planned to vote for him because they perceived him as the most electable option to check out others. Klobuchar has been rising, drawing her biggest crowds of the campaign this weekend and reporting her best fundraising days yet after Friday night’s debate.

Warren, who represents neighboring Massachusetts and led in polls of this state last summer, seems to be losing altitude here on the ground, even though she finished ahead of Klobuchar in Iowa. About a third of the people at her rally at a middle school in Concord on Sunday afternoon streamed out before she finished talking.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) holds a town hall at the opera house in Rochester, N.H., on Saturday. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

A brew of other factors is also working to Sanders's advantage on the eve of the first-in-the-nation primary. Most Democrats don't want Sanders to be their nominee, but they cannot agree on who to rally behind instead. Despite rumbling concerns of the establishment, there's no organized Stop Sanders or Never Bernie movement. In fact, Democrats who don't support Sanders still hold largely favorable views of him. Unlike in Iowa, where he faced nearly a million dollars in attack ads, no one is on the air here with anti-Sanders commercials.

Sanders expanded his lead Sunday night in the final day of the Boston Globe-WBZ-Suffolk tracking poll. He garnered 27 percent among likely Democratic presidential primary voters, up from 24 to 25 percent in the previous six polls. Buttigieg, who briefly eclipsed Sanders in the poll one day last week, got 19 percent in the latest survey, followed by Klobuchar at 14 percent. Biden and Warren tied at 12 points. The margin of error is plus or minus 4.4 percent.

You should take all the polling with a grain of salt because this contest is so in flux, but two other surveys published Sunday also showcased Sanders's relative strength among likely voters.

A University of New Hampshire poll for CNN put Sanders at 28 percent, with Buttigieg at 21 percent, Biden at 12 percent and everyone else in single digits. Buttigieg led among voters who identify themselves as moderate or conservative, while Sanders led by more than 25 points among self-identified liberals. Asked whom they expect to win, regardless of whom they're supporting, 57 percent in the CNN picked Sanders. Interestingly, Sanders also took a seven-point lead over Biden on the question of which candidate has the best chance to defeat Trump in November, a reversal since Iowa.

A YouGov poll for CBS pegged Sanders at 29 percent, up two points compared to last month, with Buttigieg at 25 percent. Most of Buttigieg's double-digit gains in that survey come at the expense of Biden, who fell to 12 percent, trailing Warren. Only 39 percent of likely voters in the CBS poll said they've definitely made their final decision, and only six in 10 said they're enthusiastic about the candidate they're leaning toward. Sanders's supporters were the most enthusiastic.

They compete for different kinds of voters, but Sanders has been attacking Buttigieg partly out of a desire to prevent him from coalescing moderate support and thereby overtaking him in this must-win state.

---

Content from Blue Cross Blue Shield Association

Addressing the need for more affordable medicines

Americans pay too much for prescription drugs. Even generics can be too expensive. So we're investing in a non-profit company to produce the drugs people need at a price they can afford. Learn more.

---

Bernie Sanders waves to supporters on Saturday night at the New Hampshire Democratic Party's McIntyre-Shaheen Dinner in the SNHU Arena in Manchester, N.H. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

Sanders could benefit from a similar dynamic to what allowed Trump to amass an unsurpassable delegate lead during the 2016 Republican primaries, even as most GOP voters opposed him. The odds, at least initially, are that all the top contenders will stay in the race beyond New Hampshire, continuing to divide up support going into the next two early states. Mike Bloomberg is waiting in the wings, spending literally hundreds of millions of dollars in states that vote on March 3, also known as Super Tuesday, when a third of all pledged delegates to the convention are awarded.

Four years ago, Sanders struggled with nonwhite voters and hit a wall because of Latinos in Nevada and African Americans in South Carolina, the next two states to vote. The senator has worked hard to make inroads with communities of color ever since, and Biden's fade could boost Sanders in the Palmetto State by dividing up the black vote.

The Sanders campaign, which has invested heavily in organization, said that volunteers knocked on more than 150,000 doors on Saturday alone. Sanders's field program is focused more on mobilization of known supporters than persuasion of the undecided, a contrast to the late-surging campaigns like Klobuchar's and Buttigieg's who are still trying to identify potential backers. The campaign said 1,981 people attended Sanders's rally last night in Keene. Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-N.Y.) will join Sanders tonight for a massive concert the campaign is putting on in Durham, home to the University of New Hampshire, featuring The Strokes and Sunflower Bean.

The Sanders campaign slogan is "Us, not me." But his stump speech increasingly sounds like "Us versus Them." And the "Them" is the party establishment. He's added a little more pitchfork to his populist tone in the recent days. "We're taking on not only the whole Republican political establishment and Trump," Sanders said this weekend. "We're taking on the Democratic establishment." His supporters from four years ago remain angry at the system and feel let down by both parties. The undercurrent of anti-elite frustration that helped propel Trump still exists in 2020, despite strong top-line economic indicators.

Voters listen to Sanders speak during a town hall at the Rochester Opera House on Saturday. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

Nick Landry, 27 of Somersworth, said he has tried hard to keep an open mind since supporting Sanders four years ago. He considered Warren “very strongly.” He heard out entrepreneur Andrew Yang, who was intriguing, but he found his plan to give everyone a thousand bucks a month “kind of gimmicky.” After watching the Democratic debate on Friday night, he decided he’ll probably back Sanders again.

“We lost in 2016 by trying to play to the middle. As a liberal, I believe we should swing for the fences. And if we’re not going to win, let’s at least go down pushing for progressive ideals,” Landry said at a Sanders rally in the packed-to-capacity Opera House in Rochester. “Biden represents the establishment, and I think Pete and Amy are part of the establishment.”

The data analyst for an insurance company supports Medicare-for-all and badly wants stricter gun laws so that his kids will be safer at school. Landry said he totally understands why some Democrats fixate on electability, but he said Trump and Senate Republicans have shown themselves to be such “cartoonish villains” that he doesn’t believe the opposition should pander to win back the kinds of voters who supported Barack Obama in 2012 but Trump in 2016. “They’re keeping kids in cages,” Landry said. “I don’t want to necessarily be shaping our political platform around trying to appeal to people who aren’t bothered by that.”

Joe Biden speaks in Hudson. (Bonnie Jo Mount/The Washington Post)

Meanwhile, moderate voters express growing concern about what they see as a collective action problem. Siobhan Brace, 62, was the first person to ask Biden a question during his town hall meeting on Sunday night. “I love you a lot, but I am undecided,” she said. “I thought everybody did a great job in the debate, but I am afraid of that one of you cannot beat [Trump], but I think all of you could. Is there some way that you guys could put a dream team together and present that to the American people? And just say, like, Amy is going to be vice president and we’ll put Andrew [Yang] in charge of Commerce?”

The crowd cheered. Biden laughed. “There’s two ways to be on the dream team: run it or be picked,” he replied. “I promise that you my administration will look like the country. It will be made up of women and blacks and browns and people who represent the diversity of the country. There are at least six women I can think of at the top of my head who I wouldn’t have a moment’s hesitation in asking to be my vice president. I can say the same thing for at least four leading African Americans that I know.”

Reflecting the degree to which voters still believe he's in contention, Biden was asked again half an hour later who he might pick for vice president. Biden said he didn't want to be presumptuous, but then he hinted that he might select Buttigieg.

The 77-year-old said he could promise that he would not pick anyone who is older than him to be his No. 2, which would take out the 78-year-old Sanders. Biden added that he cannot imagine picking someone to be vice president who supports Medicare-for-all, a knock against Sanders. "But there are at least four people running that are, in fact, simpatico with where I am, starting with Indiana," he said, a reference to Buttigieg, the former mayor of South Bend, Ind.

Brace, who asked the first question to Biden, said in an interview afterward that she's "terrified" Trump will win. "Bernie's too way over there," she said, pointing with her left arm to the other side of the room. "The Republicans that are on the fence are going to come with a moderate. We need to get some of the Republicans who do know that Trump is crazy to come over to our side, and they're only going to do it with a moderate. So we've got to find a moderate."

Independents could have outsized influence in tomorrow's open Democratic primary because there's not a competitive race on the Republican side. Though Trump is flying up here to hold a rally in Manchester tonight, he faces no competitive GOP primary. Polls show the incumbent president getting more than 90 percent against former Massachusetts governor William Weld. New Hampshire has 416,000 "unaffiliated" voters, who get to pick which primary to participate in.

A supporter carries a poster of Bernie Sanders's head in in Manchester. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

Sanders defeated Clinton by 22 points in New Hampshire four years ago, garnering 60 percent, or 152,000 votes. Polls and interviews make clear that most of the people who backed him as the anti-Clinton candidate four years ago will not support him again this time. That said, I encountered a few people at the Sanders rally in Rochester who backed Clinton in the primary four years ago and are giving Sanders a close look.

“We need grass-roots change, and it may be more than some of the traditional establishment is willing to go, unfortunately,” said Colleen Hartnett, 57, of Windham, a software engineer who remains undecided. “I think I’m leaning more toward the progressive side rather than the moderate part of the party at this point. ... Because Republicans have gone so far, the contrast is just striking. I feel like the pendulum can't just go for a moderate swing."

Sanders knows he needs to win this neighboring state, which is why he doesn't hesitate to confidently predict victory. There's no apparent effort to manage expectations. "I am absolutely confident that, with the volunteer support we have, we are going to win in New Hampshire," Sanders said Saturday night in Manchester. He said his 2016 victory in New Hampshire was critical to winning 22 more states in the months that followed, and he said winning the primary helped put some of his ideas that were called radical four years ago into the mainstream. "We need to complete the revolution we started four years ago in New Hampshire," he said.

Warren losing altitude in New Hampshire also likely works to Sanders's advantage. She drew only a modest crowd Sunday afternoon to a middle school near the state capitol. "Our democracy hangs in the balance, and it is up to you, Massachusetts, to decide what to do," she said at the end of her speech, after more than a hundred people had left, many to go watch other candidates.

"New Hampshire," people in the audience yelled.

"And to the people of New Hampshire," she added, correcting herself with a laugh.

The crowd applauded. "Thank you," she said, appreciatively. "It is a hard time."

Warren brushed aside a question afterward about the people who left, calling it an "enthusiastic" crowd. "It looks like it is going to be a long battle to the nomination," she told reporters. "There are 55 more states and territories after this. ... I'm in it for the long haul.”

Other candidates who struggle to get covered are trying more colorfully to contrast themselves with Sanders. James Carville, the Democratic strategist who helped elect Bill Clinton in 1992, stumped late Saturday afternoon for Sen. Michael Bennet (D-Colo.) in Manchester. He emphasized that Sanders would be a problem for down-ballot Democrats, especially in competitive Senate and House races. “They’ll run away from Bernie Sanders like the devil running away from holy water,” Carville said. “If Michael Bennet is the nominee, Mitch McConnell’s going to look like he crapped a pineapple.”

Democrats trade attacks ahead of New Hampshire primary

MORE ON 2020:

-- The Iowa Democratic Party announced last night that Buttigieg would probably receive 14 delegates to the national presidential nominating convention from the chaotic caucuses, while Sanders would receive 12. But the number may not be final. Isaac Stanley-Becker reports: “Late Sunday, Sanders adviser Jeff Weaver said the campaign will seek a partial recanvass — a process he said would put the senator from Vermont on top in the delegate count. Sanders won the popular vote, netting support from about 6,000 more caucus-goers on the first expression of preferences, known as an alignment, than Buttigieg. But the delegate allocation is based on projected support for each candidate at the state convention, known as state delegate equivalents or SDEs, which is traditionally the metric used to declare a winner of the caucuses. ... Weaver said the campaign believes seven SDEs are at issue in the precincts they have identified, which is more than the 2.77 that separate the two Democrats. ... Chris Meagher, a spokesman for Buttigieg, said, ‘We’re focused on New Hampshire.’

“The Iowa party also said that eight delegates would go to [Warren] and six would go to [Biden]. ... The update from the state party reflected its review of 55 precincts, making up about 3 percent of the total 1,765. But the review involved only rectifying discrepancies between numbers reported on math worksheets completed by caucus leaders and publicly reported data. That left untouched errors tainting the actual worksheets, where volunteer leaders had entered complex calculations based on multiple counts of caucus-night preferences — and, in some cases, made mistakes. An attorney for the state party said officials were not authorized to alter the worksheets because they represented legal documents, according to an email Troy Price, the state party chairman, sent to members of the state party’s central committee.”

-- "Democratic leaders have edged toward the brink of open war with one another in recent days," Michael Scherer and Sean Sullivan report: "Advisers to the two men most responsible for overseeing the disastrous Iowa caucuses, national chairman Tom Perez and Iowa chairman Troy Price, have been privately deflecting blame onto each other, as the relationship between the two has become tense, advisers say. Price has refused to join Perez in calling for a canvass of voting records in the state, after finding out about Perez's demand from a deputy a few minutes before it was tweeted ... Price allies blame Perez for the botched caucus count, pointing to new party rules he implemented around transparency and accessibility that increased the burdens on the state. ..."

"At the start of the campaign, Sanders advisers repeatedly praised Perez ... But that tone shifted in recent weeks, as Sanders surrogates, supporters and staff have criticized Perez for changing the debate rules and for the appointees he has placed on the various convention committees ... Weaver has tried to strike a less aggressive tone, saying that the Sanders campaign still believes Perez has tried to be evenhanded. 'Of course, given our experience, we are ever vigilant,' he said."

-- Democrats fear a repeat of the Iowa chaos in Nevada. While some top party leaders call for the end of caucuses, top Nevada Democratic Party officials are trying to assure nervous voters that their fears are overblown. This includes former Senate majority leader Harry Reid, who has been working to soothe candidate concerns about potential caucus drama. (Holly Bailey)

-- Sanders and Biden continued sparring about the role each played 18 years ago during the run-up to the Iraq War. Michael Kranish reports: “In explaining their actions to voters, however, they have both left out key details that present a more complicated picture of how they handled what both now say is one of the worst foreign policy mistakes in American history. Biden not only played a key role in helping [George W.] Bush win passage of the measure, but he also privately assured the president that ‘I think you’re doing it the exact right way,’ according to notes taken at a meeting by White House press secretary Ari Fleischer. In that meeting, Bush told Biden that though he would attempt to use diplomacy, he would use the authority to invade if he believed it was necessary, according to Fleischer’s notes. Sanders, meanwhile, agreed at the time with much of what Bush said about Iraq, including the view that Iraqi President Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction.”

-- In New Hampshire’s poorest city, there are few indications of Trump’s “blue-collar boom.” Griff Witte reports: “The unemployment rate, which was touching double digits 10 years ago as Berlin weathered the collapse of its signature mill, is down to 3 percent. The local paper is stuffed with help-wanted ads. Property values are climbing as newcomers move in. But Berlin — which thrived through most of the 20th century before the bottom fell out in the early 2000s — hardly feels like a city on the mend. More than a decade into the longest economic expansion America has ever known, residents say just about the only jobs available pay minimum wage with no benefits as out-of-pocket health-care costs surge. The last elementary school shuttered last year, capping a long-term exodus of young families. The once-bustling downtown is so scarred by closures, demolitions and fires that it looks, according to the city's mayor, 'like a bomb was dropped in the middle of it.'"

The Daily 202's
BIG IDEA

Get James's insight into Washington every weekday on your smart speaker or favorite podcast player.

Subscribe on Amazon Echo, Google Home, Apple HomePod and other podcast players.

Welcome to the Daily 202, PowerPost's morning briefing for decision-makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter.

Highlights from the 2020 Oscars: 'Parasite' wins best picture and makes history

ABOUT LAST NIGHT:

-- “Parasite” became the first foreign-language film to win the Oscar for best picture during last night’s Academy Awards. Emily Yahr, Sonia Rao, Travis Andrews, Bethonie Butler and Elahe Izadi report: “In addition to making history in the night’s most prestigious category, the darkly comedic thriller is the first South Korean film to ever be nominated for an Oscar. Filmmaker Bong Joon-ho also won in the international feature and original screenplay categories, as well as best director -- triumphing over ‘1917’ front-runner Sam Mendes, whose film didn’t wind up with quite as many awards as expected. (The World War I epic, made to look like it was filmed in one shot, did land cinematographer Roger Deakins his second win.)”

All four acting trophies wound up with the artists who dominated this awards season: Joaquin Phoenix and Renée Zellweger won for "Joker" and "Judy," and supporting actors Brad Pitt and Laura Dern for

"Once Upon a Time in Hollywood" and "Marriage Story." In an emotional roller coaster of a speech, Phoenix called for unity. "I've been thinking a lot about some of the distressing issues that we are facing collectively, and I think at times we feel or we're made to feel that we champion different causes," he said. "But for me, I see commonality. I think whether we're talking about gender inequality or racism or queer rights or indigenous rights or animal rights, we're talking about the right against injustice."

-- Other notable winners included:

- Elton John and Bernie Taupin won best original song for "(I'm Gonna) Love Me Again," from "Rocketman."
- "American Factory," produced by Barack and Michelle Obama, won best documentary feature.
- Taika Waititi won best adapted screenplay for "Jojo Rabbit," becoming the first indigenous director to ever win an Oscar.
- Find a complete list here.

-- Commentary from The Post's cultural critics:

- Ann Hornaday: "'Parasite' upset means progress. But is it a revolution?"
- Hank Stuever: "A decent show, if you like your Oscar nights fully automated."
- Elahe Izadi: "The Oscars nominated 'Parasite' but looked right past its all-Asian cast. It's part of a pattern."
- Robin Givhan: "The Oscars red carpet was diverse,

even if the nominees weren't.”

QUOTE OF THE DAY: “I’m ready to drink tonight,” said Bong, speaking English for the first time onstage that night, as he accepted the Oscar for best international feature. Later, after winning the night’s top award, Bong didn’t take the microphone, allowing Miky Lee, the mogul who built South Korea’s first movie multiplex, to speak instead.

Acting director of the Office of Management and Budget Russ Vought presses the button that starts the machine that will print copies of President Trump's proposed budget for the 2021 fiscal year at the Government Publishing Office. (Samuel Corum/Getty Images)

THE PRESIDENT REVEALS HIS PRIORITIES:

-- The White House will propose a $4.8 trillion budget that would fail to eliminate the federal deficit over the next 10 years. “Instead, White House officials plan to say their budget proposal would close the deficit by 2035,” Jeff Stein and Erica Werner report. “During President Trump’s first year in office, his advisers said their budget plan would eliminate the deficit by around 2028. This new budget will mark the third consecutive time that they abandon that 10-year goal and instead suggest a 15-year target. This new trend shows how little progress the White House is making in dealing with ballooning government debt, something GOP party leaders had made a top goal during the Obama administration.

“Trump’s first budget projected the deficit in 2021 would be $456 billion. Instead, it is projected to be more than double that amount. ... As a presidential candidate, Trump said he would eliminate not just the annual federal deficit but all debt held by the United States after eight years in office. ... The federal debt has already grown by about $3 trillion under Trump. ... The $4.8 trillion budget for 2021 would represent a $700 billion surge over levels from 2018. ... It would also propose extending tax cuts for families and individuals that are set to expire at the end of 2025. Budget experts have projected that extending those tax cuts would reduce revenue by roughly $1 trillion. ...

“The Wall Street Journal first reported the budget aims to cut spending on safety-net programs such as Medicaid and food stamps ... The budget is expected to propose 5 percent net cuts in domestic discretionary spending, which is expected to include cutting the budget of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. However, the part of CDC funding that deals with fighting the coronavirus will remain unchanged. ...

“At the same time, the budget will maintain Pentagon spending at around its current level, or boost it if increases in a so-called overseas contingency account are included. As in past budgets, this one will cut heavily into programs targeting low-income communities, including slashing community development block grants and home heating assistance. The Education Department will be cut by $6 billion ... The proposed budgets for nondefense domestic agencies, programs that deal with housing, environmental protection and agriculture, will fall well below spending caps that lawmakers and the administration already agreed to in a bipartisan budget deal for 2021. That all but ensures the budget will face bipartisan opposition on Capitol Hill.”

-- Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) said the Justice Department is vetting information that Trump’s personal attorney Rudy Giuliani delivered regarding Hunter Biden’s work on the board of a Ukrainian energy company. Paul Kane reports: “Graham, citing an early-morning conversation with Attorney General William P. Barr, said [Giuliani] is giving his information to national security experts and that he would back off his own plans to use the Senate Judiciary Committee as a vehicle to investigate the Biden family. ‘The Department of Justice is receiving information coming out of the Ukraine from Rudy to see — he told me that they have created a process that Rudy could give information and they would see if it’s verified,’ [Graham] said on CBS’s ‘Face the Nation.’ He warned that Giuliani might be getting bad information from his trips to Ukraine as part of a disinformation campaign by Russian security experts, citing their effort to disrupt the 2016 presidential campaign. ...

“Graham said he called Barr and Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.), chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, on Sunday morning after hearing about Giuliani’s interview Saturday night

on Fox News's 'Watters' World.' During the interview, the former New York City mayor made various claims about the information he has cobbled together from Ukrainian sources and said Graham should use his committee to investigate the Bidens. ... 'I have what I used to call when I was U.S. attorney, a smoking gun,' Giuliani said. ... Then, just as 'Face the Nation' started Sunday morning, Trump sent out a tweet urging Graham to launch an undefined investigations. ... Graham appeared to back away from his assertions in recent weeks that he would lead a probe into [Joe Biden's] time overseeing Ukraine policy while his son served on the board of Burisma."

-- The chairman of the group that runs the Conservative Political Action Conference warned that he would be afraid for the physical safety of Sen. Mitt Romney (R-Utah) were he to attend the annual convention. Matt Schlapp ripped the 2012 GOP nominee, who announced he was dropping out of the 2008 Republican nominating contest at CPAC. (HuffPost)

-- While Romney is being vilified by Trump and his allies inside the Beltway, many of his conservative constituents back home in Utah still have his back. From NBC News: "[We] spoke with dozens of voters in Utah in the days immediately following the Senate's vote to acquit the president. Most identified themselves as Republicans who had supported Romney in 2018 and said that regardless of their opinion of the president, Romney's decision to go against his party was one that they understood and respected for its honesty. Many said they would not hold it against the first-term senator when he faces re-election in 2024. ... 'I feel like [Romney] stands up and says, 'This is what I think' and you have the right to accept or reject that,' said Meralee Stallings, 62, who works for The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. 'I think we are getting away from that, too. It's like if you don't agree with my opinion, then you're wrong.' Stallings, who voted third-party for president in 2016 and supported Romney in 2018, said she is leaning toward voting for Romney again. 'I don't agree with everything that Romney has done,' she said, 'but if you're going to be true to what you think is correct, then that's fine with me.'"

-- Sacred Native American burial sites are being blown up for Trump's border wall, an Arizona congressman and other advocates allege. Paulina Firozi reports: "The Organ Pipe Cactus National Monument is an internationally recognized biosphere reserve ... It includes about 330,000 acres of designated wilderness and is home to ancestral grounds sacred to the Tohono O'odham Nation, one of at least a dozen Native American groups that claim connections to grounds within the monument. Rep. Raúl M. Grijalva (D-Ariz.), whose district includes the reservation, said crews this week began blasting through parts of Monument Hill, which includes a burial site for the Tohono O'odham Nation ... Grijalva, chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee, visited the location ahead of the construction and described the site in a video posted to social media. Monument Hill, where he said explosions are now occurring, is a site where members of the Tohono O'odham Nation have buried members of opposing tribes."

-- Trump used a Philadelphia girl's story to attack public schools and promote the school-choice movement. But the girl was already studying at one of the city's most desired charters. Janiyah Davis is a student at a recently opened charter school so popular that it received 6,500 applications for 100 seats. How she landed in the audience during Trump's State of the Union – and with a scholarship to attend private school financed by Betsy DeVos – remains a bit of a mystery even to her mother, who told the Philadelphia Enquirer that she had no idea Janiyah would be mentioned during the speech.

-- A gunman wounded two NYPD officers in separate attacks that police believe were attempted assassinations. Katie Mettler reports: “One officer was shot in the neck and chin Saturday night when the suspected gunman fired several rounds into a marked police van and then fled, authorities said. At 7 a.m. Sunday morning, police say, the same man walked into the Bronx precinct headquarters and opened fire again, striking a lieutenant in the arm and surrendering after his 9mm handgun ran out of bullets. The man, who is in police custody but has not been identified, has a ‘lengthy violent criminal history,’ Police Commissioner Dermot Shea said at a news conference on Sunday. ... [Trump] weighed in, using the shootings to admonish [Mayor Bill] de Blasio and [Gov. Andrew] Cuomo, who are both Democrats and critics of the president. ‘I grew up in New York City and, over many years, got to watch how GREAT NYC’s ‘Finest’ are,’ Trump tweeted. ‘Now, because of weak leadership at Governor & Mayor, stand away (water thrown at them) regulations, and lack of support, our wonderful NYC police are under assault. Stop this now!’”

-- A man was arrested in Florida on charges of driving a van into a tent full of Trump supporters. Katie Mettler and Hannah Knowles report: “The Jacksonville Sheriff’s Office has arrested Gregory William Loel Timm, 27, on two counts of aggravated assault on a person older than 65 and one count each of criminal mischief and driving with a suspended license. No one was hurt in the incident. ... As word spread and Republican Party leaders and elected officials weighed in, Trump issued a warning on Twitter. 'Be careful tough guys who you play with!' he wrote alongside a statement from GOP Chairwoman Ronna McDaniel. She called the incident an 'unprovoked, senseless' attack and said 'these disgusting acts will only make us work harder to win in November.'"

The coronavirus is forcing cruise ships to take drastic measures

THE NEW WORLD ORDER:

-- The number of people infected and killed by the coronavirus continues to climb worldwide, but the vast majority are still concentrated in the original outbreak zone of Wuhan. Gerry Shih, Alex Horton and Marisa Iati report: "The global death toll from the novel coronavirus reached more than 900 ... after previously surpassing the 774 fatalities attributed to the outbreak of the SARS coronavirus in 2002 and 2003. Among the dead was the first American, a 60-year-old woman who died Thursday in Wuhan. ... An international team lead by the World Health Organization left for China to conduct an investigation of the coronavirus. ... As infections overwhelm the afflicted province, the rest of China might be seeing the effects of strict quarantine measures, Chinese health officials said Sunday. In all parts of China outside Hubei, the daily number of new infections dropped from nearly 900 on Feb. 3 to 509 on Saturday ... [WHO] officials also said they had seen the number of new cases taper in recent days. ... The Chinese Ambassador to the United States pushed back Sunday on the suggestion by Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.) that the coronavirus may have come from China's biological weapons program. Appearing on CBS' 'Face the Nation' on Sunday, Ambassador Cui Tiankai acknowledged that much about the virus remains unknown, but he said spreading unsubstantiated theories could cause panic and amplify racial discrimination."

-- Infections aboard a quarantined cruise ship off the coast of Japan have surged, bringing to 136 the number of people who are known to have been infected on the vessel. There are a total of 3,700 passengers and crew aboard.

-- Toilet paper is growing scarce in Hong Kong. So is trust in the government. Shibani Mahtani reports: "With coronavirus fears gripping the city, a rumor of impending shortages circulating on social media had apparently spooked consumers, and pack after pack of toilet paper was flying off the shelves. Shoppers could barely carry the number of rolls they were snatching. By evening, not a single roll was left. The panic stretched through the weekend. No more green tea-scented toilet rolls, no more quilted plush rolls, no more jumbo rolls promising 'clean comfort' and an inviting picture of a fat Labrador puppy. Such scenes have played out citywide, documented in videos showcasing the frenzy. ... Some are resorting to dramatic and costly measures to procure necessities. ... As one Bloomberg columnist put it: The semiautonomous financial hub, once known as a bastion of global trade and capitalism, is now showing signs of a failed state."

-- A Chinese lawyer and journalist whose Wuhan dispatches offered a chilling glimpse inside the coronavirus hot spot has been missing since Thursday, his relatives said. Derek Hawkins reports: "Chen Qiushi slipped into the city of 11 million on Jan. 24, just after a citywide lockdown took effect, and spent days interviewing people about the outbreak and filming what he saw. On Thursday, after several of his reports circulated around the world, Chen stopped responding to calls and messages, setting off an online campaign to track him down. The 34-year-old knew he would be a likely target for law enforcement, so he gave select friends access to his accounts, instructing them to change the passwords if they went more than 12 hours without hearing from him. According to Chen's friends, authorities told his family over the weekend that he had been forcibly quarantined in an undisclosed location. Xu Xiaodong, a well-known mixed martial artist and friend of Chen's, said in a YouTube live stream that Qingdao public security officers and state security officers told his parents he had been 'detained in the name of quarantine.'"

-- Afghanistan claims the Islamic State was "obliterated." But

fighters who managed to get away could stage a resurgence. Susannah George, Siobhán O'Grady and Sharif Hassan report: "It has now become clear that military operations also scattered many fighters they aimed to defeat: The group's senior leadership fled further into the Spin Ghar mountains, crossing into Pakistan or pushing north into Konar province's more rugged terrain. Others simply went into hiding. Afghan officials estimate that hundreds of Islamic State fighters continue to operate across the country, raising the dangerous potential for a resurgence. Interviews with Afghan and U.S. officials and seven self-described Islamic State members now in Afghan custody paint a picture of a group that has a history of persevering despite territorial and leadership losses, thanks in part to a sophisticated recruitment system and the use of extreme violence to control civilian populations."

-- Two U.S. Army Special Forces soldiers were killed and six U.S. troops were wounded after a gunman opened fire in an eastern Afghanistan compound this weekend. Some Afghan officials said the attacker was a member of the Afghan security forces. (Susannah George and Sharif Hassan)

-- The Trump administration is considering suspending humanitarian assistance to Yemen as part of an international response to new restrictions imposed by Iranian-linked Houthi rebels. Missy Ryan and John Hudson report: "That one of Yemen's biggest donors is considering such a move, which, if implemented, could worsen already dire conditions, underscores the challenge of managing aid operations in areas controlled by a rebel movement that is hostile to the West. A senior State Department official said the United States has not made a final decision but was coordinating with other donor nations and aid organizations on possible responses to a 2 percent 'tax' on assistance projects and other new measures in swaths of Yemen administered by the Houthis."

-- German Chancellor Angela Merkel's would-be successor is expected to resign today following a rocky year as party leader. Loveday Morris and Luisa Beck report: "Annegret Kramp-Karrenbauer, the leader of Merkel's Christian Democrats, said she will not run for chancellor in next year's elections, German news agency DPA reported, citing a party spokesperson. She will step aside as party leader when a successor is found. Kramp-Karrenbauer, also known by her initials AKK, announced the news in a meeting with party officials on Monday morning ... A protege of Merkel, AKK beat out party rivals to take over the reins of the conservative Christian Democrats in late 2018. However, she has failed to rally the party behind her and there was widespread speculation that she would be ousted before the annual party conference in November."

-- Heavily armed police and soldiers forced their way into El Salvador's Congress, under the president's command, demanding the approval of a $109 million loan to better equip themselves. From Reuters: "President Nayib Bukele and a group of soldiers armed with automatic weapons briefly occupied El Salvador's Congress on Sunday, stepping up a pressure campaign to force lawmakers to back a crime-fighting plan. Watched by soldiers in full battle uniform, Bukele, 38, sat in the seat reserved for the president of Congress and cupped his hands together to pray, he said, for patience with lawmakers, few of whom turned up at the special session. 'If those shameless people don't approve the plan of territorial control, we'll summon you here again (next) Sunday,' he told supporters in a fiery speech outside, as he left the building."

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

Former presidential candidate Marianne Williamson took a shot at Buttigieg, who talks a great deal about creating a culture of belonging:

Michael Bennet and his family took a road trip to the North Country of New Hampshire to meet with voters:

Michael Bennet ✓
@MichaelBennet

We're in Dixville Notch, home of the #FITN primary where residents cast votes at midnight. My family & I are deeply grateful to them for sitting down with us today.

New Hampshire is central to my campaign because of traditions like this—where face-to-face conversations matter.

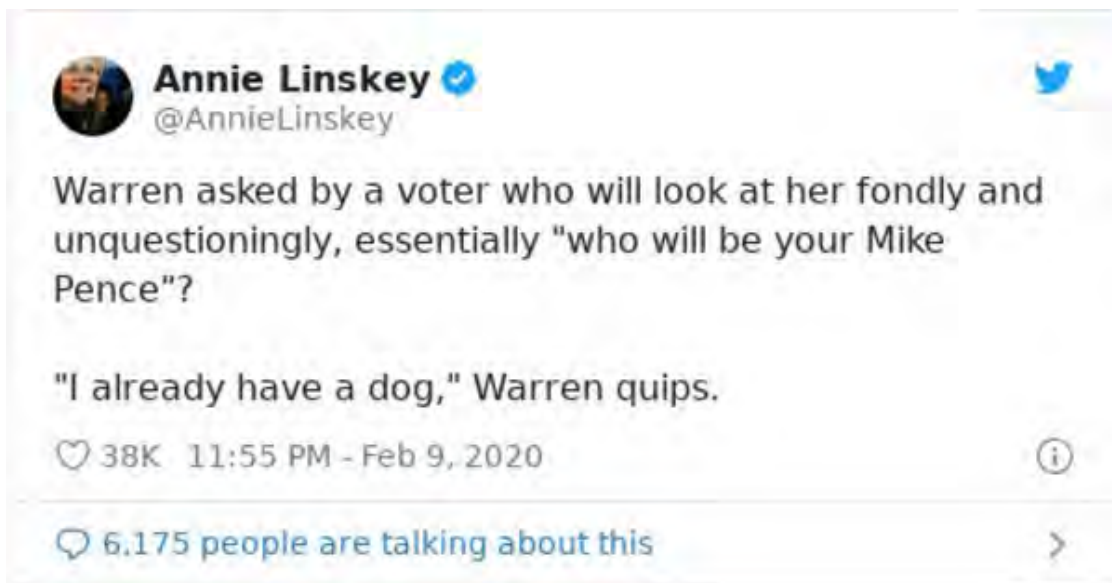

♡ 94 12:41 AM - Feb 10, 2020

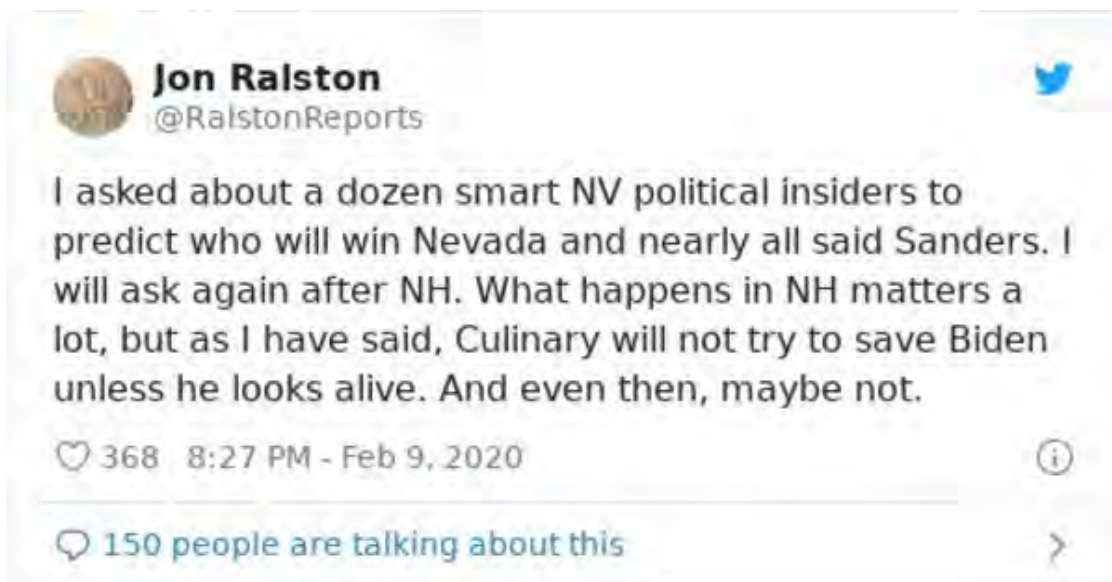

💬 21 people are talking about this

Another scene from the trail:

From a plugged-in political reporter in Nevada:

Amy Klobuchar's face during a particularly tense moment in last Friday's debate resonated among some viewers:

Shannon Watts ✓
@shannonrwatts

What's it's like to be a woman on Twitter.

♥ 37.2K 10:44 PM - Feb 8, 2020

💬 5,068 people are talking about this

Actress Natalie Portman's Oscar outfit had a special nod to the female directors who weren't nominated for the award:

Amy Kaufman ✓
@AmyKinLA

Natalie Portman embroidered her Dior cape with all of the female directors who weren't nominated for #Oscars. Check out her explanation here.

♡ 323K 12:19 AM - Feb 10, 2020

💬 77.1K people are talking about this

The winner of last night's Oscar for best animated short reminded us all that it all started with a tweet:

Matthew A. Cherry ✓
@MatthewACherry

Nailed it twitter.com/matthewacherry...

Matthew A. Cherry ✓ @MatthewACherry

Any 3D artists follow me? I got an Oscar worthy short film idea to go with this image. Get at me 🤪

♥ 421K 2:06 AM - Feb 10, 2020

💬 75.1K people are talking about this

And "Parasite" director Bong Joon-ho apologized to the film academy's engravers for having too many Oscars:

Bong Joon Ho apologizes to the engravers for having too many #Oscars bit.ly/2H6fGhj

4,443 7:12 AM - Feb 10, 2020

1,452 people are talking about this

VIDEOS OF THE DAY:

In case you missed it, our video team condensed Friday night's debate into four minutes:

The New Hampshire Democratic debate, in less than 4 minutes

“Saturday Night Live” spoofed the debate in its cold open:

And SNL also had a "local expert" talk about Trump's acquittal by the Senate:

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202

Privacy Policy | Help

From: The Washington Post

To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov

Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Bernie Sanders is the man to beat in New Hampshire, as the anti-Sanders vote splinters
Date: Monday, February 10, 2020 10:52:03 AM

---

If you're having trouble reading this, click here.

---

PowerPost

The Daily 202

Morning intelligence for leaders

Share:

 Listen to The Big Idea

Powered by  LiveIntent

Bernie Sanders is the man to beat in New Hampshire, as the anti-Sanders vote splinters

Joe Biden holds a town hall meeting in the gym of Alvirne High School in Hudson, N.H., on Sunday night. (Bonnie Jo Mount/The Washington Post)

BY JAMES HOHMANN
with Mariana Alfaro

THE BIG IDEA:

HUDSON, N.H. – Karen Forleo thinks it would be a debacle if Democrats nominate Bernie Sanders. On the eve of the New Hampshire primary, the retired dental hygienist remains undecided between four of his rivals. She loves Pete Buttigieg’s youthful vigor, Joe Biden’s experience, Elizabeth Warren’s plans and Amy Klobuchar’s grit. But the 62-year-old isn’t sure who is the best bet to stop Sanders.

“I know he appeases the young students who have no money. Well,

somebody has to pay for everything he wants,” Forleo said Sunday night after watching Biden speak for 90 minutes in a high school gymnasium here. She plans to attend rallies this afternoon for Klobuchar in Exeter and Warren in Portsmouth.

The Democrat from Lyndeborough, who supported Hillary Clinton in the 2016 primary, remains frustrated that Sanders didn’t do more to help her that fall. “If Bernie leads the ticket, I don’t think the American people are going to be ready for that. I don’t think he can beat Donald Trump,” she said. “And if Donald Trump thought he could, Trump would be all over him like he is with Joe Biden.”

The splintering among moderates like Forleo is an important part of the explanation for why Sanders, the independent senator from neighboring Vermont, is the favorite to win Tuesday’s contest. This is my sixth day on the ground here, and I’ve watched all the Democratic contenders interact with voters. Based on dozens of interviews and public polling, there’s a very fluid and incredibly tight three-way battle for third place.

Buttigieg has surged since the Iowa caucuses a week ago into a solid second-place position, prompting attacks from all directions that appear to have slowed his momentum a bit.

Biden has been tanking in the polls since finishing fourth in Iowa, prompting many people who had planned to vote for him because they perceived him as the most electable option to check out others. Klobuchar has been rising, drawing her biggest crowds of the campaign this weekend and reporting her best fundraising days yet after Friday night’s debate.

Warren, who represents neighboring Massachusetts and led in polls of this state last summer, seems to be losing altitude here on the ground, even though she finished ahead of Klobuchar in Iowa. About a third of the people at her rally at a middle school in Concord on Sunday afternoon streamed out before she finished talking.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) holds a town hall at the opera house in Rochester, N.H., on Saturday. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

A brew of other factors is also working to Sanders's advantage on the eve of the first-in-the-nation primary. Most Democrats don't want Sanders to be their nominee, but they cannot agree on who to rally behind instead. Despite rumbling concerns of the establishment, there's no organized Stop Sanders or Never Bernie movement. In fact, Democrats who don't support Sanders still hold largely favorable views of him. Unlike in Iowa, where he faced nearly a million dollars in attack ads, no one is on the air here with anti-Sanders commercials.

Sanders expanded his lead Sunday night in the final day of the Boston Globe-WBZ-Suffolk tracking poll. He garnered 27 percent among likely Democratic presidential primary voters, up from 24 to 25 percent in the previous six polls. Buttigieg, who briefly eclipsed Sanders in the poll one day last week, got 19 percent in the latest survey, followed by Klobuchar at 14 percent. Biden and Warren tied at 12 points. The margin of error is plus or minus 4.4 percent.

You should take all the polling with a grain of salt because this contest is so in flux, but two other surveys published Sunday also showcased Sanders's relative strength among likely voters.

A University of New Hampshire poll for CNN put Sanders at 28 percent, with Buttigieg at 21 percent, Biden at 12 percent and everyone else in single digits. Buttigieg led among voters who identify themselves as moderate or conservative, while Sanders led by more than 25 points among self-identified liberals. Asked whom they expect to win, regardless of whom they're supporting, 57 percent in the CNN picked Sanders. Interestingly, Sanders also took a seven-point lead over Biden on the question of which candidate has the best chance to defeat Trump in November, a reversal since Iowa.

A YouGov poll for CBS pegged Sanders at 29 percent, up two points compared to last month, with Buttigieg at 25 percent. Most of Buttigieg's double-digit gains in that survey come at the expense of Biden, who fell to 12 percent, trailing Warren. Only 39 percent of likely voters in the CBS poll said they've definitely made their final decision, and only six in 10 said they're enthusiastic about the candidate they're leaning toward. Sanders's supporters were the most enthusiastic.

They compete for different kinds of voters, but Sanders has been attacking Buttigieg partly out of a desire to prevent him from coalescing moderate support and thereby overtaking him in this must-win state.

---

Content from Blue Cross Blue Shield Association

Addressing the need for more affordable medicines

Americans pay too much for prescription drugs. Even generics can be too expensive. So we're investing in a non-profit company to produce the drugs people need at a price they can afford. Learn more.

---

Bernie Sanders waves to supporters on Saturday night at the New Hampshire Democratic Party's McIntyre-Shaheen Dinner in the SNHU Arena in Manchester, N.H. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

Sanders could benefit from a similar dynamic to what allowed Trump to amass an unsurpassable delegate lead during the 2016 Republican primaries, even as most GOP voters opposed him. The odds, at least initially, are that all the top contenders will stay in the race beyond New Hampshire, continuing to divide up support going into the next two early states. Mike Bloomberg is waiting in the wings, spending literally hundreds of millions of dollars in states that vote on March 3, also known as Super Tuesday, when a third of all pledged delegates to the convention are awarded.

Four years ago, Sanders struggled with nonwhite voters and hit a wall because of Latinos in Nevada and African Americans in South Carolina, the next two states to vote. The senator has worked hard to make inroads with communities of color ever since, and Biden's fade could boost Sanders in the Palmetto State by dividing up the black vote.

The Sanders campaign, which has invested heavily in organization, said that volunteers knocked on more than 150,000 doors on Saturday alone. Sanders's field program is focused more on mobilization of known supporters than persuasion of the undecided, a contrast to the late-surging campaigns like Klobuchar's and Buttigieg's who are still trying to identify potential backers. The campaign said 1,981 people attended Sanders's rally last night in Keene. Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-N.Y.) will join Sanders tonight for a massive concert the campaign is putting on in Durham, home to the University of New Hampshire, featuring The Strokes and Sunflower Bean.

The Sanders campaign slogan is "Us, not me." But his stump speech increasingly sounds like "Us versus Them." And the "Them" is the party establishment. He's added a little more pitchfork to his populist tone in the recent days. "We're taking on not only the whole Republican political establishment and Trump," Sanders said this weekend. "We're taking on the Democratic establishment." His supporters from four years ago remain angry at the system and feel let down by both parties. The undercurrent of anti-elite frustration that helped propel Trump still exists in 2020, despite strong top-line economic indicators.

Voters listen to Sanders speak during a town hall at the Rochester Opera House on Saturday. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

Nick Landry, 27 of Somersworth, said he has tried hard to keep an open mind since supporting Sanders four years ago. He considered Warren “very strongly.” He heard out entrepreneur Andrew Yang, who was intriguing, but he found his plan to give everyone a thousand bucks a month “kind of gimmicky.” After watching the Democratic debate on Friday night, he decided he’ll probably back Sanders again.

“We lost in 2016 by trying to play to the middle. As a liberal, I believe we should swing for the fences. And if we’re not going to win, let’s at least go down pushing for progressive ideals,” Landry said at a Sanders rally in the packed-to-capacity Opera House in Rochester. “Biden represents the establishment, and I think Pete and Amy are part of the establishment.”

The data analyst for an insurance company supports Medicare-for-all and badly wants stricter gun laws so that his kids will be safer at school. Landry said he totally understands why some Democrats fixate on electability, but he said Trump and Senate Republicans have shown themselves to be such “cartoonish villains” that he doesn’t believe the opposition should pander to win back the kinds of voters who supported Barack Obama in 2012 but Trump in 2016. “They’re keeping kids in cages,” Landry said. “I don’t want to necessarily be shaping our political platform around trying to appeal to people who aren’t bothered by that.”

Joe Biden speaks in Hudson. (Bonnie Jo Mount/The Washington Post)

Meanwhile, moderate voters express growing concern about what they see as a collective action problem. Siobhan Brace, 62, was the first person to ask Biden a question during his town hall meeting on Sunday night. “I love you a lot, but I am undecided,” she said. “I thought everybody did a great job in the debate, but I am afraid of that one of you cannot beat [Trump], but I think all of you could. Is there some way that you guys could put a dream team together and present that to the American people? And just say, like, Amy is going to be vice president and we’ll put Andrew [Yang] in charge of Commerce?”

The crowd cheered. Biden laughed. “There’s two ways to be on the dream team: run it or be picked,” he replied. “I promise that you my administration will look like the country. It will be made up of women and blacks and browns and people who represent the diversity of the country. There are at least six women I can think of at the top of my head who I wouldn’t have a moment’s hesitation in asking to be my vice president. I can say the same thing for at least four leading African Americans that I know.”

Reflecting the degree to which voters still believe he's in contention, Biden was asked again half an hour later who he might pick for vice president. Biden said he didn't want to be presumptuous, but then he hinted that he might select Buttigieg.

The 77-year-old said he could promise that he would not pick anyone who is older than him to be his No. 2, which would take out the 78-year-old Sanders. Biden added that he cannot imagine picking someone to be vice president who supports Medicare-for-all, a knock against Sanders. "But there are at least four people running that are, in fact, simpatico with where I am, starting with Indiana," he said, a reference to Buttigieg, the former mayor of South Bend, Ind.

Brace, who asked the first question to Biden, said in an interview afterward that she's "terrified" Trump will win. "Bernie's too way over there," she said, pointing with her left arm to the other side of the room. "The Republicans that are on the fence are going to come with a moderate. We need to get some of the Republicans who do know that Trump is crazy to come over to our side, and they're only going to do it with a moderate. So we've got to find a moderate."

Independents could have outsized influence in tomorrow's open Democratic primary because there's not a competitive race on the Republican side. Though Trump is flying up here to hold a rally in Manchester tonight, he faces no competitive GOP primary. Polls show the incumbent president getting more than 90 percent against former Massachusetts governor William Weld. New Hampshire has 416,000 "unaffiliated" voters, who get to pick which primary to participate in.

A supporter carries a poster of Bernie Sanders's head in in Manchester. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

Sanders defeated Clinton by 22 points in New Hampshire four years ago, garnering 60 percent, or 152,000 votes. Polls and interviews make clear that most of the people who backed him as the anti-Clinton candidate four years ago will not support him again this time. That said, I encountered a few people at the Sanders rally in Rochester who backed Clinton in the primary four years ago and are giving Sanders a close look.

“We need grass-roots change, and it may be more than some of the traditional establishment is willing to go, unfortunately,” said Colleen Hartnett, 57, of Windham, a software engineer who remains undecided. “I think I’m leaning more toward the progressive side rather than the moderate part of the party at this point. ... Because Republicans have gone so far, the contrast is just striking. I feel like

the pendulum can't just go for a moderate swing."

Sanders knows he needs to win this neighboring state, which is why he doesn't hesitate to confidently predict victory. There's no apparent effort to manage expectations. "I am absolutely confident that, with the volunteer support we have, we are going to win in New Hampshire," Sanders said Saturday night in Manchester. He said his 2016 victory in New Hampshire was critical to winning 22 more states in the months that followed, and he said winning the primary helped put some of his ideas that were called radical four years ago into the mainstream. "We need to complete the revolution we started four years ago in New Hampshire," he said.

Warren losing altitude in New Hampshire also likely works to Sanders's advantage. She drew only a modest crowd Sunday afternoon to a middle school near the state capitol. "Our democracy hangs in the balance, and it is up to you, Massachusetts, to decide what to do," she said at the end of her speech, after more than a hundred people had left, many to go watch other candidates.

"New Hampshire," people in the audience yelled.

"And to the people of New Hampshire," she added, correcting herself with a laugh.

The crowd applauded. "Thank you," she said, appreciatively. "It is a hard time."

Warren brushed aside a question afterward about the people who left, calling it an "enthusiastic" crowd. "It looks like it is going to be a long battle to the nomination," she told reporters. "There are 55 more states and territories after this. ... I'm in it for the long haul.”

Other candidates who struggle to get covered are trying more colorfully to contrast themselves with Sanders. James Carville, the Democratic strategist who helped elect Bill Clinton in 1992, stumped late Saturday afternoon for Sen. Michael Bennet (D-Colo.) in Manchester. He emphasized that Sanders would be a problem for down-ballot Democrats, especially in competitive Senate and House races. “They’ll run away from Bernie Sanders like the devil running away from holy water,” Carville said. “If Michael Bennet is the nominee, Mitch McConnell’s going to look like he crapped a pineapple.”

Democrats trade attacks ahead of New Hampshire primary

MORE ON 2020:

-- The Iowa Democratic Party announced last night that Buttigieg would probably receive 14 delegates to the national presidential nominating convention from the chaotic caucuses, while Sanders would receive 12. But the number may not be final. Isaac Stanley-Becker reports: “Late Sunday, Sanders adviser Jeff Weaver said the campaign will seek a partial recanvass — a process he said would put the senator from Vermont on top in the delegate count. Sanders won the popular vote, netting support from about 6,000 more caucus-goers on the first expression of preferences, known as an alignment, than Buttigieg. But the delegate allocation is based on projected support for each candidate at the state convention, known as state delegate equivalents or SDEs, which is traditionally the metric used to declare a winner of the caucuses. ... Weaver said the campaign believes seven SDEs are at issue in the precincts they have identified, which is more than the 2.77 that separate the two Democrats. ... Chris Meagher, a spokesman for Buttigieg, said, ‘We’re focused on New Hampshire.’

“The Iowa party also said that eight delegates would go to [Warren] and six would go to [Biden]. ... The update from the state party reflected its review of 55 precincts, making up about 3 percent of the total 1,765. But the review involved only rectifying discrepancies between numbers reported on math worksheets completed by caucus leaders and publicly reported data. That left untouched errors tainting the actual worksheets, where volunteer leaders had entered complex calculations based on multiple counts of caucus-night preferences — and, in some cases, made mistakes. An attorney for the state party said officials were not authorized to alter the worksheets because they represented legal documents, according to an email Troy Price, the state party chairman, sent to members of the state party’s central committee.”

-- "Democratic leaders have edged toward the brink of open war with one another in recent days," Michael Scherer and Sean Sullivan report: "Advisers to the two men most responsible for overseeing the disastrous Iowa caucuses, national chairman Tom Perez and Iowa chairman Troy Price, have been privately deflecting blame onto each other, as the relationship between the two has become tense, advisers say. Price has refused to join Perez in calling for a canvass of voting records in the state, after finding out about Perez's demand from a deputy a few minutes before it was tweeted ... Price allies blame Perez for the botched caucus count, pointing to new party rules he implemented around transparency and accessibility that increased the burdens on the state. ..."

"At the start of the campaign, Sanders advisers repeatedly praised Perez ... But that tone shifted in recent weeks, as Sanders surrogates, supporters and staff have criticized Perez for changing the debate rules and for the appointees he has placed on the various convention committees ... Weaver has tried to strike a less aggressive tone, saying that the Sanders campaign still believes Perez has tried to be evenhanded. 'Of course, given our experience, we are ever vigilant,' he said."

-- Democrats fear a repeat of the Iowa chaos in Nevada. While some top party leaders call for the end of caucuses, top Nevada Democratic Party officials are trying to assure nervous voters that their fears are overblown. This includes former Senate majority leader Harry Reid, who has been working to soothe candidate concerns about potential caucus drama. (Holly Bailey)

-- Sanders and Biden continued sparring about the role each played 18 years ago during the run-up to the Iraq War. Michael Kranish reports: “In explaining their actions to voters, however, they have both left out key details that present a more complicated picture of how they handled what both now say is one of the worst foreign policy mistakes in American history. Biden not only played a key role in helping [George W.] Bush win passage of the measure, but he also privately assured the president that ‘I think you’re doing it the exact right way,’ according to notes taken at a meeting by White House press secretary Ari Fleischer. In that meeting, Bush told Biden that though he would attempt to use diplomacy, he would use the authority to invade if he believed it was necessary, according to Fleischer’s notes. Sanders, meanwhile, agreed at the time with much of what Bush said about Iraq, including the view that Iraqi President Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction.”

-- In New Hampshire’s poorest city, there are few indications of Trump’s “blue-collar boom.” Griff Witte reports: “The unemployment rate, which was touching double digits 10 years ago as Berlin weathered the collapse of its signature mill, is down to 3 percent. The local paper is stuffed with help-wanted ads. Property values are climbing as newcomers move in. But Berlin — which thrived through most of the 20th century before the bottom fell out in the early 2000s — hardly feels like a city on the mend. More than a decade into the longest economic expansion America has ever known, residents say just about the only jobs available pay minimum wage with no benefits as out-of-pocket health-care costs surge. The last elementary school shuttered last year, capping a long-term exodus of young families. The once-bustling downtown is so scarred by closures, demolitions and fires that it looks, according to the city's mayor, 'like a bomb was dropped in the middle of it.'"

Subscribe on Amazon Echo, Google Home, Apple HomePod and other podcast players.

Welcome to the Daily 202, PowerPost's morning briefing for decision-makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter.

Highlights from the 2020 Oscars: 'Parasite' wins best picture and makes history

ABOUT LAST NIGHT:

-- “Parasite” became the first foreign-language film to win the Oscar for best picture during last night’s Academy Awards. Emily Yahr, Sonia Rao, Travis Andrews, Bethonie Butler and Elahe Izadi report: “In addition to making history in the night’s most prestigious category, the darkly comedic thriller is the first South Korean film to ever be nominated for an Oscar. Filmmaker Bong Joon-ho also won in the international feature and original screenplay categories, as well as best director -- triumphing over ‘1917’ front-runner Sam Mendes, whose film didn’t wind up with quite as many awards as expected. (The World War I epic, made to look like it was filmed in one shot, did land cinematographer Roger Deakins his second win.)”

All four acting trophies wound up with the artists who dominated this awards season: Joaquin Phoenix and Renée Zellweger won for "Joker" and "Judy," and supporting actors Brad Pitt and Laura Dern for

"Once Upon a Time in Hollywood" and "Marriage Story." In an emotional roller coaster of a speech, Phoenix called for unity. "I've been thinking a lot about some of the distressing issues that we are facing collectively, and I think at times we feel or we're made to feel that we champion different causes," he said. "But for me, I see commonality. I think whether we're talking about gender inequality or racism or queer rights or indigenous rights or animal rights, we're talking about the right against injustice."

-- Other notable winners included:

- Elton John and Bernie Taupin won best original song for "(I'm Gonna) Love Me Again," from "Rocketman."
- "American Factory," produced by Barack and Michelle Obama, won best documentary feature.
- Taika Waititi won best adapted screenplay for "Jojo Rabbit," becoming the first indigenous director to ever win an Oscar.
- Find a complete list here.

-- Commentary from The Post's cultural critics:

- Ann Hornaday: "'Parasite' upset means progress. But is it a revolution?"
- Hank Stuever: "A decent show, if you like your Oscar nights fully automated."
- Elahe Izadi: "The Oscars nominated 'Parasite' but looked right past its all-Asian cast. It's part of a pattern."
- Robin Givhan: "The Oscars red carpet was diverse,

even if the nominees weren't.”

QUOTE OF THE DAY: “I’m ready to drink tonight,” said Bong, speaking English for the first time onstage that night, as he accepted the Oscar for best international feature. Later, after winning the night’s top award, Bong didn’t take the microphone, allowing Miky Lee, the mogul who built South Korea’s first movie multiplex, to speak instead.

Acting director of the Office of Management and Budget Russ Vought presses the button that starts the machine that will print copies of President Trump's proposed budget for the 2021 fiscal year at the Government Publishing Office. (Samuel Corum/Getty Images)

THE PRESIDENT REVEALS HIS PRIORITIES:

-- The White House will propose a $4.8 trillion budget that would fail to eliminate the federal deficit over the next 10 years. “Instead, White House officials plan to say their budget proposal would close the deficit by 2035,” Jeff Stein and Erica Werner report. “During President Trump’s first year in office, his advisers said their budget plan would eliminate the deficit by around 2028. This new budget will mark the third consecutive time that they abandon that 10-year goal and instead suggest a 15-year target. This new trend shows how little progress the White House is making in dealing with ballooning government debt, something GOP party leaders had made a top goal during the Obama administration.

“Trump’s first budget projected the deficit in 2021 would be $456 billion. Instead, it is projected to be more than double that amount. ... As a presidential candidate, Trump said he would eliminate not just the annual federal deficit but all debt held by the United States after eight years in office. ... The federal debt has already grown by about $3 trillion under Trump. ... The $4.8 trillion budget for 2021 would represent a $700 billion surge over levels from 2018. ... It would also propose extending tax cuts for families and individuals that are set to expire at the end of 2025. Budget experts have projected that extending those tax cuts would reduce revenue by roughly $1 trillion. ...

“The Wall Street Journal first reported the budget aims to cut spending on safety-net programs such as Medicaid and food stamps ... The budget is expected to propose 5 percent net cuts in domestic discretionary spending, which is expected to include cutting the budget of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. However, the part of CDC funding that deals with fighting the coronavirus will remain unchanged. ...

“At the same time, the budget will maintain Pentagon spending at around its current level, or boost it if increases in a so-called overseas contingency account are included. As in past budgets, this one will cut heavily into programs targeting low-income communities, including slashing community development block grants and home heating assistance. The Education Department will be cut by $6 billion ... The proposed budgets for nondefense domestic agencies, programs that deal with housing, environmental protection and agriculture, will fall well below spending caps that lawmakers and the administration already agreed to in a bipartisan budget deal for 2021. That all but ensures the budget will face bipartisan opposition on Capitol Hill.”

-- Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) said the Justice Department is vetting information that Trump’s personal attorney Rudy Giuliani delivered regarding Hunter Biden’s work on the board of a Ukrainian energy company. Paul Kane reports: “Graham, citing an early-morning conversation with Attorney General William P. Barr, said [Giuliani] is giving his information to national security experts and that he would back off his own plans to use the Senate Judiciary Committee as a vehicle to investigate the Biden family. ‘The Department of Justice is receiving information coming out of the Ukraine from Rudy to see — he told me that they have created a process that Rudy could give information and they would see if it’s verified,’ [Graham] said on CBS’s ‘Face the Nation.’ He warned that Giuliani might be getting bad information from his trips to Ukraine as part of a disinformation campaign by Russian security experts, citing their effort to disrupt the 2016 presidential campaign. ...

“Graham said he called Barr and Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.), chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, on Sunday morning after hearing about Giuliani’s interview Saturday night

on Fox News's 'Watters' World.' During the interview, the former New York City mayor made various claims about the information he has cobbled together from Ukrainian sources and said Graham should use his committee to investigate the Bidens. ... 'I have what I used to call when I was U.S. attorney, a smoking gun,' Giuliani said. ... Then, just as 'Face the Nation' started Sunday morning, Trump sent out a tweet urging Graham to launch an undefined investigations. ... Graham appeared to back away from his assertions in recent weeks that he would lead a probe into [Joe Biden's] time overseeing Ukraine policy while his son served on the board of Burisma."

-- The chairman of the group that runs the Conservative Political Action Conference warned that he would be afraid for the physical safety of Sen. Mitt Romney (R-Utah) were he to attend the annual convention. Matt Schlapp ripped the 2012 GOP nominee, who announced he was dropping out of the 2008 Republican nominating contest at CPAC. (HuffPost)

-- While Romney is being vilified by Trump and his allies inside the Beltway, many of his conservative constituents back home in Utah still have his back. From NBC News: "[We] spoke with dozens of voters in Utah in the days immediately following the Senate's vote to acquit the president. Most identified themselves as Republicans who had supported Romney in 2018 and said that regardless of their opinion of the president, Romney's decision to go against his party was one that they understood and respected for its honesty. Many said they would not hold it against the first-term senator when he faces re-election in 2024. ... 'I feel like [Romney] stands up and says, 'This is what I think' and you have the right to accept or reject that,' said Meralee Stallings, 62, who works for The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. 'I think we are getting away from that, too. It's like if you don't agree with my opinion, then you're wrong.' Stallings, who voted third-party for president in 2016 and supported Romney in 2018, said she is leaning toward voting for Romney again. 'I don't agree with everything that Romney has done,' she said, 'but if you're going to be true to what you think is correct, then that's fine with me.'"

-- Sacred Native American burial sites are being blown up for Trump's border wall, an Arizona congressman and other advocates allege. Paulina Firozi reports: "The Organ Pipe Cactus National Monument is an internationally recognized biosphere reserve ... It includes about 330,000 acres of designated wilderness and is home to ancestral grounds sacred to the Tohono O'odham Nation, one of at least a dozen Native American groups that claim connections to grounds within the monument. Rep. Raúl M. Grijalva (D-Ariz.), whose district includes the reservation, said crews this week began blasting through parts of Monument Hill, which includes a burial site for the Tohono O'odham Nation ... Grijalva, chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee, visited the location ahead of the construction and described the site in a video posted to social media. Monument Hill, where he said explosions are now occurring, is a site where members of the Tohono O'odham Nation have buried members of opposing tribes."

-- Trump used a Philadelphia girl's story to attack public schools and promote the school-choice movement. But the girl was already studying at one of the city's most desired charters. Janiyah Davis is a student at a recently opened charter

school so popular that it received 6,500 applications for 100 seats. How she landed in the audience during Trump's State of the Union – and with a scholarship to attend private school financed by Betsy DeVos – remains a bit of a mystery even to her mother, who told the Philadelphia Enquirer that she had no idea Janiyah would be mentioned during the speech.

-- A gunman wounded two NYPD officers in separate attacks that police believe were attempted assassinations. Katie Mettler reports: “One officer was shot in the neck and chin Saturday night when the suspected gunman fired several rounds into a marked police van and then fled, authorities said. At 7 a.m. Sunday morning, police say, the same man walked into the Bronx precinct headquarters and opened fire again, striking a lieutenant in the arm and surrendering after his 9mm handgun ran out of bullets. The man, who is in police custody but has not been identified, has a ‘lengthy violent criminal history,’ Police Commissioner Dermot Shea said at a news conference on Sunday. ... [Trump] weighed in, using the shootings to admonish [Mayor Bill] de Blasio and [Gov. Andrew] Cuomo, who are both Democrats and critics of the president. ‘I grew up in New York City and, over many years, got to watch how GREAT NYC’s ‘Finest’ are,’ Trump tweeted. ‘Now, because of weak leadership at Governor & Mayor, stand away (water thrown at them) regulations, and lack of support, our wonderful NYC police are under assault. Stop this now!’”

-- A man was arrested in Florida on charges of driving a van into a tent full of Trump supporters. Katie Mettler and Hannah Knowles report: “The Jacksonville Sheriff’s Office has arrested Gregory William Loel Timm, 27, on two counts of aggravated assault on a person older than 65 and one count each of criminal mischief and driving with a suspended license. No one was hurt in the incident. ... As word spread and Republican Party leaders and elected officials weighed in, Trump issued a warning on Twitter. ‘Be careful tough guys who you play with!’ he wrote alongside a statement from GOP Chairwoman Ronna McDaniel. She called the incident an ‘unprovoked, senseless’ attack and said ‘these disgusting acts will only make us work harder to win in November.’”

The coronavirus is forcing cruise ships to take drastic measures

THE NEW WORLD ORDER:

-- The number of people infected and killed by the coronavirus continues to climb worldwide, but the vast majority are still concentrated in the original outbreak zone of Wuhan. Gerry Shih, Alex Horton and Marisa Iati report: “The global death toll from the novel coronavirus reached more than 900 ... after previously surpassing the 774 fatalities attributed to the outbreak of the SARS coronavirus in 2002 and 2003. Among the dead was the first American, a 60-year-old woman who died Thursday in Wuhan. ... An international team lead by the World Health Organization left for China to conduct an investigation of the coronavirus. ... As infections overwhelm the afflicted province, the rest of China might be seeing the effects of strict quarantine measures, Chinese health officials said Sunday. In all parts of China outside Hubei, the daily number of new infections dropped from nearly 900 on Feb. 3 to 509 on Saturday ... [WHO] officials also said they had seen the number of new cases taper in recent days. ... The Chinese Ambassador to the United States pushed back Sunday on the suggestion by Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.) that the coronavirus may have come from China's biological weapons program. Appearing on CBS' 'Face the Nation' on Sunday, Ambassador Cui Tiankai acknowledged that much about the virus remains unknown, but he said spreading unsubstantiated theories could cause panic and amplify racial discrimination."

-- Infections aboard a quarantined cruise ship off the coast of Japan have surged, bringing to 136 the number of people who are known to have been infected on the vessel. There are a total of 3,700 passengers and crew aboard.

-- Toilet paper is growing scarce in Hong Kong. So is trust in the government. Shibani Mahtani reports: "With coronavirus fears gripping the city, a rumor of impending shortages circulating on social media had apparently spooked consumers, and pack after pack of toilet paper was flying off the shelves. Shoppers could barely carry the number of rolls they were snatching. By evening, not a single roll was left. The panic stretched through the weekend. No more green tea-scented toilet rolls, no more quilted plush rolls, no more jumbo rolls promising 'clean comfort' and an inviting picture of a fat Labrador puppy. Such scenes have played out citywide, documented in videos showcasing the frenzy. ... Some are resorting to dramatic and costly measures to procure necessities. ... As one Bloomberg columnist put it: The semiautonomous financial hub, once known as a bastion of global trade and capitalism, is now showing signs of a failed state."

-- A Chinese lawyer and journalist whose Wuhan dispatches offered a chilling glimpse inside the coronavirus hot spot has been missing since Thursday, his relatives said. Derek Hawkins reports: "Chen Qiushi slipped into the city of 11 million on Jan. 24, just after a citywide lockdown took effect, and spent days interviewing people about the outbreak and filming what he saw. On Thursday, after several of his reports circulated around the world, Chen stopped responding to calls and messages, setting off an online campaign to track him down. The 34-year-old knew he would be a likely target for law enforcement, so he gave select friends access to his accounts, instructing them to change the passwords if they went more than 12 hours without hearing from him. According to Chen's friends, authorities told his family over the weekend that he had been forcibly quarantined in an undisclosed location. Xu Xiaodong, a well-known mixed martial artist and friend of Chen's, said in a YouTube live stream that Qingdao public security officers and state security officers told his parents he had been 'detained in the name of quarantine.'"

-- Afghanistan claims the Islamic State was "obliterated." But

fighters who managed to get away could stage a resurgence. Susannah George, Siobhán O'Grady and Sharif Hassan report: "It has now become clear that military operations also scattered many fighters they aimed to defeat: The group's senior leadership fled further into the Spin Ghar mountains, crossing into Pakistan or pushing north into Konar province's more rugged terrain. Others simply went into hiding. Afghan officials estimate that hundreds of Islamic State fighters continue to operate across the country, raising the dangerous potential for a resurgence. Interviews with Afghan and U.S. officials and seven self-described Islamic State members now in Afghan custody paint a picture of a group that has a history of persevering despite territorial and leadership losses, thanks in part to a sophisticated recruitment system and the use of extreme violence to control civilian populations."

-- Two U.S. Army Special Forces soldiers were killed and six U.S. troops were wounded after a gunman opened fire in an eastern Afghanistan compound this weekend. Some Afghan officials said the attacker was a member of the Afghan security forces. (Susannah George and Sharif Hassan)

-- The Trump administration is considering suspending humanitarian assistance to Yemen as part of an international response to new restrictions imposed by Iranian-linked Houthi rebels. Missy Ryan and John Hudson report: "That one of Yemen's biggest donors is considering such a move, which, if implemented, could worsen already dire conditions, underscores the challenge of managing aid operations in areas controlled by a rebel movement that is hostile to the West. A senior State Department official said the United States has not made a final decision but was coordinating with other donor nations and aid organizations on possible responses to a 2 percent 'tax' on assistance projects and other new measures in swaths of Yemen administered by the Houthis."

-- German Chancellor Angela Merkel's would-be successor is expected to resign today following a rocky year as party leader. Loveday Morris and Luisa Beck report: "Annegret Kramp-Karrenbauer, the leader of Merkel's Christian Democrats, said she will not run for chancellor in next year's elections, German news agency DPA reported, citing a party spokesperson. She will step aside as party leader when a successor is found. Kramp-Karrenbauer, also known by her initials AKK, announced the news in a meeting with party officials on Monday morning ... A protege of Merkel, AKK beat out party rivals to take over the reins of the conservative Christian Democrats in late 2018. However, she has failed to rally the party behind her and there was widespread speculation that she would be ousted before the annual party conference in November."

-- Heavily armed police and soldiers forced their way into El Salvador's Congress, under the president's command, demanding the approval of a $109 million loan to better equip themselves. From Reuters: "President Nayib Bukele and a group of soldiers armed with automatic weapons briefly occupied El Salvador's Congress on Sunday, stepping up a pressure campaign to force lawmakers to back a crime-fighting plan. Watched by soldiers in full battle uniform, Bukele, 38, sat in the seat reserved for the president of Congress and cupped his hands together to pray, he said, for patience with lawmakers, few of whom turned up at the special session. 'If those shameless people don't approve the plan of territorial control, we'll summon you here again (next) Sunday,' he told supporters in a fiery speech outside, as he left the building."

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

Former presidential candidate Marianne Williamson took a shot at Buttigieg, who talks a great deal about creating a culture of belonging:

Michael Bennet and his family took a road trip to the North Country of New Hampshire to meet with voters:

Michael Bennet ✓
@MichaelBennet

We're in Dixville Notch, home of the #FITN primary where residents cast votes at midnight. My family & I are deeply grateful to them for sitting down with us today.

New Hampshire is central to my campaign because of traditions like this—where face-to-face conversations matter.

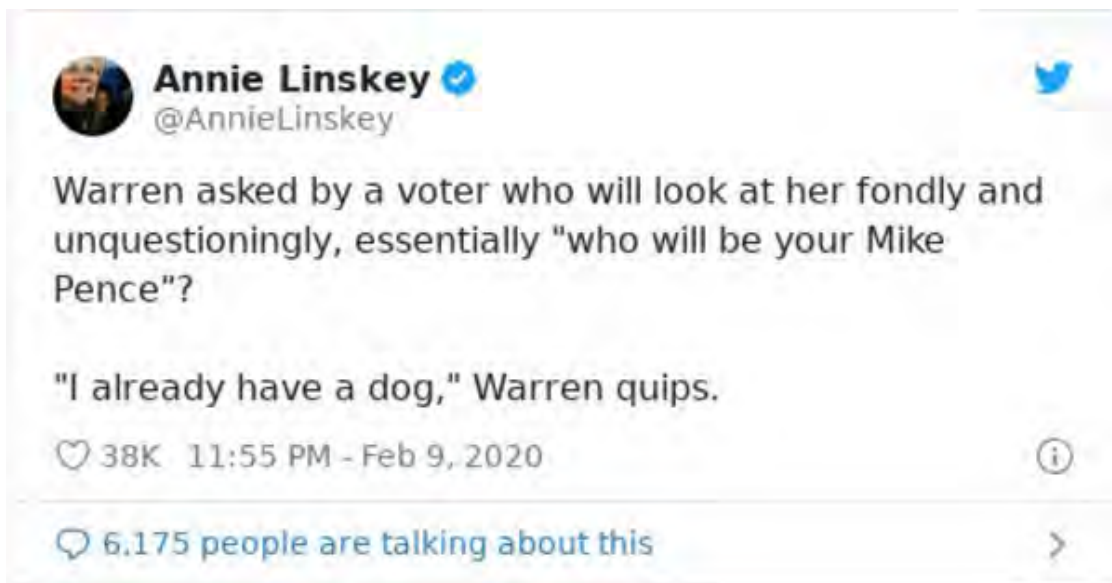

♡ 94 12:41 AM - Feb 10, 2020

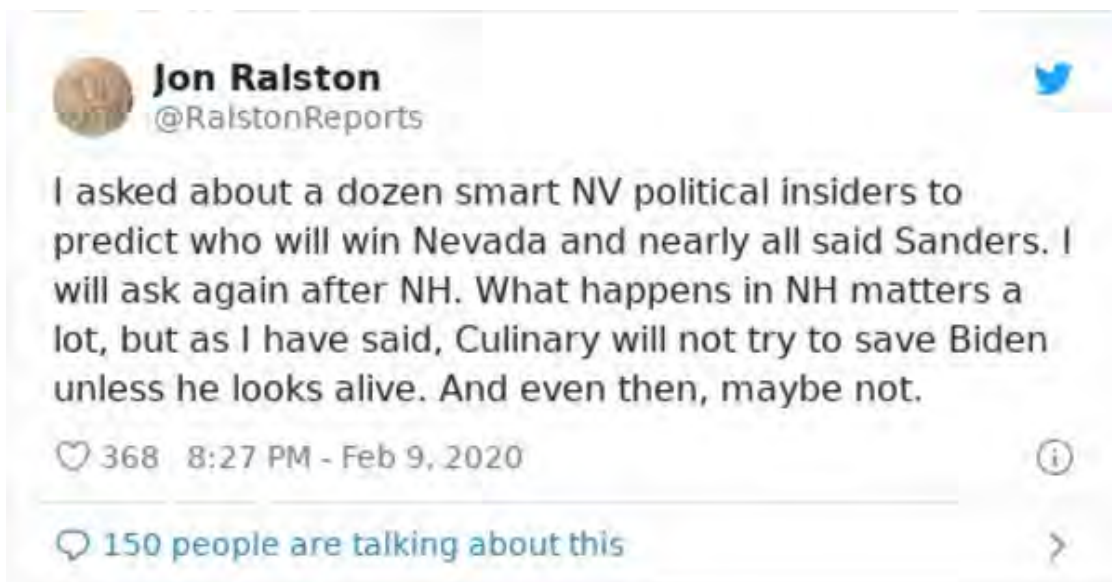

💬 21 people are talking about this

Another scene from the trail:

From a plugged-in political reporter in Nevada:

Amy Klobuchar's face during a particularly tense moment in last Friday's debate resonated among some viewers:

Shannon Watts ✓
@shannonrwatts

What's it's like to be a woman on Twitter.

♥ 37.2K 10:44 PM - Feb 8, 2020

💬 5,068 people are talking about this

Actress Natalie Portman's Oscar outfit had a special nod to the female directors who weren't nominated for the award:

Amy Kaufman ✓
@AmyKinLA

Natalie Portman embroidered her Dior cape with all of the female directors who weren't nominated for #Oscars. Check out her explanation here.

♡ 323K 12:19 AM - Feb 10, 2020

💬 77.1K people are talking about this

The winner of last night's Oscar for best animated short reminded us all that it all started with a tweet:

Matthew A. Cherry ✓
@MatthewACherry

Nailed it twitter.com/matthewacherry...

Matthew A. Cherry ✓ @MatthewACherry

Any 3D artists follow me? I got an Oscar worthy short film idea to go with this image. Get at me 🤪

♥ 421K 2:06 AM - Feb 10, 2020

💬 75.1K people are talking about this

And "Parasite" director Bong Joon-ho apologized to the film academy's engravers for having too many Oscars:

Bong Joon Ho apologizes to the engravers for having too many #Oscars bit.ly/2H6fGhj

4,443 7:12 AM - Feb 10, 2020

1,452 people are talking about this

VIDEOS OF THE DAY:

In case you missed it, our video team condensed Friday night's debate into four minutes:

The New Hampshire Democratic debate, in less than 4 minutes

“Saturday Night Live” spoofed the debate in its cold open:

And SNL also had a "local expert" talk about Trump's acquittal by the Senate:

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202

Privacy Policy | Help

---

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: The two leading women in the Democratic field are battling for third place in New Hampshire
Date: Tuesday, February 11, 2020 11:07:09 AM

---

If you're having trouble reading this, click here.

---

PowerPost

The Daily 202

Morning intelligence for leaders

Share:

 Listen to The Big Idea

Powered by  LiveIntent

The two leading women in the Democratic field are battling for third place in New Hampshire

Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) takes the stage on Monday night for a rally at South Church in downtown Portsmouth, N.H. (Melina Mara/The Washington Post)

BY JAMES HOHMANN
with Mariana Alfaro

THE BIG IDEA:

PORTSMOUTH, N.H. – Elizabeth Warren retooled her stump speech on the eve of the New Hampshire primary to make the case that she’s always been an underdog. She emphasized her hardscrabble upbringing in Oklahoma, her battle to create the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau and her victory over incumbent Republican Scott Brown to win her Senate seat. “You know what we need as president? Someone who has been winning unwinnable fights all her life,” Warren said.

The Massachusetts senator led in polls of this state last summer. Now trailing Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and former South Bend, Ind., mayor Pete Buttigieg, Warren is locked in a three-way battle in New Hampshire for third place against an ascendant Sen. Amy Klobuchar (D-Minn.) and a fading Joe Biden that will determine whether she stays viable as the Democratic presidential nominating contest moves on to Nevada, South Carolina and Super Tuesday.

Warren and Klobuchar are the last two women standing in the top tier of presidential contenders. Four years after many voters were disappointed that Hillary Clinton didn't become the first female president, the two senators are still in the hunt. They're fighting for a bronze ticket out of this pivotal early state and the chance to take on President Trump in November. But they're taking divergent approaches that go beyond their ideological differences in an attempt to gain the upper hand.

For now, though, the odds still seem stacked against Warren or Klobuchar becoming their party's standard-bearer. Indeed, no modern Democrat has won the nomination without finishing first or second in New Hampshire.

With a large pipe organ behind her, Warren paced the stage and seemed to draw energy from the crowd like an old-fashioned evangelist. "We're going to get knocked down," she told a capacity crowd of 785 people inside a magnificent church sanctuary that was built in the 1820s. "We're going to find bumpy times, and we'll find hard times, and we'll find times when we think, 'Oh, this hurts.' But the thing is: People are counting on us to get this right. ... It's about getting off our back foot and getting on our front foot.”

When her microphone cut out 47 minutes into her speech, as she talked about taking on Wall Street, Warren joked loud enough so everyone could hear: “That was the banks!” The raucous crowd rewarded her with standing ovation after standing ovation. “Don’t tell me what we can’t do,” she said. “We’ve done it.”

Sen. Amy Klobuchar (D-Minn.) speaks to a rally on Monday afternoon at Exeter Town Hall in Exeter, N.H. (Bonnie Jo Mount/The Washington Post)

Sixteen miles away in Exeter, a few hours earlier, Klobuchar spoke to 350 people with another 200 watching a feed in an overflow room. “As you’ve probably heard, we’re on a bit of a surge,” she said. The Minnesotan is drawing consistently bigger crowds over the last few days than she got before her fifth-place finish in Iowa, and her campaign says she’s raised more than $3 million since her strong debate performance on Friday night.

Like Warren, Klobuchar emphasized that she's been underestimated her whole life and especially throughout this campaign, outlasting many rivals who entered the contest with national name recognition and larger donor networks. On the anniversary of her outdoor announcement amid a blizzard back home in Minnesota, she asked Granite Staters for their help to “surprise the country.”

Klobuchar's final commercial before the primary is called “Empathy,” and its message is that she feels your pain and sympathizes with your hardships. She talks at length in her speeches about her father's alcoholism and the struggles now to pay for his long-term care. “I know you, and I will fight for you,” she said at the close of her 40-minute speech. “I want you to know this because I need your help right now. We are on the cusp of something really great.”

Bigger picture, though, Klobuchar is running as a pragmatic dealmaker while Warren is running as an ideological street brawler. Klobuchar said yesterday that she was the only candidate who raised her hand during Friday night's debate when the moderator asked whether anyone on stage worries that a democratic socialist couldn't win the general election. [In fact, Steyer did as well.] She also criticized the “free college for all” and Medicare-for-all plans that Warren and Sanders advocate, and she warned voters not to fall for “bumper sticker slogans,” an apparent reference to Buttigieg.

Warren has mostly tried to avoid taking direct shots at any of her rivals during these final days, hoping to emerge as a unity candidate by staying out of the crossfire between Buttigieg and Sanders. “There are a lot of folks shooting at other folks,” Warren told reporters last night. “Democrats cannot do a repeat of 2016. We can’t go into a general election divided and angry with each other.”

On a tour around the state, Warren stopped earlier Monday at the Sweet Maple Cafe in Conway. When a voter said she was considering backing a more moderate candidate, out of a desire to defeat Trump, Warren replied that she’s somewhere in the middle on a continuum between Sanders on the left and Buttigieg and Klobuchar in the middle.

---

Content from Blue Cross Blue Shield Association

Addressing the need for more affordable medicines

Americans pay too much for prescription drugs. Even generics can be too expensive. So we’re investing in a non-profit company to produce the drugs people need at a price they can afford. Learn more.

---

Elizabeth Warren hands out donuts outside Portsmouth Middle School on Tuesday morning. (Melina Mara/The Washington Post)

Some Warren allies privately express frustration that Klobuchar got as much momentum out of Iowa as she did, but Warren did not. The Iowa Democratic Party announced Sunday that Warren is poised to receive eight delegates from Iowa to the national convention in Milwaukee, behind the 14 for Buttigieg and 12 for Sanders, but more than the six for Biden. Klobuchar, who represents the neighboring state, received only one pledged delegate.

Klobuchar often invokes her endorsement from the New York Times editorial board. But Warren, whom the Times also endorsed, does not bring it up. She seems particularly cautious about doing anything that might make her look elitist. This also explains why she assiduously avoids using the H-word on the stump – Harvard – even though she was a barrier-breaking professor at the law school there. Cambridge, Mass., is only 60 miles south of the church where Warren spoke last night. She also emphasizes her preference for Michelob Ultra over white wine.

Warren emphasizes her gender – and the possibly historic nature of her campaign to be the first female president – far more than Klobuchar does in her stump speech. After Warren spoke last night, before she gaggled with reporters, she posed for pictures with a line of young people. She leaned down to all the little girls and repeated the same message over a dozen times: “Hi, my name is Elizabeth, and I’m running for president, because that’s what girls do.” Then she reached out her pinkie and made pinkie promises with each little girl.

Warren’s base of support feels more durable than the polls suggest. She has a loyal following of college-educated, liberal women who have steadfastly supported her since last year. They love the idea that Warren could be the first female president, and they roar with approval when she talks about all the executive actions that a president can take “all by herself.”

You should take all these surveys with a grain of salt because the race is so fluid, but the final CNN tracking poll, conducted by the University of New Hampshire and released Monday, showed Sanders in the lead, with 29 percent, among likely primary voters, followed by Buttigieg at 22 percent, Biden at 11 percent, Warren at 10 percent and Klobuchar at 7 percent. But Klobuchar has unquestionable momentum going into primary day. Even on the eve of the vote, only about half of those polled said they had definitely made their final decision. Interestingly, Warren was at the top of the list* of people's second choices: 20 percent said Warren is their back-up, followed by Sanders at 15 percent and Buttigieg at 14 percent.

Amy Klobuchar jokes with supporters outside a polling place on Tuesday in Manchester, N.H. She was joined by her daughter, Abigail Bessler. (Bonnie Jo Mount/The Washington Post)

Klobuchar's calls for national reconciliation resonate with the kinds of moderate Democrats and independents who go to her events while Warren's promise to fight fired up the more liberal people who tend to support her. Jill Baillargeon, 36 of Exeter, has children who are 7, 5 and 2-years-old. "I feel pretty good about Amy after seeing her," she said as she left Klobuchar's event, with her daughter Maeve and a miniature American flag that volunteers handed her on the way in. "I was for Bernie for a while, then Warren, then Biden and now Klobuchar."

Baillargeon, who teaches English lessons online to kids who live in China, wants an American president that she can let her kids watch on television without worrying about what they'll say. "We've got a lot going on in our life," she said. "I feel like I could breathe a little bit easier and not worry about what's going on in Washington everyday if Amy was in the Oval Office. She could bring back a sense of normalcy."

Warren's supporters want "big, structural change." Klobuchar's audiences desire a "return to normalcy," a pitch that previously pulled many of them toward Biden. "I really want someone who can help the country take a pause to breathe and to heal," said Susan Varn, 69, a retired consultant who lives in Exeter. "I'm less in the Elizabeth or Bernie camp because I think they want to do too much too soon when this country has been traumatized and needs to recover."

Varn has been leaning toward Biden because he's a "healing figure" who might be able to patch up the wounds of division, but she really liked what she saw from Klobuchar. She's had a Biden yard sign in front of her home for a while now, but she took a Klobuchar sign with her when she left the rally. She said the two signs will go next to each other, and she will decide whether to go with Biden or Klobuchar before heading to her polling place.

A common refrain among Warren supporters was that, in picking her, they're following their hearts. "Right now, we're in the primaries so you go with who you like the most," said Aaron Jule, 45 of Rye, who is in retail sales. "After Tuesday, I might have to deal with something that I have to live with."

Klobuchar emphasizes her ability to topple Trump in a head-to-head matchup in a way that Warren does not. During a town hall on Saturday, Klobuchar told voters that she had just been texting backstage with Cindy McCain, the widow of the 2008 GOP presidential nominee John McCain. She always highlights the inroads she's made with Republicans as a senator in Washington and during her three statewide victories in Minnesota. "I have won every red and purple, suburban and rural congressional district every single time I've run," she likes to say. "I have won every race, every place, every time all the way down to fourth grade, where my slogan that I have since abandoned was, 'All the way with Amy K.'"

It was a play on Lyndon Johnson's 1964 slogan: "All the way with LBJ."

Elizabeth Warren speaks to New Hampshire voters at Sweet Maple Cafe in Conway on Monday. (Melina Mara/The Washington Post)

“Electability” as a buzzword has become quite blasé in the aftermath of Iowa. I interviewed more than a dozen voters at both the Klobuchar and Warren rallies. The most striking takeaway from these conversations was that several women across the ideological spectrum complained without prompting – and without me using it – about the pervasiveness of the term in the Democratic debate.

“I know that she’s polling in third, fourth or fifth in New Hampshire. I certainly hope she sticks with it,” said Warren supporter Kelly Scanlon, 44 of Dover, who works for a nonprofit organization that assists the developmentally disabled. “The rhetoric revolving around picking a candidate who can beat Trump feels like coded language to me that means it needs to be a white male. Because they don’t want Hillary 2.0. That rhetoric has hurt [Warren] a little bit. At one point in time, she was considered the front-runner. That’s when the talking heads started discussing ‘concerns’ about her ‘electability.’ That’s a word that comes up, obviously, a lot.”

Warren supporter Terie Norelli, the former Democratic speaker of the New Hampshire House, also complained about this. “When I went out on the campaign trail, I kept hearing from people who would say, ‘Oh, I’m so nervous. I don’t want Donald Trump to win,’” she recalled. “They’d say the only the thing I care about is beating Donald Trump. And I was like: We don’t have a crystal ball. But we have something really important, and that’s a first-in-the-nation primary vote. So I decided that I would focus on who was going to be the best president. ... And then I realized: She can also win.”

Sheila Kelly, 56, a fundraiser for a nonprofit organization who lives in Exeter, is torn among Klobuchar, Buttigieg and possibly entrepreneur Andrew Yang. Outside Klobuchar’s town hall, she said she’s searched around online to research who might be strongest against Trump. She volunteered that she really dislikes when the term “electability” gets thrown around by pundits. “I don’t like where that leads,” she said.

Kelly believes a candidate who excites people – who makes them want to “get off the couch” – is essential to victory, and she said a simplistic focus on electability puts a premium on “milquetoast” when that’s not what historically wins. “For whatever reason, Biden’s just not exciting to me,” she explained. “Also, to be honest, I think Warren is in the rearview mirror.” But, she added, her daughter is planning to drive home on Tuesday afternoon from Brown University in Rhode Island, where she’s a student, so that she can vote – probably for Warren.

Joe Biden holds a rally on Sunday night in Hampton, N.H. (Bonnie Jo Mount/The Washington Post)

THE BIDEN COLLAPSE CONTINUES:

-- “Biden’s advisers were bracing for another dismal result, with some inside his campaign saying he could finish as low as fifth, and with some early warning signs that his national polling lead — one that he pointed to just two days earlier as validation — has collapsed,” Matt Viser and Sean Sullivan report. “Much as he tried to hurry past his low finish in Iowa, Biden on Monday sought to push beyond New Hampshire even before the vote. His campaign announced that its co-chairman, Rep. Cedric L. Richmond (D-La.), will host a ‘launch party’ in South Carolina on Tuesday night at around the same time polls will be closing in New Hampshire. Biden is planning to travel to South Carolina, where he has been leading in polls ahead of the Feb. 29 vote, before heading to Nevada, which holds its caucuses

Feb. 22.”

-- “There are two Joe Bidens. The wrong one is running for president,” Karen Tumulty observes in a smart column: “Biden sounds like a man whose time has passed. Many in the modest-sized crowds that he draws are dismayed. After he spoke on the same stage as the other Democratic candidates at a state Democratic Party dinner on Saturday night, one undecided voter told me: ‘Joe needs to retire.’ This has become a common refrain, even among people who admire and respect Biden. But then there is the Biden you see mostly on the rope line.

“As soon as the sound on his mic is turned off, he dives toward the area where those who remain behind are standing to shake his hand or take a selfie. At those moments, Biden is transformed. He lingers with anyone who wants to tell him a story, even as maintenance workers start dismantling his stage and folding up chairs. People light up in his presence. Perhaps because of the personal suffering he has endured, Biden seems to have a kind of radar that draws him to people who are starving for solace and reassurance, and they to him.

“On the stump, he is at his most compelling when he stops talking about himself and starts telling the stories of the people he has met. Some of them have crossed Biden’s path here in New Hampshire: the security guard mourning the death of her father and fearful of the test that grief is putting on her 30 years of sobriety; the man who confided he has just lost his job and is afraid to tell his family; the woman who fled the man who beat her and ended up living on the street; the line of people standing in 22-degree temperatures at a downtown food bank, some of them children wearing no gloves. This is the better Biden, embracing personal vulnerability over electoral invincibility. He is perhaps the most authentic tribune of empathy in public life today — and the starkest contrast imaginable from the man who sits in the Oval Office.”

-- On the trail with Biden, this question arises: What happens when the “electability candidate” starts to lose? Ben Terris reports: “There’s a surreal feeling surrounding the Biden campaign’s efforts in New Hampshire. ... Maybe this is a strategic move by a candidate whose best play, for now, is to manage expectations. But how exactly are his people on the ground supposed to feel about that? Does anyone know what place they should be fighting for? ... ‘I’d be happy in the top three,’ said Heather Ledoux, a registered nurse who turned her house in Litchfield into a canvassing staging area. ‘Top four counts as a win,’ said Bob Mulholland, a member of the Democratic National Committee and a Biden supporter. ‘I’m not going to prognosticate,’ former secretary of state John F. Kerry said when asked what would count as a success. ‘You’ll know it, we’ll all know it, we’ll feel it.’ ...

“When a campaign appears to be on a downward spiral, it becomes easy to see signs of doom. ... There was Biden’s anemic cheering section at the McIntyre-Shaheen 100 Club Dinner — a raucous fundraiser held in a Manchester hockey arena — that appeared smaller even than the group that came out to support nominal presidential candidate Deval Patrick. There’s the ways in which Biden has begun acting like an underdog, attacking his opponents as too inexperienced ... or too extreme ... Even his supporters have begun talking about him like a long shot. ‘No one ever expected Donald Trump to be elected president, either,’ said Barry Nestor, standing outside the Rex Theatre in Manchester, wearing socks on his hands to keep warm before seeing Biden speak.”

-- “Biden is the most electable candidate, just not right here or right now,” columnist Alexandra Petri writes in a satire.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) speaks during a town hall at Pierce University on Monday in Rindge, N.H. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

MORE ON-THE-GROUND REPORTING:

-- The first votes in the New Hampshire primary were cast just after midnight. Mike Bloomberg took home an unexpected bipartisan win in Dixville Notch (with three write-in votes). Klobuchar was the popular choice in Hart's Location (where she got six votes) and Millsfield (where she got two) – the other New Hampshire locations that cast their ballots in the wee hours. From WMUR: "Bloomberg got three write-in votes, one of which was a write-in vote in the Republican primary. It's a rarity in Dixville Notch for write-in votes. [Buttigieg and Sanders] each got one vote. The local tradition in Dixville Notch was put into jeopardy this year when it was learned that not enough people in the community were registered to vote. In order for the midnight vote to take place, Dixville Notch needed a minimum of five registered voters. In January, Dixville Notch got enough residents after the man behind the redevelopment project of the Balsams Resort officially moved to town and registered to vote." The only candidate to visit Dixville Notch prior to the vote was Sen. Michael Bennet (D-Colo.), who failed to convince any of the five residents to support him.

-- Sanders, looking for a more emphatic victory than his near-tie in the Iowa caucuses, wrapped up his New Hampshire effort last night with a rally that his campaign said drew more than 7,500 people in Durham. A rock band called the Strokes performed, and Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-N.Y.) warmed up the crowd at an arena on the University of New Hampshire's campus. Buttigieg's final rally was in Exeter, and actor Kevin Costner introduced him.

-- Jill Biden helped push a heckler away from her husband during a New Hampshire event. A man, shouting as he recorded the moment on his phone, moved toward the candidate's lectern as the former vice president spoke. Jill Biden, who was seated close by, hopped up from her chair and stopped the protester before he got too close. When asked about the incident later, she laughed and said: "I'm

a good Philly girl.” (CNN)

-- Trump, who held a campaign rally in Manchester last night, has inserted himself into the Democrats' nominating contest with a fervor that exceeds his predecessors — many of whom were reluctant to directly involve themselves in another party's political selection process. Robert Costa, Toluse Olorunnipa and Josh Dawsey report: “The Trump campaign’s effort to counter the Democratic race extended to a ‘Cops for Trump’ gathering on Monday afternoon in Portsmouth ... Pence and White House senior adviser Ivanka Trump both spoke at the event, which was attended by about 200 police officers ... The Trump campaign has been active in New Hampshire for weeks, sending legions of surrogates to the state and booking them on state-based talk radio programs and at local Republican events. For Trump and his loyalists, New Hampshire holds a particularly special place in their collective political memory: It was his first primary victory and a significant boost that pushed him toward the 2016 Republican nomination.”

-- Health care is the top concern for the New Hampshire electorate, and it comes up more than any other issue during town halls and on rope lines. Amy Goldstein reports: “The system’s flaws come up nonstop: the expense of prescription drugs, a scarcity of mental health services, coverage gaps, and care that’s difficult to afford even for people who have private insurance. ... With one of the nation’s highest median ages and a fast-growing older population, ... people see close-up the limits of Medicare.”

-- Nine places to watch as returns come in tonight, per Politico:

- The bigger cities: Manchester, “The state’s largest city is arguably also the most important — a blowout here is a solid indication of who will win”; Concord, “It’s a good spot to see where pro-establishment, middle-of-the-road voters are breaking”; Nashua, “The most diverse city in the state, only about 82% white as compared to the state’s 94% white.”
- The Trump-Obama cities: Claremont, “Perhaps a quintessential Obama-Trump town”; and Laconia, “The city’s brand new Democratic mayor was a heavily sought after endorsement before he finally supported [Klobuchar].”
- The college towns: Keene, Plymouth, Durham and Hanover. “In 2016, they represented less than seven percent of the overall vote, but Sanders won them with astonishing numbers.”

-- Several campaigns, wary of working with the Democratic National Committee, have set up a shadow voter protection program in New Hampshire for today. They will use a neutral boiler room helmed by former Obama adviser Quentin Palfrey to share reports of voter rights infringements from legal observers across the state. (Politico)

-- Audio from a 2015 Aspen Institute appearance purportedly features Bloomberg defending his stop-and-frisk policy. From Mediaite: Bloomberg appears to tell the audience “that cops targeted minority neighborhoods ‘because that’s where all the crime is.’ ... In the roughly minute-long excerpt, Bloomberg begins his argument defending stop-and-frisk by saying: ‘95% of your murders — murderers and murder victims — fit one M.O. You can just take the description, Xerox it and pass it out to all the cops.’”

-- Bloomberg doesn't want Silicon Valley's money, but he did call up hundreds of tech leaders and asked them to refer their most talented employees. From Vox: “The request made plain

Bloomberg's comfort with — and, in some ways, dependence on — the Silicon Valley companies that have been persistently criticized during the 2020 Democratic primary. ... On the Monday call, [former Foursquare CEO Jeff] Glueck said he needed the tech leaders to pitch jobs on the Bloomberg campaign to ‘your most talented friends’ and ‘send them our way,’ especially those with expertise in data science, internet marketing, advertising buying and analytics.”

-- With five days until early voting begins in Nevada, the campaigns are still in the dark about the state's new caucus process. From the Nevada Independent: Campaigns “have been told that the Nevada State Democratic Party won't be using the same app and vendor that were in part responsible for bungling the results of Iowa's caucus last week, that the party won't be using any app at all, and that what the party does plan to use is best described as a ‘tool’ or ‘calculator.’ Beyond that, aides aren't really sure what's in store for the state's Feb. 22 Democratic caucus. They don't know how early voting, which was originally supposed to take place on an app on an iPad, is set to work. They don't know how those votes are going to flow back to early voters' home precincts to be counted alongside their neighbors preferences just as if they were there on Caucus Day. (A second app was supposed to accomplish that function.) They also don't know how the Caucus Day results will be transmitted to the party."

QUOTE OF THE DAY:

"They're all going after each other. You got them all over the place. They don't know what the hell they're doing. ... They can't even count their votes," Trump said of the Democratic candidates during his rally in Manchester. (Robert Costa, Toluse Olorunnipa and Josh Dawsey)

An advertisement for a podcast. The background is blue with a subtle pattern of concentric circles. At the top, it says "The Daily 202's" in a smaller font, followed by "BIG IDEA" in a very large, white, serif font. Below this, on the left, is a white play button icon inside a circle. To the right of the icon, the text reads "Get James's insight into Washington every weekday on your smart speaker or favorite podcast player." in a white, sans-serif font.

Subscribe on Amazon Echo, Google Home, Apple HomePod and other podcast players.

Welcome to the Daily 202, PowerPost's morning briefing for decision-makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter.

Barr says Justice Department will vet Giuliani evidence

THE JUSTICE SYSTEM:

-- Federal prosecutors said that Trump confidant Roger Stone deserves seven to nine years in prison for lying to Congress in the Russia probe. Spencer Hsu, Ann Marimow and Devlin Barrett report: “The sentencing filing came after days of tense debate within the U.S. attorney’s office in Washington about the proper prison term for the sixth Trump associate convicted and last person indicted in former special counsel Robert S. Mueller III’s investigation. Front-line prosecutors, some previously with Mueller’s team, argued for a sentence on the higher end for Stone than some of their supervisors were comfortable with, according to two people familiar with the discussions. A recommendation on the higher end prevailed, with prosecutors’ filings citing federal sentencing guidelines that ratchet up in cases involving obstruction that impedes the administration of justice. ...

“Stone’s defense on Monday asked for a sentence of probation, citing his age, 67, and lack of criminal history. They also noted that of seven Mueller defendants who have been sentenced, only one faces more than a six-month term: former Trump campaign chairman Paul Manafort, who is serving 7½ years. ... Hours before the filing was due Monday, the new head of the D.C. office, interim U.S. attorney Timothy Shea — a former close adviser to Attorney General William P. Barr — had not made a final decision on Stone’s sentencing recommendation ... Disagreements among prosecutors about sentencing recommendations are not uncommon, especially when it comes to politically sensitive high-profile cases. It would have been unusual, however, for the U.S. attorney’s office to endorse a sentence below the guideline range after winning conviction at trial...”

-- Barr acknowledged that the DOJ has created an “intake process” to vet dirt provided by Rudy Giuliani on Joe and Hunter Biden. Matt Zaptosky and Barrett report: “Barr confirmed an assertion made Sunday by Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) that the Justice Department had ‘created a process that Rudy could give information and they would see if it’s verified.’ ... ‘That is true for all information that comes to the department relating to the Ukraine, including anything Mr. Giuliani might provide,’ Barr said. He did not provide any other specifics. A Justice Department official said Giuliani had ‘recently’ shared information with federal law enforcement officials through the process described by Barr. Two people familiar with the matter said the information is being routed to the U.S. attorney’s office in Pittsburgh. ...

“That Giuliani would have a direct pipeline to the Justice Department for providing information on a political rival of Trump raised fears among some legal analysts that federal law enforcement was being conscripted into doing campaign work for the president. The matter is complicated, too, because Giuliani is under investigation by the Justice Department. That case already has produced campaign finance charges against two of his associates, Lev Parnas and Igor Fruman, who helped in Giuliani’s Ukraine-related pursuits ... Barr said the intake process was established ‘so that any information coming in about Ukraine could be carefully scrutinized by the department and its intelligence community partners so that we could assess its provenance and its credibility.’ FBI Deputy Director David Bowdich said: ‘We’re taking information as we would in any case. We will evaluate it appropriately.’ ... Barr’s announcement angered Democrats, who questioned whether Giuliani was getting special treatment from Trump’s Justice Department. ... Giuliani has long vexed Barr and the Justice Department. ... But Giuliani has maintained access to the department and to Barr.”

-- A federal judge last night canceled the sentencing hearing for former Trump national security adviser Michael Flynn that was set for Feb. 27. Judge Emmet Sullivan issued an order putting off the hearing indefinitely, pending a new order from him. Martin Weil reports: “The move represents the latest turn in the case against Flynn, who pleaded guilty in December 2017 to lying to the FBI about his contacts with Russian Ambassador Sergey Kislyak. Federal prosecutors once suggested probation for Flynn, then shifted to include prison time, and then said in a late January court filing that probation remained a 'reasonable sentence.' The prosecutors' Jan. 29 filing was submitted as Flynn continued his effort to withdraw his guilty plea."

-- Barr also announced the DOJ will sue so-called "sanctuary" jurisdictions over policies he considers overly friendly to undocumented migrants. Zapotosky and Barrett report: "Barr announced the lawsuits in a speech to the National Sheriffs' Association, saying they were part of 'a significant escalation in the federal government's efforts to confront the resistance of 'sanctuary cities.'" He said he also was reviewing the practice of some state and local prosecutors who charge criminals with lesser offenses to avoid deportation, and giving non-sanctuary jurisdictions priority when it comes to awarding certain grant money." In separate federal filings, the Justice Department sought to block a New Jersey policy that limits how state and local authorities share information with federal immigration officials and to stop a county in Washington state from preventing immigration authorities from using an international airport there for deportations.

-- Possibly suspicious grant-making decisions at the DOJ prompted a whistleblower complaint. From Reuters: The internal complaints happened "after two nonprofits were denied funding in favor of two less established groups whose applications were not recommended by career DOJ officials. The awarding of more than $1 million total to the two groups, Hookers for Jesus in Nevada and the Lincoln Tubman Foundation in South Carolina, has triggered a whistleblower complaint filed by the Justice Department's employee union to the department's Inspector General. An internal department memo seen by Reuters shows that as of September 12, two long-established nonprofits – the Catholic Charities of the Diocese of Palm Beach and Chicanos Por La Causa of Phoenix – were originally on the list of recommended grant winners after receiving high marks from outside contractors hired to review applications. The annual grants help nonprofits and local governments aid human trafficking victims.”

-- The DOJ also charged four members of the Chinese military in connection with the hack of the credit reporting agency

Equifax. Barrett and Zapotosky report: “In a nine-count indictment filed in federal court in Atlanta, federal prosecutors alleged that four members of the People's Liberation Army hacked into Equifax's systems, stealing the personal data as well as company trade secrets. [Barr] called their efforts ‘a deliberate and sweeping intrusion into the private information of the American people.’ ... The 2017 breach gave hackers access to the personal information, including Social Security numbers and birth dates, of about 145 million people. ... Barr said China has a ‘voracious appetite’ for Americans’ personal information, and he pointed to other intrusions that he alleged have been carried out by Beijing's actors in recent years, including hacks disclosed in 2015 of the health insurer Anthem and the federal Office of Personnel Management (OPM), as well as a 2018 hack of the hotel chain Marriott. ‘This data has economic value, and these thefts can feed China's development of artificial intelligence tools,’ Barr said.”

-- A former Indian Health Service pediatrician was sentenced to five lifetime prison terms for sexually abusing boys. From the

WSJ: “Stanley Patrick Weber, 71, groomed and abused Native American boys as young as about 9 years old on reservations in Montana and South Dakota between 1995 and 2011, according to court documents. His supervisors in the federal government buried their own suspicions about his conduct, tried to silence others who raised concerns, and transferred the doctor from one reservation to another after managers concluded he might have molested his patients ...Weber was convicted in South Dakota in September of abusing four of his patients at the IHS’s Pine Ridge hospital and his government housing unit there.”

-- Defense witnesses at Harvey Weinstein’s trial disputed his accusers’ accounts. Shayna Jacobs reports: “One of those witness was Talita Maia, 35, who was at one point a close friend and roommate of Weinstein rape accuser Jessica Mann. Last week, Mann gave dramatic testimony in which she said the powerful movie producer forced her into intercourse on two occasions — once in New York, the incident at issue in the trial. In New York Supreme Court in Manhattan on Monday, Maia was asked to recall the first time she and Mann, 34, met Weinstein ... ‘She put her arm around him and pinched his cheek,’ Maia testified, adding that Mann said he was ‘so cute.’ ... Prosecutors say Weinstein forced sex on Mann at a DoubleTree Hotel in Manhattan on March 18, 2013. ‘Did [Weinstein] ever force her to do anything against her will?’ defense lawyer Donna Rotunno asked Maia, a Brazilian-born actress, on direct examination. ‘No,’ Maia testified. ‘She spoke very highly of him.’ ... Weinstein’s legal team also called Mexican actress and fashion influencer Claudia Salinas. Earlier in the trial, another accuser, Lauren Young, blamed Salinas for setting her up to be ‘trapped’ in a hotel suite bathroom with Weinstein.

... On Monday, Salinas denied ever walking into a hotel room with Young and Weinstein. ... Justice James Burke told jurors that summations are likely to be Thursday and that they would begin deliberating after Presidents' Day. The defense is expected to call several additional witnesses."

-- Shattering glass: For the first time, the flagship law journals at the top 16 law schools in the country are all led by women. Ann Marimow reports: "Only one woman worked on the staff of the Harvard Law Review when Ruth Bader Ginsburg arrived on campus in 1956. It would be another two decades before a woman was elected to lead the school's prestigious legal journal. The Supreme Court justice recently addressed the current slate of editors in chief from the top 16 law schools in the country. For the first time ever, all are women. ... The event in part celebrated the statistical improbability of an all-female sweep of elections at the leading publications of legal scholarship at schools including Harvard, Yale, Stanford, Georgetown, Columbia and Duke universities. The editors in chief collaborated for the first time to publish a Women & Law journal with a series of essays from prominent female lawyers. But there was also recognition, as the women came together dressed in dark power suits, of the reality that men still dominate the ranks of law firms, the federal judiciary and academia. ...

"In recent years, the number of women enrolling in accredited law schools has exceeded the number of men ... But women make up less than a quarter of law firm equity partners, a quarter of tenured and tenure-track law professors, and about a third of all active federal district and appeals court judges. ... Women are also underrepresented at oral argument at the high court. In the past five terms, 17 percent of the advocates were women ... 'There is certainly more glass yet to be shattered,' Duke Law professor Marin Levy told the crowd after ticking off the statistics. 'But I see a whole lot of hammers out there.'"

The coronavirus and other outbreaks are hard to contain. Here's why.

THE NEW WORLD ORDER:

-- As deaths from the coronavirus topped 1,000, with more than 100 in a single day, China urged countries that have enacted travel restrictions aimed at curbing the outbreak to restore normal ties for the sake of the global economy. Simon Denyer and Rick Noack report: "The comments from China's Foreign Ministry underscored the economic dangers posed by the unprecedented shutdown of much of the world's second-largest economy, as well as the Communist Party's concerns about the outbreak's capacity to fuel domestic instability. Authorities in the virus-hit city of Wuhan have announced fresh restrictions on residents, making millions of people virtual prisoners in their own homes. Two provincial health bosses have been fired as the Communist Party struggles to contain widespread anger over the spread of the virus. ...

“The number of confirmed infections continues to rise but the rate of growth is slowing. ... More than a dozen ambulances are lined up alongside the Diamond Princess in Yokohama as medical staff evacuate passengers and crew confirmed as carrying the virus, after 65 more people on board the cruise ship tested positive. China is bracing for the return of some 160 million migrant workers to their cities of employment as the country’s economy sputters back to life after an extended holiday vacation following the outbreak.”

-- A British “superspreader” may have unwittingly infected at least 11 people with the coronavirus in the course of his travels from Singapore to France to Switzerland and then to England. Infected Britons in England, France and Spain probably caught the virus from him, health authorities and British media claim. (Karla Adam)

-- The CDC confirmed the 13th coronavirus infection in the United States. The patient was among several hundred Americans who were evacuated last week from Wuhan and is currently being treated at the University of California San Diego Medical Center. (Hawkins)

-- Trump keeps saying that the coronavirus could “miraculously” go away this spring. Experts say that's not how diseases work. Hawkins reports for our live blog: “Trump first raised the idea in a tweet last week, saying the Chinese government's efforts to control the virus would succeed 'as the weather starts to warm and the virus hopefully becomes weaker, and then gone.' He made a similar prediction in a rally Monday, suggesting that the outbreak could subside 'by April.' 'You know, in theory when it gets a little warmer, it miraculously goes away, that's true,' he told an audience in New Hampshire. Experts said that's wishful thinking at best: While it's true that respiratory viruses tend to follow seasonal patterns, there's no telling what course the novel coronavirus will take. 'This virus can do anything it wants,' Allison McGeer, an infectious-disease epidemiologist at the University of Toronto, told The Washington Post last week."

-- The virus is spreading rapidly. So is misinformation about it. Kim Bellware reports: "Since the first cases of a then-unidentified pneumonia were reported in late December, hoaxes, half-truths and flat-out lies have proliferated, mostly through social media. BuzzFeed News for several days kept a running list of misinformation, including wildly inaccurate reports that the death toll in China was 112,000 as of late January (reality: around 80 at the time); claims that Chinese people eating bats were the source of the outbreak (a viral photo of a woman biting a bat was not taken in China); and false suggestions that the virus was lab-engineered as a kind of bioweapon."

-- A bag of tiny dead birds from China was confiscated from a passenger at Dulles Airport. Agricultural specialists found a package with pictures of pets printed on it – similar to packages of pet treats – that had several tiny, dried birds inside. The passenger said they were cat food but the birds were quickly confiscated because of the potential threat of avian influenza. (Lori Aratani)

-- Pangolins – the world’s most trafficked mammal – are suspected as a potential coronavirus host. From the NYT: “It is far from clear whether being identified as a viral host would be good or bad for pangolins. It could decrease the trade in the animals, or cause a backlash. It is also far from clear whether the pangolin is the animal that passed the new virus to humans. Bats are still thought to be the original host of the virus. If pangolins are involved in disease transmission, they would act as an intermediate host. The science so far is suggestive rather than conclusive, and because of the intense interest in the virus, some claims have been made public before the traditional scientific review process.”

-- A mask-clad Xi Jinping emerged from a conspicuous absence to visit the coronavirus “front line” at a facility in Beijing. Rick Noack reports: “Photos and videos of the visit — carried by state-run news agencies and television stations — did not deviate from the usual pattern of publicity appearances by Xi and other Chinese Communist Party officials. But Xi’s appearance Monday capped a remarkably unengaged period for the Chinese leader at a critical time, during which he conspicuously avoided public attention. ... Xi left it to other Communist Party officials to calm concerns over the novel coronavirus or to celebrate tireless medical workers.... Keeping a low profile may no longer be a viable option for Xi, as his absence has fueled speculation and as public scrutiny has increasingly turned away from local cadres’ failings and toward more systemic complaints over the ruling Communist Party in Beijing.”

-- The Philippines will end its military cooperation deal with the U.S. From the NYT: “The notice to terminate the pact, the Visiting Forces Agreement, comes as President Rodrigo Duterte has warmed up to China while distancing himself from the United States, the Philippines’ former colonial ruler. The move also comes as the Philippines has shown increasing reluctance to stand up to China over its territorial claims in the South China Sea. ... The agreement still remains in force, but the notice to terminate it, delivered to the American Embassy in Manila, starts a clock under which it will remain in effect for 180 days before lapsing.”

-- The CIA, in partnership with West German intelligence, secretly owned a Swiss company that sold rigged encryption devices to more than 120 countries, which allowed it to read the coded messages of allies and adversaries for decades. Greg Miller reports: “The Swiss firm made millions of dollars selling equipment to more than 120 countries well into the 21st century. Its clients included Iran, military juntas in Latin America, nuclear rivals India and Pakistan, and even the Vatican. But what none of its customers ever knew was that Crypto AG was secretly owned by the CIA in a highly classified partnership with West German intelligence. ... The decades-long arrangement, among the most closely guarded secrets of the Cold War, is laid bare in a classified, comprehensive CIA history of the operation obtained by The Washington Post and ZDF, a German public broadcaster, in a joint reporting project.”

-- Syria and Turkey are inching closer to war after their troops exchanged deadly fire for the second time in days. Kareem Fahim and Sarah Dadouch report: “The latest hostilities started after shelling by Syrian forces killed five Turkish soldiers and injured five others, according to Turkey's Defense Ministry. The deaths came a week after a previous round of Syrian shelling in Idlib killed eight Turkish military personnel. Turkey's response Monday included attacks on what it said were '115 regime targets,' including mortar positions, tanks and a helicopter. One hundred and one troops loyal to Syrian President Bashar al-Assad were killed, the Turkish Defense Ministry said."

-- Israeli opposition leader Benny Gantz had two shots to oust Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. He's now counting on the third time being the charm. Ruth Eglash and Steve Hendrix report:

"As the sides slug their way to a third election in less than a year on March 2, political observers say the nonstop campaign has made the former army general an even more formidable opponent. ... Even after two general elections failed to produce a clear winner and the Israeli public grew increasingly apathetic, those working for Gantz's Blue and White party appear energized. That could reflect the fact that the party has an edge in the polls, which put Blue and White ahead of Netanyahu's ruling Likud party in the final weeks. That appears to continue an upward trend since the first election last April, when, as a newly formed party, Blue and White came in a close second behind Likud. ... Although he was unable to unseat Netanyahu in the previous elections — in part because of Israel's coalition-based parliamentary system — Gantz is now widely viewed as a viable successor to the longtime prime minister."

-- More than 100 U.S. troops have now been diagnosed with brain injuries stemming from Iran's missile attack on an Iraqi base last

month. (Reuters)

-- A strange Russian spacecraft is shadowing a U.S. spy satellite, a U.S. military commander told Time. This underscores “a growing threat to America’s dominance in space-based espionage and a potentially costly new chapter in Washington’s decades-long competition with Moscow. Gen. John ‘Jay’ Raymond, commander of the newly minted U.S. Space Force, says the Russian spacecraft began maneuvering toward the American satellite shortly after being launched into orbit in November, at times creeping within 100 miles of it. ‘We view this behavior as unusual and disturbing,’ Raymond says. ‘It has the potential to create a dangerous situation in space.’ Raymond says the U.S. government has expressed concern to Moscow through diplomatic channels.”

Proposed changes to funding in Trump's budget

THE PRESIDENT'S PRIORITIES:

-- Trump's $4.8 trillion budget plan was met with disdain from Democrats, who said it would cripple low-income families. Jeff Stein and Erica Werner report: "The budget plan sets up the Trump administration's policy priorities heading into the November election and is likely to draw scrutiny in Washington and on the campaign trail. Trump has in the past not shown much interest in pursuing the budget cuts his aides have offered, and he didn't make any public comments about the plan Monday. ... [Instead], Russell Vought, acting White House budget director, touted the proposed spending increases in the budget for NASA, immigration, opioid mitigation and veterans, while saying they would not lead to benefit reductions for Medicare and Medicaid, as Democrats charged ...

“Trump has sought spending cuts in the past, only to back down immediately during negotiations with Democrats. ... Proposing the cuts again, on the eve of the New Hampshire Democratic primary, gave Democrats a fresh target to attack. ‘The old cliché is that a budget is a moral document,’ [Sanders] said in a statement. ‘What kind of unbelievable moral framework allowed this White House to propose $182 billion in cuts to nutrition assistance from needy families, when nearly one in seven households with children are food insecure?’ ... Even some of Trump’s staunchest allies criticized his sharp cuts for domestic agencies, such as the Agriculture Department, which he is targeting for an 8 percent overall reduction. That was an indication that the budget will get a cold shoulder on Capitol Hill from lawmakers of both parties.”

-- The budget would slash student loan programs and offer tax breaks for private school tuition, offering sharp contrasts to the education proposals pushed by Democratic presidential candidates. Overall, the administration wants to cut the Education Department’s discretionary spending by 7.8 percent, replacing funding for 29 education programs – including more than $24 billion in spending – with a single block-grant program totaling just over $19 billion. (Laura Meckler and Danielle Douglas-Gabriel)

-- The Trump budget would decimate the budget for foreign aid and diplomacy, a move that lawmakers predicted would be swiftly rejected by Congress. The budget would allot $40 billion to the State Department and the U.S. Agency for International Development, representing a cut of about 22 percent. (Carol Morello)

-- The Department of Transportation's discretionary spending would also be cut by 13 percent, including deep reductions in spending on Amtrak and airport grants, as well as cuts of more than $2 billion in highway infrastructure funds. At the same time, the administration introduced what it called a “historic, 10-year, $810 billion reauthorization of surface transportation programs,” which would cover highways, transit rail and other programs and would replace a five-year transportation bill, known as the FAST Act, which will expire later this year. (Michael Laris)

-- Trump once again called for the elimination of federal arts agencies. Previous proposals by the president along these lines have been soundly rejected by Congress, which has instead increased funding for the National Endowment for the Arts and the National Endowment for the Humanities. (Peggy McGlone)

-- Federal employees' retirement benefits would also be cut. In some cases, the benefits would be reduced only for future retirees, but in other cases, those already retired would face cuts as well. The budget also proposes a 1 percent pay increase for federal employees while recommending a 3 percent raise for military personnel. (Eric Yoder)

-- And while Trump wants to grant NASA a multibillion-dollar boost to put astronauts back on the moon, his budget would cut funding for other science and health agencies. The Health and Human Services agency would suffer a nearly 10 percent cut, while the Environmental Protection Agency would lose 26 percent of its funding – the administration is hoping to eliminate nearly 50 EPA programs. The Energy Department would get a boost in funding for safeguarding the nuclear weapons stockpile, but outside of that program it would see a 28.7 percent cut.

The budget would cut spending at HHS by 9 percent. Medicaid would receive nearly $920 billion less than otherwise anticipated by 2030. Meanwhile, a “health reform vision allowance” would lower spending on Obamacare by $844 billion over the decade. The budget request would also trim funding for the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention by 16 percent. The president’s health priorities – wiping out HIV transmission in the U.S. and battling the opioid crisis – would receive $716 million and $5 billion respectively. (Joel Achenbach, Laurie McGinley, Amy Goldstein and Ben Guarino)

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

A group of Biden supporters remixed a popular '90s song to make it about him:

Kate Hyde
@KateHydeNY

Watch as a chorus of Gen Zs presents a political rendition of Backstreet Boys to a Boomer.

♡ 1,706 4:05 PM - Feb 10, 2020

💬 876 people are talking about this

Warren took a walk around a snowy New Hampshire town:

Tara Prindiville ✓
@taraprindiville

Before departing on our press bus this morning, we caught @ewarren on her way back from a 2.2 mile walk. It's hard to see, but she's wearing a hat that says "Make Earth Cool Again". She says her walk through a nearby neighborhood in the snow is a "good way to start the day."

♥ 1,759 3:39 PM - Feb 10, 2020

💬 461 people are talking about this

The Iowa Democratic Party's chairman was talking about the disastrous caucuses when his lectern's sign fell, prompting chatter that this was perhaps a metaphor:

Shane Goldmacher ✓
@ShaneGoldmacher

This happened

♥ 5,868 9:52 PM - Feb 10, 2020

💬 1,322 people are talking about this

Turns out some people can win in Iowa:

David Freedlander ✓
@freedlander

Looks like there was a big winner in Iowa last week after all kcci.com/article/former...

Former Gov. Vilsack claims $150,000 Powerball prize
He never thought he would win, but it didn't stop him from playing.
kcci.com

♥ 11 6:11 PM - Feb 10, 2020

See David Freedlander's other Tweets

Trump's defense budget proposed gutting the budget of Stars and Stripes, its independent newspaper. A Post reporter who used to work there questioned what it says about the Pentagon's priorities:

Alex Horton ✓
@AlexHortonTX

The agency that can't pass an audit and brought you the F-35, billions in uniform waste, Fat Leonard, pallets of cash for Afghan warlords and millions paid to the NFL with no clear return want you to know it's tightening its belt for a newspaper representing a rounding error
twitter.com/reporterjoe/st...

Joe Gould ✓ @reporterjoe

Acting DoD Comptroller Elaine McCusker confirms @starsandstripes' budget faces significant cuts, per DoD-wide review. "We essentially decided, coming into the modern age, that newspapers is not the way we communicate any longer."

790 8:36 PM - Feb 10, 2020

406 people are talking about this

Many former DOJ officials criticized Barr's "intake process" to assess Giuliani's information about the Bidens:

David Laufman
@DavidLaufmanLaw

There is nothing normal about the Attorney General creating a special “intake process in the field” for info relating to claims advancing a White House political narrative — particularly for someone reportedly under criminal investigation washingtonpost.com/national-secur...

Barr acknowledges Justice Dept. has created ‘intak...

The attorney general said officials must be cautious with information emanating from Ukraine.

washingtonpost.com

♡ 8,604 10:46 PM - Feb 10, 2020

💬 4,173 people are talking about this

This is what the new Air Force One will look like:

Marcus Weisgerber ✓
@MarcusReports

JUST IN: It's official ... This is paint job for Trump's new Air Force One, as depicted in new Pentagon budget documents

♥ 882 8:09 PM - Feb 10, 2020

💬 866 people are talking about this

And the D.C. Council tried to subtweet New York Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez after she said she couldn't find a good bacon, egg and cheese sandwich in the capital, but the sandwich they ended up eating looked nothing like the classic New York City rolls:

Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez ✓
@AOC

At this rate y'all are going to make me start a version of The Pengest Munch for breakfast sandwiches 🤑 😂
twitter.com/councilofdc/st...

Council of DC ✓ @councilofdc

Glad I found this tasty $3.59 bacon, egg, and cheese close to home when I did, or else the Acela fare up to NYC would have really eaten into my planned breakfast budget

♥ 9,709 10:46 PM - Feb 10, 2020

💬 1,275 people are talking about this

VIDEOS OF THE DAY:

Stephen Colbert introduced us to the political consultant the Democrats hired to look over the New Hampshire vote:

Seth Meyers criticized Trump for retaliating against his impeachment trial witnesses:

And Trevor Noah took a look at the beef between Biden and Buttigieg:

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202

Privacy Policy | Help

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: The two leading women in the Democratic field are battling for third place in New Hampshire
Date: Tuesday, February 11, 2020 11:09:29 AM

---

If you're having trouble reading this, click here.

---

PowerPost

The Daily 202

Morning intelligence for leaders

Share:

 Listen to The Big Idea

Powered by  Liventent

The two leading women in the Democratic field are battling for third place in New Hampshire

Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) takes the stage on Monday night for a rally at South Church in downtown Portsmouth, N.H. (Melina Mara/The Washington Post)

BY JAMES HOHMANN
with Mariana Alfaro

THE BIG IDEA:

PORTSMOUTH, N.H. – Elizabeth Warren retooled her stump speech on the eve of the New Hampshire primary to make the case that she’s always been an underdog. She emphasized her hardscrabble upbringing in Oklahoma, her battle to create the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau and her victory over incumbent Republican Scott Brown to win her Senate seat. “You know what we need as president? Someone who has been winning unwinnable fights all her life,” Warren said.

The Massachusetts senator led in polls of this state last summer. Now trailing Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and former South Bend, Ind., mayor Pete Buttigieg, Warren is locked in a three-way battle in New Hampshire for third place against an ascendant Sen. Amy Klobuchar (D-Minn.) and a fading Joe Biden that will determine whether she stays viable as the Democratic presidential nominating contest moves on to Nevada, South Carolina and Super Tuesday.

Warren and Klobuchar are the last two women standing in the top tier of presidential contenders. Four years after many voters were disappointed that Hillary Clinton didn't become the first female president, the two senators are still in the hunt. They're fighting for a bronze ticket out of this pivotal early state and the chance to take on President Trump in November. But they're taking divergent approaches that go beyond their ideological differences in an attempt to gain the upper hand.

For now, though, the odds still seem stacked against Warren or Klobuchar becoming their party's standard-bearer. Indeed, no modern Democrat has won the nomination without finishing first or second in New Hampshire.

With a large pipe organ behind her, Warren paced the stage and seemed to draw energy from the crowd like an old-fashioned evangelist. "We're going to get knocked down," she told a capacity crowd of 785 people inside a magnificent church sanctuary that was built in the 1820s. "We're going to find bumpy times, and we'll find hard times, and we'll find times when we think, 'Oh, this hurts.' But the thing is: People are counting on us to get this right. ... It's about getting off our back foot and getting on our front

foot.”

When her microphone cut out 47 minutes into her speech, as she talked about taking on Wall Street, Warren joked loud enough so everyone could hear: “That was the banks!” The raucous crowd rewarded her with standing ovation after standing ovation. “Don’t tell me what we can’t do,” she said. “We’ve done it.”

Sen. Amy Klobuchar (D-Minn.) speaks to a rally on Monday afternoon at Exeter Town Hall in Exeter, N.H. (Bonnie Jo Mount/The Washington Post)

Sixteen miles away in Exeter, a few hours earlier, Klobuchar spoke to 350 people with another 200 watching a feed in an overflow room. “As you’ve probably heard, we’re on a bit of a surge,” she said. The Minnesotan is drawing consistently bigger crowds over the last few days than she got before her fifth-place finish in Iowa, and her campaign says she’s raised more than $3 million since her strong debate performance on Friday night.

Like Warren, Klobuchar emphasized that she's been underestimated her whole life and especially throughout this campaign, outlasting many rivals who entered the contest with national name recognition and larger donor networks. On the anniversary of her outdoor announcement amid a blizzard back home in Minnesota, she asked Granite Staters for their help to “surprise the country.”

Klobuchar's final commercial before the primary is called “Empathy,” and its message is that she feels your pain and sympathizes with your hardships. She talks at length in her speeches about her father's alcoholism and the struggles now to pay for his long-term care. “I know you, and I will fight for you,” she said at the close of her 40-minute speech. “I want you to know this because I need your help right now. We are on the cusp of something really great.”

Bigger picture, though, Klobuchar is running as a pragmatic dealmaker while Warren is running as an ideological street brawler. Klobuchar said yesterday that she was the only candidate who raised her hand during Friday night's debate when the moderator asked whether anyone on stage worries that a democratic socialist couldn't win the general election. [In fact, Steyer did as well.] She also criticized the “free college for all” and Medicare-for-all plans that Warren and Sanders advocate, and she warned voters not to fall for “bumper sticker slogans,” an apparent reference to Buttigieg.

Warren has mostly tried to avoid taking direct shots at any of her

rivals during these final days, hoping to emerge as a unity candidate by staying out of the crossfire between Buttigieg and Sanders. “There are a lot of folks shooting at other folks,” Warren told reporters last night. “Democrats cannot do a repeat of 2016. We can’t go into a general election divided and angry with each other.”

On a tour around the state, Warren stopped earlier Monday at the Sweet Maple Cafe in Conway. When a voter said she was considering backing a more moderate candidate, out of a desire to defeat Trump, Warren replied that she’s somewhere in the middle on a continuum between Sanders on the left and Buttigieg and Klobuchar in the middle.

---

Content from Blue Cross Blue Shield Association

Addressing the need for more affordable medicines

Americans pay too much for prescription drugs. Even generics can be too expensive. So we’re investing in a non-profit company to produce the drugs people need at a price they can afford. Learn more.

---

Elizabeth Warren hands out donuts outside Portsmouth Middle School on Tuesday morning. (Melina Mara/The Washington Post)

Some Warren allies privately express frustration that Klobuchar got as much momentum out of Iowa as she did, but Warren did not. The Iowa Democratic Party announced Sunday that Warren is poised to receive eight delegates from Iowa to the national convention in Milwaukee, behind the 14 for Buttigieg and 12 for Sanders, but more than the six for Biden. Klobuchar, who represents the neighboring state, received only one pledged delegate.

Klobuchar often invokes her endorsement from the New York Times editorial board. But Warren, whom the Times also endorsed, does not bring it up. She seems particularly cautious about doing anything that might make her look elitist. This also explains why she assiduously avoids using the H-word on the stump – Harvard – even though she was a barrier-breaking professor at the law school there. Cambridge, Mass., is only 60 miles south of the church where Warren spoke last night. She also emphasizes her preference for Michelob Ultra over white wine.

Warren emphasizes her gender – and the possibly historic nature of her campaign to be the first female president – far more than Klobuchar does in her stump speech. After Warren spoke last night, before she gaggled with reporters, she posed for pictures with a line of young people. She leaned down to all the little girls and repeated the same message over a dozen times: “Hi, my name is Elizabeth, and I’m running for president, because that’s what girls do.” Then she reached out her pinkie and made pinkie promises with each little girl.

Warren’s base of support feels more durable than the polls suggest. She has a loyal following of college-educated, liberal women who have steadfastly supported her since last year. They love the idea that Warren could be the first female president, and they roar with approval when she talks about all the executive actions that a president can take “all by herself.”

You should take all these surveys with a grain of salt because the race is so fluid, but the final CNN tracking poll, conducted by the University of New Hampshire and released Monday, showed Sanders in the lead, with 29 percent, among likely primary voters, followed by Buttigieg at 22 percent, Biden at 11 percent, Warren at 10 percent and Klobuchar at 7 percent. But Klobuchar has unquestionable momentum going into primary day. Even on the eve of the vote, only about half of those polled said they had definitely made their final decision. Interestingly, Warren was at the top of the list* of people's second choices: 20 percent said Warren is their back-up, followed by Sanders at 15 percent and Buttigieg at 14 percent.

Amy Klobuchar jokes with supporters outside a polling place on Tuesday in Manchester, N.H. She was joined by her daughter, Abigail Bessler. (Bonnie Jo Mount/The Washington Post)

Klobuchar's calls for national reconciliation resonate with the kinds of moderate Democrats and independents who go to her events while Warren's promise to fight fired up the more liberal people who tend to support her. Jill Baillargeon, 36 of Exeter, has children who are 7, 5 and 2-years-old. "I feel pretty good about Amy after seeing her," she said as she left Klobuchar's event, with her daughter Maeve and a miniature American flag that volunteers handed her on the way in. "I was for Bernie for a while, then Warren, then Biden and now Klobuchar."

Baillargeon, who teaches English lessons online to kids who live in China, wants an American president that she can let her kids watch on television without worrying about what they'll say. "We've got a lot going on in our life," she said. "I feel like I could breathe a little bit easier and not worry about what's going on in Washington everyday if Amy was in the Oval Office. She could bring back a sense of normalcy."

Warren's supporters want "big, structural change." Klobuchar's audiences desire a "return to normalcy," a pitch that previously pulled many of them toward Biden. "I really want someone who can help the country take a pause to breathe and to heal," said Susan Varn, 69, a retired consultant who lives in Exeter. "I'm less in the Elizabeth or Bernie camp because I think they want to do too much too soon when this country has been traumatized and needs to recover."

Varn has been leaning toward Biden because he's a "healing figure" who might be able to patch up the wounds of division, but she really liked what she saw from Klobuchar. She's had a Biden yard sign in front of her home for a while now, but she took a Klobuchar sign with her when she left the rally. She said the two signs will go next to each other, and she will decide whether to go with Biden or Klobuchar before heading to her polling place.

A common refrain among Warren supporters was that, in picking her, they're following their hearts. "Right now, we're in the primaries so you go with who you like the most," said Aaron Jule, 45 of Rye, who is in retail sales. "After Tuesday, I might have to deal with something that I have to live with."

Klobuchar emphasizes her ability to topple Trump in a head-to-head matchup in a way that Warren does not. During a town hall on Saturday, Klobuchar told voters that she had just been texting backstage with Cindy McCain, the widow of the 2008 GOP presidential nominee John McCain. She always highlights the inroads she's made with Republicans as a senator in Washington and during her three statewide victories in Minnesota. "I have won every red and purple, suburban and rural congressional district every single time I've run," she likes to say. "I have won every race, every place, every time all the way down to fourth grade, where my slogan that I have since abandoned was, 'All the way with Amy K.'"

It was a play on Lyndon Johnson's 1964 slogan: "All the way with LBJ."

Elizabeth Warren speaks to New Hampshire voters at Sweet Maple Cafe in Conway on Monday. (Melina Mara/The Washington Post)

“Electability” as a buzzword has become quite blasé in the aftermath of Iowa. I interviewed more than a dozen voters at both the Klobuchar and Warren rallies. The most striking takeaway from these conversations was that several women across the ideological spectrum complained without prompting – and without me using it – about the pervasiveness of the term in the Democratic debate.

“I know that she’s polling in third, fourth or fifth in New Hampshire. I certainly hope she sticks with it,” said Warren supporter Kelly Scanlon, 44 of Dover, who works for a nonprofit organization that assists the developmentally disabled. “The rhetoric revolving around picking a candidate who can beat Trump feels like coded language to me that means it needs to be a white male. Because they don’t want Hillary 2.0. That rhetoric has hurt [Warren] a little bit. At one point in time, she was considered the front-runner. That’s when the talking heads started discussing ‘concerns’ about her ‘electability.’ That’s a word that comes up, obviously, a lot.”

Warren supporter Terie Norelli, the former Democratic speaker of the New Hampshire House, also complained about this. “When I went out on the campaign trail, I kept hearing from people who would say, ‘Oh, I’m so nervous. I don’t want Donald Trump to win,’” she recalled. “They’d say the only the thing I care about is beating Donald Trump. And I was like: We don’t have a crystal ball. But we have something really important, and that’s a first-in-the-nation primary vote. So I decided that I would focus on who was going to be the best president. ... And then I realized: She can also win.”

Sheila Kelly, 56, a fundraiser for a nonprofit organization who lives in Exeter, is torn among Klobuchar, Buttigieg and possibly entrepreneur Andrew Yang. Outside Klobuchar’s town hall, she said she’s searched around online to research who might be strongest against Trump. She volunteered that she really dislikes when the term “electability” gets thrown around by pundits. “I don’t like where that leads,” she said.

Kelly believes a candidate who excites people – who makes them want to “get off the couch” – is essential to victory, and she said a simplistic focus on electability puts a premium on “milquetoast” when that’s not what historically wins. “For whatever reason, Biden’s just not exciting to me,” she explained. “Also, to be honest, I think Warren is in the rearview mirror.” But, she added, her daughter is planning to drive home on Tuesday afternoon from Brown University in Rhode Island, where she’s a student, so that she can vote – probably for Warren.

Joe Biden holds a rally on Sunday night in Hampton, N.H. (Bonnie Jo Mount/The Washington Post)

THE BIDEN COLLAPSE CONTINUES:

-- “Biden’s advisers were bracing for another dismal result, with some inside his campaign saying he could finish as low as fifth, and with some early warning signs that his national polling lead — one that he pointed to just two days earlier as validation — has collapsed,” Matt Viser and Sean Sullivan report. “Much as he tried to hurry past his low finish in Iowa, Biden on Monday sought to push beyond New Hampshire even before the vote. His campaign announced that its co-chairman, Rep. Cedric L. Richmond (D-La.), will host a ‘launch party’ in South Carolina on Tuesday night at around the same time polls will be closing in New Hampshire. Biden is planning to travel to South Carolina, where he has been leading in polls ahead of the Feb. 29 vote, before heading to Nevada, which holds its caucuses

Feb. 22.”

-- “There are two Joe Bidens. The wrong one is running for president,” Karen Tumulty observes in a smart column: “Biden sounds like a man whose time has passed. Many in the modest-sized crowds that he draws are dismayed. After he spoke on the same stage as the other Democratic candidates at a state Democratic Party dinner on Saturday night, one undecided voter told me: ‘Joe needs to retire.’ This has become a common refrain, even among people who admire and respect Biden. But then there is the Biden you see mostly on the rope line.

“As soon as the sound on his mic is turned off, he dives toward the area where those who remain behind are standing to shake his hand or take a selfie. At those moments, Biden is transformed. He lingers with anyone who wants to tell him a story, even as maintenance workers start dismantling his stage and folding up chairs. People light up in his presence. Perhaps because of the personal suffering he has endured, Biden seems to have a kind of radar that draws him to people who are starving for solace and reassurance, and they to him.

“On the stump, he is at his most compelling when he stops talking about himself and starts telling the stories of the people he has met. Some of them have crossed Biden’s path here in New Hampshire: the security guard mourning the death of her father and fearful of the test that grief is putting on her 30 years of sobriety; the man who confided he has just lost his job and is afraid to tell his family; the woman who fled the man who beat her and ended up living on the street; the line of people standing in 22-degree temperatures at a downtown food bank, some of them children wearing no gloves. This is the better Biden, embracing personal vulnerability over electoral invincibility. He is perhaps the most authentic tribune of empathy in public life today — and the starkest contrast imaginable from the man who sits in the Oval Office.”

-- On the trail with Biden, this question arises: What happens when the “electability candidate” starts to lose? Ben Terris

reports: “There’s a surreal feeling surrounding the Biden campaign’s efforts in New Hampshire. ... Maybe this is a strategic move by a candidate whose best play, for now, is to manage expectations. But how exactly are his people on the ground supposed to feel about that? Does anyone know what place they should be fighting for? ... ‘I’d be happy in the top three,’ said Heather Ledoux, a registered nurse who turned her house in Litchfield into a canvassing staging area. ‘Top four counts as a win,’ said Bob Mulholland, a member of the Democratic National Committee and a Biden supporter. ‘I’m not going to prognosticate,’ former secretary of state John F. Kerry said when asked what would count as a success. ‘You’ll know it, we’ll all know it, we’ll feel it.’ ...

“When a campaign appears to be on a downward spiral, it becomes easy to see signs of doom. ... There was Biden’s anemic cheering section at the McIntyre-Shaheen 100 Club Dinner — a raucous fundraiser held in a Manchester hockey arena — that appeared smaller even than the group that came out to support nominal presidential candidate Deval Patrick. There’s the ways in which Biden has begun acting like an underdog, attacking his opponents as too inexperienced ... or too extreme ... Even his supporters have begun talking about him like a long shot. ‘No one ever expected Donald Trump to be elected president, either,’ said Barry Nestor, standing outside the Rex Theatre in Manchester, wearing socks on his hands to keep warm before seeing Biden speak.”

-- “Biden is the most electable candidate, just not right here or right now,” columnist Alexandra Petri writes in a satire.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) speaks during a town hall at Pierce University on Monday in Rindge, N.H. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

MORE ON-THE-GROUND REPORTING:

-- The first votes in the New Hampshire primary were cast just after midnight. Mike Bloomberg took home an unexpected bipartisan win in Dixville Notch (with three write-in votes). Klobuchar was the popular choice in Hart's Location (where she got six votes) and Millsfield (where she got two) – the other New Hampshire locations that cast their ballots in the wee hours. From WMUR: "Bloomberg got three write-in votes, one of which was a write-in vote in the Republican primary. It's a rarity in Dixville Notch for write-in votes. [Buttigieg and Sanders] each got one vote. The local tradition in Dixville Notch was put into jeopardy this year when it was learned that not enough people in the community were registered to vote. In order for the midnight vote to take place, Dixville Notch needed a minimum of five registered voters. In January, Dixville Notch got enough residents after the man behind the redevelopment project of the Balsams Resort officially moved to town and registered to vote." The only candidate to visit Dixville Notch prior to the vote was Sen. Michael Bennet (D-Colo.), who failed to convince any of the five residents to support him.

-- Sanders, looking for a more emphatic victory than his near-tie in the Iowa caucuses, wrapped up his New Hampshire effort last night with a rally that his campaign said drew more than 7,500 people in Durham. A rock band called the Strokes performed, and Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-N.Y.) warmed up the crowd at an arena on the University of New Hampshire's campus. Buttigieg's final rally was in Exeter, and actor Kevin Costner introduced him.

-- Jill Biden helped push a heckler away from her husband during a New Hampshire event. A man, shouting as he recorded the moment on his phone, moved toward the candidate's lectern as the former vice president spoke. Jill Biden, who was seated close by, hopped up from her chair and stopped the protester before he got too close. When asked about the incident later, she laughed and said: "I'm

a good Philly girl.” (CNN)

-- Trump, who held a campaign rally in Manchester last night, has inserted himself into the Democrats' nominating contest with a fervor that exceeds his predecessors — many of whom were reluctant to directly involve themselves in another party's political selection process. Robert Costa, Toluse Olorunnipa and Josh Dawsey report: “The Trump campaign’s effort to counter the Democratic race extended to a ‘Cops for Trump’ gathering on Monday afternoon in Portsmouth ... Pence and White House senior adviser Ivanka Trump both spoke at the event, which was attended by about 200 police officers ... The Trump campaign has been active in New Hampshire for weeks, sending legions of surrogates to the state and booking them on state-based talk radio programs and at local Republican events. For Trump and his loyalists, New Hampshire holds a particularly special place in their collective political memory: It was his first primary victory and a significant boost that pushed him toward the 2016 Republican nomination.”

-- Health care is the top concern for the New Hampshire electorate, and it comes up more than any other issue during town halls and on rope lines. Amy Goldstein reports: “The system’s flaws come up nonstop: the expense of prescription drugs, a scarcity of mental health services, coverage gaps, and care that’s difficult to afford even for people who have private insurance. ... With one of the nation’s highest median ages and a fast-growing older population, ... people see close-up the limits of Medicare.”

-- Nine places to watch as returns come in tonight, per Politico:

- The bigger cities: Manchester, “The state’s largest city is arguably also the most important — a blowout here is a solid indication of who will win”; Concord, “It’s a good spot to see where pro-establishment, middle-of-the-road voters are breaking”; Nashua, “The most diverse city in the state, only about 82% white as compared to the state’s 94% white.”
- The Trump-Obama cities: Claremont, “Perhaps a quintessential Obama-Trump town”; and Laconia, “The city’s brand new Democratic mayor was a heavily sought after endorsement before he finally supported [Klobuchar].”
- The college towns: Keene, Plymouth, Durham and Hanover. “In 2016, they represented less than seven percent of the overall vote, but Sanders won them with astonishing numbers.”

-- Several campaigns, wary of working with the Democratic National Committee, have set up a shadow voter protection program in New Hampshire for today. They will use a neutral boiler room helmed by former Obama adviser Quentin Palfrey to share reports of voter rights infringements from legal observers across the state. (Politico)

-- Audio from a 2015 Aspen Institute appearance purportedly features Bloomberg defending his stop-and-frisk policy. From Mediaite: Bloomberg appears to tell the audience “that cops targeted minority neighborhoods ‘because that’s where all the crime is.’ ... In the roughly minute-long excerpt, Bloomberg begins his argument defending stop-and-frisk by saying: ‘95% of your murders — murderers and murder victims — fit one M.O. You can just take the description, Xerox it and pass it out to all the cops.’”

-- Bloomberg doesn't want Silicon Valley's money, but he did call up hundreds of tech leaders and asked them to refer their most talented employees. From Vox: “The request made plain Bloomberg's comfort with — and, in some ways, dependence on — the Silicon Valley companies that have been persistently criticized during the 2020 Democratic primary. ... On the Monday call, [former Foursquare CEO Jeff] Glueck said he needed the tech leaders to pitch jobs on the Bloomberg campaign to ‘your most talented friends’ and ‘send them our way,’ especially those with expertise in data science, internet marketing, advertising buying and analytics.”

-- With five days until early voting begins in Nevada, the campaigns are still in the dark about the state's new caucus process. From the Nevada Independent:

Campaigns “have been told that the Nevada State Democratic Party won't be using the same app and vendor that were in part responsible for bungling the results of Iowa's caucus last week, that the party won't be using any app at all, and that what the party does plan to use is best described as a ‘tool’ or ‘calculator.’ Beyond that, aides aren't really sure what's in store for the state's Feb. 22 Democratic caucus. They don't know how early voting, which was originally supposed to take place on an app on an iPad, is set to work. They don't know how those votes are going to flow back to early voters' home precincts to be counted alongside their neighbors preferences just as if they were there on Caucus Day. (A second app was supposed to accomplish that function.) They also

don't know how the Caucus Day results will be transmitted to the party."

QUOTE OF THE DAY:

"They're all going after each other. You got them all over the place. They don't know what the hell they're doing. ... They can't even count their votes," Trump said of the Democratic candidates during his rally in Manchester. (Robert Costa, Toluse Olorunnipa and Josh Dawsey)

A blue rectangular advertisement for a podcast. At the top, it says "The Daily 202's" in a smaller font, followed by "BIG IDEA" in a very large, white, serif font. Below this, there is a white play button icon inside a circle, followed by the text "Get James's insight into Washington every weekday on your smart speaker or favorite podcast player." The background of the ad features faint, concentric circles.

Subscribe on Amazon Echo, Google Home, Apple HomePod and other podcast players.

Welcome to the Daily 202, PowerPost's morning briefing for decision-makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter.

Barr says Justice Department will vet Giuliani evidence

THE JUSTICE SYSTEM:

-- Federal prosecutors said that Trump confidant Roger Stone deserves seven to nine years in prison for lying to Congress in the Russia probe. Spencer Hsu, Ann Marimow and Devlin Barrett report: “The sentencing filing came after days of tense debate within the U.S. attorney’s office in Washington about the proper prison term for the sixth Trump associate convicted and last person indicted in former special counsel Robert S. Mueller III’s investigation. Front-line prosecutors, some previously with Mueller’s team, argued for a sentence on the higher end for Stone than some of their supervisors were comfortable with, according to two people familiar with the discussions. A recommendation on the higher end prevailed, with prosecutors’ filings citing federal sentencing guidelines that ratchet up in cases involving obstruction that impedes the administration of justice. ...

“Stone’s defense on Monday asked for a sentence of probation, citing his age, 67, and lack of criminal history. They also noted that of seven Mueller defendants who have been sentenced, only one faces more than a six-month term: former Trump campaign chairman Paul Manafort, who is serving 7½ years. ... Hours before the filing was due Monday, the new head of the D.C. office, interim U.S. attorney Timothy Shea — a former close adviser to Attorney General William P. Barr — had not made a final decision on Stone’s sentencing recommendation ... Disagreements among prosecutors about sentencing recommendations are not uncommon, especially when it comes to politically sensitive high-profile cases. It would have been unusual, however, for the U.S. attorney’s office to endorse a sentence below the guideline range after winning conviction at trial...”

-- Barr acknowledged that the DOJ has created an “intake process” to vet dirt provided by Rudy Giuliani on Joe and Hunter Biden. Matt Zapposky and Barrett report: “Barr confirmed an assertion made Sunday by Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) that the Justice Department had ‘created a process that Rudy could give information and they would see if it’s verified.’ ... ‘That is true for all information that comes to the department relating to the Ukraine, including anything Mr. Giuliani might provide,’ Barr said. He did not provide any other specifics. A Justice Department official said Giuliani had ‘recently’ shared information with federal law enforcement officials through the process described by Barr. Two people familiar with the matter said the information is being routed to the U.S. attorney’s office in Pittsburgh. ...

“That Giuliani would have a direct pipeline to the Justice Department for providing information on a political rival of Trump raised fears among some legal analysts that federal law enforcement was being conscripted into doing campaign work for the president. The matter is complicated, too, because Giuliani is under investigation by the Justice Department. That case already has produced campaign finance charges against two of his associates, Lev Parnas and Igor Fruman, who helped in Giuliani’s Ukraine-related pursuits ... Barr said the intake process was established ‘so that any information coming in about Ukraine could be carefully scrutinized by the department and its intelligence community partners so that we could assess its provenance and its credibility.’ FBI Deputy Director David Bowdich said: ‘We’re taking information as we would in any case. We will evaluate it appropriately.’ ... Barr’s announcement angered Democrats, who questioned whether Giuliani was getting special treatment from Trump’s Justice Department. ... Giuliani has long vexed Barr and the Justice Department. ... But Giuliani has maintained access to the department and to Barr.”

-- A federal judge last night canceled the sentencing hearing for former Trump national security adviser Michael Flynn that was set for Feb. 27. Judge Emmet Sullivan issued an order putting off the hearing indefinitely, pending a new order from him. Martin Weil reports: “The move represents the latest turn in the case against Flynn, who pleaded guilty in December 2017 to lying to the FBI about his contacts with Russian Ambassador Sergey Kislyak. Federal prosecutors once suggested probation for Flynn, then shifted to include prison time, and then said in a late January court filing that probation remained a 'reasonable sentence.' The prosecutors' Jan. 29 filing was submitted as Flynn continued his effort to withdraw his guilty plea."

-- Barr also announced the DOJ will sue so-called "sanctuary" jurisdictions over policies he considers overly friendly to undocumented migrants. Zapotosky and Barrett report: "Barr announced the lawsuits in a speech to the National Sheriffs' Association, saying they were part of 'a significant escalation in the federal government's efforts to confront the resistance of 'sanctuary cities.'" He said he also was reviewing the practice of some state and local prosecutors who charge criminals with lesser offenses to avoid deportation, and giving non-sanctuary jurisdictions priority when it comes to awarding certain grant money." In separate federal filings, the Justice Department sought to block a New Jersey policy that limits how state and local authorities share information with federal immigration officials and to stop a county in Washington state from preventing immigration authorities from using an international airport there for deportations.

-- Possibly suspicious grant-making decisions at the DOJ prompted a whistleblower complaint. From Reuters: The internal complaints happened "after two nonprofits were denied funding in favor of two less established groups whose applications were not recommended by career DOJ officials. The awarding of more than $1 million total to the two groups, Hookers for Jesus in Nevada and the Lincoln Tubman Foundation in South Carolina, has triggered a whistleblower complaint filed by the Justice Department's employee union to the department's Inspector General. An internal department memo seen by Reuters shows that as of September 12, two long-established nonprofits – the Catholic Charities of the Diocese of Palm Beach and Chicanos Por La Causa of Phoenix – were originally on the list of recommended grant winners after receiving high marks from outside contractors hired to review applications. The annual grants help nonprofits and local governments aid human trafficking victims.”

-- The DOJ also charged four members of the Chinese military in connection with the hack of the credit reporting agency

Equifax. Barrett and Zapotosky report: “In a nine-count indictment filed in federal court in Atlanta, federal prosecutors alleged that four members of the People's Liberation Army hacked into Equifax's systems, stealing the personal data as well as company trade secrets. [Barr] called their efforts ‘a deliberate and sweeping intrusion into the private information of the American people.’ ... The 2017 breach gave hackers access to the personal information, including Social Security numbers and birth dates, of about 145 million people. ... Barr said China has a ‘voracious appetite’ for Americans’ personal information, and he pointed to other intrusions that he alleged have been carried out by Beijing's actors in recent years, including hacks disclosed in 2015 of the health insurer Anthem and the federal Office of Personnel Management (OPM), as well as a 2018 hack of the hotel chain Marriott. ‘This data has economic value, and these thefts can feed China's development of artificial intelligence tools,’ Barr said.”

-- A former Indian Health Service pediatrician was sentenced to five lifetime prison terms for sexually abusing boys. From the

WSJ: “Stanley Patrick Weber, 71, groomed and abused Native American boys as young as about 9 years old on reservations in Montana and South Dakota between 1995 and 2011, according to court documents. His supervisors in the federal government buried their own suspicions about his conduct, tried to silence others who raised concerns, and transferred the doctor from one reservation to another after managers concluded he might have molested his patients ...Weber was convicted in South Dakota in September of abusing four of his patients at the IHS’s Pine Ridge hospital and his government housing unit there.”

-- Defense witnesses at Harvey Weinstein’s trial disputed his accusers’ accounts. Shayna Jacobs reports: “One of those witness was Talita Maia, 35, who was at one point a close friend and roommate of Weinstein rape accuser Jessica Mann. Last week, Mann gave dramatic testimony in which she said the powerful movie producer forced her into intercourse on two occasions — once in New York, the incident at issue in the trial. In New York Supreme Court in Manhattan on Monday, Maia was asked to recall the first time she and Mann, 34, met Weinstein ... ‘She put her arm around him and pinched his cheek,’ Maia testified, adding that Mann said he was ‘so cute.’ ... Prosecutors say Weinstein forced sex on Mann at a DoubleTree Hotel in Manhattan on March 18, 2013. ‘Did [Weinstein] ever force her to do anything against her will?’ defense lawyer Donna Rotunno asked Maia, a Brazilian-born actress, on direct examination. ‘No,’ Maia testified. ‘She spoke very highly of him.’ ... Weinstein’s legal team also called Mexican actress and fashion influencer Claudia Salinas. Earlier in the trial, another accuser, Lauren Young, blamed Salinas for setting her up to be ‘trapped’ in a hotel suite bathroom with Weinstein.

... On Monday, Salinas denied ever walking into a hotel room with Young and Weinstein. ... Justice James Burke told jurors that summations are likely to be Thursday and that they would begin deliberating after Presidents' Day. The defense is expected to call several additional witnesses."

-- Shattering glass: For the first time, the flagship law journals at the top 16 law schools in the country are all led by women. Ann Marimow reports: "Only one woman worked on the staff of the Harvard Law Review when Ruth Bader Ginsburg arrived on campus in 1956. It would be another two decades before a woman was elected to lead the school's prestigious legal journal. The Supreme Court justice recently addressed the current slate of editors in chief from the top 16 law schools in the country. For the first time ever, all are women. ... The event in part celebrated the statistical improbability of an all-female sweep of elections at the leading publications of legal scholarship at schools including Harvard, Yale, Stanford, Georgetown, Columbia and Duke universities. The editors in chief collaborated for the first time to publish a Women & Law journal with a series of essays from prominent female lawyers. But there was also recognition, as the women came together dressed in dark power suits, of the reality that men still dominate the ranks of law firms, the federal judiciary and academia. ...

"In recent years, the number of women enrolling in accredited law schools has exceeded the number of men ... But women make up less than a quarter of law firm equity partners, a quarter of tenured and tenure-track law professors, and about a third of all active federal district and appeals court judges. ... Women are also underrepresented at oral argument at the high court. In the past five terms, 17 percent of the advocates were women ... 'There is certainly more glass yet to be shattered,' Duke Law professor Marin Levy told the crowd after ticking off the statistics. 'But I see a whole lot of hammers out there.'"

The coronavirus and other outbreaks are hard to contain. Here's why.

THE NEW WORLD ORDER:

-- As deaths from the coronavirus topped 1,000, with more than 100 in a single day, China urged countries that have enacted travel restrictions aimed at curbing the outbreak to restore normal ties for the sake of the global economy. Simon Denyer and Rick Noack report: "The comments from China's Foreign Ministry underscored the economic dangers posed by the unprecedented shutdown of much of the world's second-largest economy, as well as the Communist Party's concerns about the outbreak's capacity to fuel domestic instability. Authorities in the virus-hit city of Wuhan have announced fresh restrictions on residents, making millions of people virtual prisoners in their own homes. Two provincial health bosses have been fired as the Communist Party struggles to contain widespread anger over the spread of the virus. ...

“The number of confirmed infections continues to rise but the rate of growth is slowing. ... More than a dozen ambulances are lined up alongside the Diamond Princess in Yokohama as medical staff evacuate passengers and crew confirmed as carrying the virus, after 65 more people on board the cruise ship tested positive. China is bracing for the return of some 160 million migrant workers to their cities of employment as the country’s economy sputters back to life after an extended holiday vacation following the outbreak.”

-- A British “superspreader” may have unwittingly infected at least 11 people with the coronavirus in the course of his travels from Singapore to France to Switzerland and then to England. Infected Britons in England, France and Spain probably caught the virus from him, health authorities and British media claim. (Karla Adam)

-- The CDC confirmed the 13th coronavirus infection in the United States. The patient was among several hundred Americans who were evacuated last week from Wuhan and is currently being treated at the University of California San Diego Medical Center. (Hawkins)

-- Trump keeps saying that the coronavirus could “miraculously” go away this spring. Experts say that's not how diseases work. Hawkins reports for our live blog: “Trump first raised the idea in a tweet last week, saying the Chinese government's efforts to control the virus would succeed 'as the weather starts to warm and the virus hopefully becomes weaker, and then gone.' He made a similar prediction in a rally Monday, suggesting that the outbreak could subside 'by April.' 'You know, in theory when it gets a little warmer, it miraculously goes away, that's true,' he told an audience in New Hampshire. Experts said that's wishful thinking at best: While it's true that respiratory viruses tend to follow seasonal patterns, there's no telling what course the novel coronavirus will take. 'This virus can do anything it wants,' Allison McGeer, an infectious-disease epidemiologist at the University of Toronto, told The Washington Post last week."

-- The virus is spreading rapidly. So is misinformation about it. Kim Bellware reports: "Since the first cases of a then-unidentified pneumonia were reported in late December, hoaxes, half-truths and flat-out lies have proliferated, mostly through social media. BuzzFeed News for several days kept a running list of misinformation, including wildly inaccurate reports that the death toll in China was 112,000 as of late January (reality: around 80 at the time); claims that Chinese people eating bats were the source of the outbreak (a viral photo of a woman biting a bat was not taken in China); and false suggestions that the virus was lab-engineered as a kind of bioweapon."

-- A bag of tiny dead birds from China was confiscated from a passenger at Dulles Airport. Agricultural specialists found a package with pictures of pets printed on it – similar to packages of pet treats – that had several tiny, dried birds inside. The passenger said they were cat food but the birds were quickly confiscated because of the potential threat of avian influenza. (Lori Aratani)

-- Pangolins – the world’s most trafficked mammal – are suspected as a potential coronavirus host. From the NYT: “It is far from clear whether being identified as a viral host would be good or bad for pangolins. It could decrease the trade in the animals, or cause a backlash. It is also far from clear whether the pangolin is the animal that passed the new virus to humans. Bats are still thought to be the original host of the virus. If pangolins are involved in disease transmission, they would act as an intermediate host. The science so far is suggestive rather than conclusive, and because of the intense interest in the virus, some claims have been made public before the traditional scientific review process.”

-- A mask-clad Xi Jinping emerged from a conspicuous absence to visit the coronavirus “front line” at a facility in Beijing. Rick Noack reports: “Photos and videos of the visit — carried by state-run news agencies and television stations — did not deviate from the usual pattern of publicity appearances by Xi and other Chinese Communist Party officials. But Xi’s appearance Monday capped a remarkably unengaged period for the Chinese leader at a critical time, during which he conspicuously avoided public attention. ... Xi left it to other Communist Party officials to calm concerns over the novel coronavirus or to celebrate tireless medical workers.... Keeping a low profile may no longer be a viable option for Xi, as his absence has fueled speculation and as public scrutiny has increasingly turned away from local cadres’ failings and toward more systemic complaints over the ruling Communist Party in Beijing.”

-- The Philippines will end its military cooperation deal with the U.S. From the NYT: “The notice to terminate the pact, the Visiting Forces Agreement, comes as President Rodrigo Duterte has warmed up to China while distancing himself from the United States, the Philippines’ former colonial ruler. The move also comes as the Philippines has shown increasing reluctance to stand up to China over its territorial claims in the South China Sea. ... The agreement still remains in force, but the notice to terminate it, delivered to the American Embassy in Manila, starts a clock under which it will remain in effect for 180 days before lapsing.”

-- The CIA, in partnership with West German intelligence, secretly owned a Swiss company that sold rigged encryption devices to more than 120 countries, which allowed it to read the coded messages of allies and adversaries for decades. Greg Miller reports: “The Swiss firm made millions of dollars selling equipment to more than 120 countries well into the 21st century. Its clients included Iran, military juntas in Latin America, nuclear rivals India and Pakistan, and even the Vatican. But what none of its customers ever knew was that Crypto AG was secretly owned by the CIA in a highly classified partnership with West German intelligence. ... The decades-long arrangement, among the most closely guarded secrets of the Cold War, is laid bare in a classified, comprehensive CIA history of the operation obtained by The Washington Post and ZDF, a German public broadcaster, in a joint reporting project.”

-- Syria and Turkey are inching closer to war after their troops exchanged deadly fire for the second time in days. Kareem Fahim and Sarah Dadouch report: “The latest hostilities started after shelling by Syrian forces killed five Turkish soldiers and injured five others, according to Turkey's Defense Ministry. The deaths came a week after a previous round of Syrian shelling in Idlib killed eight Turkish military personnel. Turkey's response Monday included attacks on what it said were '115 regime targets,' including mortar positions, tanks and a helicopter. One hundred and one troops loyal to Syrian President Bashar al-Assad were killed, the Turkish Defense Ministry said."

-- Israeli opposition leader Benny Gantz had two shots to oust Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. He's now counting on the third time being the charm. Ruth Eglash and Steve Hendrix report:

"As the sides slug their way to a third election in less than a year on March 2, political observers say the nonstop campaign has made the former army general an even more formidable opponent. ... Even after two general elections failed to produce a clear winner and the Israeli public grew increasingly apathetic, those working for Gantz's Blue and White party appear energized. That could reflect the fact that the party has an edge in the polls, which put Blue and White ahead of Netanyahu's ruling Likud party in the final weeks. That appears to continue an upward trend since the first election last April, when, as a newly formed party, Blue and White came in a close second behind Likud. ... Although he was unable to unseat Netanyahu in the previous elections — in part because of Israel's coalition-based parliamentary system — Gantz is now widely viewed as a viable successor to the longtime prime minister."

-- More than 100 U.S. troops have now been diagnosed with brain injuries stemming from Iran's missile attack on an Iraqi base last

month. (Reuters)

-- A strange Russian spacecraft is shadowing a U.S. spy satellite, a U.S. military commander told Time. This underscores “a growing threat to America’s dominance in space-based espionage and a potentially costly new chapter in Washington’s decades-long competition with Moscow. Gen. John ‘Jay’ Raymond, commander of the newly minted U.S. Space Force, says the Russian spacecraft began maneuvering toward the American satellite shortly after being launched into orbit in November, at times creeping within 100 miles of it. ‘We view this behavior as unusual and disturbing,’ Raymond says. ‘It has the potential to create a dangerous situation in space.’ Raymond says the U.S. government has expressed concern to Moscow through diplomatic channels.”

Proposed changes to funding in Trump's budget

THE PRESIDENT'S PRIORITIES:

-- Trump's $4.8 trillion budget plan was met with disdain from Democrats, who said it would cripple low-income families. Jeff Stein and Erica Werner report: "The budget plan sets up the Trump administration's policy priorities heading into the November election and is likely to draw scrutiny in Washington and on the campaign trail. Trump has in the past not shown much interest in pursuing the budget cuts his aides have offered, and he didn't make any public comments about the plan Monday. ... [Instead], Russell Vought, acting White House budget director, touted the proposed spending increases in the budget for NASA, immigration, opioid mitigation and veterans, while saying they would not lead to benefit reductions for Medicare and Medicaid, as Democrats charged ...

“Trump has sought spending cuts in the past, only to back down immediately during negotiations with Democrats. ... Proposing the cuts again, on the eve of the New Hampshire Democratic primary, gave Democrats a fresh target to attack. ‘The old cliché is that a budget is a moral document,’ [Sanders] said in a statement. ‘What kind of unbelievable moral framework allowed this White House to propose $182 billion in cuts to nutrition assistance from needy families, when nearly one in seven households with children are food insecure?’ ... Even some of Trump’s staunchest allies criticized his sharp cuts for domestic agencies, such as the Agriculture Department, which he is targeting for an 8 percent overall reduction. That was an indication that the budget will get a cold shoulder on Capitol Hill from lawmakers of both parties.”

-- The budget would slash student loan programs and offer tax breaks for private school tuition, offering sharp contrasts to the education proposals pushed by Democratic presidential candidates. Overall, the administration wants to cut the Education Department’s discretionary spending by 7.8 percent, replacing funding for 29 education programs – including more than $24 billion in spending – with a single block-grant program totaling just over $19 billion. (Laura Meckler and Danielle Douglas-Gabriel)

-- The Trump budget would decimate the budget for foreign aid and diplomacy, a move that lawmakers predicted would be swiftly rejected by Congress. The budget would allot $40 billion to the State Department and the U.S. Agency for International Development, representing a cut of about 22 percent. (Carol Morello)

-- The Department of Transportation's discretionary spending would also be cut by 13 percent, including deep reductions in spending on Amtrak and airport grants, as well as cuts of more than $2 billion in highway infrastructure funds. At the same time, the administration introduced what it called a “historic, 10-year, $810 billion reauthorization of surface transportation programs,” which would cover highways, transit rail and other programs and would replace a five-year transportation bill, known as the FAST Act, which will expire later this year. (Michael Laris)

-- Trump once again called for the elimination of federal arts agencies. Previous proposals by the president along these lines have been soundly rejected by Congress, which has instead increased funding for the National Endowment for the Arts and the National Endowment for the Humanities. (Peggy McGlone)

-- Federal employees' retirement benefits would also be cut. In some cases, the benefits would be reduced only for future retirees, but in other cases, those already retired would face cuts as well. The budget also proposes a 1 percent pay increase for federal employees while recommending a 3 percent raise for military personnel. (Eric Yoder)

-- And while Trump wants to grant NASA a multibillion-dollar boost to put astronauts back on the moon, his budget would cut funding for other science and health agencies. The Health and Human Services agency would suffer a nearly 10 percent cut, while the Environmental Protection Agency would lose 26 percent of its funding – the administration is hoping to eliminate nearly 50 EPA programs. The Energy Department would get a boost in funding for safeguarding the nuclear weapons stockpile, but outside of that program it would see a 28.7 percent cut.

The budget would cut spending at HHS by 9 percent. Medicaid would receive nearly $920 billion less than otherwise anticipated by 2030. Meanwhile, a “health reform vision allowance” would lower spending on Obamacare by $844 billion over the decade. The budget request would also trim funding for the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention by 16 percent. The president’s health priorities – wiping out HIV transmission in the U.S. and battling the opioid crisis – would receive $716 million and $5 billion respectively. (Joel Achenbach, Laurie McGinley, Amy Goldstein and Ben Guarino)

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

A group of Biden supporters remixed a popular '90s song to make it about him:

Kate Hyde
@KateHydeNY

Watch as a chorus of Gen Zs presents a political rendition of Backstreet Boys to a Boomer.

♡ 1,706 4:05 PM - Feb 10, 2020

💬 876 people are talking about this

Warren took a walk around a snowy New Hampshire town:

Tara Prindiville ✓
@taraprindiville

Before departing on our press bus this morning, we caught @ewarren on her way back from a 2.2 mile walk. It's hard to see, but she's wearing a hat that says "Make Earth Cool Again". She says her walk through a nearby neighborhood in the snow is a "good way to start the day."

♥ 1,759 3:39 PM - Feb 10, 2020

💬 461 people are talking about this

The Iowa Democratic Party's chairman was talking about the disastrous caucuses when his lectern's sign fell, prompting chatter that this was perhaps a metaphor:

Shane Goldmacher ✓
@ShaneGoldmacher

This happened

♥ 5,868 9:52 PM - Feb 10, 2020

💬 1,322 people are talking about this

Turns out some people can win in Iowa:

David Freedlander ✓
@freedlander

Looks like there was a big winner in Iowa last week after all kcci.com/article/former...

Former Gov. Vilsack claims $150,000 Powerball prize
He never thought he would win, but it didn't stop him from playing.
kcci.com

♥ 11 6:11 PM - Feb 10, 2020

See David Freedlander's other Tweets

Trump's defense budget proposed gutting the budget of Stars and Stripes, its independent newspaper. A Post reporter who used to work there questioned what it says about the Pentagon's priorities:

Alex Horton ✓
@AlexHortonTX

The agency that can't pass an audit and brought you the F-35, billions in uniform waste, Fat Leonard, pallets of cash for Afghan warlords and millions paid to the NFL with no clear return want you to know it's tightening its belt for a newspaper representing a rounding error
twitter.com/reporterjoe/st...

Joe Gould ✓ @reporterjoe

Acting DoD Comptroller Elaine McCusker confirms @starsandstripes' budget faces significant cuts, per DoD-wide review. "We essentially decided, coming into the modern age, that newspapers is not the way we communicate any longer."

790 8:36 PM - Feb 10, 2020

406 people are talking about this

Many former DOJ officials criticized Barr's "intake process" to assess Giuliani's information about the Bidens:

David Laufman
@DavidLaufmanLaw

There is nothing normal about the Attorney General creating a special “intake process in the field” for info relating to claims advancing a White House political narrative — particularly for someone reportedly under criminal investigation washingtonpost.com/national-secur...

Barr acknowledges Justice Dept. has created ‘intak...

The attorney general said officials must be cautious with information emanating from Ukraine.

washingtonpost.com

♡ 8,604 10:46 PM - Feb 10, 2020

💬 4,173 people are talking about this

This is what the new Air Force One will look like:

Marcus Weisgerber ✓
@MarcusReports

JUST IN: It's official ... This is paint job for Trump's new Air Force One, as depicted in new Pentagon budget documents

♥ 882 8:09 PM - Feb 10, 2020

💬 866 people are talking about this

And the D.C. Council tried to subtweet New York Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez after she said she couldn't find a good bacon, egg and cheese sandwich in the capital, but the sandwich they ended up eating looked nothing like the classic New York City rolls:

Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez ✓
@AOC

At this rate y'all are going to make me start a version of The Pengest Munch for breakfast sandwiches 🤑😂
twitter.com/councilofdc/st...

Council of DC ✓ @councilofdc

Glad I found this tasty $3.59 bacon, egg, and cheese close to home when I did, or else the Acela fare up to NYC would have really eaten into my planned breakfast budget

♥ 9,709 10:46 PM - Feb 10, 2020

💬 1,275 people are talking about this

VIDEOS OF THE DAY:

Stephen Colbert introduced us to the political consultant the Democrats hired to look over the New Hampshire vote:

Seth Meyers criticized Trump for retaliating against his impeachment trial witnesses:

And Trevor Noah took a look at the beef between Biden and Buttigieg:

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202

Privacy Policy | Help

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Ten reasons Bernie Sanders should celebrate winning New Hampshire – or feel cause for concern
Date: Wednesday, February 12, 2020 11:03:55 AM

---

If you're having trouble reading this, click here.

---

PowerPost

The Daily 202

Morning intelligence for leaders

Share:

 Listen to The Big Idea

Powered by  LiveIntent

Ten reasons Bernie Sanders should celebrate winning New Hampshire – or feel cause for concern

Sanders wins New Hampshire: The candidates' speeches in 3.5 minutes

BY JAMES HOHMANN

with Mariana Alfaro

THE BIG IDEA:

MANCHESTER, N.H. – When Bernie Sanders launched his second bid for the Democratic presidential nomination a year ago, joining a large and diverse field, very few pundits thought he could win the most votes in the Iowa caucuses and repeat his 2016 triumph in the New Hampshire primary. The Vermont senator was written off again after his heart attack in October. But the 78-year-old persevered and has once again proven conventional wisdom wrong, winning here and taking the lead in the latest national polls.

“This victory here is the beginning of the end for Donald Trump,” Sanders told supporters on Tuesday night. “Bernie beats Trump,” his 1,200 supporters chanted inside the Southern New Hampshire

University field house. “Bernie beats Trump.”

By traditional metrics, Sanders would be widely considered the front-runner right now. That’s how he sees himself and how his surrogates refer to him at his rallies. The party has moved in his direction on a litany of issues. He’s built a small-dollar fundraising juggernaut. It’s not clear today that any other candidate has a greater probability of securing the nomination than he does.

In several ways, though, the results from New Hampshire offered a mixed bag for the would-be revolutionary. He deserves his due for winning, but there are also questions about his strength going into what could be a five-month slog to the Democratic National Convention in Milwaukee this July. Here’s some of the good news, as well the bad news, for Sanders as the race moves from the Granite State to Nevada, South Carolina and Super Tuesday:

1) A cause for concern: The victory was unexpectedly narrow.

Sanders won with 25.8 percent of the vote, leading Pete Buttigieg by only 1.3 percentage points, or fewer than 4,000 votes.

The percentage of the vote Sanders got is the lowest for any winner of the New Hampshire primary in modern history, lagging behind Jimmy Carter’s 28.6 percent in 1976.

Sanders, who beat Hillary Clinton by 22 points here four years ago, made no effort to manage expectations that he’d win. He confidently predicted victory at every stop in the final days.

In 2016, Sanders received 152,193 votes in the two-way race. He’s getting 74,316 votes, with 94 percent of precincts reporting as of 1 p.m. on Wednesday.

Interestingly, only 30 percent of voters in the network exit polls said they supported Sanders in 2016 – even though he got 62 percent of the vote. New Hampshire allows independents to vote in either party's primary. Republicans didn't have a competitive contest, so many unaffiliated voters took Democratic ballots.

On Tuesday, the exit polling shows Sanders won 57 percent of the group that had voted for him four years before. And he picked up 12 percent of voters who said they supported Clinton in 2016. One in five voters said they voted for neither Clinton nor Sanders in the 2016 primaries. Sanders got 14 percent of that group.

2) A reason to celebrate: Elizabeth Warren's collapse has sidelined Sanders's chief rival in the liberal lane and solidified his standing as the dominant progressive voice in the race.

Both Sanders and Warren represent neighboring states to New Hampshire. But Warren's support tanked after Iowa, and the Massachusetts senator received 9.3 percent of the vote – not enough to receive a single delegate to the national convention. (It appears that Sanders will get nine delegates and Buttigieg will get six delegates out of New Hampshire.) If Warren cannot even get double digits here, where she's spent more time and money than any other state, what's the contest she thinks she'll be able to win?

Among the 21 percent of voters who described themselves as “very liberal” in the exit poll, half backed Sanders. Warren was second, with 19 percent. Sanders and Buttigieg tied among the 40 percent of voters who saw themselves as “somewhat liberal,” getting 26 percent apiece. Buttigieg and Sen. Amy Klobuchar essentially tied – 28 percent to 26 percent – among the third of the electorate that identified as moderate.

3) A cause for concern: Most Democrats do not want Sanders to be their nominee. If you add together Buttigieg, Klobuchar and Joe Biden – the three candidates competing unabashedly in the more moderate lane – they received 52.7 percent. The self-described democratic socialist declines to formally register as a member of the Democratic Party. Democrats overwhelmingly said they’d back him over Trump, but they worry that he would lose the election.

New Hampshire primary: Sanders wins, Klobuchar surges, dropouts ensue

4) A reason to celebrate: Klobuchar’s surge is good for Sanders because it divides up the moderate lane and makes it harder for Buttigieg to consolidate support.

She finished third, with just under 20 percent of the vote. Some Buttigieg allies apparently expressed concern at his watch party in Nashua about what they called the “Klobuchar.” The strong finish by the senior senator from Minnesota, who is going to New York today to fill her campaign coffers, denies Buttigieg the chance to claim that he’s now the moderate to beat.

Klobuchar said she can appeal to the “people in middle” at her watch party: “Donald Trump's worst nightmare is that the people in the middle, the people who have had enough of the name-calling and the mudslinging, have someone to vote for in November.”

For now, Buttigieg and Klobuchar are likely to be more focused on each other than Sanders. “I admired Senator Sanders when I was a high school student, and I want to congratulate him,” the 38-year-old former mayor said at his party last night. “I respect him greatly to this day, and I congratulate him on his strong showing tonight.”

Meanwhile, Mike Bloomberg is waiting in the wings. The former New York mayor is spending hundreds of millions of dollars to air commercials in the states that vote Super Tuesday. And he’s building support. Rep. Lucy McBath (D-Ga.) endorsed Bloomberg this morning. The three of them competing for similar voters works to Sanders’s advantage.

5) A cause for concern: Late deciders didn’t break for Sanders.

Half of voters said they decided in the last few days. Sanders only got 16 percent of this group. Among the other half of the electorate, people who made up their minds earlier, 37 percent backed Sanders, according to the exits. If large numbers of people are making up their minds at the last minute, they're not likely to go for the Vermonter. He's a known commodity. This shows how it will be harder for him to grow his standing in the national polls than for some lesser-known rivals like Klobuchar. Another number to keep an eye on: Sanders won among men by nine points, but he finished third among women. He underperformed similarly with female voters in 2016, as well.

6) A reason to celebrate: Medicare-for-all helped Sanders win the primary.

Health care was the biggest concern of people who voted in Tuesday's Democratic primary, by far, and Sanders fared best among people who care most about the issue. Among the 37 percent who cared most about health care, Sanders led with 31 percent.

Six in 10 voters said they support replacing all private health insurance with a single government plan for everyone. Among that group, 39 percent backed Sanders. Buttigieg, who advocates "Medicare for all who want it," followed with 22 percent. Warren was third with this group, garnering 13 percent. Her tortured efforts to back away from Sanders's Medicare-for-all bill, which she had co-sponsored, helped doom her candidacy. When she was peaking in the polls, she struggled to explain how she'd pay for the program without raising taxes on the middle class. She eventually called for a multi-year transition period that left voters on both sides of the question unsatisfied.

Sanders trailed Buttigieg among voters who said climate change and foreign policy were the most important issues to them.

7) A cause for concern: Sanders is not widely perceived by

Democrats as electable.

Voters were asked in the exit poll whether they prioritize picking a candidate who agrees with them on major issues or who can beat Trump. Of the third of voters who prized agreement over electability, Sanders won about four in 10. But he got just two in 10 of those who primarily want to beat Trump, a much bigger bloc.

---

Content from Blue Cross Blue Shield Association

Addressing the need for more affordable medicines

Americans pay too much for prescription drugs. Even generics can be too expensive. So we're investing in a non-profit company to produce the drugs people need at a price they can afford. Learn more.

---

Supporters cheer as Bernie Sanders gives his victory speech on Tuesday night in Manchester. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

8) A reason to celebrate: Sanders has more blue-collar appeal than any of his rivals.

He led among union members, those without college degrees and lower-income voters. He beat Buttigieg 38 percent to 17 percent among those who earn less than $50,000-a-year and 31 percent to 24 percent among those who earn between $50,001 and $99,999. Buttigieg dominated with those make more than 100K, leading Klobuchar 34 percent to 20 percent, with Sanders in third.

One in five voters said income inequality is the issue they care about most. Sanders led Buttigieg among this constituency 34 percent to 20 percent. Biden enjoys saying that people like to call him “Middle Class Joe,” but he only got 6 percent of voters most concerned about income inequality. Indeed, Sanders campaign strategists spent much of the past year fretting that Biden would cut into their blue-collar base.

9) A reason to celebrate: Sanders continues to dominate the youth vote.

He won half of voters between the ages of 18 to 29, followed by Buttigieg with 20 percent. Sanders also garnered 36 percent of voters age 30 to 44, according to the exit polling. Sanders was a distant third among those 45-to-64 and 65+. Indeed, among seniors, who made up a quarter of the electorate, he got only 14 percent. Klobuchar prevailed among the 65-plus crowd. Older voters historically vote at higher rates.

10) A cause for concern: 18-to-29-year-olds made up 14 percent of the electorate on Tuesday, down from 19 percent in the 2016 primary.

The share of young people in the electorate declined despite assiduous outreach, including the campaign hosting a concert on the University of New Hampshire campus in Durham on Monday night, that drew 7,500 attendees.

Bigger picture, Sanders is not bringing the numbers of new voters into the primary process that he promises he would be able to activate in the general election if he's the Democratic nominee. Sanders's theory of the case is premised on the idea that he can bring new people into the process. But there's little evidence so far from Iowa or New Hampshire that he would be able to deliver.

Total Democratic primary turnout in New Hampshire surpassed 2016 levels and is tracking close to the 2008 total vote count of about 288,000. Last week in Iowa, the turnout of a little more than 170,000 barely surpassed 2016 levels – and fell far short of the record-breaking 240,000 caucus-goers who came out in 2008 when Barack Obama was running. Sanders conceded that this disappointed him. “Not as high, frankly, as I would have liked to have seen,” he told reporters.

Deval Patrick greets voters outside a polling place on Tuesday in Concord, N.H. (Scott Eisen/Getty Images)

-- New Hampshire has winnowed the field: Three candidates have ended their campaigns since polls closed last night.

Former Massachusetts governor Deval Patrick: “The vote in New Hampshire last night was not enough for us to create the practical wind at the campaign's back to go on to the next round of voting," he said in a statement this afternoon, "so I have decided to suspend the campaign, effective immediately."

Entrepreneur Andrew Yang: "I am a numbers guy," he told Dave Weigel in an interview. "In most of these [upcoming] states, I'm not going to be at a threshold where I get delegates, which makes sticking around not necessarily helpful or productive in terms of furthering the goals of this campaign." Yang added that he has not decided whether to endorse another candidate, though campaigns have reached out. He also said he would be open to becoming another candidate's running mate or joining the Cabinet.

Sen. Michael Bennet (D-Colo.): "I love you, New Hampshire. Whether you knew it or not, we were having a great time together," he said at his watch party in Concord, joined by Gary Hart and James Carville. "I want you to be optimistic tonight. As James Baldwin wrote at the height of the civil rights movement: This is in our hands; we have no right to assume otherwise."

QUOTE OF THE DAY:

Joe Biden left New Hampshire before the polls closed to fly to a rally in Columbia, S.C. "This is just the beginning," he told supporters there. "We have an entire nation to vote yet."

-- More team coverage from the campaign trail:

Dan Balz: “Democrats now face a fractured and divisive contest for the nomination.”

Jenna Johnson: “With a third-place finish, Klobuchar bursts to the center of the ... race.”

Annie Linskey: “Warren’s campaign at a crossroads as once-rising star confronts disappointing finishes.”

Josh Dawsey: “Biden looks to S.C. to revive faltering campaign, but success there is no longer seen as certain.”

Michael Scherer: “Bloomberg wins the Democratic spotlight and the derision of his rivals.”

Amber Phillips: “8 questions about where the Democratic primary stands after New Hampshire.”

Cat Zakrzewski: “Sanders is no friend of Big Tech. And he keeps winning.”

Dino Grandoni: “Climate concerns help boost Sanders and Buttigieg in New Hampshire.”

Holly Bailey and Isaac Stanley-Becker: “After scrapping a pair of apps similar to the one that caused chaos in Iowa, the Nevada State Democratic Party said it would use paper ballots and an online check-in process in its presidential caucuses, a plan unlikely to end growing concerns about the coming vote.”

Subscribe on Amazon Echo, Google Home, Apple HomePod and other podcast players.

Welcome to the Daily 202, PowerPost's morning briefing for decision-makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter.

Prosecutors quit amid backtrack over Roger Stone's prison term

POLITICS TRUMPS THE RULE OF LAW:

-- All four career prosecutors handling the case against Roger Stone withdrew from the case — and one quit his job entirely — after the Justice Department signaled it planned to undercut their sentencing recommendation for Trump’s longtime friend and confidant. Matt Zapotosky, Devlin Barrett, Ann Marimow and Spencer Hsu report: “The sudden and dramatic moves came after prosecutors and their superiors had argued for days over the appropriate penalty for Stone, and exposed what some career Justice Department employees say is a continuing pattern of the historically independent law enforcement institution being bent to Trump’s political will. ... The cascade of controversy began Monday, when career prosecutors handling the case recommended that a judge sentence Stone ... to between seven and nine years in federal prison. ... ‘This is a horrible and very unfair situation,’ Trump wrote early Tuesday. ‘The real crimes were on the other side, as nothing happens to them. Cannot allow this miscarriage of justice!' Hours later, a senior Justice Department official told reporters that the agency's leadership was 'shocked' by the recommendation of a seven-to-nine-year sentence and would soon revise it. ...

"One by one, the career prosecutors, two of whom had worked on [Bob] Mueller's investigation, filed notices in court of their intention to leave the case. Though none of the prosecutors gave a reason, their asking to do so was highly unusual and suggested they could not ethically affix their names to the government's revised position. ... Kerri Kupec, a Justice Department spokeswoman, said that the White House did not communicate with the agency on Monday or Tuesday about the Stone case, and that the decision to reverse course was made before Trump's tweet. Trump told reporters later Tuesday, 'I have not been involved in it at all,' though in the same remarks he called the career prosecutors' initial recommendation 'an insult to our country.' ... Jonathan Kravis, one of the prosecutors on the Stone case, wrote in a court filing that he had resigned as an assistant U.S. attorney, leaving government altogether. Three others — Aaron S.J. Zelinsky, Adam Jed and Michael Marando — filed notices with the judge saying 'please notice the withdrawal' from the case. ...

"The decision to file a new sentencing memo was made by officials in the attorney general's office and the deputy attorney general's office, according to a senior Justice Department official. The official could not point to another instance of Justice Department headquarters overruling and replacing a sentencing memorandum a day after a filing ... Hours before the [original] filing was due Monday, [Timothy] Shea, the [interim head of the D.C. U.S. attorney's office] and a former close adviser to [Attorney General Bill] Barr, had not made a final decision on Stone's sentencing recommendation ... In their Monday filing, prosecutors argued that more time should be added to Stone's sentence because of his extensive criminal conduct, which stretched over two years, and because they say he obstructed the prosecution of the case after he was charged. In a Tuesday filing from Shea, ... the government argued that those enhancements were overkill, noting that Stone's victim has asked for leniency for him and did not view the statement as an actual threat."

-- Almost simultaneously, Trump decided to revoke the nomination to a top Treasury Department post of his former U.S. attorney in the District, Jessie Liu, who supervised the Stone case when it went to trial. Hsu, Dawsey and Barrett report: "Liu, 47, served more than two years in the politically sensitive post of top federal prosecutor in the nation's capital and was Trump's first nominee to the position, serving from September 2017 until Jan. 31. In the job, Liu oversaw late-stage court proceedings for top Trump aides and Mueller defendants, including Trump's 2016 deputy campaign chairman Rick Gates and former national security adviser Michael Flynn, as well as [Stone's] November trial and conviction. However, over the past two weeks, coinciding with Liu's departure, the U.S. attorney's office has changed its sentencing stances in both Flynn and Stone's cases, with prosecutors moving from stiffer sentencing recommendations to more lenient ones. Emerging accounts of the circumstances surrounding Liu's departure from the administration cast those decisions in a new light. ...

"Trump has been lobbied extensively against Liu by people who do not like her handling of the D.C. office — particularly as it relates to the Mueller probe, an administration official said. The decision to withdraw the nomination was made Tuesday afternoon, the official said. ... A third person familiar with the situation ... said Liu's nomination was opposed vocally by Barbara Ledeen, a conservative operative and Republican Senate staffer unhappy about [Michael] Flynn's prosecution for lying to the FBI. ... The person said Ledeen had made little headway before the recent storm over Stone's sentencing, calling it a turning point. Treasury officials believe Trump himself made the call to withdraw Liu because her confirmation hearing before the Senate Banking Committee was set for Thursday, and Trump was concerned she would be asked about the case ... Liu had no role in Stone's sentencing recommendation, having left office before it was sent to supervisors for approval, several people said."

-- The four career prosecutors who withdrew from the Stone case did so after finding out from Fox News that Barr's office planned to withdraw the sentencing recommendation, per the Times: "As is customary in prominent prosecutions, the line prosecutors on the Stone case discussed their proposed sentencing recommendation with senior officials. But they apparently came to no clear agreement before the document was filed in court, an outcome that one Justice Department official blamed on a breakdown in management."

-- The week of Trump's acquittal was Fox News Channel's best in the ratings since the weeks when he was elected and

inaugurated. (AP)

-- Under Barr's iron fist, "it appears no corner of the Justice Department can escape perversion," laments columnist Dana Milbank: "In a new grant award, senior Justice officials rejected the recommendations of career officials and decided to deny grants to highly rated Catholic Charities in Palm Beach, Fla., and Chicanos Por La Causa in Phoenix. Instead, Reuters reported, they gave more than $1 million combined to lower-rated groups called the Lincoln Tubman Foundation and Hookers for Jesus. Why? Well, it turns out the head of the Catholic Charities affiliate had been active with Democrats and the Phoenix group had opposed President Trump's immigration policies. By contrast, Hookers for Jesus is run by a Christian conservative and the Lincoln Tubman group was launched by a relative of a Trump delegate to the 2016 convention. That Catholic Charities has been replaced by Hookers for Jesus says much about Barr's Justice Department. Friends of Trump are rewarded. Opponents of Trump are punished. And the nation's law enforcement apparatus becomes Trump's personal plaything."

-- As Trump escalated his campaign of retribution against his perceived enemies, Republican senators shrugged. Philip Rucker and Paul Kane report: Trump railed "in the Oval Office about a decorated combat veteran who testified about the president's conduct with Ukraine and suggesting the Defense Department should consider disciplining him. 'The military can handle him any way they want,' Trump said of Lt. Col. Alexander Vindman, who was ousted from his position on the National Security Council last Friday and reassigned to the Pentagon. Asked whether he was recommending the military take disciplinary action against Vindman for his House testimony in the impeachment proceedings, Trump replied, 'They're going to certainly, I would imagine, take a look at that.' ... Republicans who control the Senate resigned themselves this week to the reality that they are unable to check or even influence Trump, even as some GOP strategists are warning that the president's actions threaten the party's Senate majority by complicating the home-state politics for a quintet of endangered incumbents.

"One of them, Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), said last week that she believed Trump had learned 'a pretty big lesson' by being impeached. But this week she said she had been so 'concerned' about Trump's desire to punish two impeachment witnesses, U.S. Ambassador to the European Union Gordon Sondland and Vindman, that she contacted the White House. ... Asked what senators could do to rein in Trump, she replied, 'I called to try to prevent the action' ... Sens. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) and Thom Tillis (R-N.C.) said that they tried to save Sondland, a major GOP donor, from the embarrassment of being fired on the same day as Vindman. ... 'I agreed with the decision on Vindman,' Tillis said. 'I just felt like having the two have some distance would have been appropriate.'"

-- Trump plans to ditch another official over her role in impeachment. From the New York Post: "The White House is expected to pull the nomination of Elaine McCusker to be the Pentagon's comptroller and chief financial officer in the latest staffing fallout from [Trump's] impeachment ... McCusker resisted the president's directive to stall about $250 million in military aid to Ukraine and her emails protesting the delay were leaked in January to the blog Just Security ahead of Trump's Senate trial. ... It's unclear if a final decision has been made on the timing of the nomination withdrawal. It's also unclear how the withdrawal would impact McCusker's current role as acting comptroller and CFO of the Pentagon."

-- Rep. Chris Stewart (R-Utah) has emerged as a top contender to be the next director of national intelligence. He's being pushed by national security adviser Robert O'Brien. From the Times:

"Joseph Maguire, the director of the National Counterterrorism Center, has filled in as the acting director of national intelligence since Dan Coats resigned in August. But under current law limiting the duration of postings for acting cabinet-level officials, Mr. Maguire must step down next month. ... What is not clear, however, is whether the president sees Mr. Maguire's role in handling the anonymous whistle-blower complaint about Mr. Trump's dealings with Ukraine that helped prompt the impeachment inquiry as an asset or a liability. Mr. Maguire followed the advice of administration lawyers and initially blocked the complaint from being sent to Congress ... But soon after, he engineered an agreement to provide the complaint to Congress. That move ... helped prompt the impeachment inquiry. ... Mr. Stewart, like other Republicans on the House Intelligence Committee, vigorously defended Mr. Trump during impeachment hearings in the fall that focused on the president's pressure campaign on Ukraine. And he has been sharply critical of the handling by the Justice Department and F.B.I. of an investigation into the Trump campaign's ties to Russian interference in the 2016 election."

-- Speaking of Utahns, Sen. Mitt Romney (R) said the Senate GOP has already moved on from his vote last week to convict Trump of abuse of power during the impeachment trial. Paul Kane reports: "Signaling he wants to be a team player, Romney flew home to Salt Lake City for meetings last Thursday — a day after the Senate vote — and then to Palm Beach, Fla., for a National Republican Senatorial Committee gathering ... He said there was no awkwardness at the fundraising retreat or Tuesday's [GOP luncheon], also attended by [Mike] Pence." Things with the president, though, remain tense. At the White House yesterday, Trump called Romney a "disgrace," at the same time that the senator was voting for the president's judicial nominees.

Powered by  LiveIntent

Coronavirus patients, medical staff exercise and dance at Wuhan hospital

THE NEW WORLD ORDER:

-- The CDC acknowledged the patient with the latest confirmed case of coronavirus in the United States initially tested negative for the disease and was briefly allowed to leave a San Diego hospital because of a laboratory error. Derek Hawkins and Hannah Knowles report: "The patient was among three evacuees from China who were placed in isolation and underwent testing at the University of California San Diego Medical Center last week after showing signs of the novel coronavirus. An initial round of tests came back negative, and the people returned to a quarantine site at Marine Corps Air Station Miramar. Further testing revealed, however, that one of them was infected. A CDC spokeswoman, Kristen Nordlund, said Tuesday that blood samples from the three patients were inadvertently omitted from a large test run because they were incorrectly labeled. ... On Monday, the patient returned to the hospital for treatment. Going forward, a CDC laboratory staff member will join quarantine field teams to make sure that specimens are correctly labeled, Nordlund said.”

-- The coronavirus death toll rose once again, with 97 deaths yesterday alone. Luckily, while the number of confirmed infections continues to rise, the rate of growth is slowing.

Hawkins reports: “Officials also said they identified more than 2,000 new cases, bringing the total number of confirmed cases to 44,653. There were 49 confirmed cases in Hong Kong, 10 in Macau and 18 in Taiwan. More than 185,000 people were under medical observation in the mainland. The vast majority of the new deaths and infections remained concentrated in Hubei province, the epicenter of the outbreak, where 94 people were reported dead Tuesday. More than 4,700 people recovered from the disease, according to Chinese officials.”

-- Thirty-nine more people tested positive for the virus aboard the cruise ship quarantined off the coast of Japan, bringing the total to 174. (Hawkins)

-- The disease caused by the virus has a new name: covid-19. “We had to find a name that did not refer to a geographical location, an animal, an individual, or group of people,” said World Health Organization director general Tedros Adhanom Ghebreyesus. WHO also wanted a name that was “pronounceable and related to the disease,” he said. (AP)

-- American Airlines extended its cancellations of China and Hong Kong flights through April. (Lori Aratani)

-- Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas said the U.S. peace plan would make “Swiss cheese” out of Palestinian land. Anne Gearan reports: “A U.N. Security Council vote that would have been a referendum against the plan never happened, an indication that there were not votes to approve the Palestinian-backed measure. ‘This is an Israeli-American preemptive plan,’ designed to allow Israel to get what it wants while blaming Palestinians for walking away, Abbas said during a tense session of the U.N.’s main decision-making body. ... Abbas said the Trump administration plan is a dodge meant ‘to put an end to the question of Palestine.’”

-- American and Taliban negotiators will meet again today following a conditional decision from Trump to sign a peace deal with the militants, officials said. “Trump has endorsed the deal and said it must be signed,” the Afghan official said, explaining that when Secretary of State Mike Pompeo called Afghan leaders Tuesday, he said the peace talks “deadlock” had been broken. (Karen DeYoung and Susannah George)

-- Pope Francis backed away from a major, anticipated decision on whether to allow married men to serve as priests in the Amazon. Many had anticipated that Francis would green-light the move, because local bishops supported the changes as a way to address drastic Catholic clerical shortages in the region. (Chico Harlan)

-- Venezuelan opposition leader Juan Guaidó was met with abuse after returning to Caracas fresh off a global tour. Mariana Zuñiga and Anthony Faiola report: “He was greeted by rival groups of chanting supporters and insult-hurling pro-government demonstrators.

Confusion ensued as loyalists of President Nicolás Maduro, whom Guaidó is seeking to oust, chased after him. ... Judges loyal to Maduro issued a court order last year forbidding Guaidó to leave the country, but he is calculating that Maduro's government will not risk the international backlash of arresting him after he was embraced by Trump and other leaders. ... But Guaidó's opposition is divided on the strategy going forward. Some lawmakers are backing Maduro's call to hold parliamentary elections this year. Guaidó has focused on demanding new presidential elections."

-- The armed showdown in El Salvador this weekend illustrated the growing role that militaries are playing in Latin American democracies. Anne-Catherine Brigida and Mary Beth Sheridan report: "In a region that long suffered from military dictatorships, the assertiveness by the armed forces is raising fears that democracy is taking a step backward. ... El Salvador's standoff between the military and lawmakers has ended peacefully — for now. ... [But] the deployment of the soldiers — with the open support of the defense minister — sent tremors through El Salvador."

The scene in March 2018 after a Tesla electric SUV crashed into a barrier on U.S. Highway 101 in Mountain View, Calif. The driver, Apple engineer Walter Huang, died. (AP)

DOMESTIC DEVELOPMENTS THAT SHOULDN'T BE OVERLOOKED:

-- A Tesla running on “autopilot” repeatedly veered toward the same spot where an Apple engineer later crashed and died, federal investigators said. Michael Laris reports: “Four days before Walter Huang’s Tesla veered off U.S. Highway 101 in Northern California and into a concrete barrier, killing the father of two, Huang sent a text message describing the car’s ‘Autopilot’ system making a similar error in the same spot, according to documents released Tuesday by federal investigators. ... When Huang’s Tesla SUV reached the exit ramp area in Mountain View, where he said the problems previously occurred, the car again steered out of its lane and hit a barrier at about 71 miles per hour, according to the NTSB. ... Tesla has faced sharp criticism from some lawmakers in Congress and elsewhere for calling its driver assistance features ‘Autopilot,’ which critics say is an overstatement of the system’s capabilities and can encourage customers to let their guard down.”

-- Lax Federal Aviation Administration oversight allowed Southwest to put millions of passengers at risk aboard planes that didn’t meet U.S. standards, the Department of Transportation’s inspector general found. Lori Aratani, Michael Laris and Ian Duncan report: “The strongly worded report called the FAA’s oversight of Southwest’s safety management system ‘ineffective’ and said the agency improperly relied on Southwest’s own conclusion that repeated problems represented a ‘low risk, rather than requiring the airline to comply with its regulatory requirements.’ ... The report found that Southwest ‘operates its fleet of aircraft with frequent weight and balance errors.’ Such incorrect information was ‘frequently communicated to pilots, which can ‘greatly affect’ a plane’s safety and performance, the report said.”

-- Trump is closer than ever to fulfilling his promise for a U.S. with taller walls, tighter immigration laws and fewer foreigners entering the country. Nick Miroff connects the dots: In the past three years, Trump has hardened the nation’s immigration system, causing illegal border crossings to plummet and legal immigration to slump. And now, his budget proposal “would increase deportations by adding thousands of new immigration agents and expanding jail capacity.” On Monday, the DOJ announced “lawsuits against three ‘sanctuary’ jurisdictions that eschew cooperation with federal immigration enforcement. And at an evening rally in New Hampshire ahead of the state’s Democratic primary, the president dusted off one of his vintage campaign routines, reciting a dark allegory he calls ‘The Snake’ about a serpent that turns on its generous host, injecting fatal venom. ‘This is about immigration,’ he told the crowd, to raucous cheers.”

-- U.S.-Mexico border crossings continue to drop, but unauthorized crossings by Mexican migrants are surging. Abigail Hauslohner reports: “Acting CBP Commissioner Mark Morgan said Tuesday that U.S. officials apprehended or deemed ‘inadmissible’ 36,679 migrants in January, a drop of 10 percent from December. But he said the number of Mexican adults taken into custody has climbed 32 percent from this time last year, a shift he attributed to smugglers ‘scrambling to come up with new tactics’ as overall migration numbers have fallen.”

-- A Puerto Rican man applied for a license in Georgia. Officials then arrested and jailed him for fraud. Brittany Shammass reports:

“Kenneth Caban Gonzalez waited the required 30 days after moving to Georgia, then gathered what he needed to apply for a driver’s license. ... When Caban Gonzalez was called back to the service center a few days later ... he wasn’t given a new ID. He was arrested and taken to jail ... He spent three days behind bars, lost construction work and faced the possibility of imprisonment before ultimately being cleared last March. Caban Gonzalez’s ordeal was the result of a Georgia Department of Driver Services practice of treating license seekers who moved from Puerto Rico differently than those who came from U.S. states and the District of Columbia, even though they are U.S. citizens. Now, as part of a settlement in a federal discrimination lawsuit Caban Gonzalez filed in July, the state has agreed to start treating applicants from Puerto Rico and other U.S. territories the same as those from U.S. states.”

-- New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo (D) said a Department of Homeland Security memo on immigrant driving records is proof the administration engaged in “politically motivated retaliation” meant to punish his state. From BuzzFeed News: “The Jan. 27 memo, written by a top DHS official, James McCament, outlined potential options for acting DHS Secretary Chad Wolf to consider in their efforts to not only obtain the driver records but to punish states like New York that cut off access to the information. McCament offered up options such as using ‘friendly’ states to discreetly collect information for federal immigration authorities that would otherwise be inaccessible by law. The plans also include retaliation measures against states that limit access to records, such as closing down local DHS offices, refusing to accept their state identification, cutting TSA PreCheck services, and potentially issuing subpoenas for driver's licenses provided to undocumented immigrants."

-- Federal Reserve Chairman Jerome Powell warned Congress that now would be a good time to reduce the federal budget deficit, which is expected to top $1 trillion this year. For now, Powell said he doesn't see signs of a recession on the horizon and said the economy is in a "very good place." He expects growth to remain solid, though he acknowledged the coronavirus remains a major unknown for the economy. (Heather Long)

-- The Federal Trade Commission will review past mergers by Facebook, Google and other Big Tech companies. Regulators said they would look into the mergers to see whether the acquisitions of smaller rivals may have skirted federal antitrust laws. (Tony Romm)

-- Denver voted to end its 30-year ban on pit bulls. A new law that permits but still regulates the ownership of these dogs will take effect in 90 days, pending approval from the mayor. (Katie Mettler)

-- A D.C. statehood bill will advance to the House floor and it's likely to pass for the first time in history. That said, the bill faces almost certain death in the Senate. (Jenna Portnoy)

-- The San Francisco Chronicle requested public documents on gun ownership. Now its reporters are getting death threats. (Hannah Knowles)

-- Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said the deadline to ratify the Equal Rights Amendment has expired. From CNN: “Ginsburg, a long-time supporter of the Equal Rights Amendment, suggested Monday night that the deadline to ratify the measure as a constitutional amendment has expired and that the decades long effort must start anew. ‘I would like to see a new beginning,’ Ginsburg told an audience at Georgetown University Law Center. ... Ginsburg's comments seemed to throw cold water on a recent effort by Virginia and other states who argue that after Virginia became the 38th state to ratify the amendment last month, the states had met the threshold necessary to change the Constitution. ... Ginsburg said ‘there is too much controversy about late comers,’ and she added that Virginia's move came ‘long after the deadline passed.’”

-- Actor Jussie Smollett was indicted on new charges of filing false hate crime reports last year after he claimed to be the victim of a bigoted attack in Chicago. Elahe Izadi and Travis Andrews report: “A grand jury indicted Smollett on six counts of disorderly conduct, charging him with filing false reports of a hate crime, according to documents filed Tuesday. The development came almost a year after prosecutors made the controversial decision to drop multiple felony counts against Smollett. In June, a judge ruled that Cook County State’s Attorney Kim Foxx mishandled the case and ordered a special prosecutor to investigate and to determine whether Smollett would be subject to new charges. Special prosecutor Dan K. Webb decided to prosecute after ‘the grand jury’s investigation revealed that Jussie Smollett planned and participated in a staged hate crime attack, and thereafter made numerous false statements to Chicago Police Department officers on multiple occasions, reporting a heinous hate crime that he, in fact, knew had not occurred.”

-- Longtime CNBC anchor Michelle Caruso-Cabrera launched a Democratic primary challenge against Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-N.Y.). About a dozen other candidates have filed to run for the seat, even though Ocasio-Cortez will be hard to beat. The freshman is a fundraising powerhouse, having raised over $5.3 million last year. (CNN)

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

Trump praised Barr this morning for allegedly intervening in Stone’s sentencing:

Andrew Yang channeled Arnold Schwarzenegger a few hours after dropping out of the race:

 Andrew Yang
@AndrewYang

We'll be back.

 79.8K  4:30 AM - Feb 12, 2020

 12.1K people are talking about this

Michael Bennet left the campaign with a message to New Hampshire:

Dave Weigel ✓
@daveweigel

Michael Bennet drops out of the race. "I love you, New Hampshire. Whether you knew it or not, we were having a great time together... I think it's fitting for us to end the campaign tonight."

♡ 432 1:34 AM - Feb 12, 2020

💬 136 people are talking about this

Here's a sobering statistic about Biden's electoral record:

David Dayen
@ddayen

Joe Biden has never finished higher than 4th in any primary or caucus in 32 years of running for president
twitter.com/thomaskaplan/s...

Thomas Kaplan  @thomaskaplan

Biden is now addressing his party via live stream

♡ 11.1K 2:09 AM - Feb 12, 2020

💬 2,655 people are talking about this

Just as Sanders finished his victory speech in New Hampshire, the most powerful union in Nevada shared a candidate sheet with a not-so-favorable review of Medicare-for-all:

Gabriel DeBenedetti @gdebenedetti · 4h

the very, very powerful Culinary Union in Nevada just sent these handouts out to members. See under Sanders: "End Culinary Healthcare." Pretty clear signal >

DE WE WIN UN FAMILIES One. Two. Three NO VOTAMOS NOS GANAMOS Uno. Dos. Tre

RACIST PARTY PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES ON CULINARY UNION ISSUE

| NAME               | HEALTHCARE              | WAGES/BENEFITS | PROFESSIONAL DEVELOPMENT | AFRICA | CAREERS OF LA RAZA | LABOR TRAINING | IMMIGRATION |
|--------------------|-------------------------|----------------|--------------------------|--------|--------------------|----------------|-------------|
| TRUMP       | Medicare for All        | 15% raise      | Professional development | Yes    | Yes                | Yes            | Yes         |
| WELD        | Medicare for All        | 15% raise      | Professional development | Yes    | Yes                | Yes            | Yes         |
| HAAS        | Medicare for All        | 15% raise      | Professional development | Yes    | Yes                | Yes            | Yes         |
| DEBENEDETTI | Medicare for All        | 15% raise      | Professional development | Yes    | Yes                | Yes            | Yes         |
| SANDERS     | End Culinary Healthcare | 15% raise      | Professional development | Yes    | Yes                | Yes            | Yes         |

VOTING: February 15 - 18 CANCER DAY: SHIRAZI February 22

2020 2020

Gabriel DeBenedetti @gdebenedetti

when Sanders spoke to the Culinary Union members late last year, he was interrupted repeatedly by questions about how Medicare for All would hit their union-negotiated care. Big deal here in the next state to vote...

64 4:28 AM - Feb 12, 2020

24 people are talking about this

Trump reacted to the New Hampshire results:

The former acting attorney general, whom Trump fired in January 2017 when she refused to enforce his travel ban on predominantly Muslim countries, had this message for longtime DOJ staffers:

 Sally Yates ✓
@SallyQYates

To the career men and women of DOJ, you are both the backbone and the heart of the Department. Your noble dedication to the rule of law is the foundation of our republic. twitter.com/peteralexander...

Peter Alexander ✓ @PeterAlexander
BREAKING: Now, all four federal prosecutors on the Stone case have asked the judge to withdraw from the case.

Michael Marando joins the rest of his team including Aaron Zelinsky, Jonathan Kravis, and Adam Jed.

52.6K 11:39 PM - Feb 11, 2020

14.8K people are talking about this

From a former DOJ inspector general:

 Michael R. Bromwich ✓
@mrbromwich

Memo to all career DOJ employees

This is not what you signed up for. The four prosecutors who bailed on the Stone case have shown the way. Report all instances of improper political influence and other misdeeds to the DOJ IG, who is required to protect your identity.

32.1K 1:59 AM - Feb 12, 2020

10.4K people are talking about this

Trump criticized the federal judge overseeing Roger Stone's trial, and Hillary Clinton responded:

Hillary Clinton
@HillaryClinton

Do you realize intimidating judges is the behavior of failed-state fascists? Just asking!
twitter.com/realDonaldTrump...

Donald J. Trump  @realDonaldTrump
Is this the Judge that put Paul Manafort in SOLITARY CONFINEMENT, something that not even mobster Al Capone had to endure? How did she treat Crooked Hillary Clinton? Just asking! twitter.com/katiephang/sta...

77.2K 2:44 AM - Feb 12, 2020

21.9K people are talking about this

So did the speaker of the House:

Nancy Pelosi
@SpeakerPelosi

By tweet @realDonaldTrump engaged in political interference in the sentencing of Roger Stone. It is outrageous that DOJ has deeply damaged the rule of law by withdrawing its recommendation. Stepping down of prosecutors should be commended & actions of DOJ should be investigated.

64,6K 2:37 AM - Feb 12, 2020

26.8K people are talking about this

And the president seemed pretty proud of this discovery:

 Jeff Mason ✓
@jeffmason1

.@realDonaldTrump notes in the Oval Office proudly that Microsoft, Amazon, Google, Apple - companies that have the highest values in the stock market - spell, with their first letters, a familiar acronym: MAGA.

♡ 249 9:25 PM - Feb 11, 2020

💬 283 people are talking about this

VIDEOS OF THE DAY:

Siba, a standard poodle, won this year's Westminster Kennel Club

Dog Show:

Westminster dog show: Fluff, fun and fur-ocious competition

"Ahead of the final decision, the beautiful black dog beamed as she took one final lap around Madison Square Garden," writes Michael Brice-Saddler. "Siba performed masterfully Tuesday — even as the crowd urged judge Robert H. Slay to crown the golden retriever, a breed that has never been named best in show."

Reacting to the DOJ infighting, Stephen Colbert joked that the only difference between a banana republic and this situation is that Trump "doesn't eat fruit":

Gov. Gavin Newsom (D-Calif.) talked to Seth Meyers about the advice Trump gave him to fight fires:

Jimmy Kimmel talked to one of Trump's recently fired ambassadors:

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202

Privacy Policy | Help

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Ten reasons Bernie Sanders should celebrate winning New Hampshire – or feel cause for concern
Date: Wednesday, February 12, 2020 11:04:26 AM

---

If you're having trouble reading this, click here.

---

PowerPost

The Daily 202

Morning intelligence for leaders

Share:

 Listen to The Big Idea

Powered by  LiveIntent

Ten reasons Bernie Sanders should celebrate winning New Hampshire – or feel cause for concern

Sanders wins New Hampshire: The candidates' speeches in 3.5 minutes

BY JAMES HOHMANN

with Mariana Alfaro

THE BIG IDEA:

MANCHESTER, N.H. – When Bernie Sanders launched his second bid for the Democratic presidential nomination a year ago, joining a large and diverse field, very few pundits thought he could win the most votes in the Iowa caucuses and repeat his 2016 triumph in the New Hampshire primary. The Vermont senator was written off again after his heart attack in October. But the 78-year-old persevered and has once again proven conventional wisdom wrong, winning here and taking the lead in the latest national polls.

“This victory here is the beginning of the end for Donald Trump,” Sanders told supporters on Tuesday night. “Bernie beats Trump,” his 1,200 supporters chanted inside the Southern New Hampshire

University field house. “Bernie beats Trump.”

By traditional metrics, Sanders would be widely considered the front-runner right now. That’s how he sees himself and how his surrogates refer to him at his rallies. The party has moved in his direction on a litany of issues. He’s built a small-dollar fundraising juggernaut. It’s not clear today that any other candidate has a greater probability of securing the nomination than he does.

In several ways, though, the results from New Hampshire offered a mixed bag for the would-be revolutionary. He deserves his due for winning, but there are also questions about his strength going into what could be a five-month slog to the Democratic National Convention in Milwaukee this July. Here’s some of the good news, as well the bad news, for Sanders as the race moves from the Granite State to Nevada, South Carolina and Super Tuesday:

1) A cause for concern: The victory was unexpectedly narrow.

Sanders won with 25.8 percent of the vote, leading Pete Buttigieg by only 1.3 percentage points, or fewer than 4,000 votes.

The percentage of the vote Sanders got is the lowest for any winner of the New Hampshire primary in modern history, lagging behind Jimmy Carter’s 28.6 percent in 1976.

Sanders, who beat Hillary Clinton by 22 points here four years ago, made no effort to manage expectations that he’d win. He confidently predicted victory at every stop in the final days.

In 2016, Sanders received 152,193 votes in the two-way race. He’s getting 74,316 votes, with 94 percent of precincts reporting as of 1 p.m. on Wednesday.

Interestingly, only 30 percent of voters in the network exit polls said they supported Sanders in 2016 – even though he got 62 percent of the vote. New Hampshire allows independents to vote in either party's primary. Republicans didn't have a competitive contest, so many unaffiliated voters took Democratic ballots.

On Tuesday, the exit polling shows Sanders won 57 percent of the group that had voted for him four years before. And he picked up 12 percent of voters who said they supported Clinton in 2016. One in five voters said they voted for neither Clinton nor Sanders in the 2016 primaries. Sanders got 14 percent of that group.

2) A reason to celebrate: Elizabeth Warren's collapse has sidelined Sanders's chief rival in the liberal lane and solidified his standing as the dominant progressive voice in the race.

Both Sanders and Warren represent neighboring states to New Hampshire. But Warren's support tanked after Iowa, and the Massachusetts senator received 9.3 percent of the vote – not enough to receive a single delegate to the national convention. (It appears that Sanders will get nine delegates and Buttigieg will get six delegates out of New Hampshire.) If Warren cannot even get double digits here, where she's spent more time and money than any other state, what's the contest she thinks she'll be able to win?

Among the 21 percent of voters who described themselves as “very liberal” in the exit poll, half backed Sanders. Warren was second, with 19 percent. Sanders and Buttigieg tied among the 40 percent of voters who saw themselves as “somewhat liberal,” getting 26 percent apiece. Buttigieg and Sen. Amy Klobuchar essentially tied – 28 percent to 26 percent – among the third of the electorate that identified as moderate.

3) A cause for concern: Most Democrats do not want Sanders to be their nominee. If you add together Buttigieg, Klobuchar and Joe Biden – the three candidates competing unabashedly in the more moderate lane – they received 52.7 percent. The self-described democratic socialist declines to formally register as a member of the Democratic Party. Democrats overwhelmingly said they’d back him over Trump, but they worry that he would lose the election.

New Hampshire primary: Sanders wins, Klobuchar surges, dropouts ensue

4) A reason to celebrate: Klobuchar’s surge is good for Sanders because it divides up the moderate lane and makes it harder for Buttigieg to consolidate support.

She finished third, with just under 20 percent of the vote. Some Buttigieg allies apparently expressed concern at his watch party in Nashua about what they called the “Klobuchar.” The strong finish by the senior senator from Minnesota, who is going to New York today to fill her campaign coffers, denies Buttigieg the chance to claim that he’s now the moderate to beat.

Klobuchar said she can appeal to the “people in middle” at her watch party: “Donald Trump's worst nightmare is that the people in the middle, the people who have had enough of the name-calling and the mudslinging, have someone to vote for in November.”

For now, Buttigieg and Klobuchar are likely to be more focused on each other than Sanders. “I admired Senator Sanders when I was a high school student, and I want to congratulate him,” the 38-year-old former mayor said at his party last night. “I respect him greatly to this day, and I congratulate him on his strong showing tonight.”

Meanwhile, Mike Bloomberg is waiting in the wings. The former New York mayor is spending hundreds of millions of dollars to air commercials in the states that vote Super Tuesday. And he’s building support. Rep. Lucy McBath (D-Ga.) endorsed Bloomberg this morning. The three of them competing for similar voters works to Sanders’s advantage.

5) A cause for concern: Late deciders didn’t break for Sanders.

Half of voters said they decided in the last few days. Sanders only got 16 percent of this group. Among the other half of the electorate, people who made up their minds earlier, 37 percent backed Sanders, according to the exits. If large numbers of people are making up their minds at the last minute, they're not likely to go for the Vermonter. He's a known commodity. This shows how it will be harder for him to grow his standing in the national polls than for some lesser-known rivals like Klobuchar. Another number to keep an eye on: Sanders won among men by nine points, but he finished third among women. He underperformed similarly with female voters in 2016, as well.

6) A reason to celebrate: Medicare-for-all helped Sanders win the primary.

Health care was the biggest concern of people who voted in Tuesday's Democratic primary, by far, and Sanders fared best among people who care most about the issue. Among the 37 percent who cared most about health care, Sanders led with 31 percent.

Six in 10 voters said they support replacing all private health insurance with a single government plan for everyone. Among that group, 39 percent backed Sanders. Buttigieg, who advocates "Medicare for all who want it," followed with 22 percent. Warren was third with this group, garnering 13 percent. Her tortured efforts to back away from Sanders's Medicare-for-all bill, which she had co-sponsored, helped doom her candidacy. When she was peaking in the polls, she struggled to explain how she'd pay for the program without raising taxes on the middle class. She eventually called for a multi-year transition period that left voters on both sides of the question unsatisfied.

Sanders trailed Buttigieg among voters who said climate change and foreign policy were the most important issues to them.

7) A cause for concern: Sanders is not widely perceived by

Democrats as electable.

Voters were asked in the exit poll whether they prioritize picking a candidate who agrees with them on major issues or who can beat Trump. Of the third of voters who prized agreement over electability, Sanders won about four in 10. But he got just two in 10 of those who primarily want to beat Trump, a much bigger bloc.

---

Content from Blue Cross Blue Shield Association

Addressing the need for more affordable medicines

Americans pay too much for prescription drugs. Even generics can be too expensive. So we're investing in a non-profit company to produce the drugs people need at a price they can afford. Learn more.

---

Supporters cheer as Bernie Sanders gives his victory speech on Tuesday night in Manchester. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

8) A reason to celebrate: Sanders has more blue-collar appeal than any of his rivals.

He led among union members, those without college degrees and lower-income voters. He beat Buttigieg 38 percent to 17 percent among those who earn less than $50,000-a-year and 31 percent to 24 percent among those who earn between $50,001 and $99,999. Buttigieg dominated with those make more than 100K, leading Klobuchar 34 percent to 20 percent, with Sanders in third.

One in five voters said income inequality is the issue they care about most. Sanders led Buttigieg among this constituency 34 percent to 20 percent. Biden enjoys saying that people like to call him “Middle Class Joe,” but he only got 6 percent of voters most concerned about income inequality. Indeed, Sanders campaign strategists spent much of the past year fretting that Biden would cut into their blue-collar base.

9) A reason to celebrate: Sanders continues to dominate the youth vote.

He won half of voters between the ages of 18 to 29, followed by Buttigieg with 20 percent. Sanders also garnered 36 percent of voters age 30 to 44, according to the exit polling. Sanders was a distant third among those 45-to-64 and 65+. Indeed, among seniors, who made up a quarter of the electorate, he got only 14 percent. Klobuchar prevailed among the 65-plus crowd. Older voters historically vote at higher rates.

10) A cause for concern: 18-to-29-year-olds made up 14 percent of the electorate on Tuesday, down from 19 percent in the 2016 primary.

The share of young people in the electorate declined despite assiduous outreach, including the campaign hosting a concert on the University of New Hampshire campus in Durham on Monday night, that drew 7,500 attendees.

Bigger picture, Sanders is not bringing the numbers of new voters into the primary process that he promises he would be able to activate in the general election if he's the Democratic nominee. Sanders's theory of the case is premised on the idea that he can bring new people into the process. But there's little evidence so far from Iowa or New Hampshire that he would be able to deliver.

Total Democratic primary turnout in New Hampshire surpassed 2016 levels and is tracking close to the 2008 total vote count of about 288,000. Last week in Iowa, the turnout of a little more than 170,000 barely surpassed 2016 levels – and fell far short of the record-breaking 240,000 caucus-goers who came out in 2008 when Barack Obama was running. Sanders conceded that this disappointed him. “Not as high, frankly, as I would have liked to have seen,” he told reporters.

Deval Patrick greets voters outside a polling place on Tuesday in Concord, N.H. (Scott Eisen/Getty Images)

-- New Hampshire has winnowed the field: Three candidates have ended their campaigns since polls closed last night.

Former Massachusetts governor Deval Patrick: “The vote in New Hampshire last night was not enough for us to create the practical wind at the campaign's back to go on to the next round of voting," he said in a statement this afternoon, "so I have decided to suspend the campaign, effective immediately."

Entrepreneur Andrew Yang: "I am a numbers guy," he told Dave Weigel in an interview. "In most of these [upcoming] states, I'm not going to be at a threshold where I get delegates, which makes sticking around not necessarily helpful or productive in terms of furthering the goals of this campaign." Yang added that he has not decided whether to endorse another candidate, though campaigns have reached out. He also said he would be open to becoming another candidate's running mate or joining the Cabinet.

Sen. Michael Bennet (D-Colo.): "I love you, New Hampshire. Whether you knew it or not, we were having a great time together," he said at his watch party in Concord, joined by Gary Hart and James Carville. "I want you to be optimistic tonight. As James Baldwin wrote at the height of the civil rights movement: This is in our hands; we have no right to assume otherwise."

QUOTE OF THE DAY:

Joe Biden left New Hampshire before the polls closed to fly to a rally in Columbia, S.C. "This is just the beginning," he told supporters there. "We have an entire nation to vote yet."

-- More team coverage from the campaign trail:

Dan Balz: “Democrats now face a fractured and divisive contest for the nomination.”

Jenna Johnson: “With a third-place finish, Klobuchar bursts to the center of the ... race.”

Annie Linskey: “Warren’s campaign at a crossroads as once-rising star confronts disappointing finishes.”

Josh Dawsey: “Biden looks to S.C. to revive faltering campaign, but success there is no longer seen as certain.”

Michael Scherer: “Bloomberg wins the Democratic spotlight and the derision of his rivals.”

Amber Phillips: “8 questions about where the Democratic primary stands after New Hampshire.”

Cat Zakrzewski: “Sanders is no friend of Big Tech. And he keeps winning.”

Dino Grandoni: “Climate concerns help boost Sanders and Buttigieg in New Hampshire.”

Holly Bailey and Isaac Stanley-Becker: “After scrapping a pair of apps similar to the one that caused chaos in Iowa, the Nevada State Democratic Party said it would use paper ballots and an online check-in process in its presidential caucuses, a plan unlikely to end growing concerns about the coming vote.”

Subscribe on Amazon Echo, Google Home, Apple HomePod and other podcast players.

Welcome to the Daily 202, PowerPost's morning briefing for decision-makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter.

Prosecutors quit amid backtrack over Roger Stone's prison term

POLITICS TRUMPS THE RULE OF LAW:

-- All four career prosecutors handling the case against Roger Stone withdrew from the case — and one quit his job entirely — after the Justice Department signaled it planned to undercut their sentencing recommendation for Trump’s longtime friend and confidant. Matt Zapotosky, Devlin Barrett, Ann Marimow and Spencer Hsu report: “The sudden and dramatic moves came after prosecutors and their superiors had argued for days over the appropriate penalty for Stone, and exposed what some career Justice Department employees say is a continuing pattern of the historically independent law enforcement institution being bent to Trump’s political will. ... The cascade of controversy began Monday, when career prosecutors handling the case recommended that a judge sentence Stone ... to between seven and nine years in federal prison. ... ‘This is a horrible and very unfair situation,’ Trump wrote early Tuesday. ‘The real crimes were on the other side, as nothing happens to them. Cannot allow this miscarriage of justice!' Hours later, a senior Justice Department official told reporters that the agency's leadership was 'shocked' by the recommendation of a seven-to-nine-year sentence and would soon revise it. ...

"One by one, the career prosecutors, two of whom had worked on [Bob] Mueller's investigation, filed notices in court of their intention to leave the case. Though none of the prosecutors gave a reason, their asking to do so was highly unusual and suggested they could not ethically affix their names to the government's revised position. ... Kerri Kupec, a Justice Department spokeswoman, said that the White House did not communicate with the agency on Monday or Tuesday about the Stone case, and that the decision to reverse course was made before Trump's tweet. Trump told reporters later Tuesday, 'I have not been involved in it at all,' though in the same remarks he called the career prosecutors' initial recommendation 'an insult to our country.' ... Jonathan Kravis, one of the prosecutors on the Stone case, wrote in a court filing that he had resigned as an assistant U.S. attorney, leaving government altogether. Three others — Aaron S.J. Zelinsky, Adam Jed and Michael Marando — filed notices with the judge saying 'please notice the withdrawal' from the case. ...

"The decision to file a new sentencing memo was made by officials in the attorney general's office and the deputy attorney general's office, according to a senior Justice Department official. The official could not point to another instance of Justice Department headquarters overruling and replacing a sentencing memorandum a day after a filing ... Hours before the [original] filing was due Monday, [Timothy] Shea, the [interim head of the D.C. U.S. attorney's office] and a former close adviser to [Attorney General Bill] Barr, had not made a final decision on Stone's sentencing recommendation ... In their Monday filing, prosecutors argued that more time should be added to Stone's sentence because of his extensive criminal conduct, which stretched over two years, and because they say he obstructed the prosecution of the case after he was charged. In a Tuesday filing from Shea, ... the government argued that those enhancements were overkill, noting that Stone's victim has asked for leniency for him and did not view the statement as an actual threat."

-- Almost simultaneously, Trump decided to revoke the nomination to a top Treasury Department post of his former U.S. attorney in the District, Jessie Liu, who supervised the Stone case when it went to trial. Hsu, Dawsey and Barrett report: "Liu, 47, served more than two years in the politically sensitive post of top federal prosecutor in the nation's capital and was Trump's first nominee to the position, serving from September 2017 until Jan. 31. In the job, Liu oversaw late-stage court proceedings for top Trump aides and Mueller defendants, including Trump's 2016 deputy campaign chairman Rick Gates and former national security adviser Michael Flynn, as well as [Stone's] November trial and conviction. However, over the past two weeks, coinciding with Liu's departure, the U.S. attorney's office has changed its sentencing stances in both Flynn and Stone's cases, with prosecutors moving from stiffer sentencing recommendations to more lenient ones. Emerging accounts of the circumstances surrounding Liu's departure from the administration cast those decisions in a new light. ...

"Trump has been lobbied extensively against Liu by people who do not like her handling of the D.C. office — particularly as it relates to the Mueller probe, an administration official said. The decision to withdraw the nomination was made Tuesday afternoon, the official said. ... A third person familiar with the situation ... said Liu's nomination was opposed vocally by Barbara Ledeen, a conservative operative and Republican Senate staffer unhappy about [Michael] Flynn's prosecution for lying to the FBI. ... The person said Ledeen had made little headway before the recent storm over Stone's sentencing, calling it a turning point. Treasury officials believe Trump himself made the call to withdraw Liu because her confirmation hearing before the Senate Banking Committee was set for Thursday, and Trump was concerned she would be asked about the case ... Liu had no role in Stone's sentencing recommendation, having left office before it was sent to supervisors for approval, several people said."

-- The four career prosecutors who withdrew from the Stone case did so after finding out from Fox News that Barr's office planned to withdraw the sentencing recommendation, per the Times: "As is customary in prominent prosecutions, the line prosecutors on the Stone case discussed their proposed sentencing recommendation with senior officials. But they apparently came to no clear agreement before the document was filed in court, an outcome that one Justice Department official blamed on a breakdown in management."

-- The week of Trump's acquittal was Fox News Channel's best in the ratings since the weeks when he was elected and

inaugurated. (AP)

-- Under Barr's iron fist, "it appears no corner of the Justice Department can escape perversion," laments columnist Dana Milbank: "In a new grant award, senior Justice officials rejected the recommendations of career officials and decided to deny grants to highly rated Catholic Charities in Palm Beach, Fla., and Chicanos Por La Causa in Phoenix. Instead, Reuters reported, they gave more than $1 million combined to lower-rated groups called the Lincoln Tubman Foundation and Hookers for Jesus. Why? Well, it turns out the head of the Catholic Charities affiliate had been active with Democrats and the Phoenix group had opposed President Trump's immigration policies. By contrast, Hookers for Jesus is run by a Christian conservative and the Lincoln Tubman group was launched by a relative of a Trump delegate to the 2016 convention. That Catholic Charities has been replaced by Hookers for Jesus says much about Barr's Justice Department. Friends of Trump are rewarded. Opponents of Trump are punished. And the nation's law enforcement apparatus becomes Trump's personal plaything."

-- As Trump escalated his campaign of retribution against his perceived enemies, Republican senators shrugged. Philip Rucker and Paul Kane report: Trump railed "in the Oval Office about a decorated combat veteran who testified about the president's conduct with Ukraine and suggesting the Defense Department should consider disciplining him. 'The military can handle him any way they want,' Trump said of Lt. Col. Alexander Vindman, who was ousted from his position on the National Security Council last Friday and reassigned to the Pentagon. Asked whether he was recommending the military take disciplinary action against Vindman for his House testimony in the impeachment proceedings, Trump replied, 'They're going to certainly, I would imagine, take a look at that.' ... Republicans who control the Senate resigned themselves this week to the reality that they are unable to check or even influence Trump, even as some GOP strategists are warning that the president's actions threaten the party's Senate majority by complicating the home-state politics for a quintet of endangered incumbents.

"One of them, Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), said last week that she believed Trump had learned 'a pretty big lesson' by being impeached. But this week she said she had been so 'concerned' about Trump's desire to punish two impeachment witnesses, U.S. Ambassador to the European Union Gordon Sondland and Vindman, that she contacted the White House. ... Asked what senators could do to rein in Trump, she replied, 'I called to try to prevent the action' ... Sens. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) and Thom Tillis (R-N.C.) said that they tried to save Sondland, a major GOP donor, from the embarrassment of being fired on the same day as Vindman. ... 'I agreed with the decision on Vindman,' Tillis said. 'I just felt like having the two have some distance would have been appropriate.'"

-- Trump plans to ditch another official over her role in impeachment. From the New York Post: "The White House is expected to pull the nomination of Elaine McCusker to be the Pentagon's comptroller and chief financial officer in the latest staffing fallout from [Trump's] impeachment ... McCusker resisted the president's directive to stall about $250 million in military aid to Ukraine and her emails protesting the delay were leaked in January to the blog Just Security ahead of Trump's Senate trial. ... It's unclear if a final decision has been made on the timing of the nomination withdrawal. It's also unclear how the withdrawal would impact McCusker's current role as acting comptroller and CFO of the Pentagon."

-- Rep. Chris Stewart (R-Utah) has emerged as a top contender to be the next director of national intelligence. He's being pushed by national security adviser Robert O'Brien. From the Times:

"Joseph Maguire, the director of the National Counterterrorism Center, has filled in as the acting director of national intelligence since Dan Coats resigned in August. But under current law limiting the duration of postings for acting cabinet-level officials, Mr. Maguire must step down next month. ... What is not clear, however, is whether the president sees Mr. Maguire's role in handling the anonymous whistle-blower complaint about Mr. Trump's dealings with Ukraine that helped prompt the impeachment inquiry as an asset or a liability. Mr. Maguire followed the advice of administration lawyers and initially blocked the complaint from being sent to Congress ... But soon after, he engineered an agreement to provide the complaint to Congress. That move ... helped prompt the impeachment inquiry. ... Mr. Stewart, like other Republicans on the House Intelligence Committee, vigorously defended Mr. Trump during impeachment hearings in the fall that focused on the president's pressure campaign on Ukraine. And he has been sharply critical of the handling by the Justice Department and F.B.I. of an investigation into the Trump campaign's ties to Russian interference in the 2016 election."

-- Speaking of Utahns, Sen. Mitt Romney (R) said the Senate GOP has already moved on from his vote last week to convict Trump of abuse of power during the impeachment trial. Paul Kane reports: "Signaling he wants to be a team player, Romney flew home to Salt Lake City for meetings last Thursday — a day after the Senate vote — and then to Palm Beach, Fla., for a National Republican Senatorial Committee gathering ... He said there was no awkwardness at the fundraising retreat or Tuesday's [GOP luncheon], also attended by [Mike] Pence." Things with the president, though, remain tense. At the White House yesterday, Trump called Romney a "disgrace," at the same time that the senator was voting for the president's judicial nominees.

Powered by  LiveIntent

Coronavirus patients, medical staff exercise and dance at Wuhan hospital

THE NEW WORLD ORDER:

-- The CDC acknowledged the patient with the latest confirmed case of coronavirus in the United States initially tested negative for the disease and was briefly allowed to leave a San Diego hospital because of a laboratory error. Derek Hawkins and Hannah Knowles report: "The patient was among three evacuees from China who were placed in isolation and underwent testing at the University of California San Diego Medical Center last week after showing signs of the novel coronavirus. An initial round of tests came back negative, and the people returned to a quarantine site at Marine Corps Air Station Miramar. Further testing revealed, however, that one of them was infected. A CDC spokeswoman, Kristen Nordlund, said Tuesday that blood samples from the three patients were inadvertently omitted from a large test run because they were incorrectly labeled. ... On Monday, the patient returned to the hospital for treatment. Going forward, a CDC laboratory staff member will join quarantine field teams to make sure that specimens are correctly labeled, Nordlund said.”

-- The coronavirus death toll rose once again, with 97 deaths yesterday alone. Luckily, while the number of confirmed infections continues to rise, the rate of growth is slowing.

Hawkins reports: “Officials also said they identified more than 2,000 new cases, bringing the total number of confirmed cases to 44,653. There were 49 confirmed cases in Hong Kong, 10 in Macau and 18 in Taiwan. More than 185,000 people were under medical observation in the mainland. The vast majority of the new deaths and infections remained concentrated in Hubei province, the epicenter of the outbreak, where 94 people were reported dead Tuesday. More than 4,700 people recovered from the disease, according to Chinese officials.”

-- Thirty-nine more people tested positive for the virus aboard the cruise ship quarantined off the coast of Japan, bringing the total to 174. (Hawkins)

-- The disease caused by the virus has a new name: covid-19. “We had to find a name that did not refer to a geographical location, an animal, an individual, or group of people,” said World Health Organization director general Tedros Adhanom Ghebreyesus. WHO also wanted a name that was “pronounceable and related to the disease,” he said. (AP)

-- American Airlines extended its cancellations of China and Hong Kong flights through April. (Lori Aratani)

-- Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas said the U.S. peace plan would make “Swiss cheese” out of Palestinian land. Anne Gearan reports: “A U.N. Security Council vote that would have been a referendum against the plan never happened, an indication that there were not votes to approve the Palestinian-backed measure. ‘This is an Israeli-American preemptive plan,’ designed to allow Israel to get what it wants while blaming Palestinians for walking away, Abbas said during a tense session of the U.N.’s main decision-making body. ... Abbas said the Trump administration plan is a dodge meant ‘to put an end to the question of Palestine.’”

-- American and Taliban negotiators will meet again today following a conditional decision from Trump to sign a peace deal with the militants, officials said. “Trump has endorsed the deal and said it must be signed,” the Afghan official said, explaining that when Secretary of State Mike Pompeo called Afghan leaders Tuesday, he said the peace talks “deadlock” had been broken. (Karen DeYoung and Susannah George)

-- Pope Francis backed away from a major, anticipated decision on whether to allow married men to serve as priests in the Amazon. Many had anticipated that Francis would green-light the move, because local bishops supported the changes as a way to address drastic Catholic clerical shortages in the region. (Chico Harlan)

-- Venezuelan opposition leader Juan Guaidó was met with abuse after returning to Caracas fresh off a global tour. Mariana Zuñiga and Anthony Faiola report: “He was greeted by rival groups of chanting supporters and insult-hurling pro-government demonstrators.

Confusion ensued as loyalists of President Nicolás Maduro, whom Guaidó is seeking to oust, chased after him. ... Judges loyal to Maduro issued a court order last year forbidding Guaidó to leave the country, but he is calculating that Maduro's government will not risk the international backlash of arresting him after he was embraced by Trump and other leaders. ... But Guaidó's opposition is divided on the strategy going forward. Some lawmakers are backing Maduro's call to hold parliamentary elections this year. Guaidó has focused on demanding new presidential elections."

-- The armed showdown in El Salvador this weekend illustrated the growing role that militaries are playing in Latin American democracies. Anne-Catherine Brigida and Mary Beth Sheridan report: "In a region that long suffered from military dictatorships, the assertiveness by the armed forces is raising fears that democracy is taking a step backward. ... El Salvador's standoff between the military and lawmakers has ended peacefully — for now. ... [But] the deployment of the soldiers — with the open support of the defense minister — sent tremors through El Salvador."

The scene in March 2018 after a Tesla electric SUV crashed into a barrier on U.S. Highway 101 in Mountain View, Calif. The driver, Apple engineer Walter Huang, died. (AP)

DOMESTIC DEVELOPMENTS THAT SHOULDN'T BE OVERLOOKED:

-- A Tesla running on “autopilot” repeatedly veered toward the same spot where an Apple engineer later crashed and died, federal investigators said. Michael Laris reports: “Four days before Walter Huang’s Tesla veered off U.S. Highway 101 in Northern California and into a concrete barrier, killing the father of two, Huang sent a text message describing the car’s ‘Autopilot’ system making a similar error in the same spot, according to documents released Tuesday by federal investigators. ... When Huang’s Tesla SUV reached the exit ramp area in Mountain View, where he said the problems previously occurred, the car again steered out of its lane and hit a barrier at about 71 miles per hour, according to the NTSB. ... Tesla has faced sharp criticism from some lawmakers in Congress and elsewhere for calling its driver assistance features ‘Autopilot,’ which critics say is an overstatement of the system’s capabilities and can encourage customers to let their guard down.”

-- Lax Federal Aviation Administration oversight allowed Southwest to put millions of passengers at risk aboard planes that didn’t meet U.S. standards, the Department of Transportation’s inspector general found. Lori Aratani, Michael Laris and Ian Duncan report: “The strongly worded report called the FAA’s oversight of Southwest’s safety management system ‘ineffective’ and said the agency improperly relied on Southwest’s own conclusion that repeated problems represented a 'low risk, rather than requiring the airline to comply with its regulatory requirements.' ... The report found that Southwest 'operates its fleet of aircraft with frequent weight and balance errors.' Such incorrect information was 'frequently communicated to pilots, which can 'greatly affect' a plane's safety and performance, the report said."

-- Trump is closer than ever to fulfilling his promise for a U.S. with taller walls, tighter immigration laws and fewer foreigners entering the country. Nick Miroff connects the dots: In the past three years, Trump has hardened the nation's immigration system, causing illegal border crossings to plummet and legal immigration to slump. And now, his budget proposal "would increase deportations by adding thousands of new immigration agents and expanding jail capacity." On Monday, the DOJ announced "lawsuits against three 'sanctuary' jurisdictions that eschew cooperation with federal immigration enforcement. And at an evening rally in New Hampshire ahead of the state's Democratic primary, the president dusted off one of his vintage campaign routines, reciting a dark allegory he calls 'The Snake' about a serpent that turns on its generous host, injecting fatal venom. 'This is about immigration,' he told the crowd, to raucous cheers."

-- U.S.-Mexico border crossings continue to drop, but unauthorized crossings by Mexican migrants are surging. Abigail Hauslohner reports: "Acting CBP Commissioner Mark Morgan said Tuesday that U.S. officials apprehended or deemed 'inadmissible' 36,679 migrants in January, a drop of 10 percent from December. But he said the number of Mexican adults taken into custody has climbed 32 percent from this time last year, a shift he attributed to smugglers ‘scrambling to come up with new tactics’ as overall migration numbers have fallen.”

-- A Puerto Rican man applied for a license in Georgia. Officials then arrested and jailed him for fraud. Brittany Shammass reports: “Kenneth Caban Gonzalez waited the required 30 days after moving to Georgia, then gathered what he needed to apply for a driver’s license. ... When Caban Gonzalez was called back to the service center a few days later ... he wasn’t given a new ID. He was arrested and taken to jail ... He spent three days behind bars, lost construction work and faced the possibility of imprisonment before ultimately being cleared last March. Caban Gonzalez’s ordeal was the result of a Georgia Department of Driver Services practice of treating license seekers who moved from Puerto Rico differently than those who came from U.S. states and the District of Columbia, even though they are U.S. citizens. Now, as part of a settlement in a federal discrimination lawsuit Caban Gonzalez filed in July, the state has agreed to start treating applicants from Puerto Rico and other U.S. territories the same as those from U.S. states.”

-- New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo (D) said a Department of Homeland Security memo on immigrant driving records is proof the administration engaged in “politically motivated retaliation” meant to punish his state. From BuzzFeed News: “The Jan. 27 memo, written by a top DHS official, James McCament, outlined potential options for acting DHS Secretary Chad Wolf to consider in their efforts to not only obtain the driver records but to punish states like New York that cut off access to the information. McCament offered up options such as using ‘friendly’ states to discreetly collect information for federal immigration authorities that would otherwise be inaccessible by law. The plans also include retaliation measures against states that limit access to records, such as closing down local DHS offices, refusing to accept their state identification, cutting TSA PreCheck services, and potentially issuing subpoenas for driver's licenses provided to undocumented immigrants."

-- Federal Reserve Chairman Jerome Powell warned Congress that now would be a good time to reduce the federal budget deficit, which is expected to top $1 trillion this year. For now, Powell said he doesn't see signs of a recession on the horizon and said the economy is in a "very good place." He expects growth to remain solid, though he acknowledged the coronavirus remains a major unknown for the economy. (Heather Long)

-- The Federal Trade Commission will review past mergers by Facebook, Google and other Big Tech companies. Regulators said they would look into the mergers to see whether the acquisitions of smaller rivals may have skirted federal antitrust laws. (Tony Romm)

-- Denver voted to end its 30-year ban on pit bulls. A new law that permits but still regulates the ownership of these dogs will take effect in 90 days, pending approval from the mayor. (Katie Mettler)

-- A D.C. statehood bill will advance to the House floor and it's likely to pass for the first time in history. That said, the bill faces almost certain death in the Senate. (Jenna Portnoy)

-- The San Francisco Chronicle requested public documents on gun ownership. Now its reporters are getting death threats. (Hannah Knowles)

-- Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said the deadline to ratify the Equal Rights Amendment has expired. From CNN: “Ginsburg, a long-time supporter of the Equal Rights Amendment, suggested Monday night that the deadline to ratify the measure as a constitutional amendment has expired and that the decades long effort must start anew. ‘I would like to see a new beginning,’ Ginsburg told an audience at Georgetown University Law Center. ... Ginsburg's comments seemed to throw cold water on a recent effort by Virginia and other states who argue that after Virginia became the 38th state to ratify the amendment last month, the states had met the threshold necessary to change the Constitution. ... Ginsburg said ‘there is too much controversy about late comers,’ and she added that Virginia's move came ‘long after the deadline passed.’”

-- Actor Jussie Smollett was indicted on new charges of filing false hate crime reports last year after he claimed to be the victim of a bigoted attack in Chicago. Elahe Izadi and Travis Andrews report: “A grand jury indicted Smollett on six counts of disorderly conduct, charging him with filing false reports of a hate crime, according to documents filed Tuesday. The development came almost a year after prosecutors made the controversial decision to drop multiple felony counts against Smollett. In June, a judge ruled that Cook County State’s Attorney Kim Foxx mishandled the case and ordered a special prosecutor to investigate and to determine whether Smollett would be subject to new charges. Special prosecutor Dan K. Webb decided to prosecute after ‘the grand jury’s investigation revealed that Jussie Smollett planned and participated in a staged hate crime attack, and thereafter made numerous false statements to Chicago Police Department officers on multiple occasions, reporting a heinous hate crime that he, in fact, knew had not occurred.”

-- Longtime CNBC anchor Michelle Caruso-Cabrera launched a Democratic primary challenge against Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-N.Y.). About a dozen other candidates have filed to run for the seat, even though Ocasio-Cortez will be hard to beat. The freshman is a fundraising powerhouse, having raised over $5.3 million last year. (CNN)

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

Trump praised Barr this morning for allegedly intervening in Stone's sentencing:

Andrew Yang channeled Arnold Schwarzenegger a few hours after dropping out of the race:

Michael Bennet left the campaign with a message to New Hampshire:

Dave Weigel ✓
@daveweigel

Michael Bennet drops out of the race. "I love you, New Hampshire. Whether you knew it or not, we were having a great time together... I think it's fitting for us to end the campaign tonight."

♡ 432 1:34 AM - Feb 12, 2020

💬 136 people are talking about this

Here's a sobering statistic about Biden's electoral record:

David Dayen

@ddayen

Joe Biden has never finished higher than 4th in any primary or caucus in 32 years of running for president
twitter.com/thomaskaplan/s...

Thomas Kaplan  @thomaskaplan

Biden is now addressing his party via live stream

11.1K 2:09 AM - Feb 12, 2020

2,655 people are talking about this

Just as Sanders finished his victory speech in New Hampshire, the most powerful union in Nevada shared a candidate sheet with a not-so-favorable review of Medicare-for-all:

Gabriel DeBenedetti @gdebenedetti · 4h

the very, very powerful Culinary Union in Nevada just sent these handouts out to members. See under Sanders: "End Culinary Healthcare." Pretty clear signal >

DE WE WIN UN FAMILIES One. Two. Three NO VOTAMOS NOS GANAMOS Uno. Dos. Tre

RACIST PARTY PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES ON CULINARY UNION ISSUE

| NAME               | HEALTHCARE                        | WAGES/BENEFITS                    | PROFESSIONAL DEVELOPMENT          |
|--------------------|-----------------------------------|-----------------------------------|-----------------------------------|
| TRUMP       | ... (text partially obscured) ... | ... (text partially obscured) ... | ... (text partially obscured) ... |
| WELD        | ... (text partially obscured) ... | ... (text partially obscured) ... | ... (text partially obscured) ... |
| ANDERSON    | ... (text partially obscured) ... | ... (text partially obscured) ... | ... (text partially obscured) ... |
| DEBENEDETTI | ... (text partially obscured) ... | ... (text partially obscured) ... | ... (text partially obscured) ... |
| SANDERS     | ... (text partially obscured) ... | ... (text partially obscured) ... | ... (text partially obscured) ... |
| HAAS        | ... (text partially obscured) ... | ... (text partially obscured) ... | ... (text partially obscured) ... |
| PERAZA      | ... (text partially obscured) ... | ... (text partially obscured) ... | ... (text partially obscured) ... |

NOTING: FEBRUARY 15 - 18 CAMPAIGN DAY: SHIRAZI FEBRUARY 22

2 TURNOUT: DA DE LA ELECCION ELECTORAL FEBRUARY 22

Gabriel DeBenedetti

@gdebenedetti

when Sanders spoke to the Culinary Union members late last year, he was interrupted repeatedly by questions about how Medicare for All would hit their union-negotiated care. Big deal here in the next state to vote...

64 4:28 AM - Feb 12, 2020

24 people are talking about this

Trump reacted to the New Hampshire results:

The former acting attorney general, whom Trump fired in January 2017 when she refused to enforce his travel ban on predominantly Muslim countries, had this message for longtime DOJ staffers:

 Sally Yates ✓
@SallyQYates

To the career men and women of DOJ, you are both the backbone and the heart of the Department. Your noble dedication to the rule of law is the foundation of our republic. twitter.com/peteralexander...

Peter Alexander ✓ @PeterAlexander
BREAKING: Now, all four federal prosecutors on the Stone case have asked the judge to withdraw from the case.

Michael Marando joins the rest of his team including Aaron Zelinsky, Jonathan Kravis, and Adam Jed.

52.6K 11:39 PM - Feb 11, 2020

14.8K people are talking about this

From a former DOJ inspector general:

 Michael R. Bromwich ✓
@mrbromwich

Memo to all career DOJ employees

This is not what you signed up for. The four prosecutors who bailed on the Stone case have shown the way. Report all instances of improper political influence and other misdeeds to the DOJ IG, who is required to protect your identity.

32.1K 1:59 AM - Feb 12, 2020

10.4K people are talking about this

Trump criticized the federal judge overseeing Roger Stone's trial, and Hillary Clinton responded:

Hillary Clinton
@HillaryClinton

Do you realize intimidating judges is the behavior of failed-state fascists? Just asking!
twitter.com/realDonaldTrump...

Donald J. Trump
@realDonaldTrump

Is this the Judge that put Paul Manafort in SOLITARY CONFINEMENT, something that not even mobster Al Capone had to endure? How did she treat Crooked Hillary Clinton? Just asking! twitter.com/katiephang/sta...

77.2K 2:44 AM - Feb 12, 2020

21.9K people are talking about this

So did the speaker of the House:

Nancy Pelosi
@SpeakerPelosi

By tweet @realDonaldTrump engaged in political interference in the sentencing of Roger Stone. It is outrageous that DOJ has deeply damaged the rule of law by withdrawing its recommendation. Stepping down of prosecutors should be commended & actions of DOJ should be investigated.

64,6K 2:37 AM - Feb 12, 2020

26.8K people are talking about this

And the president seemed pretty proud of this discovery:

 Jeff Mason ✓
@jeffmason1

.@realDonaldTrump notes in the Oval Office proudly that Microsoft, Amazon, Google, Apple - companies that have the highest values in the stock market - spell, with their first letters, a familiar acronym: MAGA.

♡ 249 9:25 PM - Feb 11, 2020

💬 283 people are talking about this

VIDEOS OF THE DAY:

Siba, a standard poodle, won this year's Westminster Kennel Club

Dog Show:

Westminster dog show: Fluff, fun and fur-ocious competition

"Ahead of the final decision, the beautiful black dog beamed as she took one final lap around Madison Square Garden," writes Michael Brice-Saddler. "Siba performed masterfully Tuesday — even as the crowd urged judge Robert H. Slay to crown the golden retriever, a breed that has never been named best in show."

Reacting to the DOJ infighting, Stephen Colbert joked that the only difference between a banana republic and this situation is that Trump "doesn't eat fruit":

Gov. Gavin Newsom (D-Calif.) talked to Seth Meyers about the advice Trump gave him to fight fires:

Jimmy Kimmel talked to one of Trump's recently fired ambassadors:

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202

Privacy Policy | Help

---

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: New Hampshire primary results offer fresh evidence that Twitter is not real life
Date: Thursday, February 13, 2020 9:10:07 AM

Powered by LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Blue Cross Blue Shield Association

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

New Hampshire primary results offer fresh evidence that Twitter is not real life

CONCORD, N.H. – Just 11 percent of voters in the Democratic primary here on Tuesday said they regularly use Twitter for political news, according to the network exit poll.

This data point from New Hampshire offers the latest reminder of the degree to which the conversation on the social media platform tends to be different than what the vast majority of voters hear in their everyday lives. A growing body of research shows that the issues discussed on Twitter tend to be more esoteric than the pocketbook concerns that motivate most average voters.

This is especially important because so many media and political elites, including operatives on all the leading presidential campaigns, obsess over what's on Twitter, even if they try, or pretend, to ignore it. This, in turn, can indirectly influence both messaging from candidates and coverage decisions from editors. That creates an echo, or a feedback loop, that shapes public perceptions and sometimes distorts reality.

Election officials empty a ballot box on Tuesday in Londonderry, N.H. (Kate Flock/Bloomberg)

Interestingly, the New Hampshire exit poll did not find a giant chasm in support for Democratic candidates by Twitter usage, though Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) did better among Twitter users than non-users (31 percent vs. 27 percent). Former South Bend, Ind., mayor Pete Buttigieg and Sen. Amy Klobuchar (D-Minn.) both did slightly better, by about the same margin, among the 86 percent of New Hampshire voters who said they don't use Twitter than the 11 percent who said they do. This isn't to say Twitter is representative and we should pay more attention to it, but it does suggest that its users – at least the ones who voted in the Granite State – were not wildly unrepresentative.

The Pew Research Center found in October that 73 percent of tweets about national politics that Americans post come from just 6 percent of the adult population. The study found, perhaps unsurprisingly, that these super-tweeters are more polarized in terms of their ideological self-identification than those who tweet less often about the topic: 55 percent identified as either “very liberal” or “very conservative.” Among nonpolitical tweeters, only 28 percent picked those extremes. The research also found that political tweeters are far more likely to rate the political party they’re not a member of negatively.

A more recent Pew study concluded that Americans who get most of their political news on social media display significantly less confidence in the public’s acceptance of election results, regardless of the winner, than those who mostly get this news from more traditional platforms like cable TV or print newspapers.

The Hidden Tribes Project found last spring that liberal-leaning voters are, by a nearly 2 to 1 margin, more outspoken on social media than more moderate, diverse and less-educated Democrats. People in those three categories are generally less likely to post political content online. The year-long project, an initiative of a group called More in Common, built a nonpartisan representative sample of 8,000 Americans on YouGov. The Upshot, a New York Times vertical, used this data to create some cool visualizations last April comparing Democrats in “real life” to Democrats on Twitter.

Around this time four years ago, The Washington Post and ABC News teamed up with MIT’s Laboratory for Social Machines to analyze the Twitter conversation during the same days that we were in the field with a national poll. Among the most striking differences was that foreign policy and racial issues played a far bigger role in the Twitter ecosystem while people outside of the hive focused more on the economy. It’s also worth noting Twitter was also aggressively targeted with disinformation by the Russians during the 2016 election.

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost's essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Content from Blue Cross Blue Shield Association

Addressing the need for more affordable medicines

Americans pay too much for prescription drugs. Even generics can be too expensive. So we're investing in a non-profit company to produce the drugs people need at a price they can afford. Learn more.

---

A national poll that the center-left think tank Third Way commissioned from David Binder, an in-house pollster for Barack Obama's 2008 and 2012 campaigns, found last May that only 12 percent of likely Democratic primary voters in 2020 posted on Twitter every day. Binder's survey found that Democrats who frequently use Twitter were typically 25 points to the left on issues like Medicare-for-all. The survey found that 64 percent of Democratic super-tweeters supported abolishing Immigration and Customs Enforcement, but just 29 percent of all likely primary voters did.

“One pervasive problem of this campaign cycle is the fun-house mirror effect of Twitter on the minds of political reporters, commentators and insiders,” said Third Way co-founder Matt

Bennett, an alumnus of Bill Clinton's White House. "That means the discussion that too many insiders rely on for their view of the state of the race is dominated by a tiny fraction of the most hyper-engaged of Democratic voters," he added. "Those voters have lives and views that are very different than Democrats who don't regularly post on Twitter.

Twitter Democrats are younger, more urban, more male and a majority identify as 'democratic socialists.' And they are more doctrinaire, with many wanting the party to move left and preferring their policy ideas over the ability to beat Trump. These are the voters that the purveyors of conventional wisdom interact with, so it's no surprise that they were surprised that moderates collectively did so well in Iowa and New Hampshire."

A new look!

We're stoked to spruce up the Daily 202 as the 2020 campaign heats up. The goal of this redesign is to improve your experience as a reader. As always, we'd love feedback. You can reach me directly at James.Hohmann@washpost.com. And we've created an online form to share what you like or dislike for the designers, developers and engineers who have made this happen. (It's available here.)

The tweeter-in-chief

"President Trump apparently has a thing for @SexCounseling," Anne Gearan and Josh Dawsey observe. "Trump has recently retweeted posts from a California sex therapist, Dawn Michael, whose professional Twitter home is a mix of pro-Trump material and, well, other things. The three retweets since January are emblematic of the president's habit of amplifying online praise from random or troublesome corners of the Internet. ... So far in February, Trump's retweets are outpacing his original tweets by about 2 to 1, topping 265 on Wednesday and including commentary from the likes of @HiredGun37 and @heelerhoney alongside Republican lawmakers, right-wing media figures, journalists, his sons and his campaign manager. In the same period a year ago, Trump appears to have included only 21 retweets among 92 Twitter postings ...

“Early in his presidency, Trump would post tweets but rarely responded or looked to Twitter for information. ... But it became ‘both an entrance and an exit’ in 2018 as he would, on his own, dive through his replies to see who was praising him.

An aide said Trump has sometimes been taken aback by backlash to his retweets. Often, a string of retweets is not some grand statement — it’s just Trump scrolling and clicking, people close to the president said. ‘If he sees it and it’s positive about him, he just posts it,’ the administration official said. ‘It would never dawn on him to check and see who the person is.’

“Trump has mused to aides that he can mix it up on Twitter more than in real life — and ‘kind of just see how it goes,’ a former senior administration official said. ... He has retweeted official Republican accounts alongside @RedPillReport, which posts pro-Trump material and conservative views that are sometimes racially tinged or sexually suggestive. ... Trump has sometimes retweeted posts from accounts that were later suspended, or accounts that said they were associated with the Q-Anon conspiracy group.”

The worsening local news crisis

McClatchy, one of the nation’s largest newspaper publishers, filed for bankruptcy protection this morning. “The Chapter 11 filing will allow the Sacramento-based company to keep its 30 newspapers afloat while it reorganizes more than $700 million in debt, 60 percent of which would be eliminated,” Taylor Telford and Thomas Heath report. “If the plan wins court approval, control of the 163-year-old family publisher would be turned over to hedge fund Chatham Asset Management, its largest creditor. ... The publisher of the Miami Herald, Kansas City Star and other regional dailies has been saddled with debt since its $4.5 billion takeover of a much bigger rival, Knight Ridder, in 2006. The combination coincided with a digital boom that disrupted the prevailing business model and changed the way news is consumed.”

The filing foreshadows even harder times to come for the local papers that people depend on to know what’s happening in city

hall or at the schools their children attend. About 20 percent of all U.S. newspapers have closed since 2004, according to a report from PEN America, and the sector has shed 47 percent of its jobs. “Today, there are 225 counties across the country without a newspaper,” per Taylor and Thomas. “Half of all U.S. counties — more than 1,520 — have just one, usually a weekly. Of the nation’s remaining 7,200 newspapers, at least 1,000 are ‘ghost papers’ — meaning they have been so hobbled by cutbacks that they produce little original reporting.”

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

More on 2020

Usually the early Democratic presidential contests shrink the field. This year, they've expanded it.

“So far, the way candidates have gained traction has been to attract a narrow slice of the electorate. [Elizabeth] Warren spent the past several weeks attempting to cast herself as a unity candidate and saw herself overtaken by Sanders, who made a forthright appeal to liberals, a more defined niche," Matt Viser and Annie Linskey report. "Sanders on Wednesday didn't appear to be attempting to expand his ideological reach. When asked if there are any lessons in the fact that he and Warren received fewer votes than moderates in the party, campaign co-chairwoman Nina Turner was blunt. 'The lesson to be learned,' she said on CNN, 'is he won.'

“Sanders already is tussling with the Culinary Union, the largest union in Nevada and one whose members, mostly Latino and female, typically play a major role in the caucuses. The union on Tuesday distributed fliers criticizing his Medicare-for-all plan, saying it would dilute the health-care plans that it has bargained for in negotiations. The Sanders campaign countered with a statement noting he had joined unions on picket lines and saying his plan 'is as comprehensive or more so than the health care benefits union workers currently receive.' But later in the day, the union — which has yet to make a coveted endorsement — escalated the feud by releasing a statement criticizing his supporters, who it claimed had been critical of the union and its officials on Twitter and in phone calls. ...

“Buttigieg is doubling his Nevada staff, and his South Carolina team has swelled to 55 people. He announced the endorsement of J.A. Moore (D), a South Carolina state representative who had previously backed Sen. Kamala D. Harris (D-Calif.). Buttigieg also has the support of Walter Clyburn Reed, the grandson of South Carolina kingmaker Rep. James E. Clyburn (D), who has not endorsed a presidential candidate. Klobuchar — who raised as much in the three hours after polls closed Tuesday as her monthly average last year — has rolled out a seven-figure ad buy in Nevada and plans to arrive in the state on Thursday.” Warren has canceled television ad reservations in Nevada and South Carolina starting next week.

From his home in Delaware, Joe Biden and two of his top advisers asked donors on an afternoon conference call to be patient: “They said the race was just beginning, noting a fact in which the campaign has been taking solace over the past few days: Bill Clinton won only one of the first 11 contests in 1992 before claiming the nomination. ... Biden has several fundraisers scheduled for Thursday in New York, as well as one next week in Los Angeles ...

“Biden’s campaign is hoping to regroup in Nevada, and amid a shake-up of its advisers has brought in a prominent Democratic consultant to help. Jen O’Malley Dillon, a top Obama campaign aide who ran the presidential campaign of former congressman Beto O’Rourke (D-Tex.) before he dropped out, is working on a volunteer basis. But some Biden advisers say privately they are hoping for even a third-place finish in the state and that his organization is unlikely to match that of his rivals in the caucus state.” Looming over South Carolina is billionaire Tom Steyer, who has spent freely to woo black voters who previously backed Biden.

Both Steyer and Sanders received endorsements from

state lawmakers on their campaign payrolls.

“Sanders was honored to have been endorsed for the Democratic nomination by seven black members of the South Carolina legislature, he announced in a tweet. One of the lawmakers, records show, owned a company that was already being paid by the Sanders campaign. Another would soon be added to the payroll as a vendor,” the New York Times reports. “By the end of 2019, consulting companies operated by the two lawmakers ... had collected a combined total of almost $150,000 from Mr. Sanders’s presidential effort. ... Federal Election Commission records showed that the Steyer campaign had paid [South Carolina Legislative Black Caucuse head Jerry] Govan more than $40,000 since September, when Mr. Govan endorsed Mr. Steyer. The payments to a company associated with Mr. Govan, Govan Agency L.L.C., were for ‘community building services.’”

Iowa Democratic Party chairman Troy Price said he will step down as soon as a replacement can be found.

“The fact is that Democrats deserved better than what happened on caucus night,” the 39-year-old said in a letter to the state party’s central committee. “As chair of this party, I am deeply sorry for what happened and bear the responsibility for any failures on behalf of the Iowa Democratic Party.”

“The Associated Press still has not called the race because of the lingering uncertainties,” Isaac Stanley-Becker notes. “This year’s event, which Price once promised would be ‘the most successful caucuses in our party’s history,’ instead became a punchline, ridiculed by comedian Steve Martin at the Oscars ... Now, it’s not even clear if Iowa can hold on to its first-in-the-nation status.”

Rush Limbaugh said Trump would “have fun” with Buttigieg’s sexuality in a general election.

“A gay guy, 37 years old, loves kissing his husband on debate stages. Can you see Trump have fun with that?” said the conservative radio host. Trump awarded him the Presidential Medal of Freedom, the highest honor available for a civilian, during last week's State of the Union. (Daily Beast)

Bloomberg buzz, along with scrutiny, continues to grow.

At the height of the 2008 economic collapse, the then-New York mayor blamed the elimination of the discriminatory housing practice known as “redlining” for instigating the meltdown, the AP notes.

Bloomberg has been picking up some key endorsements.

Houston Mayor Sylvester Turner, Congressional Black Caucus members Reps. Lucy McBath (Ga.), Gregory Meeks (N.Y.) and Stacey Plaskett (Virgin Islands) and former North Carolina governor Bev Perdue have all announced their backing of the former mayor. Turner plans to help launch Bloomberg’s newest initiative – Mike for Black America – a move that comes days after an audio recording of Bloomberg defending “stop and frisk” policies in 2015 was made public. (CBS News)

Bloomberg’s campaign is also pushing sponsored content across popular Instagram meme pages. (NYT)

---

The Trump presidency

John Kelly laid out his misgivings with Trump.

Speaking last night at Drew University in New Jersey, the former White House chief of staff defended Army Lt. Col. Alexander Vindman, the ousted National Security Council aide who testified against Trump during the impeachment inquiry and has been ejected from the White House. “Kelly, a retired Marine Corps general, said that Vindman is blameless and simply followed the training he’d received as a soldier, migrants are ‘overwhelmingly good people’ and ‘not all rapists’; and Trump’s decision to condition military aid to Ukraine on an investigation into [Biden] upended longstanding U.S. policy,” Peter

Nicholas reports in the Atlantic. “Vindman was rightly disturbed by Trump’s phone call to Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelensky in July, Kelly suggested. Having seen something ‘questionable,’ Vindman properly notified his superiors, Kelly said. ... ‘He did exactly what we teach them to do from cradle to grave,’ Kelly told the audience at the Mayo Performing Arts Center. ‘He went and told his boss what he just heard.’ ...

“Responding to questions from the audience, Kelly faulted Trump for intervening in the case of Eddie Gallagher, a Navy Seal who was convicted last year of posing with the corpse of an ISIS fighter. Trump reversed a Navy decision to oust Gallagher, in a chain of events that led to the resignation of Navy Secretary Richard Spencer. ‘The idea that the commander-in-chief intervened there, in my opinion, was exactly the wrong thing to do,’ Kelly said. ‘Had I been there, I think I could have prevented it.’ The audience applauded. When a woman in the crowd said that Trump had ‘elevated’ Gallagher, Kelly looked out at the crowd. ‘Yep,’ he said.”

Trump seeks to bend the executive branch as part of his impeachment vendetta.

“In the span of 48 hours this week, the president has sought to protect his friends and punish his foes, even at the risk of compromising the Justice Department’s independence and integrity — a stance that his defenders see as entirely justified,” Philip Rucker, Robert Costa and Josh Dawsey report. “Trump complained publicly about federal prosecutors’ recommended prison sentence for [Roger Stone]. ... Next Trump sought to intimidate the federal judge in the Stone case, badgering her on Twitter for previous rulings ... Then Trump floated the possibility of a presidential pardon for Stone...

“Some of Trump’s top aides have counseled him against speaking out on legal matters, warning him that doing so could wrongly influence proceedings because officials at the Justice Department or elsewhere would then know they needed to please him or risk his wrath. Trump has often responded, ‘I have a right to say whatever I want,’ according to a former senior administration official ... Trump insisted Wednesday that he did nothing improper in the Stone case. ‘I didn’t speak to them, by the way, just so you understand,’ the president told reporters, referring to Justice Department officials. ‘They saw the horribleness.’ ... Still, a chorus of former U.S. attorneys and former Justice Department leaders condemned Trump for what they consider improper political pressure in a criminal prosecution.”

---

Quote of the day

“He’s trying to delegitimize anyone appointed by someone other than him and say that the only people who can be trusted are Trump judges,” retired federal judge Nancy Gertner said of Trump’s attacks on Judge Amy Berman Jackson, who will determine Stone’s sentence. (Ann Marimow)

Bill Barr faces growing scrutiny over his intervention in the Stone case.

Trump put the attorney general squarely in the middle of the controversy over the Justice Department’s reduced sentencing recommendation for the president’s longtime friend, as he publicly praised Barr for seizing command of the case from career prosecutors. “A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment on the president’s statements,” Matt Zapposky and Devlin Barrett report. “Some current and former Justice Department officials have long feared that Barr is willing to risk the institution’s historic independence to serve an irascible president. The top Democrat in the Senate called for the Justice Department inspector general to investigate the Stone episode, and the House Judiciary Committee announced Wednesday it would have Barr testify March 31 to address that case and other recent incidents that it said ‘raise grave questions’ about Barr’s leadership.”

Even Barr’s former boss criticized him.

“With Bill Barr, on an amazing number of occasions ... you can be almost 100 percent certain that there’s something improper going on,” Donald Ayer, the deputy attorney general under George H.W. Bush, told Politico.

To career federal prosecutors across the country, Barr's meddling raises fears that the worst is yet to come.

“Until now, according to conversations with more than a dozen career lawyers in some of the 93 U.S. attorney’s offices, they had watched other divisions in the Justice Department execute significant shifts in response to Mr. Trump while the work of prosecuting crimes was largely unaffected by the politics of the moment,” the Times reports. “Now career prosecutors said they worried they might face more pressure.”

More resignations could still come.

CNN reports that additional prosecutors who work in the U.S. attorney’s office for the District of Columbia have discussed resigning in the coming days over the Stone imbroglio.

Congressional Republicans showed no signs that they would move to check Trump in this case.

“It doesn’t bother me at all, as long as the judge has the final decision,” said Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), the former Senate Judiciary Committee chairman who sharply criticized the Obama administration for alleged politicization of the Justice Department.

This left Democrats “largely alone to fume about the evaporation of another norm of American governance,” Mike DeBonis reports. “Sen. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio) seized on the demise of the nomination of Jessie K. Liu to serve as undersecretary of the Treasury Department for terrorism and financial crimes as proof that Trump is ‘on a retribution tour.’”

The Senate, though, is primed to pass a measure that would restrict Trump's ability to start a war with Iran.

“Eight Republicans voted Wednesday to advance legislation invoking

Congress's war powers, a move intended to prevent the president from engaging in hostilities against Tehran without explicit authorization from the legislative branch — except in cases of clear self-defense," Karoun Demirjian reports. "The vote reflects the frustration with Trump's decision to kill a top Iranian commander, Qasem Soleimani, without first consulting lawmakers ... 'No president has the authority to commit our military to a sustained conflict,' Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) told reporters, reiterating her support for the measure.

“Collins joined Sens. Rand Paul (Ky.), Mike Lee (Utah) and Todd C. Young (Ind.) as the earliest Republicans to commit their support to the measure drafted by Sen. Tim Kaine (D-Va.).

They did so only after Kaine agreed to strike references to Trump that appeared in his original draft. But the legislation — which, as a war powers measure, was guaranteed a vote — languished for the past several weeks while the Senate was singularly focused on Trump's impeachment trial. In that time, additional Republicans have indicated they'll back the resolution, including Sen. Jerry Moran (R-Kan.). Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), Bill Cassidy (R-La.) and Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) also voted to advance the legislation on Wednesday; it is not yet clear if all three will back the resolution on its final vote. Even with their support, however, the legislation will still lack the votes to overcome a near-guaranteed veto.”

While tensions have cooled for the moment, the Pentagon is still feeling out whether Iran will retaliate again, and how. In the standoff with Tehran after Soleimani was killed, U.S. sailors said the threat level was unlike anything they'd seen. “I have spent 26 years in this Navy not hoping for war, but preparing for war so that we can keep our nation safe,” Navy Capt. Christopher D. Stone told Dan Lamothe in an interview aboard the Normandy, his warship, near the Persian Gulf. “I would say overwhelmingly, the response I saw was a crew that was very focused.”

Trump ally Jim Jordan accused of “begging” a former Ohio State wrestler not to validate reports of sexual ## abuse.

The Ohio Republican congressman allegedly asked the wrestler not to corroborate accounts made against the university's wrestling team doctor that occurred while he was a coach, Colby Itkowitz reports: “Adam DiSabato — the brother of Mike DiSabato, the whistleblower who exposed the abuse by Richard Strauss — testified Wednesday during a public hearing in the state legislature that when the story came out in July 2018, he received a phone call from a tearful Jordan. ‘[He] called me crying, crying, groveling, on the Fourth of July, begging me to go against my brother, begging me, crying for half an hour,’ Adam DiSabato said, according to video of his testimony. ... Jordan’s spokesman said DiSabato’s account was untrue. ‘Another lie,’ said Ian Fury, Jordan’s communications director. ‘Congressman Jordan never saw or heard of any abuse, and if he had, he would have dealt with it.’”

House Democrats asked the Secret Service for details about payments to Trump’s company.

This request came after David Fahrenthold and Jonathan O’Connell revealed that the agency had been charged as much as $650 per night for a room at Trump’s clubs, where agents go to protect the president.

---

The coronavirus crisis

The number of cases jumped dramatically after China expanded its diagnostic criteria.

The official death toll of the virus – now known as covid-19 – has risen to roughly 1,360, nearly all in China. The total confirmed cases worldwide surpassed 60,000. “China’s Hubei province, the epicenter of the outbreak, reported an uptick of 14,840 confirmed coronavirus cases Thursday as health officials expanded the type of cases that it includes in its count,” Marisa Iati and Gerry Shih report. “China’s state-run Xinhua News Agency announced Thursday that national health authorities issued revised guidelines to consider ‘clinically diagnosed’ coronavirus cases in the confirmed total. Chinese officials previously only counted cases confirmed by nucleic acid tests, which critics said were faulty and greatly underestimated the true magnitude of the epidemic. ... The dramatic jump in cases in Hubei essentially confirms longtime suspicions that China was for weeks vastly undercounting cases of the virus.” A death announced in Japan this morning became the second fatality from the disease reported outside China.

Most cases are actually mild, which is good news, but this complicates the response.

“So far, about 82 percent of the cases — including all 14 in the United States — have been mild, with symptoms that require little or no medical intervention. And that proportion may be an undercount. Health authorities managing the outbreak are trying to understand what that critical fact portends, Lenny Bernstein and Carolyn Johnson report. “The fact that there are so many mild cases is a real hallmark of this disease and makes it so different from SARS,’ said Jennifer Nuzzo, an epidemiologist at the Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health’s Center for Health Security. ‘It’s also really challenging. Most of our surveillance is oriented around finding people who require medical intervention.’”

The CDC has found no coronavirus cases since airport screening began a month ago.

More than 30,000 travelers from China have been screened, and no confirmed cases have been identified, per Lena Sun.

As a precaution, though, United Airlines extended its suspension of flights to China until April 24. “Overall, international flights to China have fallen by 67 percent since Jan. 30,” per Miriam Berger.

China’s Uighur Muslim minority fears the virus will spread to the camps where they’re being held.

Chinese state media give no major cause for concern that the outbreak will reach the northeastern region of Xinjiang where the Uighurs live, since it’s far from the epicenter. Still, AFP reports, representatives of the diaspora worry that, because the virus spreads from person to person through sneezing or coughing, the confinement of large groups of people could cause an outbreak.

China’s Communist Party ousted two high-level officials in Hubei province, the center of the outbreak.

The ruling party fired Jiang Chaoliang, a former banker who had been party secretary of Hubei province since 2016, and Ma Guoqiang, the party boss overseeing Wuhan, as the country’s leadership looks to tighten control over its epidemic response. (Gerry Shih)

Most workers in China were supposed to get back to work this week. But business is not as usual in Beijing.

“Worried about the toll the epidemic will take on China’s growth rate, which the government has been toiling to keep at 6 percent, officials have told businesses across the country to return to work,” Anna Fifield reports. “But in the capital Beijing, a city of 22 million people that has 352 confirmed cases of coronavirus, the streets and office buildings and stores were remarkably empty Wednesday. Sanlitun, a glitzy shopping area usually jampacked with people at lunchtime, was a concrete wasteland. The Apple store was closed. Uniqlo and Starbucks each had only one door open, and staff were constantly disinfecting the handle. The H&M was as empty as Gucci in a recession.”

---

Social media speed read

Marie Yovanovitch, the ousted U.S. ambassador to Ukraine who allegedly lost her job because of Rudy Giuliani's pressure campaign, still encourages students to join the Foreign Service:

Julia Ioffe  @juliaioffe · 8h

Marie Yovanovitch gets a loooooong standing ovation at the Georgetown School of Foreign Service

Julia Ioffe  @juliaioffe

Yovanovitch, addressing the students at the Georgetown School of Foreign Service: "To those of you who haven't *yet* decided to go to work for the American people, I hope tonight I can convince you."

Even after all of that, she's encouraging young people to become diplomats.

 3,636 10:11 PM - Feb 12, 2020

 687 people are talking about this

A group of migrant families with sick children asked for asylum at the U.S.-Mexico border under a medical exemption:

Zolan Kanno-Youngs
@KannoYoungs

They were denied entry and told to return to Matamoros.
twitter.com/kannoyoungs/st...

Zolan Kanno-Youngs  @KannoYoungs

Migrant families wait to see if they will be admitted into the US. One child has epilepsy, another autism and one has lissencephaly. Lawyers here are arguing they should have qualified for the medical exemption of MPP. Instead they've waited in Matamoros for months.

♥ 9 12:07 AM - Feb 13, 2020

 See Zolan Kanno-Youngs's other Tweets

The president telephoned the Republican challenger to Michigan Sen. Gary Peters (D), a reflection of how important the Wolverine State is in 2020:

John James ✓

@JohnjamesMI

The President of the United States of America just called to wish MY SON a happy birthday! 🥳

Thank you for the well wishes @realdonaldtrump! I look forward to continued conversation!

♥ 22.6K 1:10 AM - Feb 13, 2020

💬 4,941 people are talking about this

An editor at the Cook Political Report pointed out that moderates, not Sanders supporters, drove the rise in New Hampshire turnout:

Dave Wasserman

@Redistrict

By my calc, NH Dem turnout (vs. '16) in towns won by...

Buttigieg: +26.5%

Klobuchar: +25.2%

Sanders: +12.0%

Takeaway: most of Dems' turnout increase was attributable to Kasich/Rubio types crossing over from '16 GOP primary - not heightened progressive/Sanders base enthusiasm.

4,010 9:42 PM - Feb 12, 2020

1,617 people are talking about this

An Afghan karate coach's dog was shot dead by a group of men who told her a woman couldn't own a dog. She is now planning on fleeing the country, per the BBC:

Khaama Press (KP) ✓

@khaama

ورزش کار افغان پس از قتل سگش توسط تفنگداران ناشناس، کشور
را برای همیشه ترک میکند... khaama.com/persian/archiv...

♥ 27 1:54 PM - Feb 9, 2020

See Khaama Press \(KP\)'s other Tweets

Videos of the day

Our Max Bearak traveled to southern Ethiopia, which is facing its worst locust outbreak in generations after an uncommon weather pattern in the Indian Ocean caused relentless rains across East Africa:

Stephen Colbert took a look at the remaining Democratic candidates:

Seth Meyers thinks Trump's actions this week have shown that the stakes for the Democratic race couldn't be higher:

And Samantha Bee said the president is on a “revenge tour”:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Must Reads for a curated selection of our best journalism in your inbox every Saturday, plus a peek behind the scenes into how one story came together. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: New Hampshire primary results offer fresh evidence that Twitter is not real life
Date: Thursday, February 13, 2020 9:10:30 AM

Powered by LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Blue Cross Blue Shield Association

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

New Hampshire primary results offer fresh evidence that Twitter is not real life

CONCORD, N.H. – Just 11 percent of voters in the Democratic primary here on Tuesday said they regularly use Twitter for political news, according to the network exit poll.

This data point from New Hampshire offers the latest reminder of the degree to which the conversation on the social media platform tends to be different than what the vast majority of voters hear in their everyday lives. A growing body of research shows that the issues discussed on Twitter tend to be more esoteric than the pocketbook concerns that motivate most average voters.

This is especially important because so many media and political elites, including operatives on all the leading presidential campaigns, obsess over what's on Twitter, even if they try, or pretend, to ignore it. This, in turn, can indirectly influence both messaging from candidates and coverage decisions from editors. That creates an echo, or a feedback loop, that shapes public perceptions and sometimes distorts reality.

Election officials empty a ballot box on Tuesday in Londonderry, N.H. (Kate Flock/Bloomberg)

Interestingly, the New Hampshire exit poll did not find a giant chasm in support for Democratic candidates by Twitter usage, though Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) did better among Twitter users than non-users (31 percent vs. 27 percent). Former South Bend, Ind., mayor Pete Buttigieg and Sen. Amy Klobuchar (D-Minn.) both did slightly better, by about the same margin, among the 86 percent of New Hampshire voters who said they don't use Twitter than the 11 percent who said they do. This isn't to say Twitter is representative and we should pay more attention to it, but it does suggest that its users – at least the ones who voted in the Granite State – were not wildly unrepresentative.

The Pew Research Center found in October that 73 percent of tweets about national politics that Americans post come from just 6 percent of the adult population. The study found, perhaps unsurprisingly, that these super-tweeters are more polarized in terms of their ideological self-identification than those who tweet less often about the topic: 55 percent identified as either “very liberal” or “very conservative.” Among nonpolitical tweeters, only 28 percent picked those extremes. The research also found that political tweeters are far more likely to rate the political party they’re not a member of negatively.

A more recent Pew study concluded that Americans who get most of their political news on social media display significantly less confidence in the public’s acceptance of election results, regardless of the winner, than those who mostly get this news from more traditional platforms like cable TV or print newspapers.

The Hidden Tribes Project found last spring that liberal-leaning voters are, by a nearly 2 to 1 margin, more outspoken on social media than more moderate, diverse and less-educated Democrats. People in those three categories are generally less likely to post political content online. The year-long project, an initiative of a group called More in Common, built a nonpartisan representative sample of 8,000 Americans on YouGov. The Upshot, a New York Times vertical, used this data to create some cool visualizations last April comparing Democrats in “real life” to Democrats on Twitter.

Around this time four years ago, The Washington Post and ABC News teamed up with MIT’s Laboratory for Social Machines to analyze the Twitter conversation during the same days that we were in the field with a national poll. Among the most striking differences was that foreign policy and racial issues played a far bigger role in the Twitter ecosystem while people outside of the hive focused more on the economy. It’s also worth noting Twitter was also aggressively targeted with disinformation by the Russians during the 2016 election.

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost's essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Content from Blue Cross Blue Shield Association

Addressing the need for more affordable medicines

Americans pay too much for prescription drugs. Even generics can be too expensive. So we're investing in a non-profit company to produce the drugs people need at a price they can afford. Learn more.

---

A national poll that the center-left think tank Third Way commissioned from David Binder, an in-house pollster for Barack Obama's 2008 and 2012 campaigns, found last May that only 12 percent of likely Democratic primary voters in 2020 posted on Twitter every day. Binder's survey found that Democrats who frequently use Twitter were typically 25 points to the left on issues like Medicare-for-all. The survey found that 64 percent of Democratic super-tweeters supported abolishing Immigration and Customs Enforcement, but just 29 percent of all likely primary voters did.

“One pervasive problem of this campaign cycle is the fun-house mirror effect of Twitter on the minds of political reporters, commentators and insiders,” said Third Way co-founder Matt

Bennett, an alumnus of Bill Clinton's White House. "That means the discussion that too many insiders rely on for their view of the state of the race is dominated by a tiny fraction of the most hyper-engaged of Democratic voters," he added. "Those voters have lives and views that are very different than Democrats who don't regularly post on Twitter.

Twitter Democrats are younger, more urban, more male and a majority identify as 'democratic socialists.' And they are more doctrinaire, with many wanting the party to move left and preferring their policy ideas over the ability to beat Trump. These are the voters that the purveyors of conventional wisdom interact with, so it's no surprise that they were surprised that moderates collectively did so well in Iowa and New Hampshire."

A new look!

We're stoked to spruce up the Daily 202 as the 2020 campaign heats up. The goal of this redesign is to improve your experience as a reader. As always, we'd love feedback. You can reach me directly at James.Hohmann@washpost.com. And we've created an online form to share what you like or dislike for the designers, developers and engineers who have made this happen. (It's available here.)

The tweeter-in-chief

"President Trump apparently has a thing for @SexCounseling," Anne Gearan and Josh Dawsey observe. "Trump has recently retweeted posts from a California sex therapist, Dawn Michael, whose professional Twitter home is a mix of pro-Trump material and, well, other things. The three retweets since January are emblematic of the president's habit of amplifying online praise from random or troublesome corners of the Internet. ... So far in February, Trump's retweets are outpacing his original tweets by about 2 to 1, topping 265 on Wednesday and including commentary from the likes of @HiredGun37 and @heelerhoney alongside Republican lawmakers, right-wing media figures, journalists, his sons and his campaign manager. In the same period a year ago, Trump appears to have included only 21 retweets among 92 Twitter postings ...

“Early in his presidency, Trump would post tweets but rarely responded or looked to Twitter for information. ... But it became ‘both an entrance and an exit’ in 2018 as he would, on his own, dive through his replies to see who was praising him.

An aide said Trump has sometimes been taken aback by backlash to his retweets. Often, a string of retweets is not some grand statement — it’s just Trump scrolling and clicking, people close to the president said. ‘If he sees it and it’s positive about him, he just posts it,’ the administration official said. ‘It would never dawn on him to check and see who the person is.’

“Trump has mused to aides that he can mix it up on Twitter more than in real life — and ‘kind of just see how it goes,’ a former senior administration official said. ... He has retweeted official Republican accounts alongside @RedPillReport, which posts pro-Trump material and conservative views that are sometimes racially tinged or sexually suggestive. ... Trump has sometimes retweeted posts from accounts that were later suspended, or accounts that said they were associated with the Q-Anon conspiracy group.”

The worsening local news crisis

McClatchy, one of the nation’s largest newspaper publishers, filed for bankruptcy protection this morning. “The Chapter 11 filing will allow the Sacramento-based company to keep its 30 newspapers afloat while it reorganizes more than $700 million in debt, 60 percent of which would be eliminated,” Taylor Telford and Thomas Heath report. “If the plan wins court approval, control of the 163-year-old family publisher would be turned over to hedge fund Chatham Asset Management, its largest creditor. ... The publisher of the Miami Herald, Kansas City Star and other regional dailies has been saddled with debt since its $4.5 billion takeover of a much bigger rival, Knight Ridder, in 2006. The combination coincided with a digital boom that disrupted the prevailing business model and changed the way news is consumed.”

The filing foreshadows even harder times to come for the local papers that people depend on to know what’s happening in city

hall or at the schools their children attend. About 20 percent of all U.S. newspapers have closed since 2004, according to a report from PEN America, and the sector has shed 47 percent of its jobs. “Today, there are 225 counties across the country without a newspaper,” per Taylor and Thomas. “Half of all U.S. counties — more than 1,520 — have just one, usually a weekly. Of the nation’s remaining 7,200 newspapers, at least 1,000 are ‘ghost papers’ — meaning they have been so hobbled by cutbacks that they produce little original reporting.”

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

More on 2020

Usually the early Democratic presidential contests shrink the field. This year, they've expanded it.

“So far, the way candidates have gained traction has been to attract a narrow slice of the electorate. [Elizabeth] Warren spent the past several weeks attempting to cast herself as a unity candidate and saw herself overtaken by Sanders, who made a forthright appeal to liberals, a more defined niche," Matt Viser and Annie Linskey report. "Sanders on Wednesday didn't appear to be attempting to expand his ideological reach. When asked if there are any lessons in the fact that he and Warren received fewer votes than moderates in the party, campaign co-chairwoman Nina Turner was blunt. 'The lesson to be learned,' she said on CNN, 'is he won.'

“Sanders already is tussling with the Culinary Union, the largest union in Nevada and one whose members, mostly Latino and female, typically play a major role in the caucuses. The union on Tuesday distributed fliers criticizing his Medicare-for-all plan, saying it would dilute the health-care plans that it has bargained for in negotiations. The Sanders campaign countered with a statement noting he had joined unions on picket lines and saying his plan 'is as comprehensive or more so than the health care benefits union workers currently receive.' But later in the day, the union — which has yet to make a coveted endorsement — escalated the feud by releasing a statement criticizing his supporters, who it claimed had been critical of the union and its officials on Twitter and in phone calls. ...

“Buttigieg is doubling his Nevada staff, and his South Carolina team has swelled to 55 people. He announced the endorsement of J.A. Moore (D), a South Carolina state representative who had previously backed Sen. Kamala D. Harris (D-Calif.). Buttigieg also has the support of Walter Clyburn Reed, the grandson of South Carolina kingmaker Rep. James E. Clyburn (D), who has not endorsed a presidential candidate. Klobuchar — who raised as much in the three hours after polls closed Tuesday as her monthly average last year — has rolled out a seven-figure ad buy in Nevada and plans to arrive in the state on Thursday.” Warren has canceled television ad reservations in Nevada and South Carolina starting next week.

From his home in Delaware, Joe Biden and two of his top advisers asked donors on an afternoon conference call to be patient: “They said the race was just beginning, noting a fact in which the campaign has been taking solace over the past few days: Bill Clinton won only one of the first 11 contests in 1992 before claiming the nomination. ... Biden has several fundraisers scheduled for Thursday in New York, as well as one next week in Los Angeles ...

“Biden’s campaign is hoping to regroup in Nevada, and amid a shake-up of its advisers has brought in a prominent Democratic consultant to help. Jen O’Malley Dillon, a top Obama campaign aide who ran the presidential campaign of former congressman Beto O’Rourke (D-Tex.) before he dropped out, is working on a volunteer basis. But some Biden advisers say privately they are hoping for even a third-place finish in the state and that his organization is unlikely to match that of his rivals in the caucus state.” Looming over South Carolina is billionaire Tom Steyer, who has spent freely to woo black voters who previously backed Biden.

Both Steyer and Sanders received endorsements from

state lawmakers on their campaign payrolls.

“Sanders was honored to have been endorsed for the Democratic nomination by seven black members of the South Carolina legislature, he announced in a tweet. One of the lawmakers, records show, owned a company that was already being paid by the Sanders campaign. Another would soon be added to the payroll as a vendor,” the New York Times reports. “By the end of 2019, consulting companies operated by the two lawmakers ... had collected a combined total of almost $150,000 from Mr. Sanders’s presidential effort. ... Federal Election Commission records showed that the Steyer campaign had paid [South Carolina Legislative Black Caucuse head Jerry] Govan more than $40,000 since September, when Mr. Govan endorsed Mr. Steyer. The payments to a company associated with Mr. Govan, Govan Agency L.L.C., were for ‘community building services.’”

Iowa Democratic Party chairman Troy Price said he will step down as soon as a replacement can be found.

“The fact is that Democrats deserved better than what happened on caucus night,” the 39-year-old said in a letter to the state party’s central committee. “As chair of this party, I am deeply sorry for what happened and bear the responsibility for any failures on behalf of the Iowa Democratic Party.”

“The Associated Press still has not called the race because of the lingering uncertainties,” Isaac Stanley-Becker notes. “This year’s event, which Price once promised would be ‘the most successful caucuses in our party’s history,’ instead became a punchline, ridiculed by comedian Steve Martin at the Oscars ... Now, it’s not even clear if Iowa can hold on to its first-in-the-nation status.”

Rush Limbaugh said Trump would “have fun” with Buttigieg’s sexuality in a general election.

“A gay guy, 37 years old, loves kissing his husband on debate stages. Can you see Trump have fun with that?” said the conservative radio host. Trump awarded him the Presidential Medal of Freedom, the highest honor available for a civilian, during last week's State of the Union. (Daily Beast)

Bloomberg buzz, along with scrutiny, continues to grow.

At the height of the 2008 economic collapse, the then-New York mayor blamed the elimination of the discriminatory housing practice known as “redlining” for instigating the meltdown, the AP notes.

Bloomberg has been picking up some key endorsements.

Houston Mayor Sylvester Turner, Congressional Black Caucus members Reps. Lucy McBath (Ga.), Gregory Meeks (N.Y.) and Stacey Plaskett (Virgin Islands) and former North Carolina governor Bev Perdue have all announced their backing of the former mayor. Turner plans to help launch Bloomberg’s newest initiative – Mike for Black America – a move that comes days after an audio recording of Bloomberg defending “stop and frisk” policies in 2015 was made public. (CBS News)

Bloomberg’s campaign is also pushing sponsored content across popular Instagram meme pages. (NYT)

---

The Trump presidency

John Kelly laid out his misgivings with Trump.

Speaking last night at Drew University in New Jersey, the former White House chief of staff defended Army Lt. Col. Alexander Vindman, the ousted National Security Council aide who testified against Trump during the impeachment inquiry and has been ejected from the White House. “Kelly, a retired Marine Corps general, said that Vindman is blameless and simply followed the training he’d received as a soldier, migrants are ‘overwhelmingly good people’ and ‘not all rapists’; and Trump’s decision to condition military aid to Ukraine on an investigation into [Biden] upended longstanding U.S. policy,” Peter

Nicholas reports in the Atlantic. “Vindman was rightly disturbed by Trump’s phone call to Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelensky in July, Kelly suggested. Having seen something ‘questionable,’ Vindman properly notified his superiors, Kelly said. ... ‘He did exactly what we teach them to do from cradle to grave,’ Kelly told the audience at the Mayo Performing Arts Center. ‘He went and told his boss what he just heard.’ ...

“Responding to questions from the audience, Kelly faulted Trump for intervening in the case of Eddie Gallagher, a Navy Seal who was convicted last year of posing with the corpse of an ISIS fighter. Trump reversed a Navy decision to oust Gallagher, in a chain of events that led to the resignation of Navy Secretary Richard Spencer. ‘The idea that the commander-in-chief intervened there, in my opinion, was exactly the wrong thing to do,’ Kelly said. ‘Had I been there, I think I could have prevented it.’ The audience applauded. When a woman in the crowd said that Trump had ‘elevated’ Gallagher, Kelly looked out at the crowd. ‘Yep,’ he said.”

Trump seeks to bend the executive branch as part of his impeachment vendetta.

“In the span of 48 hours this week, the president has sought to protect his friends and punish his foes, even at the risk of compromising the Justice Department’s independence and integrity — a stance that his defenders see as entirely justified,” Philip Rucker, Robert Costa and Josh Dawsey report. “Trump complained publicly about federal prosecutors’ recommended prison sentence for [Roger Stone]. ... Next Trump sought to intimidate the federal judge in the Stone case, badgering her on Twitter for previous rulings ... Then Trump floated the possibility of a presidential pardon for Stone...

“Some of Trump’s top aides have counseled him against speaking out on legal matters, warning him that doing so could wrongly influence proceedings because officials at the Justice Department or elsewhere would then know they needed to please him or risk his wrath. Trump has often responded, ‘I have a right to say whatever I want,’ according to a former senior administration official ... Trump insisted Wednesday that he did nothing improper in the Stone case. ‘I didn’t speak to them, by the way, just so you understand,’ the president told reporters, referring to Justice Department officials. ‘They saw the horribleness.’ ... Still, a chorus of former U.S. attorneys and former Justice Department leaders condemned Trump for what they consider improper political pressure in a criminal prosecution.”

---

Quote of the day

“He’s trying to delegitimize anyone appointed by someone other than him and say that the only people who can be trusted are Trump judges,” retired federal judge Nancy Gertner said of Trump’s attacks on Judge Amy Berman Jackson, who will determine Stone’s sentence. (Ann Marimow)

Bill Barr faces growing scrutiny over his intervention in the Stone case.

Trump put the attorney general squarely in the middle of the controversy over the Justice Department’s reduced sentencing recommendation for the president’s longtime friend, as he publicly praised Barr for seizing command of the case from career prosecutors. “A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment on the president’s statements,” Matt Zapposky and Devlin Barrett report. “Some current and former Justice Department officials have long feared that Barr is willing to risk the institution’s historic independence to serve an irascible president. The top Democrat in the Senate called for the Justice Department inspector general to investigate the Stone episode, and the House Judiciary Committee announced Wednesday it would have Barr testify March 31 to address that case and other recent incidents that it said ‘raise grave questions’ about Barr’s leadership.”

Even Barr’s former boss criticized him.

“With Bill Barr, on an amazing number of occasions ... you can be almost 100 percent certain that there’s something improper going on,” Donald Ayer, the deputy attorney general under George H.W. Bush, told Politico.

To career federal prosecutors across the country, Barr's meddling raises fears that the worst is yet to come.

“Until now, according to conversations with more than a dozen career lawyers in some of the 93 U.S. attorney’s offices, they had watched other divisions in the Justice Department execute significant shifts in response to Mr. Trump while the work of prosecuting crimes was largely unaffected by the politics of the moment,” the Times reports. “Now career prosecutors said they worried they might face more pressure.”

More resignations could still come.

CNN reports that additional prosecutors who work in the U.S. attorney’s office for the District of Columbia have discussed resigning in the coming days over the Stone imbroglio.

Congressional Republicans showed no signs that they would move to check Trump in this case.

“It doesn’t bother me at all, as long as the judge has the final decision,” said Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), the former Senate Judiciary Committee chairman who sharply criticized the Obama administration for alleged politicization of the Justice Department.

This left Democrats “largely alone to fume about the evaporation of another norm of American governance,” Mike DeBonis reports. “Sen. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio) seized on the demise of the nomination of Jessie K. Liu to serve as undersecretary of the Treasury Department for terrorism and financial crimes as proof that Trump is ‘on a retribution tour.’”

The Senate, though, is primed to pass a measure that would restrict Trump's ability to start a war with Iran.

“Eight Republicans voted Wednesday to advance legislation invoking

Congress's war powers, a move intended to prevent the president from engaging in hostilities against Tehran without explicit authorization from the legislative branch — except in cases of clear self-defense," Karoun Demirjian reports. "The vote reflects the frustration with Trump's decision to kill a top Iranian commander, Qasem Soleimani, without first consulting lawmakers ... 'No president has the authority to commit our military to a sustained conflict,' Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) told reporters, reiterating her support for the measure.

“Collins joined Sens. Rand Paul (Ky.), Mike Lee (Utah) and Todd C. Young (Ind.) as the earliest Republicans to commit their support to the measure drafted by Sen. Tim Kaine (D-Va.).

They did so only after Kaine agreed to strike references to Trump that appeared in his original draft. But the legislation — which, as a war powers measure, was guaranteed a vote — languished for the past several weeks while the Senate was singularly focused on Trump's impeachment trial. In that time, additional Republicans have indicated they'll back the resolution, including Sen. Jerry Moran (R-Kan.). Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), Bill Cassidy (R-La.) and Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) also voted to advance the legislation on Wednesday; it is not yet clear if all three will back the resolution on its final vote. Even with their support, however, the legislation will still lack the votes to overcome a near-guaranteed veto.”

While tensions have cooled for the moment, the Pentagon is still feeling out whether Iran will retaliate again, and how. In the standoff with Tehran after Soleimani was killed, U.S. sailors said the threat level was unlike anything they'd seen. “I have spent 26 years in this Navy not hoping for war, but preparing for war so that we can keep our nation safe,” Navy Capt. Christopher D. Stone told Dan Lamothe in an interview aboard the Normandy, his warship, near the Persian Gulf. “I would say overwhelmingly, the response I saw was a crew that was very focused.”

Trump ally Jim Jordan accused of “begging” a former Ohio State wrestler not to validate reports of sexual

abuse.

The Ohio Republican congressman allegedly asked the wrestler not to corroborate accounts made against the university's wrestling team doctor that occurred while he was a coach, Colby Itkowitz reports: “Adam DiSabato — the brother of Mike DiSabato, the whistleblower who exposed the abuse by Richard Strauss — testified Wednesday during a public hearing in the state legislature that when the story came out in July 2018, he received a phone call from a tearful Jordan. ‘[He] called me crying, crying, groveling, on the Fourth of July, begging me to go against my brother, begging me, crying for half an hour,’ Adam DiSabato said, according to video of his testimony. ... Jordan’s spokesman said DiSabato’s account was untrue. ‘Another lie,’ said Ian Fury, Jordan’s communications director. ‘Congressman Jordan never saw or heard of any abuse, and if he had, he would have dealt with it.’”

House Democrats asked the Secret Service for details about payments to Trump’s company.

This request came after David Fahrenthold and Jonathan O’Connell revealed that the agency had been charged as much as $650 per night for a room at Trump’s clubs, where agents go to protect the president.

---

The coronavirus crisis

The number of cases jumped dramatically after China expanded its diagnostic criteria.

The official death toll of the virus – now known as covid-19 – has risen to roughly 1,360, nearly all in China. The total confirmed cases worldwide surpassed 60,000. “China’s Hubei province, the epicenter of the outbreak, reported an uptick of 14,840 confirmed coronavirus cases Thursday as health officials expanded the type of cases that it includes in its count,” Marisa Iati and Gerry Shih report. “China’s state-run Xinhua News Agency announced Thursday that national health authorities issued revised guidelines to consider ‘clinically diagnosed’ coronavirus cases in the confirmed total. Chinese officials previously only counted cases confirmed by nucleic acid tests, which critics said were faulty and greatly underestimated the true magnitude of the epidemic. ... The dramatic jump in cases in Hubei essentially confirms longtime suspicions that China was for weeks vastly undercounting cases of the virus.” A death announced in Japan this morning became the second fatality from the disease reported outside China.

Most cases are actually mild, which is good news, but this complicates the response.

“So far, about 82 percent of the cases — including all 14 in the United States — have been mild, with symptoms that require little or no medical intervention. And that proportion may be an undercount. Health authorities managing the outbreak are trying to understand what that critical fact portends, Lenny Bernstein and Carolyn Johnson report. “The fact that there are so many mild cases is a real hallmark of this disease and makes it so different from SARS,’ said Jennifer Nuzzo, an epidemiologist at the Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health’s Center for Health Security. ‘It’s also really challenging. Most of our surveillance is oriented around finding people who require medical intervention.’”

The CDC has found no coronavirus cases since airport screening began a month ago.

More than 30,000 travelers from China have been screened, and no confirmed cases have been identified, per Lena Sun.

As a precaution, though, United Airlines extended its suspension of flights to China until April 24. “Overall, international flights to China have fallen by 67 percent since Jan. 30,” per Miriam Berger.

China’s Uighur Muslim minority fears the virus will spread to the camps where they’re being held.

Chinese state media give no major cause for concern that the outbreak will reach the northeastern region of Xinjiang where the Uighurs live, since it’s far from the epicenter. Still, AFP reports, representatives of the diaspora worry that, because the virus spreads from person to person through sneezing or coughing, the confinement of large groups of people could cause an outbreak.

China’s Communist Party ousted two high-level officials in Hubei province, the center of the outbreak.

The ruling party fired Jiang Chaoliang, a former banker who had been party secretary of Hubei province since 2016, and Ma Guoqiang, the party boss overseeing Wuhan, as the country’s leadership looks to tighten control over its epidemic response. (Gerry Shih)

Most workers in China were supposed to get back to work this week. But business is not as usual in Beijing.

“Worried about the toll the epidemic will take on China’s growth rate, which the government has been toiling to keep at 6 percent, officials have told businesses across the country to return to work,” Anna Fifield reports. “But in the capital Beijing, a city of 22 million people that has 352 confirmed cases of coronavirus, the streets and office buildings and stores were remarkably empty Wednesday. Sanlitun, a glitzy shopping area usually jam-packed with people at lunchtime, was a concrete wasteland. The Apple store was closed. Uniqlo and Starbucks each had only one door open, and staff were constantly disinfecting the handle. The H&M was as empty as Gucci in a recession.”

---

Social media speed read

Marie Yovanovitch, the ousted U.S. ambassador to Ukraine who allegedly lost her job because of Rudy Giuliani's pressure campaign, still encourages students to join the Foreign Service:

Julia Ioffe  @juliaioffe · 8h

Marie Yovanovitch gets a loooooong standing ovation at the Georgetown School of Foreign Service

Julia Ioffe  @juliaioffe

Yovanovitch, addressing the students at the Georgetown School of Foreign Service: "To those of you who haven't *yet* decided to go to work for the American people, I hope tonight I can convince you."

Even after all of that, she's encouraging young people to become diplomats.

 3,636 10:11 PM - Feb 12, 2020

 687 people are talking about this

A group of migrant families with sick children asked for asylum at the U.S.-Mexico border under a medical exemption:

Zolan Kanno-Youngs
@KannoYoungs

They were denied entry and told to return to Matamoros.
twitter.com/kannoyoungs/st...

Zolan Kanno-Youngs  @KannoYoungs

Migrant families wait to see if they will be admitted into the US. One child has epilepsy, another autism and one has lissencephaly. Lawyers here are arguing they should have qualified for the medical exemption of MPP. Instead they've waited in Matamoros for months.

♥ 9 12:07 AM - Feb 13, 2020

 See Zolan Kanno-Youngs's other Tweets

The president telephoned the Republican challenger to Michigan Sen. Gary Peters (D), a reflection of how important the Wolverine State is in 2020:

John James ✓
@JohnjamesMI

The President of the United States of America just called to wish MY SON a happy birthday! 🥳

Thank you for the well wishes @realdonaldtrump! I look forward to continued conversation!

♥ 22.6K 1:10 AM - Feb 13, 2020

💬 4,941 people are talking about this

An editor at the Cook Political Report pointed out that moderates, not Sanders supporters, drove the rise in New Hampshire turnout:

Dave Wasserman

@Redistrict

By my calc, NH Dem turnout (vs. '16) in towns won by...

Buttigieg: +26.5%

Klobuchar: +25.2%

Sanders: +12.0%

Takeaway: most of Dems' turnout increase was attributable to Kasich/Rubio types crossing over from '16 GOP primary - not heightened progressive/Sanders base enthusiasm.

4,010 9:42 PM - Feb 12, 2020

1,617 people are talking about this

An Afghan karate coach's dog was shot dead by a group of men who told her a woman couldn't own a dog. She is now planning on fleeing the country, per the BBC:

Khaama Press (KP) ✓

@khaama

ورزش کار افغان پس از قتل سگش توسط تفنگداران ناشناس، کشور
را برای همیشه ترک میکند... khaama.com/persian/archiv...

♥ 27 1:54 PM - Feb 9, 2020

See Khaama Press \(KP\)'s other Tweets

Videos of the day

Our Max Bearak traveled to southern Ethiopia, which is facing its worst locust outbreak in generations after an uncommon weather pattern in the Indian Ocean caused relentless rains across East Africa:

Stephen Colbert took a look at the remaining Democratic candidates:

Seth Meyers thinks Trump's actions this week have shown that the stakes for the Democratic race couldn't be higher:

And Samantha Bee said the president is on a “revenge tour”:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Must Reads for a curated selection of our best journalism in your inbox every Saturday, plus a peek behind the scenes into how one story came together. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] Book Club: Another book about election interference promises startling details -- but you'll have to wait
Date: Friday, February 14, 2020 7:41:10 AM

2022
THE CLIMATE
FROM The Washington Post

Inside the politics of climate change
This daily newsletter from reporter Maxine Joselow is a must-read for environmental decisionmakers, energy executives and the climate-curious alike.

Sign up

Powered by  LiveIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

The Washington Post

Book Club

Reviews and recommendations from critic Ron Charles.

By Ron Charles

 Email

Knopf released this placeholder cover for "Rigged," by David Shimer; U.S. President Donald Trump and Russian President Vladimir Putin at the Presidential Palace in Finland on July 16, 2018 (AP Photo/Pablo Martinez Monsivais); author David Shimer (Courtesy of PRH).

While former National Security Advisor John Bolton tries to pry his unpublished memoir from Donald Trump's short fingers, here comes word of another upcoming book about election interference. Yesterday, in an unusually weighty press release, Penguin Random House announced that David Shimer, a former intern on

Hillary Clinton's campaign who graduated from Yale in 2018, will publish "Rigged: America, Russia, and One Hundred Years of Covert Electoral Interference." Described as a "sweeping story" of KGB and CIA meddling around the world, the book also promises "startling new details" about Russia's interference in the 2016 presidential election and "the definitive account of Barack Obama's secret struggle against Vladimir Putin." Shimer, who looks just old enough to vote, reportedly interviewed scores of power players, including Hillary Clinton, Steve Bannon, David Petraeus, Leon Panetta, John Brennan, Susan Rice and H.R. McMaster. "Rigged" is scheduled for release on June 9, which in Trump Years is like 83 scandals from now. Is it just me, or are we all tired of waiting for crucial information about the collapse of our democracy until a profitable book can be produced?

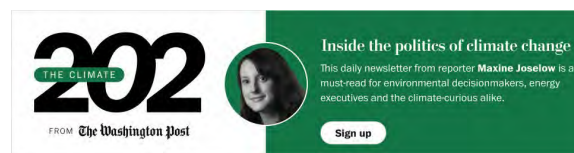

Just lion around: The New York Public Library's mascot peruses the list of 125 Books We Love. (Jonathan Blanc/NYPL)

We ♥ books. The New York Public Library is celebrating Valentine's Day by releasing a list of "125 Books We Love." The list, which spans genres and forms, includes such classics as Toni Morrison's novel "Beloved," Ron Chernow's biography "Alexander Hamilton" and Tracy K. Smith's poetry collection "Life on Mars." Starting today, you can pick up a printed copy of the list at any NYPL branch or click here. Having drawn up many lists of the "best" books of the year, I shudder to imagine how hard it must have been to select favorites published since 1895 when the library was incorporated. A team of NYPL librarians spent about a year on this project trying to choose exciting and enlightening books that have survived the test of time. They took into account “literary merit” and “popularity” — the Scylla and Charybdis of all such lists — and they aimed to include “diverse voices.” They only allowed one title (or series) per author, and only titles for adults were considered, except “Harry Potter,” which, they claim, “transcends age categories.” (Having nothing nice to say about that judgment, I shall say nothing at all.) Tonight’s romantic plans up in the air? Tickets are still available to the NYPL’s Valentine’s Day party — “the city’s most cerebral happy hour.” Among the activities: “dramatic readings of love poems,” “librarian-led book matchmaking” and “a one-night-only special-collections display of our most amorous items.” Yikes! 21 and older; ID required. Yes, seriously.

ADVERTISEMENT

Brothers With Books co-founders Kevin Isabelle-Peete and Isaac Cudjoe. (Courtesy of Brothers With Books)

The young men behind Brothers With Books are two of the most inspiring people I’ve met. In less than a year, co-founders Isaac Cudjoe and Kevin Isabelle-Peete have distributed more than 17,000 books to children around Montgomery County, outside Washington, D.C. Their literacy organization — an ad hoc enterprise operated out of their homes — encourages kids to read by giving them books to keep. In a school system that has too few African American male teachers, Cudjoe and Isabelle-Peete also serve as great role models, proof that reading is cool and fun. Cudjoe, a doctoral student in public policy and administration, tells me the idea for Brothers With Books came to them after they were stopped and harassed by police officers while driving home. Afterwards, they considered how to respond. “I’m a fan of us doing something that is actionable for the community with the tools that we have,” Cudjoe says. He and Isabelle-Peete realized that kids need far better access to books, especially to books by and about people of color. Starting with 150 titles from the Maryland Book Bank, they contacted a local teacher and asked if they could give some books away. Since then, they’ve relied mostly on individual donations, which have poured in. “It’s been wonderful. Schools have been very receptive and so positive,” says Isabelle-Peete, who’s completing a degree in elementary and special education. Recently, Brothers With Books has also begun offering $250 scholarships to students nominated by their teachers. “People undervalue how much a little bit can do for somebody,” Cudjoe says. “If you think $250 is too small for a scholarship, go ahead and donate.” Indeed. If you’d like to make a cash donation or you have new or lightly used books for kids 8 through 12, contact brothers.w.books@gmail.com. “People do want to serve their community,” Cudjoe says. “They just often don’t know how.” These two men do.

President Donald Trump's budget request for fiscal year 2021 arrives at the House Budget Committee on Capitol Hill, where Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer immediately called it a "blueprint for destroying America," Feb. 10, 2020. (AP Photo/J. Scott Applewhite)

The Tweeter-in-Chief has launched his annual assault on our federal arts agencies. President Trump's proposed budget, announced Monday, proposes eliminating the National Endowment for the Arts and the National Endowment for the Humanities. His plan also calls for shutting down the Institute of Museum and Library Services and the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. (Sorry, Elmo, but tax money for all the president's golf trips has to come from somewhere.) Fortunately, Trump's dreams of cultural vandalism are no more likely to succeed this year than they have in the past. As Washington Post reporter Peggy McGlone writes, "Previous budget proposals by President Trump along these lines have been soundly rejected by Congress, which has increased funding in each of the past three years for the NEA and the NEH" (full story). Just hours after the president's penurious budget proposal was released, NEH Chairman Jon Parrish Peede – who was appointed by Trump – issued a surprisingly bold press release touting his agency's crucial support for teachers, authors, veterans, libraries and museums throughout the country (i.e. in every congressional district). "NEH grants have helped preserve and increase access to the essential records of American history," the statement said, "including the papers of George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, and other presidents, as well as those of significant writers, thinkers, and entrepreneurs such as

Willa Cather, Ernest Hemingway, Martin Luther King Jr., and Thomas Edison.” Fore!

(Courtesy of PEN America)

ADVERTISEMENT

PEN America is gearing up for its massive annual awards ceremony, which will be hosted by Seth Meyers because book nerds are crazy for the aura of TV personalities. This week, in preparation for the ceremony on March 2 in New York, the foundation announced the winners of several lifetime achievement prizes, including Tom Stoppard, Tanya Barfield, M. NourbeSe Philip and Rigoberto González. (Incidentally, check out González’s review of Jeanine Cummins’s controversial novel “American Dirt” in the LA Times.) At the ceremony, many more winners will be announced across a number of categories spanning fiction, nonfiction, poetry, biography, essay, science writing and translation — more than $330,000 in prizes all told. The most curious prize is the $75,000 PEN/Jean Stein Award for a book in any genre “which has broken new ground by reshaping the boundaries of its form and signaling strong potential for lasting influence.” Here are the five wildly diverse finalists:

- “The Undying,” by Anne Boyer, is a memoir about surviving cancer and its treatment.
- “Deaf Republic,” by Ilya Kaminsky, is a collection of poems set in a town under military occupation (review).
- “Where Reasons End,” by Yiyun Li, is a novel that imagines the interaction between a mother and her son who committed suicide.
- “The World Doesn’t Require You,” by Rion Amilcar Scott, is a story collection about present-day life in a Maryland town founded by the survivors of a successful slave revolt (review).
- “Rusty Brown,” by Chris Ware, is a graphic novel about six people on a single Midwestern day (one of The Post’s top 10 graphic novels of 2019).

Frederick Douglass, ca. 1879. (Frank W. Legg/National Archives)

“I have no accurate knowledge of my age,” Frederick Douglass wrote at the opening of his 1845 autobiography. “It is the wish of most masters within my knowledge to keep their slaves thus ignorant.” Douglass, who spent his life combating slavery and ignorance, eventually chose to observe his birthday on Feb. 14. Tomorrow, there will be a celebration of Douglass’s 202nd birthday and the centennial of the 19th Amendment at the Frederick Douglass National Historic House in Washington where the great writer lived from 1877-1895. Earlier this week, life-size bronze statues of Douglass and fellow abolitionist Harriet Tubman were unveiled in the Maryland State House (story). And last night in New York, Amy Murrell Taylor accepted the annual $25,000 Frederick Douglass Book Prize for “Embattled Freedom: Journeys through the Civil War’s Slave Refugee Camps.” A special achievement award was also given to Julius S. Scott for “The Common Wind: Afro-American Currents in the Age of the Haitian Revolution.”

“My Name Is Lucy Barton,” starring Laura Linney, will close on Broadway at the end of this month. The one-woman play, based on Elizabeth Strout’s novel, has been tremendously popular (review). A few tickets starting at $195 remain, but there’s another way that involves far less money and no travel: Linney has released an audiobook version of her stage performance (listen to a sample). If you’re interested in buying this or checking it out from the library, make sure you search for the version adapted by Rona Munro with Linney as narrator; Kimberly Farr released a traditional audiobook of the novel back in 2016.

Novelist Silvia Moreno-Garcia has just published “Untamed Shore” (Agora).

I knew her when. Years ago, I was the Books editor at the Christian Science Monitor, and I also supervised the paper’s interns. In 2001, one of those interns was a student at Endicott College named Silvia Moreno-Garcia. Now jump ahead almost 20 years: My editor here at The Post told me a new fantasy and science fiction reviewer was dropping by the office, but I had a lunch meeting, so I missed her. Only later that day did I realize it was my old friend Silvia Moreno-Garcia, who’s now a publisher and celebrated writer! This week she has released her fifth novel, a thriller called “Untamed Shore.” It’s about a young Mexican woman in Baja California who gets hired to be the assistant for a wealthy American arriving with his glamorous wife and dissipated brother. The situation is immediately ominous, and when one of them dies, things really heat up. And did I mention there are sharks?

Incidentally, Moreno-Garcia is an expert on H.P. Lovecraft. That reminds me that Brown University, which holds the world’s largest collection of Lovecraft materials, is offering a fellowship for scholars researching science fiction and horror ($2,500/month). Applications are due by March 13. More information here.

Daniel Mendelsohn is a brilliant critic and translator, but more importantly, he's the creator of #classicalValentines on Twitter.

"A few years ago I was doing a stint as a writer-in-residence at a university out West," he tells me. "It was Valentine's Day, and I had nothing to do, and I started fooling around with some rhymes. I've always loved doggerel and 'occasional verse,' and I thought, why not flood the twittersphere with something amusing?" Go, Cupid! Tuesday, he started posting this year's batch. They're a delightfully zany mix of madcap antics and classical allusions, as you might expect from a writer whose most recent book was "Ecstasy and Terror: From the Greeks to Game of Thrones" (review). It helps if, like Mendelsohn, you know Homer in the original Greek, but you don't have to be Odysseus to figure out these gags. "My favorites are rhymes across languages," he says, "especially when they're a bit slanty: Who doesn't love cup/schtup?"

Penelope, my tricky lady—
yes, you're every bit as shady
as I! (Ok, I'm bonking Circe—
but she's a goddess: please have mercy!)

Center: A three-handled palace Style Mycenaean amphora, 15th c. B.C., in the National Archeological Museum, Athens, Greece. (Ron Charles/The Washington Post)

Mary Szybist won a National Book Award for her second book of poetry, “Incarnadine,” in 2013. “The Lushness of It” is my favorite poem from that remarkable collection – and my all-time favorite poem about octopus love. Szybist revised the poem slightly after reading “Other Minds: The Octopus, the Sea, and the Deep Origins of Consciousness,” by Peter Godfrey-Smith. That updated version appears here.

The Lushness of It

It’s not that the octopus wouldn’t love you—
not that it wouldn’t reach for you
with each of its tapering arms.

You’d be as good as anyone, I think,
to an octopus. And the creatures of the sea,
unlike the sea, might think about themselves, or you. Keep on floating there, cradled, unable to burn. Abandon yourself to the sway, the ruffled eddies, abandon your heavy legs to the floating meadows

of seaweed and feel
the bloom of phytoplankton, spindrift, sea

spray, barnacles. In the dark benthic realm, the slippery nekton glide over the abyssal plains and as you float you can feel that upwelling of cold, deep water touch the skin stretched over your spine. No, it's not that the octopus wouldn't love you. If it touched, if it tasted you, each of its three hearts would turn red.

Will theologians of any confession refute me?
Not the bluecap salmon. Not its dotted head.

From "Incarnadine," by Mary Szybist (Graywolf Press, 2013). Reprinted by permission of the author.

Enjoy the long weekend – from Valentine's Day through Presidents Day. If you have any questions or comments about The Post's book coverage, contact me at ron.charles@washpost.com. And if you know someone who would enjoy this newsletter, please forward it to them. To subscribe, click here.

---

The juicy details of Jessica Simpson's memoir are only part of her misunderstood story

Review • By Emily Yahr • Read more »

Behind the scenes of James Bond: A new book offers a look back at the longest-running movie franchise

Review • By Chris Klimek • Read more »

How 12 authors turned their book dedications into grand romantic gestures

By Angela Haupt • Read more »

---

Stationery stores are in trouble, but our love for Valentine's Day cards burns hotter than ever

By Ron Charles • Read more »

---

First published in 1924, 'Still She Wished for Company' makes for a delicious, if bittersweet, Valentine's Day treat

Review • By Michael Dirda • Read more »

---

The appeal of 'And I Do Not Forgive You' is hard to articulate but impossible to resist

Review • By John Domini • Read more »

---

Joe Ide draws on his love of Sherlock Holmes in his complex crime tale 'Hi Five'

Review • By Maureen Corrigan • Read more »

---

Amy Bonnaffons's 'The Regrets' puts an otherworldly spin on the breakup novel

Review • By Bethanne Patrick • Read more »

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out By The Way for tips and guides that will help you travel better and make you feel like a local wherever you go. Delivered every Thursday. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from Book Club | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for Book Club or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] Book Club: Another book about election interference promises startling details -- but you'll have to wait
Date: Friday, February 14, 2020 7:41:32 AM

2022
THE CLIMATE
FROM The Washington Post

Inside the politics of climate change
This daily newsletter from reporter Maxine Joselow is a must-read for environmental decisionmakers, energy executives and the climate-curious alike.

Sign up

Powered by  LiveIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

The Washington Post

Book Club

Reviews and recommendations from critic Ron Charles.

By Ron Charles

 Email

Knopf released this placeholder cover for "Rigged," by David Shimer; U.S. President Donald Trump and Russian President Vladimir Putin at the Presidential Palace in Finland on July 16, 2018 (AP Photo/Pablo Martinez Monsivais); author David Shimer (Courtesy of PRH).

While former National Security Advisor John Bolton tries to pry his unpublished memoir from Donald Trump's short fingers, here comes word of another upcoming book about election interference. Yesterday, in an unusually weighty press release, Penguin Random House announced that David Shimer, a former intern on

Hillary Clinton's campaign who graduated from Yale in 2018, will publish "Rigged: America, Russia, and One Hundred Years of Covert Electoral Interference." Described as a "sweeping story" of KGB and CIA meddling around the world, the book also promises "startling new details" about Russia's interference in the 2016 presidential election and "the definitive account of Barack Obama's secret struggle against Vladimir Putin." Shimer, who looks just old enough to vote, reportedly interviewed scores of power players, including Hillary Clinton, Steve Bannon, David Petraeus, Leon Panetta, John Brennan, Susan Rice and H.R. McMaster. "Rigged" is scheduled for release on June 9, which in Trump Years is like 83 scandals from now. Is it just me, or are we all tired of waiting for crucial information about the collapse of our democracy until a profitable book can be produced?

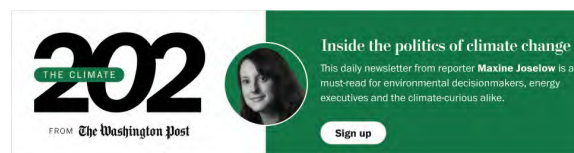

Just lion around: The New York Public Library's mascot peruses the list of 125 Books We Love. (Jonathan Blanc/NYPL)

We ♥ books. The New York Public Library is celebrating Valentine's Day by releasing a list of "125 Books We Love." The list, which spans genres and forms, includes such classics as Toni Morrison's novel "Beloved," Ron Chernow's biography "Alexander Hamilton" and Tracy K. Smith's poetry collection "Life on Mars." Starting today, you can pick up a printed copy of the list at any NYPL branch or click here. Having drawn up many lists of the "best" books of the year, I shudder to imagine how hard it must have been to select favorites published since 1895 when the library was incorporated. A team of NYPL librarians spent about a year on this project trying to choose exciting and enlightening books that have survived the test of time. They took into account “literary merit” and “popularity” — the Scylla and Charybdis of all such lists — and they aimed to include “diverse voices.” They only allowed one title (or series) per author, and only titles for adults were considered, except “Harry Potter,” which, they claim, “transcends age categories.” (Having nothing nice to say about that judgment, I shall say nothing at all.) Tonight’s romantic plans up in the air? Tickets are still available to the NYPL’s Valentine’s Day party — “the city’s most cerebral happy hour.” Among the activities: “dramatic readings of love poems,” “librarian-led book matchmaking” and “a one-night-only special-collections display of our most amorous items.” Yikes! 21 and older; ID required. Yes, seriously.

ADVERTISEMENT

Brothers With Books co-founders Kevin Isabelle-Peete and Isaac Cudjoe. (Courtesy of Brothers With Books)

The young men behind Brothers With Books are two of the most inspiring people I’ve met. In less than a year, co-founders Isaac Cudjoe and Kevin Isabelle-Peete have distributed more than 17,000 books to children around Montgomery County, outside Washington, D.C. Their literacy organization — an ad hoc enterprise operated out of their homes — encourages kids to read by giving them books to keep. In a school system that has too few African American male teachers, Cudjoe and Isabelle-Peete also serve as great role models, proof that reading is cool and fun. Cudjoe, a doctoral student in public policy and administration, tells me the idea for Brothers With Books came to them after they were stopped and harassed by police officers while driving home. Afterwards, they considered how to respond. “I’m a fan of us doing something that is actionable for the community with the tools that we have,” Cudjoe says. He and Isabelle-Peete realized that kids need far better access to books, especially to books by and about people of color. Starting with 150 titles from the Maryland Book Bank, they contacted a local teacher and asked if they could give some books away. Since then, they’ve relied mostly on individual donations, which have poured in. “It’s been wonderful. Schools have been very receptive and so positive,” says Isabelle-Peete, who’s completing a degree in elementary and special education. Recently, Brothers With Books has also begun offering $250 scholarships to students nominated by their teachers. “People undervalue how much a little bit can do for somebody,” Cudjoe says. “If you think $250 is too small for a scholarship, go ahead and donate.” Indeed. If you’d like to make a cash donation or you have new or lightly used books for kids 8 through 12, contact brothers.w.books@gmail.com. “People do want to serve their community,” Cudjoe says. “They just often don’t know how.” These two men do.

President Donald Trump's budget request for fiscal year 2021 arrives at the House Budget Committee on Capitol Hill, where Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer immediately called it a "blueprint for destroying America," Feb. 10, 2020. (AP Photo/J. Scott Applewhite)

The Tweeter-in-Chief has launched his annual assault on our federal arts agencies. President Trump's proposed budget, announced Monday, proposes eliminating the National Endowment for the Arts and the National Endowment for the Humanities. His plan also calls for shutting down the Institute of Museum and Library Services and the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. (Sorry, Elmo, but tax money for all the president's golf trips has to come from somewhere.) Fortunately, Trump's dreams of cultural vandalism are no more likely to succeed this year than they have in the past. As Washington Post reporter Peggy McGlone writes, "Previous budget proposals by President Trump along these lines have been soundly rejected by Congress, which has increased funding in each of the past three years for the NEA and the NEH" (full story). Just hours after the president's penurious budget proposal was released, NEH Chairman Jon Parrish Peede – who was appointed by Trump – issued a surprisingly bold press release touting his agency's crucial support for teachers, authors, veterans, libraries and museums throughout the country (i.e. in every congressional district). "NEH grants have helped preserve and increase access to the essential records of American history," the statement said, "including the papers of George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, and other presidents, as well as those of significant writers, thinkers, and entrepreneurs such as

Willa Cather, Ernest Hemingway, Martin Luther King Jr., and Thomas Edison.” Fore!

(Courtesy of PEN America)

ADVERTISEMENT

PEN America is gearing up for its massive annual awards ceremony, which will be hosted by Seth Meyers because book nerds are crazy for the aura of TV personalities. This week, in preparation for the ceremony on March 2 in New York, the foundation announced the winners of several lifetime achievement prizes, including Tom Stoppard, Tanya Barfield, M. NourbeSe Philip and Rigoberto González. (Incidentally, check out González’s review of Jeanine Cummins’s controversial novel “American Dirt” in the LA Times.) At the ceremony, many more winners will be announced across a number of categories spanning fiction, nonfiction, poetry, biography, essay, science writing and translation — more than $330,000 in prizes all told. The most curious prize is the $75,000 PEN/Jean Stein Award for a book in any genre “which has broken new ground by reshaping the boundaries of its form and signaling strong potential for lasting influence.” Here are the five wildly diverse finalists:

- “The Undying,” by Anne Boyer, is a memoir about surviving cancer and its treatment.
- “Deaf Republic,” by Ilya Kaminsky, is a collection of poems set in a town under military occupation (review).
- “Where Reasons End,” by Yiyun Li, is a novel that imagines the interaction between a mother and her son who committed suicide.
- “The World Doesn’t Require You,” by Rion Amilcar Scott, is a story collection about present-day life in a Maryland town founded by the survivors of a successful slave revolt (review).
- “Rusty Brown,” by Chris Ware, is a graphic novel about six people on a single Midwestern day (one of The Post’s top 10 graphic novels of 2019).

Frederick Douglass, ca. 1879. (Frank W. Legg/National Archives)

“I have no accurate knowledge of my age,” Frederick Douglass wrote at the opening of his 1845 autobiography. “It is the wish of most masters within my knowledge to keep their slaves thus ignorant.” Douglass, who spent his life combating slavery and ignorance, eventually chose to observe his birthday on Feb. 14. Tomorrow, there will be a celebration of Douglass’s 202nd birthday and the centennial of the 19th Amendment at the Frederick Douglass National Historic House in Washington where the great writer lived from 1877-1895. Earlier this week, life-size bronze statues of Douglass and fellow abolitionist Harriet Tubman were unveiled in the Maryland State House (story). And last night in New York, Amy Murrell Taylor accepted the annual $25,000 Frederick Douglass Book Prize for “Embattled Freedom: Journeys through the Civil War’s Slave Refugee Camps.” A special achievement award was also given to Julius S. Scott for “The Common Wind: Afro-American Currents in the Age of the Haitian Revolution.”

“My Name Is Lucy Barton,” starring Laura Linney, will close on Broadway at the end of this month. The one-woman play, based on Elizabeth Strout’s novel, has been tremendously popular (review). A few tickets starting at $195 remain, but there’s another way that involves far less money and no travel: Linney has released an audiobook version of her stage performance (listen to a sample). If you’re interested in buying this or checking it out from the library, make sure you search for the version adapted by Rona Munro with Linney as narrator; Kimberly Farr released a traditional audiobook of the novel back in 2016.

Novelist Silvia Moreno-Garcia has just published “Untamed Shore” (Agora).

I knew her when. Years ago, I was the Books editor at the Christian Science Monitor, and I also supervised the paper’s interns. In 2001, one of those interns was a student at Endicott College named Silvia Moreno-Garcia. Now jump ahead almost 20 years: My editor here at The Post told me a new fantasy and science fiction reviewer was dropping by the office, but I had a lunch meeting, so I missed her. Only later that day did I realize it was my old friend Silvia Moreno-Garcia, who’s now a publisher and celebrated writer! This week she has released her fifth novel, a thriller called “Untamed Shore.” It’s about a young Mexican woman in Baja California who gets hired to be the assistant for a wealthy American arriving with his glamorous wife and dissipated brother. The situation is immediately ominous, and when one of them dies, things really heat up. And did I mention there are sharks?

Incidentally, Moreno-Garcia is an expert on H.P. Lovecraft. That reminds me that Brown University, which holds the world’s largest collection of Lovecraft materials, is offering a fellowship for scholars researching science fiction and horror ($2,500/month). Applications are due by March 13. More information here.

Daniel Mendelsohn is a brilliant critic and translator, but more importantly, he's the creator of #classicalValentines on Twitter.

"A few years ago I was doing a stint as a writer-in-residence at a university out West," he tells me. "It was Valentine's Day, and I had nothing to do, and I started fooling around with some rhymes. I've always loved doggerel and 'occasional verse,' and I thought, why not flood the twittersphere with something amusing?" Go, Cupid! Tuesday, he started posting this year's batch. They're a delightfully zany mix of madcap antics and classical allusions, as you might expect from a writer whose most recent book was "Ecstasy and Terror: From the Greeks to Game of Thrones" (review). It helps if, like Mendelsohn, you know Homer in the original Greek, but you don't have to be Odysseus to figure out these gags. "My favorites are rhymes across languages," he says, "especially when they're a bit slanty: Who doesn't love cup/schtup?"

Penelope, my tricky lady—
yes, you're every bit as shady
as I! (Ok, I'm bonking Circe—
but she's a goddess: please have mercy!)

Center: A three-handled palace Style Mycenaean amphora, 15th c. B.C., in the National Archeological Museum, Athens, Greece. (Ron Charles/The Washington Post)

Mary Szybist won a National Book Award for her second book of poetry, “Incarnadine,” in 2013. “The Lushness of It” is my favorite poem from that remarkable collection – and my all-time favorite poem about octopus love. Szybist revised the poem slightly after reading “Other Minds: The Octopus, the Sea, and the Deep Origins of Consciousness,” by Peter Godfrey-Smith. That updated version appears here.

The Lushness of It

It’s not that the octopus wouldn’t love you—
not that it wouldn’t reach for you
with each of its tapering arms.

You’d be as good as anyone, I think,
to an octopus. And the creatures of the sea,
unlike the sea, might think about themselves, or you. Keep on floating there, cradled, unable to burn. Abandon yourself to the sway, the ruffled eddies, abandon

your heavy legs to the floating meadows
of seaweed and feel
the bloom of phytoplankton, spindrift, sea

spray, barnacles. In the dark benthic realm, the slippery nekton glide over the abyssal plains and as you float you can feel that upwelling of cold, deep water touch the skin stretched over your spine. No, it's not that the octopus wouldn't love you. If it touched, if it tasted you, each of its three hearts would turn red.

Will theologians of any confession refute me?
Not the bluecap salmon. Not its dotted head.

From "Incarnadine," by Mary Szybist (Graywolf Press, 2013). Reprinted by permission of the author.

Enjoy the long weekend – from Valentine's Day through Presidents Day. If you have any questions or comments about The Post's book coverage, contact me at ron.charles@washpost.com. And if you know someone who would enjoy this newsletter, please forward it to them. To subscribe, click here.

---

The juicy details of Jessica Simpson's memoir are only part of her misunderstood story

Review • By Emily Yahr • Read more »

---

Behind the scenes of James Bond: A new book offers a look back at the longest-running movie franchise

Review • By Chris Klimek • Read more »

---

How 12 authors turned their book dedications into grand romantic gestures

By Angela Haupt • Read more »

---

Stationery stores are in trouble, but our love for Valentine's Day cards burns hotter than ever

By Ron Charles • Read more »

---

First published in 1924, 'Still She Wished for Company' makes for a delicious, if bittersweet, Valentine's Day treat

Review • By Michael Dirda • Read more »

---

The appeal of 'And I Do Not Forgive You' is hard to articulate but impossible to resist

Review • By John Domini • Read more »

---

Joe Ide draws on his love of Sherlock Holmes in his complex crime tale 'Hi Five'

Review • By Maureen Corrigan • Read more »

---

Amy Bonnaffons's 'The Regrets' puts an otherworldly spin on the breakup novel

Review • By Bethanne Patrick • Read more »

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out By The Way for tips and guides that will help you travel better and make you feel like a local wherever you go. Delivered every Thursday. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from Book Club | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for Book Club or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Donald Trump, the Houston Astros and the fear of the asterisk
Date: Friday, February 14, 2020 10:30:38 AM

Powered by LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Blue Cross Blue Shield Association

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

Donald Trump, the Houston Astros and the fear of the asterisk

Former White House communications director Hope Hicks told the FBI that President Trump viewed the intelligence community's assessment that Russia interfered on his behalf in the 2016 election as his "Achilles heel" because, even if it had no impact on the outcome of the election, people would think Russia helped him win.

Hicks, who will soon rejoin the White House, is one of multiple senior people quoted in former special counsel Bob Mueller's 2019 report to make the point that Trump was deeply concerned that acknowledging Russian interference would pock his electoral college triumph with an asterisk.*

Sean Spicer, Trump's first White House press secretary, said "the president thought the Russia story was developed to undermine the legitimacy of his election," according to Mueller. Former deputy campaign chairman Rick Gates said, "the president viewed the Russia investigation as an attack on the legitimacy of his win." And former White House chief of staff Reince Priebus recalled, "when the intelligence assessment came out, the president-elect was concerned people would question the legitimacy of his win."

Trump's enduring fear of the asterisk came to mind on Thursday in West Palm Beach, Fla., as the owner of the Houston Astros and his players insisted adamantly that they would have still won the World Series in 2017 without knowing in advance what pitches the opposing team was going to throw when playing at home.

Alex Bregman and Jose Altuve of the Houston Astros look on as owner Jim Crane reads a prepared statement during a news conference on Thursday in West Palm Beach, Fla. (Michael Reaves/Getty Images)

As pitchers and catchers reported for spring training, the 10 remaining players of the 2017 Astros appeared for a news conference at their Florida ballpark, which they share with the Washington Nationals and happens to be 10 miles from the president's Mar-a-Lago club.

Astros owner Jim Crane fired manager A.J. Hinch and general manager Jeff Luhnow last month after Major League Baseball released a report detailing its investigation into the electronic sign-stealing scheme the Astros were found to have used in 2017 and 2018. But Crane got defensive when asked whether what the team did amounted to cheating. "We broke the rules. You can phrase that any way you want," he told reporters.

"Our opinion is that this didn't impact the game," the owner added. "We had a good team. We won the World Series, and we'll leave it at that." Asked whether he should have been held accountable himself as the team's top official, Crane said: "No, I don't think I should be held accountable." When asked whether players should have been disciplined for knowingly participating in the scheme, he said: "Our players should not be punished. These are a great group of guys who did not receive proper guidance from their leaders."

"Crane's absolution of everyone except those who already have paid for the Astros' sins underscored the glaring limits of the apologies offered Thursday. The lack of specifics and the lack of introspection made it sometimes seem as if the Astros were reading from a list of talking points," Dave Sheinin reports. "They would admit what they did — stealing signs from opposing catchers using a center field camera and a video monitor — was wrong. Some would even acknowledge they gained an advantage through it. But they would accept no insinuation that their 2017 championship was in any way tainted."

Outfielder Josh Reddick, for example, would not admit that sign-stealing gave him an edge — "I can't really say it did [or] it didn't," he said — and said he felt no need to reach out to teams the Astros beat along the way. "I think it goes back to it not being a tainted championship. We were still a good team. [The scheme] wasn't the necessary point of us winning. We still won on the road as well."

What Reddick didn't say was that, in fact, Houston went 8-1 at Minute Maid Park that postseason. That's the stadium where they used an illegal camera to decipher the signs being used by opposing teams to relay them to batters by banging on a garbage can.

---

Content from Blue Cross Blue Shield Association

Addressing the need for more affordable medicines

Americans pay too much for prescription drugs. Even generics can be too expensive. So we're investing in a non-profit company to produce the drugs people need at a price they can afford. Learn more.

---

Trump's fear of the asterisk helps explain why he has continued to suggest, against all evidence to the contrary, that the Russians may not actually have done what an overwhelming mountain of evidence makes clear they did. "I don't believe they interfered," Trump told Time magazine in December 2016. "That became a laughing point, not a talking point, a laughing point. Any time I do something, they say 'oh, Russia interfered.'"

"This Russia thing with Trump and Russia is a made-up story," Trump told NBC in May 2017 after firing Jim Comey as FBI director. "It's an excuse by the Democrats for having lost an election that they should've won."

After meeting with Vladimir Putin in November 2017, Trump said he believed the Russian president's denials: "Every time he sees me, he says, 'I didn't do that.' And I really believe that, when he tells me that, he means it."

Mueller wrote in his report that Trump's fixation on the perceived legitimacy of his victory influenced some of his behavior, including the termination of Michael Flynn as national security adviser after The Washington Post broke the story about his conversation with the Russian ambassador regarding sanctions.

The impeachment inquiry, along with the rough transcript of Trump's July 25 phone call with his Ukrainian counterpart, also established that part of Trump's interest in that country was trying to cast doubt on the story line that Russia actually interfered in 2016.

In contrast to the Houston baseball team, the president has never apologized for anything related to Russia. He's not expressed regret for his own team's contacts in 2016 with Russians nor his false public statements about his knowledge of them.

As Mueller outlined 10 possible instances of obstruction of justice by Trump, he offered this analysis: “In this investigation, the evidence does not establish that the President was involved in an underlying crime related to Russian election interference. But the evidence does point to a range of other possible personal motives animating the President's conduct. These include concerns that continued investigation would call into question the legitimacy of his election and potential uncertainty about whether certain events, such as advance notice of WikiLeaks's release of hacked information or the June 9, 2016 meeting between senior campaign officials and Russians, could be seen as criminal activity by the President, his campaign, or his family.”

The Mueller report concluded that the Trump campaign expected to “benefit electorally” from information stolen and released by Russia. Don't forget, Trump even expressed this sentiment publicly. On July 27, 2016, he said at a campaign event: “Russia, if you're listening, I hope you're able to find the 30,000 emails that are missing.” Hours later, according to Mueller, Russian military intelligence attempted to hack Hillary Clinton's private email server for the first time.

Trump's asterisk fears weren't entirely misplaced. In the fourth year of his presidency, some of the president's critics continue to cite

Russian interference to speculate that he would have lost the election had it not been for a boost from the Kremlin.

“There’s no doubt that the Russians did interfere in the election, and I think the interference, although not yet quantified, if fully investigated would show that Trump didn’t actually win the election in 2016,” former president Jimmy Carter said last summer. “He lost the election, and he was put into office because the Russians interfered on his behalf.” Asked by historian Jon Meacham whether he considers Trump to be “an illegitimate president,” Carter replied: “Based on what I just said, which I can’t retract.”

Clinton herself dismissed Trump as an “illegitimate president” in September, suggesting that “he knows” he stole the 2016 election from her. “I believe he understands that the many varying tactics they used, from voter suppression and voter purging to hacking to the false stories — he knows that — there were just a bunch of different reasons why the election turned out like it did,” the former secretary of state said on CBS. “There were many funny things that happened in my election that will not happen again.”

A definitive answer is unknowable because so many other factors were at play in the election, including the FBI reopening – and then closing – the Clinton email investigation in the final weeks. But that won’t stop people from arguing about it for generations.

Trump continues to attack the Russia probe, nearly a year after its conclusion. “The Mueller investigation was a shakedown and a disgrace,” he told Geraldo Rivera for his “Roadkill” podcast on Thursday. “It probably should be expunged.”

Like how Clinton and Democrats remain embittered toward Trump, teams and players who lost to the Astros in 2017 will also always feel wronged.

Crane's assertion that his team's sign-stealing did not affect the outcome of games, and therefore did not taint the World Series, perturbed Houston's rivals. "Clearly, on what level did it impact things, I guess we'll never know, and that's for people to draw their own conclusions on," Yankees Manager Aaron Boone told reporters. "But clearly when we're talking about some of the things that went on, those things have an effect on games, clearly."

Just like with the question of whether Russian involvement changed the outcome of the election, no one will ever be able to definitively prove either way that the Astros would have lost the American League Championship Series or the World Series in 2017 had they not stolen signs.

New York Yankees closer Aroldis Chapman said that he believes the Astros' cheating cost them the 2017 World Series because the Astros beat the Yankees in Game Seven in the ALCS. "It was very close, and everything, all the details that come out, I think it was the extra edge that allowed them to move on," Chapman told Adam Kilgore.

Brett Anderson, who competed against the Astros with the A's in the American League West the past two seasons, responded to Crane's assertion with a GIF of Will Ferrell's "Anchorman" character Ron Burgundy saying, "I don't believe you."

And Texas Rangers outfielder Willie Calhoun quipped:

Kurt Suzuki, the Nationals catcher who gave complex signs this past October when Washington defeated the Astros to win the World Series, told Thomas Boswell that he thinks Houston was still cheating through the end of the 2019 season. "Oh, yeah, no question," he said. "We could hear it from their dugout. We heard their whistling. What are you going to do?"

"Nats reliever Sean Doolittle recalled two of his blown saves against the Astros in 2017 on homers by George Springer and José Altuve when he pitched for Oakland," Boswell reports. "I was wondering what that did to my trade value. ... I got hit around a bunch by the Astros,' said Doolittle, who was soon traded to the Nats, along with Ryan Madson. ... 'I landed on my feet. I ended up in a great spot. But for some guys, their bad outings, that was the end of the road for them. They got sent down. They never got called back up again. I think about those guys a lot.'"

President Trump watches the Nationals play the Astros in Game 5 of the 2019 World Series in Washington. (John McDonnell/The Washington Post)

Tying these story lines together: The president shows grace for gamblers.

Trump endorsed Pete Rose's appeal to end his lifetime ban. The president, a former casino owner, tweeted over the weekend that the all-time leader in hits "paid a decades long price" for gambling on games in which his team was playing. Rose submitted a petition for reinstatement to Major League Baseball last week, citing the fact that Houston's players were not punished for sign-stealing to argue that his punishment was "disproportionate."

Meanwhile, the White House announced Thursday that Trump's former body man John McEntee will take over as the head of the office of presidential personnel. "McEntee lost his White House job in March 2018 because an investigation found he was a frequent gambler whose habit posed a security risk," Josh Dawsey reports. "A background investigation found that McEntee bet tens of thousands of dollars at a time, making him unsuitable for a sensitive position close to the president ... There was no indication his gambling was illegal, but there was concern that he could be vulnerable to outside influence ... McEntee will replace Sean Doocey, who some aides, including deputy chief of staff Emma Doyle, tried to keep from losing his job. But Trump is infuriated over what he believes are so many people around him who are not loyal, and that some 2016 campaign aides have not been able to get jobs, that he replaced Doocey with McEntee, according to two administration officials."

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost's essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

---

Programming note

In honor of Presidents' Day, there will be no 202 on Monday. We're also excited about our redesigned format. Thanks to everyone who sent feedback yesterday. We really want to make this email as useful and readable as possible for you. Let me know what you think at James.Hohmann@washpost.com or submit a form here to let our engineering team know what you like or don't like.

---

All the president's men

---

Quote of the day

“I think it’s time to stop the tweeting about Department of Justice criminal cases,” Attorney General Bill Barr said in an interview with ABC News, adding that such statements “make it impossible for me to do my job and to assure the courts and the prosecutors and the department that we’re doing our work with integrity.” He added: “I cannot do my job here at the department with a constant background commentary that undercuts me.”

Why the attorney general really rebuked the president

While the coverage has focused on Roger Stone’s sentencing, the president’s rage stems more from the fact that his appointees at the Justice Department have not been more aggressive about trying to prosecute his perceived enemies. “People close to Barr said that in recent months he has become increasingly frustrated with Trump’s tweets about the Justice Department,” Devlin Barrett, Matt Zapposky and Josh Dawsey report:

“Behind that public fight ... is a deeper tension between Trump and Barr’s Justice Department over the lack of criminal charges against [Jim Comey] and those close to him. ... Trump has repeatedly complained about FBI Director Christopher A. Wray in recent months, saying that Wray has not done enough to ... purge the bureau of people who are disloyal to him ... Justice Department Inspector General Michael Horowitz referred Comey’s handling of the memos [about his conversations with the president] to prosecutors for possible criminal prosecution, but lawyers quickly determined it was not a close call and did not seek to build a case. That sent Trump into a rage ... He complained so loudly and swore so frequently in the Oval Office that some of his aides discussed it for days ... Trump repeatedly said that Comey deserved to be charged ... ‘Can you [expletive] believe they didn’t charge him?’ Trump said on the night of the decision ...

“Trump has also wanted charges filed against Comey’s former deputy, Andrew McCabe. A separate inspector general investigation concluded that McCabe lied to investigators about his role in authorizing disclosures for a Wall Street Journal story in October 2016 about internal FBI tensions over an investigation of the Clinton Foundation. A grand jury in Washington seemed poised to make a decision on the case last year before fizzling into inaction.

“Trump’s anger over the lack of charges against FBI personnel flared again in January, prompted by two unrelated developments ... First, prosecutors updated their position in the case of former national security adviser Michael Flynn, saying a sentence of some prison time would be appropriate. Around the same time, The Washington Post reported that U.S. Attorney John Huber in Utah — tapped years earlier to reinvestigate several issues related to vague allegations of corruption against Hillary Clinton — had quietly wound down his work after finding nothing of consequence. ... In the president’s mind, it is unacceptable that people such as Comey and McCabe have not been charged, particularly if people such as Stone and Flynn are going to be treated harshly ...

“The president’s anger has focused increasingly on Jessie Liu, the former U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia, whose office has been handling many of the cases related to Comey and other former FBI officials. That office has recently conducted interviews in a leak inquiry, eyeing senior FBI officials over news stories in 2017 that discussed a top-secret Russian intelligence document that influenced Comey’s decision-making in 2016. Many of investigators’ questions have seemed focused on the former FBI director.

“Separately, Barr tapped U.S. Attorney John Durham in Connecticut to investigate whether any crimes were committed by FBI and CIA officials in the pursuit of allegations in 2016 that Russia interfered in the election to benefit Trump’s campaign. After learning that the Huber investigation is not likely to produce charges, Trump has become more insistent that Durham finish his work soon ... [Trump] wants to be able to use whatever Durham finds as a cudgel in his reelection campaign."

Investigators keep fishing for a pretext to charge Obama-era intelligence officials.

Questions being asked by Durham suggest he may be “pursuing a theory that the C.I.A., under its former director John O. Brennan, had a preconceived notion about Russia or was trying to get to a particular result — and was nefariously trying to keep other agencies from seeing the full picture lest they interfere with that goal,” the New York Times reports.

The White House’s muted response prompted theories that Barr’s comments were choreographed.

“Barr, while complaining about the impact of the tweets on the department’s mission, didn’t take issue with the substance of Trump’s comments, including one suggesting that the judge in Stone’s case was biased,” Fred Barbash and Allyson Chiu report. “And Barr’s comments didn’t elicit the expected flurry of backlash from Trump and his allies. Instead, White House press secretary Stephanie Grisham issued a statement saying, ‘The President wasn’t bothered by the comments at all.’ She added that Trump ‘has full faith and confidence in Attorney General Barr to do his job and uphold the law.’”

“There were plenty of plausible and practical reasons for Barr’s comments and their timing. The chief judge of the U.S. District Court in Washington has expressed concern about judges being pressured in the wake of Trump’s tweets and Barr’s statement allows government lawyers to disown the president’s comments when they appear in court. Barr is also facing unrest from lawyers within and outside of the department, including from the New York City bar, over the handling of the Stone case.”

“Barr isn’t objecting to Trump’s political interference with the Justice Department to undermine the rule of law,” observed Rep. Don Beyer (D-Va.). “He’s saying Trump shouldn’t tell everyone about it.”

Trump admits he sent Rudy Giuliani to find dirt on Joe Biden.

Geraldo Rivera, in a podcast interview, asked Trump, “Was it strange to send Rudy Giuliani to Ukraine, your personal lawyer? Are you sorry you did that?” Trump responded, “No, not at all.” He then praised the former New York mayor, who remains under investigation, as a “crime fighter.”

Judy Shelton, Trump's nominee to be a governor of the Federal Reserve, is sworn in for her confirmation hearing before the Senate Banking Committee on Thursday. (Andrew Harrer/Bloomberg News)

Trump's latest nominee to the Federal Reserve could be in trouble.

Three GOP senators on the Senate Banking Committee said last night they are undecided about whether to support Judy Shelton after sitting through her confirmation hearing: Pat Toomey (Pa.), Dick Shelby (Ala.) and John Neely Kennedy (La.). Any one of them could torpedo her nomination since Republicans only have a one-seat advantage on the panel. Toomey said he “didn’t know” if Shelton would uphold the Fed’s independence. Shelby said Shelton sounded like she “could be an outlier” whose views are outside the mainstream. "I'm undecided," Kennedy said after the hearing, adding "nobody wants anybody on the Federal Reserve that has a fatal attraction to nutty ideas."

Shelton "is known as an outspoken critic of the Federal Reserve and for advocating that the United States return to something akin to the gold standard, which the nation fully abandoned in 1971," Heather Long reports. "She has alarmed many in the financial world by calling for more coordination between the Fed and the White House. She has also altered some of her views to appear more in line with Trump's aggressive push for lower interest rates ... The White House said it stands fully behind Shelton, who said several times during her confirmation hearing she would bring 'intellectual diversity' to the Fed. ...

"Trump's prior two picks — businessman Herman Cain and conservative pundit Stephen Moore — both had to withdraw because of dicey personal issues. ... Two of Trump's other Fed nominees were also passed over. ... Trump has made no secret he regrets picking Jerome H. Powell to be Fed chair, and there's concern that Trump would quickly elevate Shelton to the top job at the central bank when Powell's term expires in early 2022."

The Senate passed a resolution to limit Trump's power to start a war with Iran.

Trump plans to veto the measure once it passes the House, and neither chamber of Congress has the votes to override that veto. But eight Republicans joined all Democrats in voting 55 to 45 for the measure, "despite sharp warnings from Trump that challenging his war powers would 'show weakness' and send 'a very bad signal' to Tehran," Karoun Demirjian reports.

Mitch McConnell told Fox News he would fill a Supreme Court vacancy if one opens this year.

If you were alive in 2016, you will recall this was the excuse the Senate majority leader used to deny giving Merrick Garland a hearing. The Kentucky senator said back then it would be totally inappropriate for the Senate to put someone on the Supreme Court in an election year. But that was when his party didn't control the White House.

Meanwhile, Garland yesterday formally stepped down from his role as chief judge of the D.C. Circuit, the second most powerful court in the country. He passed the gavel to Sri Srinivasan, the first person of South Asian descent to lead a federal circuit court. Garland will continue to serve on the court he joined three decades ago, per Ann Marimow.

Ignoring the will of Congress, Trump diverted $3.8 billion more from the Pentagon to his border wall.

In a letter to Congress, the administration said money appropriated for the purchase of aircraft will instead be spent on wall construction. “The Pentagon is moving the money using a counternarcotics law that allows the Defense Department to build fencing for other federal, state and local agencies in known drug-smuggling corridors,” Paul Sonne and Nick Miroff report.

During the State of the Union, Trump touted a veteran’s comeback story. It was not true.

“Tony Rankins, a formerly homeless, drug-addicted Army veteran, got a standing ovation at the [speech] after [Trump] described how he turned his life around thanks to a construction job at a company using the administration’s ‘Opportunity Zone’ tax breaks targeting poor neighborhoods,” the Associated Press scoops. “Rankins, who indeed moved out of his car and into an apartment since landing a job refurbishing a Nashville hotel two years ago, doesn’t work at a site taking advantage of the breaks and never has done so. In fact, he started that job four months before the Treasury Department published its final list of neighborhoods eligible for the breaks. And the hotel where he worked couldn’t benefit even now because it’s an area that didn’t make the cut.”

---

2020 watch

Pete Buttigieg looks at his husband Chasten at his New Hampshire primary night rally in Nashua on Tuesday. (Brendan Mcdermid/Reuters)

Trump allies are starting to focus attention on Pete Buttigieg's sexual orientation.

Rush Limbaugh, a week after receiving the Presidential Medal of Freedom, questioned whether Americans are ready for a gay candidate who kisses his husband onstage. The Federalist, a conservative web site, defended Limbaugh. On his own radio show Wednesday, Seb Gorka, a former deputy assistant to the president and a Trump campaign surrogate, questioned “what right” Buttigieg had to talk about abortion rights if he’s never going to impregnate a woman. “Why is a homosexual man lecturing us about the sanctity of life in the womb? Just a little curious there. Strange, strange,” Gorka said. Conservative radio host Ben Ferguson seemed to imply Buttigieg is less masculine because he is gay. A video that went viral last week showed an Iowa woman who caucused for Buttigieg asking whether she could change her vote after finding out he’s gay. “He’d better read the Bible,” the woman said.

“The attacks are prompting blunt responses from Buttigieg’s allies and even his Democratic rivals, who call the remarks inappropriate and offensive,” Amy B Wang and Chelsea Janes report. Pro-LGBTQ "Victory Fund staffers deliberated internally on whether to respond to the comments since they did not want amplify them. But given Limbaugh's high profile, the group decided it needed to respond. 'The real question is who wants to kiss Rush Limbaugh,' the group tweeted Thursday. ...

“Previous candidates have sometimes decided to confront identity issues directly: Barack Obama delivered a highly personal talk on race in 2008, and John F. Kennedy gave a major speech about his Catholicism in 1960 to a group of Protestant ministers. So far the Buttigieg campaign has evidently concluded that ignoring the remarks is the best course, but that could change if the attacks become louder and more frequent, or show signs of resonating more widely. ...

“Since Buttigieg's strong performances in Iowa and New Hampshire, journalists have begun raising the issue of his sexuality more frequently, prompting responses like his recent comment to People magazine that he was excited to start a family 'soon' with his husband Chasten. 'No matter what happens, I think the next chapter in our personal lives is going to be about kids,' Buttigieg said.”

“The Benefits of Being Joe Biden's Brother.”

That's the headline of a new ProPublica review of the relationship between Jim Biden's business ventures and the former vice president's political capital: Jim often “turned to Joe's political network for the kind of assistance that would have been almost unimaginable for someone with a different last name. Campaign donors helped him face a series of financial problems, including a series of IRS liens totaling more than $1 million that made it harder to get bank financing. ... [O]n occasion, as Jim pursued opportunities, Joe met with his potential clients or partners, at Jim's request.”

Nevada's most powerful union won't endorse before next week's caucuses.

“The Culinary Union, which represents 60,000 hotel and casino workers across Nevada and is considered an organizing behemoth in Democratic politics here, said it would instead flex its power to get its members out to vote in the caucuses,” report Holly Bailey and Felicia Sonmez. “The decision came after months of aggressive courting from candidates eager to win the support of the politically powerful group, whose endorsement has long been viewed as a major advantage in mobilizing Latinos and women, who make up most of its membership and have been a decisive political force in the state.” The decision comes after the union claimed Bernie Sanders followers “viciously attacked” it for standing against Medicare-for-all. In response to that kerfuffle, Sanders released a statement condemning online harassment and urging supporters of all campaigns “not to engage in bullying or personal attacks.”

Nevada Democrats are trying to clarify how their caucuses will work as concerns grow.

“The Nevada State Democratic Party announced Thursday that it will use a Web-based calculator designed to complete caucus math and report results on an iPad,” report Elise Viebeck and Isaac Stanley-Becker.

“Precinct chairs will receive preconfigured iPads, purchased by the party, and will access the calculator through a ‘secure Google web form,’ the state party said in a memo to presidential campaigns. Results will be transmitted through a secure hotline and verified either through the online calculator or with paper reporting sheets.”

Elizabeth Warren said she's raised $6 million since Iowa.

“Hours later, during a raucous evening rally at a high school gym in Washington’s Virginia suburbs, Warren didn’t seem like a candidate worried about leaving the race,” the AP reports. The $6 million, though respectable, pales in comparison to Sanders, who raised more than $25 million in January.

For his part, Trump will headline a $580,600-per-couple fundraiser in Palm Beach on Saturday, per Dawsey and Michelle Ye Hee Lee.

More candidates are stepping up attacks against a rising Mike Bloomberg.

“Struggling to recover from poor showings in the Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire primary, [Warren] and [Biden] took the lead in attacking Bloomberg. [Biden] said on ABC’s ‘The View’ that ‘I don’t think you can buy an election,’ while Warren took Bloomberg to task for his 2008 comments that ending redlining, a discriminatory housing practice helped trigger the economic meltdown,” the AP reports.

---

The coronavirus crisis

A man wears a gas mask as he holds a bouquet of flowers on Friday in Hong Kong. (Tyrone Siu/Reuters)

The economic fallout is growing around the world.

Singapore’s leader warned of a possible recession as the virus and travel curbs slam the regional economy. Asian and European auto plants are running short of parts, Chinese tourists are staying home and American companies are bracing for unpredictable turbulence. And that’s just the start. The financial hangover will linger for months, even if the illness is soon brought under control.

“The Chinese epidemic’s aftereffects will probably cause the global economy to shrink this quarter for the first time since the depths of the 2009 financial crisis, according to Capital Economics in London,” David Lynch reports. “Caterpillar this week said most of its Chinese suppliers have returned to work. But Foxconn, a major electronics producer for Apple, said it will be the end of the month before even half of its facilities are operating. ... The ripple effects of China’s shutdown are spreading, with the auto industry especially hard-hit. Nissan temporarily closed one of its factories in Japan after running short of Chinese components, one week after Hyundai in South Korea did the same. Fiat Chrysler warned that it may shutter one of its European plants. Some U.S. manufacturers could face parts shortages in one to two weeks.”

One corner of China’s economy has been particularly hard-hit: Flower sellers.

“Forget red roses. Broccoli, cauliflower, masks and hand sanitizer are now the way to prove you love your partner this Valentine’s Day in China,” Wang Yuan reports. “Flower delivery platforms are reporting a massive drop in online flower sales, as health fears dissuade people from ordering anything online or picking up deliveries. Zhong’ai Flower, an online flower delivery platform based in Wuhan, the epicenter of coronavirus outbreak, reported a sales drop of 90 percent. Ma Yingzi, a flower supplier in Beijing, also estimated a 95 percent drop in flower sales this Valentine’s Day.”

Another 5,000 cases of coronavirus were reported, bringing the count in mainland China past 63,000.

“More places in Hubei province, the epicenter of the outbreak, are enacting ‘wartime’ measures, such as sealing off residential complexes and only allowing essential vehicles on the roads. Authorities in Yunmeng county, where the new steps kicked in on Friday morning, said that anyone attempting to breach the lockdown ‘at compounds, buildings or road connections’ would be detained,” Shibani Mahtani and Miriam

Berger report. “Apps are being used to track citizens who must provide their information before entering and exiting key Chinese cities, allowing authorities to collect a huge amount of data. ... China’s National Health Commission said more than 1,700 medical workers have been infected with coronavirus, six of whom have died, citing the latest available figures as of Feb. 11.”

Japan said 10 people were evacuated from the quarantined cruise ship in serious condition.

Eight were confirmed to have the virus, Simon Denyer reports. “Amid persistent criticism of its approach, the government said it would start allowing some people who have tested negative for the virus to disembark from the ship early and finish their quarantine at a facility on land. Priority will be given to passengers over the age of 80 and those with existing medical problems, as well as people in windowless cabins, health minister Katsunobu Kato said. So far, 218 people on board the ship have tested positive for the virus.”

---

Social media speed read

Trump attacked Gov. Andrew Cuomo (D-N.Y.) before a White House meeting to discuss the state’s feud with federal immigration authorities, hinting the Empire State should drop lawsuits against him to get what it wants from the federal government. The lead House impeachment manager likened these hardball tactics to the alleged scheme to coerce Ukraine that got him impeached:

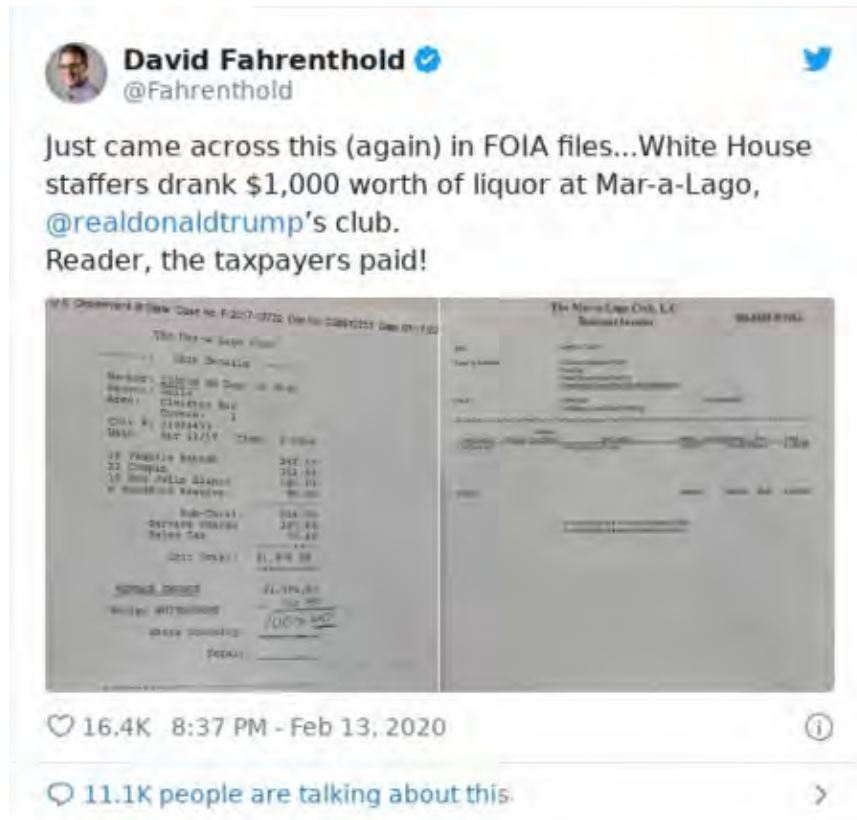

Trump attacked his former chief of staff after he spoke out against the president's retaliation against Lt. Col. Alexander Vindman:

You picked up the tab for the president's staffers drinking at Trump's private club:

A former federal prosecutor shined a light on why so many DOJ alumni are disgusted with Trump meddling in the cases of Stone and others:

Videos of the day

It may still be a couple of weeks away, but Stephen Colbert is already excited for the South Carolina primary:

Seth Meyers said Trump is turning the Department of Justice into a political weapon:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Speaking of Science for the latest, greatest and weirdest in science news, every Wednesday.

Expect news on discoveries, animals and space.

Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Donald Trump, the Houston Astros and the fear of the asterisk
Date: Friday, February 14, 2020 10:31:04 AM

Powered by LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Blue Cross Blue Shield Association

By James Hohmann

with Mariana Alfaro

Email

Donald Trump, the Houston Astros and the fear of the asterisk

Former White House communications director Hope Hicks told the FBI that President Trump viewed the intelligence community's assessment that Russia interfered on his behalf in the 2016 election as his "Achilles heel" because, even if it had no impact on the outcome of the election, people would think Russia helped him win.

Hicks, who will soon rejoin the White House, is one of multiple senior people quoted in former special counsel Bob Mueller's 2019 report to make the point that Trump was deeply concerned that acknowledging Russian interference would pock his electoral college triumph with an asterisk.*

Sean Spicer, Trump's first White House press secretary, said "the president thought the Russia story was developed to undermine the legitimacy of his election," according to Mueller. Former deputy campaign chairman Rick Gates said, "the president viewed the Russia investigation as an attack on the legitimacy of his win." And former White House chief of staff Reince Priebus recalled, "when the intelligence assessment came out, the president-elect was concerned people would question the legitimacy of his win."

Trump's enduring fear of the asterisk came to mind on Thursday in West Palm Beach, Fla., as the owner of the Houston Astros and his players insisted adamantly that they would have still won the World Series in 2017 without knowing in advance what pitches the opposing team was going to throw when playing at home.

Alex Bregman and Jose Altuve of the Houston Astros look on as owner Jim Crane reads a prepared statement during a news conference on Thursday in West Palm Beach, Fla. (Michael Reaves/Getty)

As pitchers and catchers reported for spring training, the 10 remaining players of the 2017 Astros appeared for a news conference at their Florida ballpark, which they share with the Washington Nationals and happens to be 10 miles from the president's Mar-a-Lago club.

Astros owner Jim Crane fired manager A.J. Hinch and general manager Jeff Luhnow last month after Major League Baseball released a report detailing its investigation into the electronic sign-stealing scheme the Astros were found to have used in 2017 and 2018. But Crane got defensive when asked whether what the team did amounted to cheating. "We broke the rules. You can phrase that any way you want," he told reporters.

"Our opinion is that this didn't impact the game," the owner added. "We had a good team. We won the World Series, and we'll leave it at that." Asked whether he should have been held accountable himself as the team's top official, Crane said: "No, I don't think I should be held accountable." When asked whether players should have been disciplined for knowingly participating in the scheme, he said: "Our players should not be punished. These are a great group of guys who did not receive proper guidance from their leaders."

"Crane's absolution of everyone except those who already have paid for the Astros' sins underscored the glaring limits of the apologies offered Thursday. The lack of specifics and the lack of introspection made it sometimes seem as if the Astros were reading from a list of talking points," Dave Sheinin reports. "They would admit what they did — stealing signs from opposing catchers using a center field camera and a video monitor — was wrong. Some would even acknowledge they gained an advantage through it. But they would accept no insinuation that their 2017 championship was in any way tainted."

Outfielder Josh Reddick, for example, would not admit that sign-stealing gave him an edge — "I can't really say it did [or] it didn't," he said — and said he felt no need to reach out to teams the Astros beat along the way. "I think it goes back to it not being a tainted championship. We were still a good team. [The scheme] wasn't the necessary point of us winning. We still won on the road as well."

What Reddick didn't say was that, in fact, Houston went 8-1 at Minute Maid Park that postseason. That's the stadium where they used an illegal camera to decipher the signs being used by opposing teams to relay them to batters by banging on a garbage can.

---

Content from Blue Cross Blue Shield Association

Addressing the need for more affordable medicines

Americans pay too much for prescription drugs. Even generics can be too expensive. So we're investing in a non-profit company to produce the drugs people need at a price they can afford. Learn more.

---

Trump's fear of the asterisk helps explain why he has continued to suggest, against all evidence to the contrary, that the Russians may not actually have done what an overwhelming mountain of evidence makes clear they did. "I don't believe they interfered," Trump told Time magazine in December 2016. "That became a laughing point, not a talking point, a laughing point. Any time I do something, they say 'oh, Russia interfered.'"

"This Russia thing with Trump and Russia is a made-up story," Trump told NBC in May 2017 after firing Jim Comey as FBI director. "It's an excuse by the Democrats for having lost an election that they should've won."

After meeting with Vladimir Putin in November 2017, Trump said he believed the Russian president's denials: "Every time he sees me, he says, 'I didn't do that.' And I really believe that, when he tells me that, he means it."

Mueller wrote in his report that Trump's fixation on the perceived legitimacy of his victory influenced some of his behavior, including the termination of Michael Flynn as national security adviser after The Washington Post broke the story about his conversation with the Russian ambassador regarding sanctions.

The impeachment inquiry, along with the rough transcript of Trump's July 25 phone call with his Ukrainian counterpart, also established that part of Trump's interest in that country was trying to cast doubt on the story line that Russia actually interfered in 2016.

In contrast to the Houston baseball team, the president has never apologized for anything related to Russia. He's not expressed regret for his own team's contacts in 2016 with Russians nor his false public statements about his knowledge of them.

As Mueller outlined 10 possible instances of obstruction of justice by Trump, he offered this analysis: “In this investigation, the evidence does not establish that the President was involved in an underlying crime related to Russian election interference. But the evidence does point to a range of other possible personal motives animating the President's conduct. These include concerns that continued investigation would call into question the legitimacy of his election and potential uncertainty about whether certain events, such as advance notice of WikiLeaks's release of hacked information or the June 9, 2016 meeting between senior campaign officials and Russians, could be seen as criminal activity by the President, his campaign, or his family.”

The Mueller report concluded that the Trump campaign expected to “benefit electorally” from information stolen and released by Russia. Don't forget, Trump even expressed this sentiment publicly. On July 27, 2016, he said at a campaign event: “Russia, if you're listening, I hope you're able to find the 30,000 emails that are missing.” Hours later, according to Mueller, Russian military intelligence attempted to hack Hillary Clinton's private email server for the first time.

Trump's asterisk fears weren't entirely misplaced. In the fourth year of his presidency, some of the president's critics continue to cite

Russian interference to speculate that he would have lost the election had it not been for a boost from the Kremlin.

“There’s no doubt that the Russians did interfere in the election, and I think the interference, although not yet quantified, if fully investigated would show that Trump didn’t actually win the election in 2016,” former president Jimmy Carter said last summer. “He lost the election, and he was put into office because the Russians interfered on his behalf.” Asked by historian Jon Meacham whether he considers Trump to be “an illegitimate president,” Carter replied: “Based on what I just said, which I can’t retract.”

Clinton herself dismissed Trump as an “illegitimate president” in September, suggesting that “he knows” he stole the 2016 election from her. “I believe he understands that the many varying tactics they used, from voter suppression and voter purging to hacking to the false stories — he knows that — there were just a bunch of different reasons why the election turned out like it did,” the former secretary of state said on CBS. “There were many funny things that happened in my election that will not happen again.”

A definitive answer is unknowable because so many other factors were at play in the election, including the FBI reopening – and then closing – the Clinton email investigation in the final weeks. But that won’t stop people from arguing about it for generations.

Trump continues to attack the Russia probe, nearly a year after its conclusion. “The Mueller investigation was a shakedown and a disgrace,” he told Geraldo Rivera for his “Roadkill” podcast on Thursday. “It probably should be expunged.”

Like how Clinton and Democrats remain embittered toward Trump, teams and players who lost to the Astros in 2017 will also always feel wronged.

Crane's assertion that his team's sign-stealing did not affect the outcome of games, and therefore did not taint the World Series, perturbed Houston's rivals. "Clearly, on what level did it impact things, I guess we'll never know, and that's for people to draw their own conclusions on," Yankees Manager Aaron Boone told reporters. "But clearly when we're talking about some of the things that went on, those things have an effect on games, clearly."

Just like with the question of whether Russian involvement changed the outcome of the election, no one will ever be able to definitively prove either way that the Astros would have lost the American League Championship Series or the World Series in 2017 had they not stolen signs.

New York Yankees closer Aroldis Chapman said that he believes the Astros' cheating cost them the 2017 World Series because the Astros beat the Yankees in Game Seven in the ALCS. "It was very close, and everything, all the details that come out, I think it was the extra edge that allowed them to move on," Chapman told Adam Kilgore.

Brett Anderson, who competed against the Astros with the A's in the American League West the past two seasons, responded to Crane's assertion with a GIF of Will Ferrell's "Anchorman" character Ron Burgundy saying, "I don't believe you."

And Texas Rangers outfielder Willie Calhoun quipped:

Kurt Suzuki, the Nationals catcher who gave complex signs this past October when Washington defeated the Astros to win the World Series, told Thomas Boswell that he thinks Houston was still cheating through the end of the 2019 season. "Oh, yeah, no question," he said. "We could hear it from their dugout. We heard their whistling. What are you going to do?"

"Nats reliever Sean Doolittle recalled two of his blown saves against the Astros in 2017 on homers by George Springer and José Altuve when he pitched for Oakland," Boswell reports. "I was wondering what that did to my trade value. ... I got hit around a bunch by the Astros,' said Doolittle, who was soon traded to the Nats, along with Ryan Madson. ... 'I landed on my feet. I ended up in a great spot. But for some guys, their bad outings, that was the end of the road for them. They got sent down. They never got called back up again. I think about those guys a lot.'"

President Trump watches the Nationals play the Astros in Game 5 of the 2019 World Series in Washington. (John McDonnell/The Washington Post)

Tying these story lines together: The president shows grace for gamblers.

Trump endorsed Pete Rose's appeal to end his lifetime ban. The president, a former casino owner, tweeted over the weekend that the all-time leader in hits "paid a decades long price" for gambling on games in which his team was playing. Rose submitted a petition for reinstatement to Major League Baseball last week, citing the fact that Houston's players were not punished for sign-stealing to argue that his punishment was "disproportionate."

Meanwhile, the White House announced Thursday that Trump’s former body man John McEntee will take over as the head of the office of presidential personnel. “McEntee lost his White House job in March 2018 because an investigation found he was a frequent gambler whose habit posed a security risk,” Josh Dawsey reports. “A background investigation found that McEntee bet tens of thousands of dollars at a time, making him unsuitable for a sensitive position close to the president ... There was no indication his gambling was illegal, but there was concern that he could be vulnerable to outside influence ... McEntee will replace Sean Doocey, who some aides, including deputy chief of staff Emma Doyle, tried to keep from losing his job. But Trump is infuriated over what he believes are so many people around him who are not loyal, and that some 2016 campaign aides have not been able to get jobs, that he replaced Doocey with McEntee, according to two administration officials."

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost's essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

---

Programming note

In honor of Presidents' Day, there will be no 202 on Monday. We're also excited about our redesigned format. Thanks to everyone who sent feedback yesterday. We really want to make this email as useful and readable as possible for you. Let me know what you think at James.Hohmann@washpost.com or submit a form here to let our engineering team know what you like or don't like.

---

All the president's men

---

Quote of the day

“I think it’s time to stop the tweeting about Department of Justice criminal cases,” Attorney General Bill Barr said in an interview with ABC News, adding that such statements “make it impossible for me to do my job and to assure the courts and the prosecutors and the department that we’re doing our work with integrity.” He added: “I cannot do my job here at the department with a constant background commentary that undercuts me.”

Why the attorney general really rebuked the president

While the coverage has focused on Roger Stone’s sentencing, the president’s rage stems more from the fact that his appointees at the Justice Department have not been more aggressive about trying to prosecute his perceived enemies. “People close to Barr said that in recent months he has become increasingly frustrated with Trump’s tweets about the Justice Department,” Devlin Barrett, Matt Zapposky and Josh Dawsey report:

“Behind that public fight ... is a deeper tension between Trump and Barr’s Justice Department over the lack of criminal charges against [Jim Comey] and those close to him. ... Trump has repeatedly complained about FBI Director Christopher A. Wray in recent months, saying that Wray has not done enough to ... purge the bureau of people who are disloyal to him ... Justice Department Inspector General Michael Horowitz referred Comey’s handling of the memos [about his conversations with the president] to prosecutors for possible criminal prosecution, but lawyers quickly determined it was not a close call and did not seek to build a case. That sent Trump into a rage ... He complained so loudly and swore so frequently in the Oval Office that some of his aides discussed it for days ... Trump repeatedly said that Comey deserved to be charged ... ‘Can you [expletive] believe they didn’t charge him?’ Trump said on the night of the decision ...

“Trump has also wanted charges filed against Comey’s former deputy, Andrew McCabe. A separate inspector general investigation concluded that McCabe lied to investigators about his role in authorizing disclosures for a Wall Street Journal story in October 2016 about internal FBI tensions over an investigation of the Clinton Foundation. A grand jury in Washington seemed poised to make a decision on the case last year before fizzling into inaction.

“Trump’s anger over the lack of charges against FBI personnel flared again in January, prompted by two unrelated developments ... First, prosecutors updated their position in the case of former national security adviser Michael Flynn, saying a sentence of some prison time would be appropriate. Around the same time, The Washington Post reported that U.S. Attorney John Huber in Utah — tapped years earlier to reinvestigate several issues related to vague allegations of corruption against Hillary Clinton — had quietly wound down his work after finding nothing of consequence. ... In the president’s mind, it is unacceptable that people such as Comey and McCabe have not been charged, particularly if people such as Stone and Flynn are going to be treated harshly ...

“The president’s anger has focused increasingly on Jessie Liu, the former U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia, whose office has been handling many of the cases related to Comey and other former FBI officials. That office has recently conducted interviews in a leak inquiry, eyeing senior FBI officials over news stories in 2017 that discussed a top-secret Russian intelligence document that influenced Comey’s decision-making in 2016. Many of investigators’ questions have seemed focused on the former FBI director.

“Separately, Barr tapped U.S. Attorney John Durham in Connecticut to investigate whether any crimes were committed by FBI and CIA officials in the pursuit of allegations in 2016 that Russia interfered in the election to benefit Trump’s campaign. After learning that the Huber investigation is not likely to produce charges, Trump has become more insistent that Durham finish his work soon ... [Trump] wants to be able to use whatever Durham finds as a cudgel in his reelection campaign."

Investigators keep fishing for a pretext to charge Obama-era intelligence officials.

Questions being asked by Durham suggest he may be “pursuing a theory that the C.I.A., under its former director John O. Brennan, had a preconceived notion about Russia or was trying to get to a particular result — and was nefariously trying to keep other agencies from seeing the full picture lest they interfere with that goal,” the New York Times reports.

The White House’s muted response prompted theories that Barr’s comments were choreographed.

“Barr, while complaining about the impact of the tweets on the department’s mission, didn’t take issue with the substance of Trump’s comments, including one suggesting that the judge in Stone’s case was biased,” Fred Barbash and Allyson Chiu report. “And Barr’s comments didn’t elicit the expected flurry of backlash from Trump and his allies. Instead, White House press secretary Stephanie Grisham issued a statement saying, ‘The President wasn’t bothered by the comments at all.’ She added that Trump ‘has full faith and confidence in Attorney General Barr to do his job and uphold the law.’”

“There were plenty of plausible and practical reasons for Barr’s comments and their timing. The chief judge of the U.S. District Court in Washington has expressed concern about judges being pressured in the wake of Trump’s tweets and Barr’s statement allows government lawyers to disown the president’s comments when they appear in court. Barr is also facing unrest from lawyers within and outside of the department, including from the New York City bar, over the handling of the Stone case.”

“Barr isn’t objecting to Trump’s political interference with the Justice Department to undermine the rule of law,” observed Rep. Don Beyer (D-Va.). “He’s saying Trump shouldn’t tell everyone about it.”

Trump admits he sent Rudy Giuliani to find dirt on Joe Biden.

Geraldo Rivera, in a podcast interview, asked Trump, “Was it strange to send Rudy Giuliani to Ukraine, your personal lawyer? Are you sorry you did that?” Trump responded, “No, not at all.” He then praised the former New York mayor, who remains under investigation, as a “crime fighter.”

Judy Shelton, Trump's nominee to be a governor of the Federal Reserve, is sworn in for her confirmation hearing before the Senate Banking Committee on Thursday. (Andrew Harrer/Bloomberg News)

Trump's latest nominee to the Federal Reserve could be in trouble.

Three GOP senators on the Senate Banking Committee said last night they are undecided about whether to support Judy Shelton after sitting through her confirmation hearing: Pat Toomey (Pa.), Dick Shelby (Ala.) and John Neely Kennedy (La.). Any one of them could torpedo her nomination since Republicans only have a one-seat advantage on the panel. Toomey said he “didn’t know” if Shelton would uphold the Fed’s independence. Shelby said Shelton sounded like she “could be an outlier” whose views are outside the mainstream. "I'm undecided," Kennedy said after the hearing, adding "nobody wants anybody on the Federal Reserve that has a fatal attraction to nutty ideas."

Shelton "is known as an outspoken critic of the Federal Reserve and for advocating that the United States return to something akin to the gold standard, which the nation fully abandoned in 1971," Heather Long reports. "She has alarmed many in the financial world by calling for more coordination between the Fed and the White House. She has also altered some of her views to appear more in line with Trump's aggressive push for lower interest rates ... The White House said it stands fully behind Shelton, who said several times during her confirmation hearing she would bring 'intellectual diversity' to the Fed. ...

"Trump's prior two picks — businessman Herman Cain and conservative pundit Stephen Moore — both had to withdraw because of dicey personal issues. ... Two of Trump's other Fed nominees were also passed over. ... Trump has made no secret he regrets picking Jerome H. Powell to be Fed chair, and there's concern that Trump would quickly elevate Shelton to the top job at the central bank when Powell's term expires in early 2022."

The Senate passed a resolution to limit Trump's power to start a war with Iran.

Trump plans to veto the measure once it passes the House, and neither chamber of Congress has the votes to override that veto. But eight Republicans joined all Democrats in voting 55 to 45 for the measure, "despite sharp warnings from Trump that challenging his war powers would 'show weakness' and send 'a very bad signal' to Tehran," Karoun Demirjian reports.

Mitch McConnell told Fox News he would fill a Supreme Court vacancy if one opens this year.

If you were alive in 2016, you will recall this was the excuse the Senate majority leader used to deny giving Merrick Garland a hearing. The Kentucky senator said back then it would be totally inappropriate for the Senate to put someone on the Supreme Court in an election year. But that was when his party didn't control the White House.

Meanwhile, Garland yesterday formally stepped down from his role as chief judge of the D.C. Circuit, the second most powerful court in the country. He passed the gavel to Sri Srinivasan, the first person of South Asian descent to lead a federal circuit court. Garland will continue to serve on the court he joined three decades ago, per Ann Marimow.

Ignoring the will of Congress, Trump diverted $3.8 billion more from the Pentagon to his border wall.

In a letter to Congress, the administration said money appropriated for the purchase of aircraft will instead be spent on wall construction. “The Pentagon is moving the money using a counternarcotics law that allows the Defense Department to build fencing for other federal, state and local agencies in known drug-smuggling corridors,” Paul Sonne and Nick Miroff report.

During the State of the Union, Trump touted a veteran’s comeback story. It was not true.

“Tony Rankins, a formerly homeless, drug-addicted Army veteran, got a standing ovation at the [speech] after [Trump] described how he turned his life around thanks to a construction job at a company using the administration’s ‘Opportunity Zone’ tax breaks targeting poor neighborhoods,” the Associated Press scoops. “Rankins, who indeed moved out of his car and into an apartment since landing a job refurbishing a Nashville hotel two years ago, doesn’t work at a site taking advantage of the breaks and never has done so. In fact, he started that job four months before the Treasury Department published its final list of neighborhoods eligible for the breaks. And the hotel where he worked couldn’t benefit even now because it’s an area that didn’t make the cut.”

---

2020 watch

Pete Buttigieg looks at his husband Chasten at his New Hampshire primary night rally in Nashua on Tuesday. (Brendan Mcdermid/Reuters)

Trump allies are starting to focus attention on Pete Buttigieg's sexual orientation.

Rush Limbaugh, a week after receiving the Presidential Medal of Freedom, questioned whether Americans are ready for a gay candidate who kisses his husband onstage. The Federalist, a conservative web site, defended Limbaugh. On his own radio show Wednesday, Seb Gorka, a former deputy assistant to the president and a Trump campaign surrogate, questioned “what right” Buttigieg had to talk about abortion rights if he’s never going to impregnate a woman. “Why is a homosexual man lecturing us about the sanctity of life in the womb? Just a little curious there. Strange, strange,” Gorka said. Conservative radio host Ben Ferguson seemed to imply Buttigieg is less masculine because he is gay. A video that went viral last week showed an Iowa woman who caucused for Buttigieg asking whether she could change her vote after finding out he’s gay. “He’d better read the Bible,” the woman said.

“The attacks are prompting blunt responses from Buttigieg’s allies and even his Democratic rivals, who call the remarks inappropriate and

offensive,” Amy B Wang and Chelsea Janes report. Pro-LGBTQ "Victory Fund staffers deliberated internally on whether to respond to the comments since they did not want amplify them. But given Limbaugh's high profile, the group decided it needed to respond. 'The real question is who wants to kiss Rush Limbaugh,' the group tweeted Thursday. ...

“Previous candidates have sometimes decided to confront identity issues directly: Barack Obama delivered a highly personal talk on race in 2008, and John F. Kennedy gave a major speech about his Catholicism in 1960 to a group of Protestant ministers. So far the Buttigieg campaign has evidently concluded that ignoring the remarks is the best course, but that could change if the attacks become louder and more frequent, or show signs of resonating more widely. ...

“Since Buttigieg's strong performances in Iowa and New Hampshire, journalists have begun raising the issue of his sexuality more frequently, prompting responses like his recent comment to People magazine that he was excited to start a family 'soon' with his husband Chasten. 'No matter what happens, I think the next chapter in our personal lives is going to be about kids,' Buttigieg said.”

“The Benefits of Being Joe Biden's Brother.”

That's the headline of a new ProPublica review of the relationship between Jim Biden's business ventures and the former vice president's political capital: Jim often “turned to Joe's political network for the kind of assistance that would have been almost unimaginable for someone with a different last name. Campaign donors helped him face a series of financial problems, including a series of IRS liens totaling more than $1 million that made it harder to get bank financing. ... [O]n occasion, as Jim pursued opportunities, Joe met with his potential clients or partners, at Jim's request.”

Nevada's most powerful union won't endorse before next week's caucuses.

“The Culinary Union, which represents 60,000 hotel and casino workers across Nevada and is considered an organizing behemoth in Democratic politics here, said it would instead flex its power to get its members out to vote in the caucuses,” report Holly Bailey and Felicia Sonmez. “The decision came after months of aggressive courting from candidates eager to win the support of the politically powerful group, whose endorsement has long been viewed as a major advantage in mobilizing Latinos and women, who make up most of its membership and have been a decisive political force in the state.” The decision comes after the union claimed Bernie Sanders followers “viciously attacked” it for standing against Medicare-for-all. In response to that kerfuffle, Sanders released a statement condemning online harassment and urging supporters of all campaigns “not to engage in bullying or personal attacks.”

Nevada Democrats are trying to clarify how their caucuses will work as concerns grow.

“The Nevada State Democratic Party announced Thursday that it will use a Web-based calculator designed to complete caucus math and report results on an iPad,” report Elise Viebeck and Isaac Stanley-Becker.

“Precinct chairs will receive preconfigured iPads, purchased by the party, and will access the calculator through a ‘secure Google web form,’ the state party said in a memo to presidential campaigns. Results will be transmitted through a secure hotline and verified either through the online calculator or with paper reporting sheets.”

Elizabeth Warren said she's raised $6 million since Iowa.

“Hours later, during a raucous evening rally at a high school gym in Washington’s Virginia suburbs, Warren didn’t seem like a candidate worried about leaving the race,” the AP reports. The $6 million, though respectable, pales in comparison to Sanders, who raised more than $25 million in January.

For his part, Trump will headline a $580,600-per-couple fundraiser in Palm Beach on Saturday, per Dawsey and Michelle Ye Hee Lee.

More candidates are stepping up attacks against a rising Mike Bloomberg.

“Struggling to recover from poor showings in the Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire primary, [Warren] and [Biden] took the lead in attacking Bloomberg. [Biden] said on ABC’s ‘The View’ that ‘I don’t think you can buy an election,’ while Warren took Bloomberg to task for his 2008 comments that ending redlining, a discriminatory housing practice helped trigger the economic meltdown,” the AP reports.

---

The coronavirus crisis

A man wears a gas mask as he holds a bouquet of flowers on Friday in Hong Kong. (Tyrone Siu/Reuters)

The economic fallout is growing around the world.

Singapore’s leader warned of a possible recession as the virus and travel curbs slam the regional economy. Asian and European auto plants are running short of parts, Chinese tourists are staying home and American companies are bracing for unpredictable turbulence. And that’s just the start. The financial hangover will linger for months, even if the illness is soon brought under control.

“The Chinese epidemic’s aftereffects will probably cause the global economy to shrink this quarter for the first time since the depths of the 2009 financial crisis, according to Capital Economics in London,” David Lynch reports. “Caterpillar this week said most of its Chinese suppliers have returned to work. But Foxconn, a major electronics producer for Apple, said it will be the end of the month before even half of its facilities are operating. ... The ripple effects of China’s shutdown are spreading, with the auto industry especially hard-hit. Nissan temporarily closed one of its factories in Japan after running short of Chinese components, one week after Hyundai in South Korea did the same. Fiat Chrysler warned that it may shutter one of its European plants. Some U.S. manufacturers could face parts shortages in one to two weeks.”

One corner of China’s economy has been particularly hard-hit: Flower sellers.

“Forget red roses. Broccoli, cauliflower, masks and hand sanitizer are now the way to prove you love your partner this Valentine’s Day in China,” Wang Yuan reports. “Flower delivery platforms are reporting a massive drop in online flower sales, as health fears dissuade people from ordering anything online or picking up deliveries. Zhong’ai Flower, an online flower delivery platform based in Wuhan, the epicenter of coronavirus outbreak, reported a sales drop of 90 percent. Ma Yingzi, a flower supplier in Beijing, also estimated a 95 percent drop in flower sales this Valentine’s Day.”

Another 5,000 cases of coronavirus were reported, bringing the count in mainland China past 63,000.

“More places in Hubei province, the epicenter of the outbreak, are enacting ‘wartime’ measures, such as sealing off residential complexes and only allowing essential vehicles on the roads. Authorities in Yunmeng county, where the new steps kicked in on Friday morning, said that anyone attempting to breach the lockdown ‘at compounds, buildings or road connections’ would be detained,” Shibani Mahtani and Miriam

Berger report. “Apps are being used to track citizens who must provide their information before entering and exiting key Chinese cities, allowing authorities to collect a huge amount of data. ... China’s National Health Commission said more than 1,700 medical workers have been infected with coronavirus, six of whom have died, citing the latest available figures as of Feb. 11.”

Japan said 10 people were evacuated from the quarantined cruise ship in serious condition.

Eight were confirmed to have the virus, Simon Denyer reports. “Amid persistent criticism of its approach, the government said it would start allowing some people who have tested negative for the virus to disembark from the ship early and finish their quarantine at a facility on land. Priority will be given to passengers over the age of 80 and those with existing medical problems, as well as people in windowless cabins, health minister Katsunobu Kato said. So far, 218 people on board the ship have tested positive for the virus.”

---

Social media speed read

Trump attacked Gov. Andrew Cuomo (D-N.Y.) before a White House meeting to discuss the state’s feud with federal immigration authorities, hinting the Empire State should drop lawsuits against him to get what it wants from the federal government. The lead House impeachment manager likened these hardball tactics to the alleged scheme to coerce Ukraine that got him impeached:

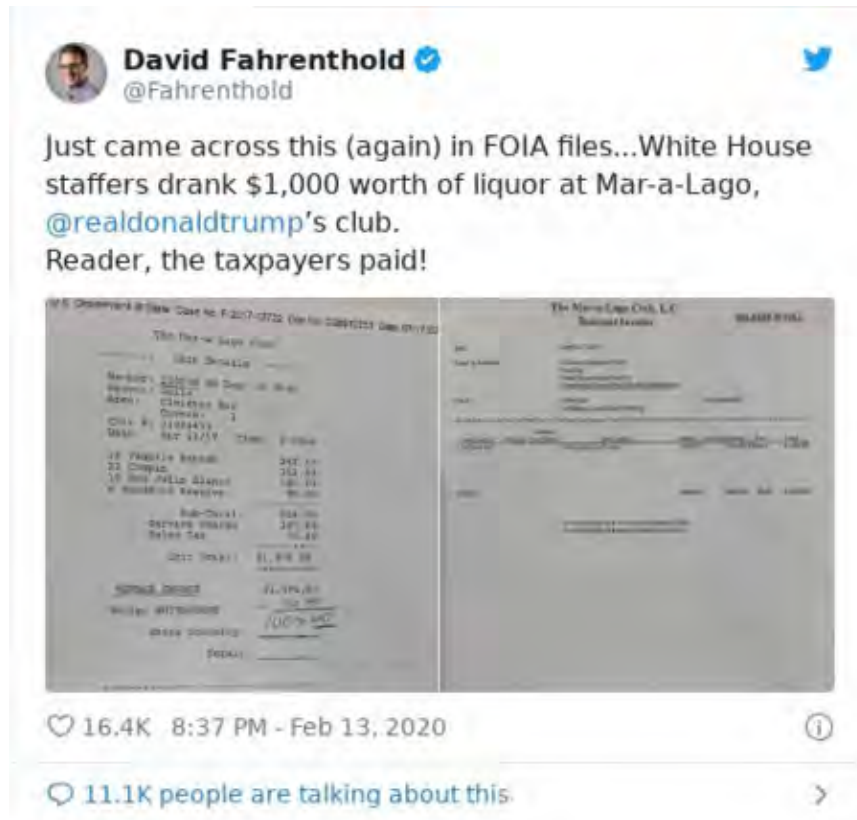

Trump attacked his former chief of staff after he spoke out against the president's retaliation against Lt. Col. Alexander Vindman:

You picked up the tab for the president's staffers drinking at Trump's private club:

A former federal prosecutor shined a light on why so many DOJ alumni are disgusted with Trump meddling in the cases of Stone and others:

Videos of the day

It may still be a couple of weeks away, but Stephen Colbert is already excited for the South Carolina primary:

Seth Meyers said Trump is turning the Department of Justice into a political weapon:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Speaking of Science for the latest, greatest and weirdest in science news, every Wednesday. Expect news on discoveries, animals and space.

Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Donald Trump, the Houston Astros and the fear of the asterisk
Date: Friday, February 14, 2020 10:32:01 AM

Powered by LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Blue Cross Blue Shield Association

By James Hohmann

with Mariana Alfaro

Email

Donald Trump, the Houston Astros and the fear of the asterisk

Former White House communications director Hope Hicks told the FBI that President Trump viewed the intelligence community's assessment that Russia interfered on his behalf in the 2016 election as his "Achilles heel" because, even if it had no impact on the outcome of the election, people would think Russia helped him win.

Hicks, who will soon rejoin the White House, is one of multiple senior people quoted in former special counsel Bob Mueller's 2019 report to make the point that Trump was deeply concerned that acknowledging Russian interference would pock his electoral college triumph with an asterisk.*

Sean Spicer, Trump's first White House press secretary, said "the president thought the Russia story was developed to undermine the legitimacy of his election," according to Mueller. Former deputy campaign chairman Rick Gates said, "the president viewed the Russia investigation as an attack on the legitimacy of his win." And former White House chief of staff Reince Priebus recalled, "when the intelligence assessment came out, the president-elect was concerned people would question the legitimacy of his win."

Trump's enduring fear of the asterisk came to mind on Thursday in West Palm Beach, Fla., as the owner of the Houston Astros and his players insisted adamantly that they would have still won the World Series in 2017 without knowing in advance what pitches the opposing team was going to throw when playing at home.

Alex Bregman and Jose Altuve of the Houston Astros look on as owner Jim Crane reads a prepared statement during a news conference on Thursday in West Palm Beach, Fla. (Michael Reaves/Getty)

As pitchers and catchers reported for spring training, the 10 remaining players of the 2017 Astros appeared for a news conference at their Florida ballpark, which they share with the Washington Nationals and happens to be 10 miles from the president's Mar-a-Lago club.

Astros owner Jim Crane fired manager A.J. Hinch and general manager Jeff Luhnow last month after Major League Baseball released a report detailing its investigation into the electronic sign-stealing scheme the Astros were found to have used in 2017 and 2018. But Crane got defensive when asked whether what the team did amounted to cheating. "We broke the rules. You can phrase that any way you want," he told reporters.

"Our opinion is that this didn't impact the game," the owner added. "We had a good team. We won the World Series, and we'll leave it at that." Asked whether he should have been held accountable himself as the team's top official, Crane said: "No, I don't think I should be held accountable." When asked whether players should have been disciplined for knowingly participating in the scheme, he said: "Our players should not be punished. These are a great group of guys who did not receive proper guidance from their leaders."

"Crane's absolution of everyone except those who already have paid for the Astros' sins underscored the glaring limits of the apologies offered Thursday. The lack of specifics and the lack of introspection made it sometimes seem as if the Astros were reading from a list of talking points," Dave Sheinin reports. "They would admit what they did — stealing signs from opposing catchers using a center field camera and a video monitor — was wrong. Some would even acknowledge they gained an advantage through it. But they would accept no insinuation that their 2017 championship was in any way tainted."

Outfielder Josh Reddick, for example, would not admit that sign-stealing gave him an edge — "I can't really say it did [or] it didn't," he said — and said he felt no need to reach out to teams the Astros beat along the way. "I think it goes back to it not being a tainted championship. We were still a good team. [The scheme] wasn't the necessary point of us winning. We still won on the road as well."

What Reddick didn't say was that, in fact, Houston went 8-1 at Minute Maid Park that postseason. That's the stadium where they used an illegal camera to decipher the signs being used by opposing teams to relay them to batters by banging on a garbage can.

---

Content from Blue Cross Blue Shield Association

Addressing the need for more affordable medicines

Americans pay too much for prescription drugs. Even generics can be too expensive. So we're investing in a non-profit company to produce the drugs people need at a price they can afford. Learn more.

---

Trump's fear of the asterisk helps explain why he has continued to suggest, against all evidence to the contrary, that the Russians may not actually have done what an overwhelming mountain of evidence makes clear they did. "I don't believe they interfered," Trump told Time magazine in December 2016. "That became a laughing point, not a talking point, a laughing point. Any time I do something, they say 'oh, Russia interfered.'"

"This Russia thing with Trump and Russia is a made-up story," Trump told NBC in May 2017 after firing Jim Comey as FBI director. "It's an excuse by the Democrats for having lost an election that they should've won."

After meeting with Vladimir Putin in November 2017, Trump said he believed the Russian president's denials: "Every time he sees me, he says, 'I didn't do that.' And I really believe that, when he tells me that, he means it."

Mueller wrote in his report that Trump's fixation on the perceived legitimacy of his victory influenced some of his behavior, including the termination of Michael Flynn as national security adviser after The Washington Post broke the story about his conversation with the Russian ambassador regarding sanctions.

The impeachment inquiry, along with the rough transcript of Trump's July 25 phone call with his Ukrainian counterpart, also established that part of Trump's interest in that country was trying to cast doubt on the story line that Russia actually interfered in 2016.

In contrast to the Houston baseball team, the president has never apologized for anything related to Russia. He's not expressed regret for his own team's contacts in 2016 with Russians nor his false public statements about his knowledge of them.

As Mueller outlined 10 possible instances of obstruction of justice by Trump, he offered this analysis: “In this investigation, the evidence does not establish that the President was involved in an underlying crime related to Russian election interference. But the evidence does point to a range of other possible personal motives animating the President's conduct. These include concerns that continued investigation would call into question the legitimacy of his election and potential uncertainty about whether certain events, such as advance notice of WikiLeaks's release of hacked information or the June 9, 2016 meeting between senior campaign officials and Russians, could be seen as criminal activity by the President, his campaign, or his family.”

The Mueller report concluded that the Trump campaign expected to “benefit electorally” from information stolen and released by Russia. Don't forget, Trump even expressed this sentiment publicly. On July 27, 2016, he said at a campaign event: “Russia, if you're listening, I hope you're able to find the 30,000 emails that are missing.” Hours later, according to Mueller, Russian military intelligence attempted to hack Hillary Clinton's private email server for the first time.

Trump's asterisk fears weren't entirely misplaced. In the fourth year of his presidency, some of the president's critics continue to cite

Russian interference to speculate that he would have lost the election had it not been for a boost from the Kremlin.

“There’s no doubt that the Russians did interfere in the election, and I think the interference, although not yet quantified, if fully investigated would show that Trump didn’t actually win the election in 2016,” former president Jimmy Carter said last summer. “He lost the election, and he was put into office because the Russians interfered on his behalf.” Asked by historian Jon Meacham whether he considers Trump to be “an illegitimate president,” Carter replied: “Based on what I just said, which I can’t retract.”

Clinton herself dismissed Trump as an “illegitimate president” in September, suggesting that “he knows” he stole the 2016 election from her. “I believe he understands that the many varying tactics they used, from voter suppression and voter purging to hacking to the false stories — he knows that — there were just a bunch of different reasons why the election turned out like it did,” the former secretary of state said on CBS. “There were many funny things that happened in my election that will not happen again.”

A definitive answer is unknowable because so many other factors were at play in the election, including the FBI reopening – and then closing – the Clinton email investigation in the final weeks. But that won’t stop people from arguing about it for generations.

Trump continues to attack the Russia probe, nearly a year after its conclusion. “The Mueller investigation was a shakedown and a disgrace,” he told Geraldo Rivera for his “Roadkill” podcast on Thursday. “It probably should be expunged.”

Like how Clinton and Democrats remain embittered toward Trump, teams and players who lost to the Astros in 2017 will also always feel wronged.

Crane's assertion that his team's sign-stealing did not affect the outcome of games, and therefore did not taint the World Series, perturbed Houston's rivals. "Clearly, on what level did it impact things, I guess we'll never know, and that's for people to draw their own conclusions on," Yankees Manager Aaron Boone told reporters. "But clearly when we're talking about some of the things that went on, those things have an effect on games, clearly."

Just like with the question of whether Russian involvement changed the outcome of the election, no one will ever be able to definitively prove either way that the Astros would have lost the American League Championship Series or the World Series in 2017 had they not stolen signs.

New York Yankees closer Aroldis Chapman said that he believes the Astros' cheating cost them the 2017 World Series because the Astros beat the Yankees in Game Seven in the ALCS. "It was very close, and everything, all the details that come out, I think it was the extra edge that allowed them to move on," Chapman told Adam Kilgore.

Brett Anderson, who competed against the Astros with the A's in the American League West the past two seasons, responded to Crane's assertion with a GIF of Will Ferrell's "Anchorman" character Ron Burgundy saying, "I don't believe you."

And Texas Rangers outfielder Willie Calhoun quipped:

Kurt Suzuki, the Nationals catcher who gave complex signs this past October when Washington defeated the Astros to win the World Series, told Thomas Boswell that he thinks Houston was still cheating through the end of the 2019 season. "Oh, yeah, no question," he said. "We could hear it from their dugout. We heard their whistling. What are you going to do?"

"Nats reliever Sean Doolittle recalled two of his blown saves against the Astros in 2017 on homers by George Springer and José Altuve when he pitched for Oakland," Boswell reports. "I was wondering what that did to my trade value. ... I got hit around a bunch by the Astros,' said Doolittle, who was soon traded to the Nats, along with Ryan Madson. ... 'I landed on my feet. I ended up in a great spot. But for some guys, their bad outings, that was the end of the road for them. They got sent down. They never got called back up again. I think about those guys a lot.'"

President Trump watches the Nationals play the Astros in Game 5 of the 2019 World Series in Washington. (John McDonnell/The Washington Post)

Tying these story lines together: The president shows grace for gamblers.

Trump endorsed Pete Rose's appeal to end his lifetime ban. The president, a former casino owner, tweeted over the weekend that the all-time leader in hits "paid a decades long price" for gambling on games in which his team was playing. Rose submitted a petition for reinstatement to Major League Baseball last week, citing the fact that Houston's players were not punished for sign-stealing to argue that his punishment was "disproportionate."

Meanwhile, the White House announced Thursday that Trump’s former body man John McEntee will take over as the head of the office of presidential personnel. “McEntee lost his White House job in March 2018 because an investigation found he was a frequent gambler whose habit posed a security risk,” Josh Dawsey reports. “A background investigation found that McEntee bet tens of thousands of dollars at a time, making him unsuitable for a sensitive position close to the president ... There was no indication his gambling was illegal, but there was concern that he could be vulnerable to outside influence ... McEntee will replace Sean Doocey, who some aides, including deputy chief of staff Emma Doyle, tried to keep from losing his job. But Trump is infuriated over what he believes are so many people around him who are not loyal, and that some 2016 campaign aides have not been able to get jobs, that he replaced Doocey with McEntee, according to two administration officials."

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost's essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

---

Programming note

In honor of Presidents' Day, there will be no 202 on Monday. We're also excited about our redesigned format. Thanks to everyone who sent feedback yesterday. We really want to make this email as useful and readable as possible for you. Let me know what you think at James.Hohmann@washpost.com or submit a form here to let our engineering team know what you like or don't like.

---

All the president's men

---

Quote of the day

“I think it’s time to stop the tweeting about Department of Justice criminal cases,” Attorney General Bill Barr said in an interview with ABC News, adding that such statements “make it impossible for me to do my job and to assure the courts and the prosecutors and the department that we’re doing our work with integrity.” He added: “I cannot do my job here at the department with a constant background commentary that undercuts me.”

Why the attorney general really rebuked the president

While the coverage has focused on Roger Stone’s sentencing, the president’s rage stems more from the fact that his appointees at the Justice Department have not been more aggressive about trying to prosecute his perceived enemies. “People close to Barr said that in recent months he has become increasingly frustrated with Trump’s tweets about the Justice Department,” Devlin Barrett, Matt Zapposky and Josh Dawsey report:

“Behind that public fight ... is a deeper tension between Trump and Barr’s Justice Department over the lack of criminal charges against [Jim Comey] and those close to him. ... Trump has repeatedly complained about FBI Director Christopher A. Wray in recent months, saying that Wray has not done enough to ... purge the bureau of people who are disloyal to him ... Justice Department Inspector General Michael Horowitz referred Comey’s handling of the memos [about his conversations with the president] to prosecutors for possible criminal prosecution, but lawyers quickly determined it was not a close call and did not seek to build a case. That sent Trump into a rage ... He complained so loudly and swore so frequently in the Oval Office that some of his aides discussed it for days ... Trump repeatedly said that Comey deserved to be charged ... ‘Can you [expletive] believe they didn’t charge him?’ Trump said on the night of the decision ...

“Trump has also wanted charges filed against Comey’s former deputy, Andrew McCabe. A separate inspector general investigation concluded that McCabe lied to investigators about his role in authorizing disclosures for a Wall Street Journal story in October 2016 about internal FBI tensions over an investigation of the Clinton Foundation. A grand jury in Washington seemed poised to make a decision on the case last year before fizzling into inaction.

“Trump’s anger over the lack of charges against FBI personnel flared again in January, prompted by two unrelated developments ... First, prosecutors updated their position in the case of former national security adviser Michael Flynn, saying a sentence of some prison time would be appropriate. Around the same time, The Washington Post reported that U.S. Attorney John Huber in Utah — tapped years earlier to reinvestigate several issues related to vague allegations of corruption against Hillary Clinton — had quietly wound down his work after finding nothing of consequence. ... In the president’s mind, it is unacceptable that people such as Comey and McCabe have not been charged, particularly if people such as Stone and Flynn are going to be treated harshly ...

“The president’s anger has focused increasingly on Jessie Liu, the former U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia, whose office has been handling many of the cases related to Comey and other former FBI officials. That office has recently conducted interviews in a leak inquiry, eyeing senior FBI officials over news stories in 2017 that discussed a top-secret Russian intelligence document that influenced Comey’s decision-making in 2016. Many of investigators’ questions have seemed focused on the former FBI director.

“Separately, Barr tapped U.S. Attorney John Durham in Connecticut to investigate whether any crimes were committed by FBI and CIA officials in the pursuit of allegations in 2016 that Russia interfered in the election to benefit Trump’s campaign. After learning that the Huber investigation is not likely to produce charges, Trump has become more insistent that Durham finish his work soon ... [Trump] wants to be able to use whatever Durham finds as a cudgel in his reelection campaign."

Investigators keep fishing for a pretext to charge Obama-era intelligence officials.

Questions being asked by Durham suggest he may be “pursuing a theory that the C.I.A., under its former director John O. Brennan, had a preconceived notion about Russia or was trying to get to a particular result — and was nefariously trying to keep other agencies from seeing the full picture lest they interfere with that goal,” the New York Times reports.

The White House’s muted response prompted theories that Barr’s comments were choreographed.

“Barr, while complaining about the impact of the tweets on the department’s mission, didn’t take issue with the substance of Trump’s comments, including one suggesting that the judge in Stone’s case was biased,” Fred Barbash and Allyson Chiu report. “And Barr’s comments didn’t elicit the expected flurry of backlash from Trump and his allies. Instead, White House press secretary Stephanie Grisham issued a statement saying, ‘The President wasn’t bothered by the comments at all.’ She added that Trump ‘has full faith and confidence in Attorney General Barr to do his job and uphold the law.’”

“There were plenty of plausible and practical reasons for Barr’s comments and their timing. The chief judge of the U.S. District Court in Washington has expressed concern about judges being pressured in the wake of Trump’s tweets and Barr’s statement allows government lawyers to disown the president’s comments when they appear in court. Barr is also facing unrest from lawyers within and outside of the department, including from the New York City bar, over the handling of the Stone case.”

“Barr isn’t objecting to Trump’s political interference with the Justice Department to undermine the rule of law,” observed Rep. Don Beyer (D-Va.). “He’s saying Trump shouldn’t tell everyone about it.”

Trump admits he sent Rudy Giuliani to find dirt on Joe Biden.

Geraldo Rivera, in a podcast interview, asked Trump, “Was it strange to send Rudy Giuliani to Ukraine, your personal lawyer? Are you sorry you did that?” Trump responded, “No, not at all.” He then praised the former New York mayor, who remains under investigation, as a “crime fighter.”

Judy Shelton, Trump's nominee to be a governor of the Federal Reserve, is sworn in for her confirmation hearing before the Senate Banking Committee on Thursday. (Andrew Harrer/Bloomberg News)

Trump's latest nominee to the Federal Reserve could be in trouble.

Three GOP senators on the Senate Banking Committee said last night they are undecided about whether to support Judy Shelton after sitting through her confirmation hearing: Pat Toomey (Pa.), Dick Shelby (Ala.) and John Neely Kennedy (La.). Any one of them could torpedo her nomination since Republicans only have a one-seat advantage on the panel. Toomey said he “didn’t know” if Shelton would uphold the Fed’s independence. Shelby said Shelton sounded like she “could be an outlier” whose views are outside the mainstream. "I'm undecided," Kennedy said after the hearing, adding "nobody wants anybody on the Federal Reserve that has a fatal attraction to nutty ideas."

Shelton "is known as an outspoken critic of the Federal Reserve and for advocating that the United States return to something akin to the gold standard, which the nation fully abandoned in 1971," Heather Long reports. "She has alarmed many in the financial world by calling for more coordination between the Fed and the White House. She has also altered some of her views to appear more in line with Trump's aggressive push for lower interest rates ... The White House said it stands fully behind Shelton, who said several times during her confirmation hearing she would bring 'intellectual diversity' to the Fed. ...

"Trump's prior two picks — businessman Herman Cain and conservative pundit Stephen Moore — both had to withdraw because of dicey personal issues. ... Two of Trump's other Fed nominees were also passed over. ... Trump has made no secret he regrets picking Jerome H. Powell to be Fed chair, and there's concern that Trump would quickly elevate Shelton to the top job at the central bank when Powell's term expires in early 2022."

The Senate passed a resolution to limit Trump's power to start a war with Iran.

Trump plans to veto the measure once it passes the House, and neither chamber of Congress has the votes to override that veto. But eight Republicans joined all Democrats in voting 55 to 45 for the measure, "despite sharp warnings from Trump that challenging his war powers would 'show weakness' and send 'a very bad signal' to Tehran," Karoun Demirjian reports.

Mitch McConnell told Fox News he would fill a Supreme Court vacancy if one opens this year.

If you were alive in 2016, you will recall this was the excuse the Senate majority leader used to deny giving Merrick Garland a hearing. The Kentucky senator said back then it would be totally inappropriate for the Senate to put someone on the Supreme Court in an election year. But that was when his party didn't control the White House.

Meanwhile, Garland yesterday formally stepped down from his role as chief judge of the D.C. Circuit, the second most powerful court in the country. He passed the gavel to Sri Srinivasan, the first person of South Asian descent to lead a federal circuit court. Garland will continue to serve on the court he joined three decades ago, per Ann Marimow.

Ignoring the will of Congress, Trump diverted $3.8 billion more from the Pentagon to his border wall.

In a letter to Congress, the administration said money appropriated for the purchase of aircraft will instead be spent on wall construction. “The Pentagon is moving the money using a counternarcotics law that allows the Defense Department to build fencing for other federal, state and local agencies in known drug-smuggling corridors,” Paul Sonne and Nick Miroff report.

During the State of the Union, Trump touted a veteran’s comeback story. It was not true.

“Tony Rankins, a formerly homeless, drug-addicted Army veteran, got a standing ovation at the [speech] after [Trump] described how he turned his life around thanks to a construction job at a company using the administration’s ‘Opportunity Zone’ tax breaks targeting poor neighborhoods,” the Associated Press scoops. “Rankins, who indeed moved out of his car and into an apartment since landing a job refurbishing a Nashville hotel two years ago, doesn’t work at a site taking advantage of the breaks and never has done so. In fact, he started that job four months before the Treasury Department published its final list of neighborhoods eligible for the breaks. And the hotel where he worked couldn’t benefit even now because it’s an area that didn’t make the cut.”

---

2020 watch

Pete Buttigieg looks at his husband Chasten at his New Hampshire primary night rally in Nashua on Tuesday. (Brendan Mcdermid/Reuters)

Trump allies are starting to focus attention on Pete Buttigieg's sexual orientation.

Rush Limbaugh, a week after receiving the Presidential Medal of Freedom, questioned whether Americans are ready for a gay candidate who kisses his husband onstage. The Federalist, a conservative web site, defended Limbaugh. On his own radio show Wednesday, Seb Gorka, a former deputy assistant to the president and a Trump campaign surrogate, questioned "what right" Buttigieg had to talk about abortion rights if he's never going to impregnate a woman. "Why is a homosexual man lecturing us about the sanctity of life in the womb? Just a little curious there. Strange, strange," Gorka said. Conservative radio host Ben Ferguson seemed to imply Buttigieg is less masculine because he is gay. A video that went viral last week showed an Iowa woman who caucused for Buttigieg asking whether she could change her vote after finding out he's gay. "He'd better read the Bible," the woman said.

"The attacks are prompting blunt responses from Buttigieg's allies and even his Democratic rivals, who call the remarks inappropriate and offensive,” Amy B Wang and Chelsea Janes report. Pro-LGBTQ "Victory Fund staffers deliberated internally on whether to respond to the comments since they did not want amplify them. But given Limbaugh's high profile, the group decided it needed to respond. 'The real question is who wants to kiss Rush Limbaugh,' the group tweeted Thursday. ...

“Previous candidates have sometimes decided to confront identity issues directly: Barack Obama delivered a highly personal talk on race in 2008, and John F. Kennedy gave a major speech about his Catholicism in 1960 to a group of Protestant ministers. So far the Buttigieg campaign has evidently concluded that ignoring the remarks is the best course, but that could change if the attacks become louder and more frequent, or show signs of resonating more widely. ...

“Since Buttigieg's strong performances in Iowa and New Hampshire, journalists have begun raising the issue of his sexuality more frequently, prompting responses like his recent comment to People magazine that he was excited to start a family 'soon' with his husband Chasten. 'No matter what happens, I think the next chapter in our personal lives is going to be about kids,' Buttigieg said.”

“The Benefits of Being Joe Biden's Brother.”

That's the headline of a new ProPublica review of the relationship between Jim Biden's business ventures and the former vice president's political capital: Jim often “turned to Joe's political network for the kind of assistance that would have been almost unimaginable for someone with a different last name. Campaign donors helped him face a series of financial problems, including a series of IRS liens totaling more than $1 million that made it harder to get bank financing. ... [O]n occasion, as Jim pursued opportunities, Joe met with his potential clients or partners, at Jim's request.”

Nevada's most powerful union won't endorse before next week's caucuses.

“The Culinary Union, which represents 60,000 hotel and casino workers across Nevada and is considered an organizing behemoth in Democratic politics here, said it would instead flex its power to get its members out to vote in the caucuses,” report Holly Bailey and Felicia Sonmez. “The decision came after months of aggressive courting from candidates eager to win the support of the politically powerful group, whose endorsement has long been viewed as a major advantage in mobilizing Latinos and women, who make up most of its membership and have been a decisive political force in the state.” The decision comes after the union claimed Bernie Sanders followers “viciously attacked” it for standing against Medicare-for-all. In response to that kerfuffle, Sanders released a statement condemning online harassment and urging supporters of all campaigns “not to engage in bullying or personal attacks.”

Nevada Democrats are trying to clarify how their caucuses will work as concerns grow.

“The Nevada State Democratic Party announced Thursday that it will use a Web-based calculator designed to complete caucus math and report results on an iPad,” report Elise Viebeck and Isaac Stanley-Becker.

“Precinct chairs will receive preconfigured iPads, purchased by the party, and will access the calculator through a ‘secure Google web form,’ the state party said in a memo to presidential campaigns. Results will be transmitted through a secure hotline and verified either through the online calculator or with paper reporting sheets.”

Elizabeth Warren said she's raised $6 million since Iowa.

“Hours later, during a raucous evening rally at a high school gym in Washington’s Virginia suburbs, Warren didn’t seem like a candidate worried about leaving the race,” the AP reports. The $6 million, though respectable, pales in comparison to Sanders, who raised more than $25 million in January.

For his part, Trump will headline a $580,600-per-couple fundraiser in Palm Beach on Saturday, per Dawsey and Michelle Ye Hee Lee.

More candidates are stepping up attacks against a rising Mike Bloomberg.

“Struggling to recover from poor showings in the Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire primary, [Warren] and [Biden] took the lead in attacking Bloomberg. [Biden] said on ABC’s ‘The View’ that ‘I don’t think you can buy an election,’ while Warren took Bloomberg to task for his 2008 comments that ending redlining, a discriminatory housing practice helped trigger the economic meltdown,” the AP reports.

---

The coronavirus crisis

A man wears a gas mask as he holds a bouquet of flowers on Friday in Hong Kong. (Tyrone Siu/Reuters)

The economic fallout is growing around the world.

Singapore’s leader warned of a possible recession as the virus and travel curbs slam the regional economy. Asian and European auto plants are running short of parts, Chinese tourists are staying home and American companies are bracing for unpredictable turbulence. And that’s just the start. The financial hangover will linger for months, even if the illness is soon brought under control.

“The Chinese epidemic’s aftereffects will probably cause the global economy to shrink this quarter for the first time since the depths of the 2009 financial crisis, according to Capital Economics in London,” David Lynch reports. “Caterpillar this week said most of its Chinese suppliers have returned to work. But Foxconn, a major electronics producer for Apple, said it will be the end of the month before even half of its facilities are operating. ... The ripple effects of China’s shutdown are spreading, with the auto industry especially hard-hit. Nissan temporarily closed one of its factories in Japan after running short of Chinese components, one week after Hyundai in South Korea did the same. Fiat Chrysler warned that it may shutter one of its European plants. Some U.S. manufacturers could face parts shortages in one to two weeks.”

One corner of China’s economy has been particularly hard-hit: Flower sellers.

“Forget red roses. Broccoli, cauliflower, masks and hand sanitizer are now the way to prove you love your partner this Valentine’s Day in China,” Wang Yuan reports. “Flower delivery platforms are reporting a massive drop in online flower sales, as health fears dissuade people from ordering anything online or picking up deliveries. Zhong’ai Flower, an online flower delivery platform based in Wuhan, the epicenter of coronavirus outbreak, reported a sales drop of 90 percent. Ma Yingzi, a flower supplier in Beijing, also estimated a 95 percent drop in flower sales this Valentine’s Day.”

Another 5,000 cases of coronavirus were reported, bringing the count in mainland China past 63,000.

“More places in Hubei province, the epicenter of the outbreak, are enacting ‘wartime’ measures, such as sealing off residential complexes and only allowing essential vehicles on the roads. Authorities in Yunmeng county, where the new steps kicked in on Friday morning, said that anyone attempting to breach the lockdown ‘at compounds, buildings or road connections’ would be detained,” Shibani Mahtani and Miriam

Berger report. “Apps are being used to track citizens who must provide their information before entering and exiting key Chinese cities, allowing authorities to collect a huge amount of data. ... China’s National Health Commission said more than 1,700 medical workers have been infected with coronavirus, six of whom have died, citing the latest available figures as of Feb. 11.”

Japan said 10 people were evacuated from the quarantined cruise ship in serious condition.

Eight were confirmed to have the virus, Simon Denyer reports. “Amid persistent criticism of its approach, the government said it would start allowing some people who have tested negative for the virus to disembark from the ship early and finish their quarantine at a facility on land. Priority will be given to passengers over the age of 80 and those with existing medical problems, as well as people in windowless cabins, health minister Katsunobu Kato said. So far, 218 people on board the ship have tested positive for the virus.”

---

Social media speed read

Trump attacked Gov. Andrew Cuomo (D-N.Y.) before a White House meeting to discuss the state’s feud with federal immigration authorities, hinting the Empire State should drop lawsuits against him to get what it wants from the federal government. The lead House impeachment manager likened these hardball tactics to the alleged scheme to coerce Ukraine that got him impeached:

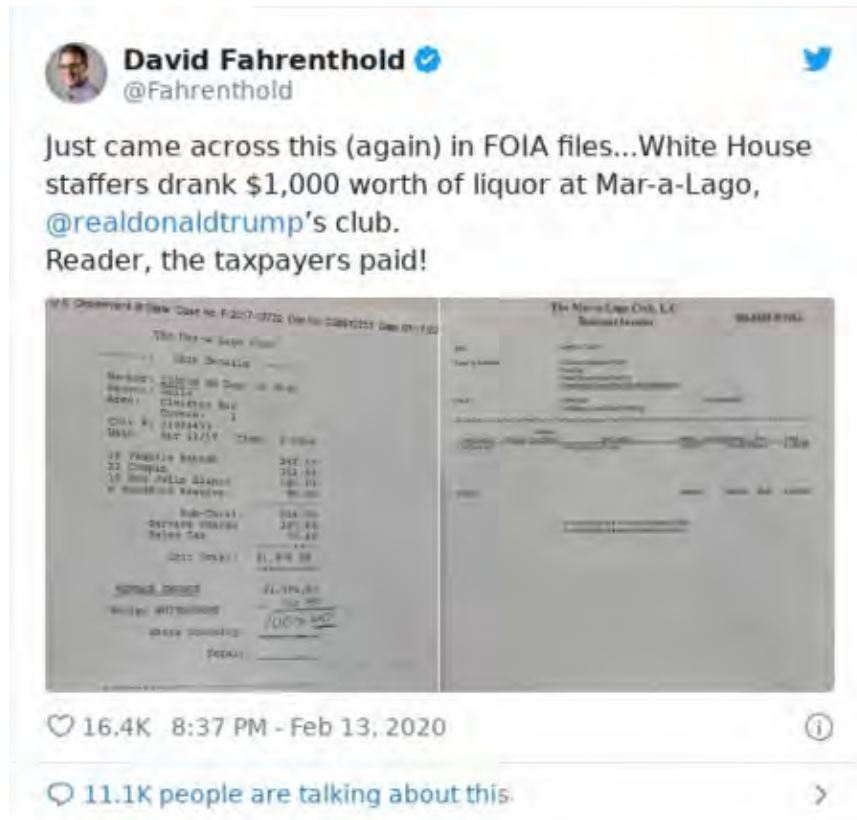

Trump attacked his former chief of staff after he spoke out against the president's retaliation against Lt. Col. Alexander Vindman:

You picked up the tab for the president's staffers drinking at Trump's private club:

A former federal prosecutor shined a light on why so many DOJ alumni are disgusted with Trump meddling in the cases of Stone and others:

Videos of the day

It may still be a couple of weeks away, but Stephen Colbert is already excited for the South Carolina primary:

Seth Meyers said Trump is turning the Department of Justice into a political weapon:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Speaking of Science for the latest, greatest and weirdest in science news, every Wednesday. Expect news on discoveries, animals and space.

Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Conservative intellectuals launch a new group to challenge free-market 'fundamentalism' on the right
Date: Tuesday, February 18, 2020 7:42:12 AM

COMMITTED TO
AFFORDABLE CARE
FOR THE HEALTH OF AMERICA<sup>SM</sup>

BlueCross
BlueShield
Association

Powered by  LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Partnership for America's Health Care Future

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

Conservative intellectuals launch a new group to challenge free-market 'fundamentalism' on the right

Oren Cass believes conservatives have blundered by outsourcing GOP economic policymaking to libertarian “fundamentalists” who see the free market as an end unto itself, rather than as a means for improving quality of life to strengthen families and communities. The former domestic policy director on Mitt Romney’s 2012 presidential campaign quit his job as a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute to launch a new group called

American Compass that aims to reorient the right. He previewed their plans in an exclusive interview on Monday afternoon.

Joining him on the board of directors will be Sen. Marco Rubio's chief of staff Mike Needham, the former chief executive of Heritage Action for America; Julius Krein, the editor of American Affairs, a quarterly political journal; and David Azerrad, a Hillsdale College professor who was formerly a fellow at the Heritage Foundation. Wells King will be the research director. Until last week, the former McKinsey consultant was a policy adviser to Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah) on the Joint Economic Committee.

Cass compares President Trump to an earthquake.

Running as a populist, Trump challenged Republican orthodoxy on free trade and tapped into the disaffection of blue-collar workers in the heartland who have been left behind by the growing, but uneven, economy. For the most part, however, he said conservative elites in the think tank world have not followed suit.

President Trump speaks at the White House on Friday. (Jabin Botsford/The Washington Post)

“The goal, long term, is to think about what the post-Trump right-of-center is going to be,” said Cass. “One of the reasons we think this is such an important project is that, even four-plus years after Trump emerged on the scene, there really has been very little new and interesting ferment in the right of center. It’s pretty much the same set of institutions and publications and so forth. ... By and large, the establishment is what it was. And it seems to be keeping its head down and sort of hoping that everything can just go back post-Trump to the way that it was pre-Trump. To the extent that the future should sound different, and certainly I think it should, now is the time to start building the institutions and efforts that are going to make that a reality.”

Cass acknowledges the problems animating populism are very real, but he argues that they won’t be solved by the governing ideologies he blames for creating the crisis, nor by the populism itself, “which has demonstrated no ability to formulate or implement a coherent response.”

“An earthquake clears a lot of space for rebuilding, but an earthquake does not rebuild,” Cass explained. “And there are a lot of people who want to rush right back in and build what you already had after the earthquake. But something an earthquake shows you is which of the things that you'd already built were really not built very thoughtfully. It’s important to learn lessons from this disruption that has occurred. It's important to go back to first principles and ask: What do we actually believe and why? What do we care about and why?”

Inside the GOP coalition, Cass argues, traditional economic conservatives ceded economic policy to libertarians as part of a “bargain” to win the Cold War. Ronald Reagan called it a three-legged stool: economic libertarians, social conservatives and national security hawks. Cass believes this “fusionism” worked well – in the past. “When you had a situation where the free market was delivering the social outcomes that conservatives most prized, libertarians and conservatives tended to agree,” he said. “What we've seen more recently is a growing understanding that the market does not necessarily in all cases deliver a set of social outcomes that conservatives prize.”

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) leaves a luncheon with fellow GOP senators at the Capitol earlier this month. He's retrofitted his approach to economics since losing to Trump in 2016. (Amanda Voisard for The Washington Post)

---

Content from Partnership for America's Health Care Future

We Can't Afford Medicare for All

A graphic with a blue background on the left and a light blue background on the right. The text on the left reads "WE CAN'T AFFORD A NEW GOVERNMENT HEALTH INSURANCE SYSTEM". The text on the right reads "DOUBLED INCOME TAXES FOR EVERY FAMILY" and "POLITICIANS IN CONTROL OF YOUR HEALTH". There are icons of a pill and a hand holding a pill, and a pillbox icon. At the bottom right, there is small text: "BASED UPON: 'TRUMP SUPPORTER ON MEDICARE FOR ALL,' THE NEW YORK TIMES, APRIL 11, 2019; 'NEW YORK BILL WOULD END UP BEING COMMITTED FOR A RESPONSIBLE FUTURE,' MARCH 2019."

American families should not be forced to foot the bill for Medicare for All. And any new government insurance system would force them to pay more to wait longer for worse care.

---

A society's vitality, of course, cannot be judged solely

by its gross domestic product.

Markets are good, Cass explained, but life is about so much more than markets. He said American conservatism historically had a richer conception of the role of government beyond maximizing returns, such as strengthening domestic industry. He lamented the growing concentration of wealth, geographically on the coasts and in the big cities, as well as in a handful of industries, which has accelerated income inequality.

“When you zoom out, you can have a rising GDP, but if it's in the context of collapsing families and people no longer getting married and declining fertility rates and so on and so forth, you haven't necessarily enhanced well-being,” said Cass. “Likewise, if you are generating growth by trading off the non-market work that people historically performed within their households for a model where everyone goes to work and then they pay each other for the things they used to do in their own household, that's not great either. Obviously, there are times when disruption, even if unfortunate, is necessary, but it's important to recognize that, alongside the value that the hyper-efficient conglomerate brings, there is also an awful lot of value that the locally-owned small business brings.”

Cass said American Compass will “think differently” about labor vs. capital than Republicans have in recent generations. “A big component of the market fundamentalism – in many cases, held entirely in good faith; in some cases, more as a matter of political convenience – is the argument that whatever policies are best for shareholders in the short run are the best policies and will eventually be good for everyone else also,” he said. “That is something that's not actually part of real economics, and it's certainly not a conservative way of thinking about how a society operates. ... We need to recognize that sometimes we should feel just as comfortable saying, ‘What's good for workers is going to be good for shareholders in the long run.’”

Sen. Josh Hawley (R-Mo.) arrives at the Capitol for the impeachment trial last month. (Erin Scott/Reuters)

Two GOP senators have been championing this sort of an approach.

Freshman Sen. Josh Hawley (R-Mo.) has talked a great deal over the last year about the need for new policies that make it easier for people to stay in their hometowns if they want to, among other things. Rubio, the senior senator from Florida, has retrofitted his approach to economic policy since losing to Trump in the 2016 primaries. He's challenged shareholder primacy theory and even embraced Catholic social doctrine as a way to respond to capitalism's inevitable failures.

“As you look across the Republican conference, you've got Rubio and Hawley who are furthest out in front, but then right behind them is a very interesting group of folks who are really thoughtful and heterodox on these issues,” said Cass. He named Lee as part of that contingent, along with Sens. Tom Cotton (Ark.), Tim Scott (S.C.), Ben Sasse (Neb.) and Romney (Utah).

“In terms of how it fits ideologically, I think there are certainly components of it that sound more Trumpian,” Cass said. “For instance, an actual conservative economics would be much more skeptical of free trade than is libertarian economics. But this is not an effort to codify and carry forward Trumpism.”

Cass, 36, graduated from Harvard Law School, where he was an editor of the law review, after working as a management consultant at Bain, Romney’s former firm, in the firm’s Boston and New Delhi offices. He emphasized that American Compass, the new initiative, is “not an exercise in starting from scratch.” He said the mission is really about “going back and finding things that always were part of the American tradition that have been important to conservative thinkers, but that seem to have gotten lost in in the more market fundamentalist mode of especially the last 20 to 30 years.”

“I think there is just tremendous intellectual energy ... that's working on and discussing and hashing these things out, but there aren't really any institutional trappings of it yet,” he said. “There is not really even a vocabulary for it. If you said, ‘Who are the people working on this stuff?,’ it's hard to know where to look. We want to provide that base. We'll just be one entity in the flotilla or the armada or the fleet. I don't know the difference between those three things. But hopefully one that has some prominent people on board and can facilitate communication and can bring people together and ... help focus attacks when there are fights to be had.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

2020 watch

Rep. Henry Cuellar (D-Tex.) holds up a border map as he speaks during a meeting with lawmakers on immigration policy at the White House in 2018. (Jabin Botsford/The Washington Post)

Scoop: The U.S. Chamber of Commerce will endorse Democratic Rep. Henry Cuellar in Texas.

The seven-term congressman is facing a vigorous challenge on his left from Jessica Cisneros in a March 3 primary. Cisneros, a 26-year-old immigration attorney, has endorsements from women’s groups like EMILY’s List, environmental groups like the Sierra Club and national liberal leaders like Bernie Sanders and Elizabeth Warren. The U.S. Chamber joins the Koch-backed group Libre Initiative Action, which endorsed Cuellar on Friday.

“At a time when the country continues to be polarized, it’s important to elect centrist candidates who aim to find common ground on common sense solutions to better serve Americans and strengthen communities,” said Scott Reed, the U.S. Chamber’s chief political strategist. He praised Cuellar for his early work on the U.S.-Mexico-Canada trade agreement, as well as business-friendly efforts to protect Texas’s auto industry from tariffs and fighting for the oil and gas industry. “Cuellar has consistently stepped up to the plate,” said Reed.

Meanwhile, in Massachusetts, Sen. Edward Markey will square off tonight in the first televised debate with his Democratic primary challenger, Rep. Joe Kennedy III. (Karen Weintraub has a preview.)

Mike Bloomberg campaigns last Wednesday in Chattanooga, Tenn. (Doug Strickland/Reuters)

Mike Bloomberg has qualified for Wednesday's Democratic debate.

A new NPR-PBS-Marist poll showed him in second place with the support of 19 percent of Democratic primary voters nationally, trailing Bernie Sanders at 31 percent. Bloomberg has leapfrogged Joe Biden by spending more than $300 million on television in states that vote on Super Tuesday and beyond. Biden has fallen to third place with 15 percent, followed by Elizabeth Warren at 12 percent, Amy Klobuchar at 9 percent and Pete Buttigieg at 8 percent. Sanders and Bloomberg are tied at 22 percent in Virginia, according to a new Monmouth University poll that also came out this morning. Biden comes in third in the commonwealth, pulling in 18 percent.

Bloomberg has been preparing for the debate on the assumption he'd qualify.

“Top Bloomberg lieutenants and policy experts have been preparing him for what would be the most unscripted event yet of his three-month-old campaign,” Politico reports. “Howard Wolfson, the veteran Democratic strategist who joined Bloomberg’s orbit in 2009 after working on Hillary Clinton’s 2008 presidential race, is playing the role of Sanders; Julie Wood, Bloomberg’s national press secretary, is depicting [Warren]; and senior advisers Marc La Vorgna and Marcia Hale are stand-ins for [Buttigieg and Klobuchar], respectively. Wolfson joked that his inspiration for Sanders came from watching ‘Statler and Waldorf,’ the cantankerous elderly Muppets who lob critiques from their balcony seats. Asked about rivals trying to get under Bloomberg’s own skin, he quipped, ‘Haters gonna hate. Bring it on.’

“Bloomberg is trying to hone a crisp and energetic appeal to voters that will contrast with Biden— another white, male septuagenarian on stage, according to advisers. ... Other potential pitfalls for Bloomberg are his tendency to use dated language — words like ‘bawdy,’ for instance — to dismiss concerns about his financial news service’s work culture for female employees. Bloomberg has a history of losing his cool in public. He once grew visibly annoyed at a reporter in a wheelchair who interrupted his press conference when he dropped a recording device. More recently, he urged a reporter to 'get on with it' when he was pressed about his controversial stop-and-frisk policing tactic. Snapping at other candidates or a moderator could undermine his efforts to convey empathy and contrition."

The former New York City mayor is making inroads with black voters who backed Biden.

"Bloomberg has pummeled the airwaves in South Carolina, Nevada and Super Tuesday states with ads, so much so that a questioner at a Tennessee news conference thanked him for a $3.5 million buy at his media station before proceeding," Cleve Wootson, Bob Costa and Michael Scherer report. "Biden's unsteady turn — a fourth-place finish in Iowa preceded his decline in New Hampshire — has given an opening to rivals to make their own arguments to black and Latino voters. ... Rosemary Lawrence, a 75-year-old black woman who leads the political ministry at Charlotte's mostly black Friendship Missionary Baptist Church, ... supported Biden when he entered the race in April, laying out the argument for anyone who asked that he was the candidate most likely to defeat Trump. ... 'I love Joe Biden,' she said. ... 'I really wanted to support him, but what I've seen recently is he doesn't seem to be as energized and focused and alert as he was, say, eight years ago even. And now his funding is drying up. The bottom line is I want to find somebody who can beat Donald Trump.' Early voting has already started in North Carolina. Next week, Lawrence plans to cast a ballot for Bloomberg."

To be sure, Bloomberg has his own problems with stop-and-frisk, among other things. "While his crowds, even in southern states, are often affluent and white, he is regularly introduced by black leaders who testify to Bloomberg's understanding of the history of racism in the country and his commitment to nonwhite voters. Bloomberg has been endorsed by more than 100 mayors, many of them black. He has proposed a plan, named 'the Greenwood Initiative' for a black Tulsa community destroyed in a 1921 racial massacre, that sets a goal of helping 1 million black families buy a home, double the number of black-owned businesses and triple the net worth of a typical black family.”

Bloomberg launched his first attack against Sanders. Others followed.

In a web video, Bloomberg compared Sanders’s campaign tactics to Trump’s. Sanders replied by comparing Bloomberg to Trump. Biden called on Sanders to disavow “Trump-like” attacks by some of his supporters on officials at the Nevada culinary workers union, per the Times. Elizabeth Warren also jumped into the fray, saying Sanders “has a lot of questions to answer” about his supporters’ behavior. “I am particularly worried about what happened in the attacks on members of the culinary union,” Warren said, per NBC. “That is not how we build an inclusive Democratic Party. ... We do not build on a foundation of hate.”

Biden's campaign is counting on at least a second-place finish in Nevada.

“First would be wonderful, but us getting a second place I think does the work that we need to do to win South Carolina,” Biden campaign manager Greg Schultz told supporters on a conference call. “We win South Carolina, we’re going to have ended the first four contests likely with a delegate advantage. ... I think the Democratic Party will sigh a collective sigh of relief when we finish second or better in Nevada.” (NYT)

The Afghanistan war shattered Biden’s faith in American military power.

“Biden talks about America in grand, almost Reaganesque, terms,” writes Greg Jaffe in the latest installment of our Pursuits series. “But inside the Obama administration Biden was a consistent voice of caution. The mismatch is a product of an approach to foreign policy that is guided largely by impulse and feeling rather than abiding philosophy. And it reflects a decades-long career in which Biden has been all over the map on the biggest questions of war and peace. ... In the 1990s, Biden had made an impassioned argument that U.S. credibility and the country’s moral standing demanded that it use military force to stop a slaughter in the Balkans. In Afghanistan, Biden rejected the notion that America had any moral obligation to improve the lives of Afghans or prevent civil wars. ‘He had that empathy for the people in the Balkans. He even had it for people in Iraq,’ said a senior Obama administration official... ‘I never saw it in Afghanistan.’”

Speaking of Afghanistan: Results released today, nearly five months after the election, show that President Ashraf Ghani has won a second term. “The announcement comes after months of political uncertainty and just days after U.S. and Taliban negotiators announced they had reached a conditional peace deal that could be signed as soon as the end of the month,” Sayed Salahuddin and Sharif Hassan report.

---

The coronavirus

The number of coronavirus cases in the U.S. is now 29.

“Fourteen Americans who tested positive for coronavirus were among the hundreds of U.S. citizens evacuated from a cruise ship off Japan to U.S. facilities over the holiday weekend, the result of a chaotic chain of events that put virus-stricken passengers on flights with other evacuees,” Anna Fifield, Alex Horton and Abha Bhattacharai report. “Their return almost doubles the number of confirmed coronavirus cases in the United States ... The 14 U.S. passengers tested positive for the virus after disembarking from the Diamond Princess, a cruise liner carrying 2,666 passengers and 1,045 crew members that had been quarantined for two weeks off the Japanese port of Yokohama. But by the time their test results arrived, they were already on a fleet of buses that took 328 asymptomatic passengers from the ship to two charter planes bound for U.S. military bases in Texas and California ...

"It was a wrench in a coordinated effort. While the buses sat on the tarmac, health experts mulled whether to put the 14 on the flights or divert them to hospitals in Japan ... The planes each included a sealed-off section of 18 seats in the back, and part of the plan was to isolate passengers there if they developed symptoms midflight ... Health authorities deemed the 14 'fit to fly' because they were not showing symptoms, the State Department and the Department of Health and Human Services said in a statement

Monday. They were cordoned off from the other passengers during the flights.” The Diamond Princess quarantine will end as scheduled on Wednesday, Japan’s health minister said today, as 88 more cases were discovered, bringing the total linked to the ship to 542. A total of 35 Filipino crew members on the cruise ship have tested positive for the coronavirus.

Apple said the virus will cause it to miss revenue targets.

Apple warned that “it expects to fall short of revenue goals in the current quarter because of the coronavirus outbreak, underscoring the far-reaching effects of the public health crisis on the global economy,” Derek Hawkins and Reed Albergotti report. “In a statement to investors, Apple said that while factories in China were reopening, iPhone production in the country was ramping up more slowly than expected. ... Demand for Apple products has also dampened in China, where all the company’s stores and many of its partner stores have shuttered...”

The virus killed the director of Wuhan’s main hospital.

“A respected neurologist who was the director of Wuchang Hospital in Wuhan died Tuesday after contracting the novel coronavirus,” Anna Fifield and Rick Noack report. Liu Zhiming, who was 51, passed away despite a “full effort rescue,” according to a statement from Wuhan’s municipal health commission. Zhiming “became the most prominent victim of the outbreak since another doctor, whistleblower Li Wenliang died Feb. 7, sparking an outpouring of public anger and grief. Liu’s death follows that last week of a nurse, Liu Fan, from the same hospital. A total of eight front-line health care workers have now died, while as many as 3,000 have been infected with the coronavirus. ...

“Officials have been sounding a more upbeat note in recent days about the prospects for containing the virus. But a renowned Chinese pulmonologist who predicted a peak this month clarified his remarks to say that the peak may be followed by a plateau, rather than an outright fall in cases. ... China reported 1,886 new coronavirus cases and 98 more deaths in its daily update on the outbreak Tuesday, bringing the death toll in mainland China to 1,868, with 72,436 confirmed cases. The overwhelming majority have been in Hubei province.”

In China, 200 million kids are back in school – thanks to the Internet.

“They didn’t stand in front of a flagpole and sing the national anthem. They watched it on screens. In some parts of the country, so many kids were watching at the same time that Internet speeds ground to a halt,” Fifield reports. “One middle school boy, sitting with his computer at his front door in Beijing, was asked what he was studying. He responded: physical education. Chinese authorities have taken extreme measures to try to contain the coronavirus, which has spread nationwide. More than half the country’s 1.4 billion people are now restricted from leaving their homes in some way. Public gatherings are banned, including those in schoolyards.”

Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.) keeps repeating a debunked conspiracy theory.

“Cotton referenced a laboratory in the city, the Wuhan National Biosafety Laboratory, in an interview on Fox News’s ‘Sunday Morning Futures.’ He said the lab was near a market some scientists initially thought was a starting point for the virus’s spread,” Paulina Firozi reports. “‘We don’t know where it originated, and we have to get to the bottom of that,’ Cotton said. ‘We also know that just a few miles away from that food market is China’s only biosafety level 4 super laboratory that researches human infectious diseases.’ Yet Cotton acknowledged there is no evidence that the disease originated at the lab. Instead, he suggested it’s necessary to ask Chinese authorities about the possibility, fanning the embers of a conspiracy theory that has been repeatedly debunked by experts.”

---

Domestic developments that shouldn't be overlooked

A Guatemalan family separated by the Trump administration has now been apart over two years.

“When her teacher, or her social worker, or her best friend Ashley asks, Adelaida sounds it out — one of the first words she learned in English. “They separated us,” Kevin Sieff reports. “Adelaida Reynoso and her mother, María, were among the first migrant families broken up by the Trump administration, on July 31, 2017, long before the government acknowledged it was separating parents and children at the border. They haven’t seen each other since. Adelaida is now 9, a third-grader in southwest Florida, one of the top students in her class, carrying a thick English dictionary in a purple backpack. María, now 31, was deported alone to rural Guatemala. She has met with lawyers and smugglers and priests about reuniting with her daughter. Nothing has worked.”

The administration will waive federal contracting laws to speed border wall construction.

The Department of Homeland Security said waiving 10 regulations would allow for 177 miles of wall to be built quickly in California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas. (AP)

The Boy Scouts of America filed for bankruptcy, facing a wave of lawsuits over allegations of sexual abuse.

“The long-anticipated Chapter 11 bankruptcy filing will allow the Boy Scouts to keep operating as it reorganizes its finances and handles claims from hundreds of potential victims,” Samantha Schmidt reports. “It will also give alleged victims a limited amount of time to come forward before being barred indefinitely from seeking compensation. ... Lawyers throughout the country have begun representing hundreds of clients and have filed lawsuits in states such as New York and Pennsylvania. ‘In a way, this is an acknowledgment finally on the part of the Boy Scouts that they had this enormous problem and the problem is so large that they can’t deal with it themselves,’ said Michael Pfau, a lawyer who said he represents about 300 victims. ...

“A key question will be whether the Boy Scouts of America will be able to protect the assets of the local councils, which own camps and properties in prime real estate throughout the country. The local councils are incorporated separately but hold 70 percent of the Boy Scouts’ wealth, [\[per the WSJ\]](#). ... Many of these institutions could be implicated in the claims, making for an even more complicated bankruptcy case, said Pfau.”

Cardinal McCarrick quietly gave nearly $1 million to a group led by a cleric accused of sexual misconduct.

“From 2004 to 2017, [Theodore] McCarrick sent the Institute of the Incarnate Word dozens of checks — some as large as $50,000 — from a charitable account he controlled at the Archdiocese of Washington,” according to ledgers obtained by Shawn Boburg and Robert O’Harrow Jr. “During those years, Carlos Buela, who founded the group decades ago in Argentina, repeatedly defied Vatican sanctions for alleged sexual misconduct with seminarians, according to a confidential Vatican order. ... Six current and former members of Incarnate Word said McCarrick was celebrated internally for using his influence to protect the group. They said multiple members had warned church officials about alleged sexual encounters between Buela and seminarians. They also complained to church officials that institute leaders stifled internal criticism and punished dissenters.”

The EPA is about to change a rule cutting mercury pollution. The industry doesn't even want it.

“Exelon, one of the nation’s largest utilities, told the EPA that its effort to change a rule that has cut emissions of mercury and other toxins is ‘an action that is entirely unnecessary, unreasonable, and universally opposed by the power generation sector,’” Juliet Eilperin and Brady Dennis report. “Despite a chorus of opposition from unions, business groups and electric utilities, the EPA is on the verge of finalizing its proposal as part of a broader effort to overhaul how the government calculates the health benefits of cleaner air. The agency plans to declare that it is not ‘appropriate and necessary’ for the government to limit harmful pollutants from power plants, even though every utility in America has complied with standards put in place in 2011 ...

“While it will technically keep existing restrictions on mercury in place, it means the government would not be able to count collateral benefits — such as reducing soot and smog — when it sets limits on toxic air pollutants. It’s a rollback that industry officials argue could open the door to new legal fights, prompt some plants to turn off their pollution controls and ultimately sicken more Americans — all so that the administration can rewire how the government weighs the costs of regulation. The changes could give a boost to struggling coal companies, while hamstringing future efforts to limit mercury emissions from the nation’s power plants. The rule in question, known as the Mercury and Air Toxics Standards (MATS), targets a powerful neurotoxin that can affect the IQ and motor skills of children, even in utero. Between 2006, when states began to curb mercury from coal plants, and 2016, when the Obama-era rule took full effect, emissions have declined 85 percent.”

Jeff Bezos will give $10 billion to fight climate change.

Through the Bezos Earth Fund, the Amazon founder and Washington Post owner will “provide $10 billion in grants to scientists and activists to fund their efforts to fight climate change,” Kimberly Kindy reports. “[Bezos] said the grants, which will be issued this summer, will go to individuals and organizations from around the globe, adding that the effort will ‘take collective action from big companies, small companies, nation states, global organizations, and individuals.”

The Virginia ban on assault weapons sales didn't make it through a state Senate committee.

The failed vote handed Gov. Ralph Northam (D) a big defeat as he attempts to push a package of eight gun-control measures, Laura Vozzella reports. “The House has passed all eight of Northam’s bills, but a handful of Democrats in the less liberal Senate have quashed three of them amid fears that the newly empowered party might overplay its hand. The same tension has been playing out on other fronts, with the Senate taking a more cautious approach on issues such as the minimum wage, collective bargaining and state budgeting.”

A college accredited by an Education Department-sanctioned group doesn't actually exist.

“Reagan National University was supposed to be a place of higher learning, but it was unclear how it awarded degrees. By all appearances, at present, it has no students, no faculty and no classrooms. An agency meant to serve as a gatekeeper for federal money gave the university approval to operate anyway,” USA Today reports. The Accrediting Council for Independent Colleges & Schools “exists mainly because it was saved by the Education Department in 2018.”

More than 2,000 Justice Department alumni are calling on Bill Barr to resign.

The nonpartisan group Protect Democracy wrote that “political interference in the conduct of a criminal prosecution is anathema to the Department's core mission and to its sacred obligation to ensure equal justice under the law,” according to ABC News. The former officials also said it is “outrageous” the way Barr interfered in the Roger Stone case. “Although there are times when political leadership appropriately weighs in on individual prosecutions, it is unheard of for the Department's top leaders to overrule line prosecutors, who are following established policies, in order to give preferential treatment to a close associate of the President, as Attorney General Barr did in the Stone case," they wrote.

An association of federal judges called an emergency meeting.

“Philadelphia U.S. District Judge Cynthia Rufe, who heads the independent Federal Judges Association, said the group ‘could not wait’ until its spring conference to weigh in on a deepening crisis that has enveloped the Justice Department and [Barr],” USA Today reports. Rufe “said the group of more than 1,000 federal jurists called for the meeting last week after Trump criticized prosecutors’ initial sentencing recommendation for Stone and the Department of Justice overruled them.”

Peter Navarro – Trump’s top trade adviser – has a side project: Hunting for “Anonymous.”

“Since at least the time of the impeachment process against Trump, Navarro—whom the president affectionately calls ‘my Peter’—began conducting his own private investigation into the identity of Anonymous,” reports the Daily Beast. “One of those sources described Navarro’s investigative efforts as partially an in-depth analysis of the language and phrases used in Anonymous’ book and other public writings. The process ... mimics forensic linguistic profiling, and the goal is to cross-reference Navarro’s ‘profile’ with a list of potential suspects.”

---

Quote of the day

“In my view, to pursue the right policies for America I was willing to put up with a lot. I’m not asking for martyrdom because of that,” said John Bolton, describing his work for the Trump administration. “I knew – think I knew what I was getting into. I did it for 17 months. I did the best I could. You can judge the results by what the policies are.” (The Atlantic)

---

Social media speed read

After Bloomberg's campaign called Sanders Trump's new "bro," the Vermont senator replied with this picture:

Bernie Sanders ✓

@BernieSanders

twitter.com/sahilkapur/sta...

Sahil Kapur ✓ @sahilkapur

Mike Bloomberg's campaign manager Kevin Sheekey releases a statement responding to attacks from Sanders.

Subject line: "BERNIE'S NEW BRO... DONALD TRUMP"

BERNIE'S NEW BRO... DONALD TRUMP

NEW YORK — In response to the repeated attacks by Bernie Sanders, his spokespeople and supporters, today Mike Bloomberg 2020 responded against baseless charges espoused online, in print, and on TV.

"It's a shameful turn of events to see Bernie

♥ 148K 10:01 PM - Feb 17, 2020

💬 41.1K people are talking about this

Cher endorsed Joe Biden:

Biden offered to meet up in Vegas:

Amy Klobuchar played along with an Internet joke about her branding strategy:

Amy Klobuchar ✓

@amyklobuchar

Busted.... twitter.com/shanajocreus/s...

Shana Jo Crews @ShanaJoCrews

Just realized that @amyklobuchar's campaign colors are the same as Hidden Valley Ranch and now I desperately hope this was all part of her master plan to win the Midwest and unite the country #Election2020

♥ 60.2K 5:07 PM - Feb 17, 2020

🗨 5,524 people are talking about this

Pete Buttigieg got some sun:

Chuck Kennedy ✓

@ChuckKennedyDC

The desert sun. Las Vegas, NV on Feb. 16, 2020.

♥ 1,109 7:33 PM - Feb 17, 2020

💬 157 people are talking about this

A former presidential candidate made dinner for her husband:

Douglas Emhoff ✓

@douglasemhoff

Meanwhile, @KamalaHarris is home for the weekend and... 🍷🔥❤️😊

♥️ 13.2K 8:59 PM - Feb 17, 2020

💬 876 people are talking about this

Barack Obama highlighted the anniversary of the Recovery Act:

Barack Obama ✓

@BarackObama

Eleven years ago today, near the bottom of the worst recession in generations, I signed the Recovery Act, paving the way for more than a decade of economic growth and the longest streak of job creation in American history.

613K 3:46 PM - Feb 17, 2020

147K people are talking about this

And his successor seemed to respond:

Donald J. Trump ✓ @realDonaldTrump · 7h

Did you hear the latest con job? President Obama is now trying to take credit for the Economic Boom taking place under the Trump Administration. He had the WEAKEST recovery since the Great Depression, despite Zero Fed Rate & MASSIVE quantitative easing. NOW, best jobs numbers....

Donald J. Trump ✓

@realDonaldTrump

...ever. Had to rebuild our military, which was totally depleted. Fed Rate UP, taxes and regulations WAY DOWN. If Dems won in 2016, the USA would be in big economic (Depression?) & military trouble right now. THE BEST IS YET TO COME. KEEP AMERICA GREAT!

80.9K 11:40 PM - Feb 17, 2020

31K people are talking about this

Ivanka Trump's trip to the United Arab Emirates over the weekend drew attention to another conflict of interest:

 Anna Massoglia
@annalecta

Ivanka Trump's United Arab Emirates trip comes days before the 3 year anniversary celebration of Trump's Dubai golf club that opened weeks after President Trump's inauguration & doubled its income his 2nd year in the White House, raking in $43M+ since 2017
crp.org/trfi twitter.com/ivankatrump/st...

 World of Influence: A guide to Trump...
Two years into his presidency, Donald Trump continues to make money from properties and licensing deals in nearly two
opensecrets.org

Ivanka Trump  @IvankaTrump

Magical evening in Dubai with H.H. Sheikha Latifa bint Mohammed bin Rashid Al Maktoum, Prime Minister May, David Malpass and Kristalina Georgieva. ✨

♥ 1,736 6:48 PM - Feb 17, 2020 · Washington, DC

💬 1,606 people are talking about this

And Stephen Miller, Trump's domestic policy adviser who oversees immigration policy, married Katie Waldman, Vice President Pence's press secretary, at the Trump hotel in D.C. on Sunday. The president attended – as did an Elvis impersonator:

Katie Rose Miller

@katiewaldman

The most perfect day, the most perfect man surrounded with more love than we both could have ever dreamed.

Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Miller

2.16.20

8,516 8:07 PM - Feb 17, 2020 · Trump® International Hotel Washington, D.C.

4,489 people are talking about this

Videos of the day

John Oliver is back, and, in a very timely fashion, he talked about Medicare-for-all:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out The Trailer for news and insight on political campaigns around the country, from David Weigel. 435 districts. 50 states. Tuesday, Thursday and Sunday evenings. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Conservative intellectuals launch a new group to challenge free-market 'fundamentalism' on the right
Date: Tuesday, February 18, 2020 7:42:35 AM

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Partnership for America's Health Care Future

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
✉ Email

Conservative intellectuals launch a new group to challenge free-market 'fundamentalism' on the right

Oren Cass believes conservatives have blundered by outsourcing GOP economic policymaking to libertarian "fundamentalists" who see the free market as an end unto itself, rather than as a means for improving quality of life to strengthen families and communities. The former domestic policy director on Mitt Romney's 2012 presidential campaign quit his job as a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute to launch a new group called

American Compass that aims to reorient the right. He previewed their plans in an exclusive interview on Monday afternoon.

Joining him on the board of directors will be Sen. Marco Rubio's chief of staff Mike Needham, the former chief executive of Heritage Action for America; Julius Krein, the editor of American Affairs, a quarterly political journal; and David Azerrad, a Hillsdale College professor who was formerly a fellow at the Heritage Foundation. Wells King will be the research director. Until last week, the former McKinsey consultant was a policy adviser to Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah) on the Joint Economic Committee.

Cass compares President Trump to an earthquake.

Running as a populist, Trump challenged Republican orthodoxy on free trade and tapped into the disaffection of blue-collar workers in the heartland who have been left behind by the growing, but uneven, economy. For the most part, however, he said conservative elites in the think tank world have not followed suit.

President Trump speaks at the White House on Friday. (Jabin Botsford/The Washington Post)

“The goal, long term, is to think about what the post-Trump right-of-center is going to be,” said Cass. “One of the reasons we think this is such an important project is that, even four-plus years after Trump emerged on the scene, there really has been very little new and interesting ferment in the right of center. It’s pretty much the same set of institutions and publications and so forth. ... By and large, the establishment is what it was. And it seems to be keeping its head down and sort of hoping that everything can just go back post-Trump to the way that it was pre-Trump. To the extent that the future should sound different, and certainly I think it should, now is the time to start building the institutions and efforts that are going to make that a reality.”

Cass acknowledges the problems animating populism are very real, but he argues that they won’t be solved by the governing ideologies he blames for creating the crisis, nor by the populism itself, “which has demonstrated no ability to formulate or implement a coherent response.”

“An earthquake clears a lot of space for rebuilding, but an earthquake does not rebuild,” Cass explained. “And there are a lot of people who want to rush right back in and build what you already had after the earthquake. But something an earthquake shows you is which of the things that you'd already built were really not built very thoughtfully. It’s important to learn lessons from this disruption that has occurred. It's important to go back to first principles and ask: What do we actually believe and why? What do we care about and why?”

Inside the GOP coalition, Cass argues, traditional economic conservatives ceded economic policy to libertarians as part of a “bargain” to win the Cold War. Ronald Reagan called it a three-legged stool: economic libertarians, social conservatives and national security hawks. Cass believes this “fusionism” worked well – in the past. “When you had a situation where the free market was delivering the social outcomes that conservatives most prized, libertarians and conservatives tended to agree,” he said. “What we've seen more recently is a growing understanding that the market does not necessarily in all cases deliver a set of social outcomes that conservatives prize.”

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) leaves a luncheon with fellow GOP senators at the Capitol earlier this month. He's retrofitted his approach to economics since losing to Trump in 2016. (Amanda Voisard for The Washington Post)

---

Content from Partnership for America's Health Care Future

We Can't Afford Medicare for All

American families should not be forced to foot the bill for Medicare for All. And any new government insurance system would force them to pay more to wait longer for worse care.

---

A society's vitality, of course, cannot be judged solely

by its gross domestic product.

Markets are good, Cass explained, but life is about so much more than markets. He said American conservatism historically had a richer conception of the role of government beyond maximizing returns, such as strengthening domestic industry. He lamented the growing concentration of wealth, geographically on the coasts and in the big cities, as well as in a handful of industries, which has accelerated income inequality.

“When you zoom out, you can have a rising GDP, but if it's in the context of collapsing families and people no longer getting married and declining fertility rates and so on and so forth, you haven't necessarily enhanced well-being,” said Cass. “Likewise, if you are generating growth by trading off the non-market work that people historically performed within their households for a model where everyone goes to work and then they pay each other for the things they used to do in their own household, that's not great either. Obviously, there are times when disruption, even if unfortunate, is necessary, but it's important to recognize that, alongside the value that the hyper-efficient conglomerate brings, there is also an awful lot of value that the locally-owned small business brings.”

Cass said American Compass will “think differently” about labor vs. capital than Republicans have in recent generations. “A big component of the market fundamentalism – in many cases, held entirely in good faith; in some cases, more as a matter of political convenience – is the argument that whatever policies are best for shareholders in the short run are the best policies and will eventually be good for everyone else also,” he said. “That is something that's not actually part of real economics, and it's certainly not a conservative way of thinking about how a society operates. ... We need to recognize that sometimes we should feel just as comfortable saying, ‘What's good for workers is going to be good for shareholders in the long run.’”

Sen. Josh Hawley (R-Mo.) arrives at the Capitol for the impeachment trial last month. (Erin Scott/Reuters)

Two GOP senators have been championing this sort of an approach.

Freshman Sen. Josh Hawley (R-Mo.) has talked a great deal over the last year about the need for new policies that make it easier for people to stay in their hometowns if they want to, among other things. Rubio, the senior senator from Florida, has retrofitted his approach to economic policy since losing to Trump in the 2016 primaries. He's challenged shareholder primacy theory and even embraced Catholic social doctrine as a way to respond to capitalism's inevitable failures.

“As you look across the Republican conference, you've got Rubio and Hawley who are furthest out in front, but then right behind them is a very interesting group of folks who are really thoughtful and heterodox on these issues,” said Cass. He named Lee as part of that contingent, along with Sens. Tom Cotton (Ark.), Tim Scott (S.C.), Ben Sasse (Neb.) and Romney (Utah).

“In terms of how it fits ideologically, I think there are certainly

components of it that sound more Trumpian,” Cass said. “For instance, an actual conservative economics would be much more skeptical of free trade than is libertarian economics. But this is not an effort to codify and carry forward Trumpism.”

Cass, 36, graduated from Harvard Law School, where he was an editor of the law review, after working as a management consultant at Bain, Romney’s former firm, in the firm’s Boston and New Delhi offices. He emphasized that American Compass, the new initiative, is “not an exercise in starting from scratch.” He said the mission is really about “going back and finding things that always were part of the American tradition that have been important to conservative thinkers, but that seem to have gotten lost in in the more market fundamentalist mode of especially the last 20 to 30 years.”

“I think there is just tremendous intellectual energy ... that's working on and discussing and hashing these things out, but there aren't really any institutional trappings of it yet,” he said. “There is not really even a vocabulary for it. If you said, ‘Who are the people working on this stuff?,’ it's hard to know where to look. We want to provide that base. We'll just be one entity in the flotilla or the armada or the fleet. I don't know the difference between those three things. But hopefully one that has some prominent people on board and can facilitate communication and can bring people together and ... help focus attacks when there are fights to be had.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

2020 watch

Rep. Henry Cuellar (D-Tex.) holds up a border map as he speaks during a meeting with lawmakers on immigration policy at the White House in 2018. (Jabin Botsford/The Washington Post)

Scoop: The U.S. Chamber of Commerce will endorse Democratic Rep. Henry Cuellar in Texas.

The seven-term congressman is facing a vigorous challenge on his left from Jessica Cisneros in a March 3 primary. Cisneros, a 26-year-old immigration attorney, has endorsements from women’s groups like EMILY’s List, environmental groups like the Sierra Club and national liberal leaders like Bernie Sanders and Elizabeth Warren. The U.S. Chamber joins the Koch-backed group Libre Initiative Action, which endorsed Cuellar on Friday.

“At a time when the country continues to be polarized, it’s important to elect centrist candidates who aim to find common ground on common sense solutions to better serve Americans and strengthen communities,” said Scott Reed, the U.S. Chamber’s chief political strategist. He praised Cuellar for his early work on the U.S.-Mexico-Canada trade agreement, as well as business-friendly efforts to protect Texas’s auto industry from tariffs and fighting for the oil and gas industry. “Cuellar has consistently stepped up to the plate,” said Reed.

Meanwhile, in Massachusetts, Sen. Edward Markey will square off tonight in the first televised debate with his Democratic primary challenger, Rep. Joe Kennedy III. (Karen Weintraub has a preview.)

Mike Bloomberg campaigns last Wednesday in Chattanooga, Tenn. (Doug Strickland/Reuters)

Mike Bloomberg has qualified for Wednesday's Democratic debate.

A new NPR-PBS-Marist poll showed him in second place with the support of 19 percent of Democratic primary voters nationally, trailing Bernie Sanders at 31 percent. Bloomberg has leapfrogged Joe Biden by spending more than $300 million on television in states that vote on Super Tuesday and beyond. Biden has fallen to third place with 15 percent, followed by Elizabeth Warren at 12 percent, Amy Klobuchar at 9 percent and Pete Buttigieg at 8 percent. Sanders and Bloomberg are tied at 22 percent in Virginia, according to a new Monmouth University poll that also came out this morning. Biden comes in third in the commonwealth, pulling in 18 percent.

Bloomberg has been preparing for the debate on the assumption he'd qualify.

“Top Bloomberg lieutenants and policy experts have been preparing him for what would be the most unscripted event yet of his three-month-old campaign,” Politico reports. “Howard Wolfson, the veteran Democratic strategist who joined Bloomberg’s orbit in 2009 after working on Hillary Clinton’s 2008 presidential race, is playing the role of Sanders; Julie Wood, Bloomberg’s national press secretary, is depicting [Warren]; and senior advisers Marc La Vorgna and Marcia Hale are stand-ins for [Buttigieg and Klobuchar], respectively. Wolfson joked that his inspiration for Sanders came from watching ‘Statler and Waldorf,’ the cantankerous elderly Muppets who lob critiques from their balcony seats. Asked about rivals trying to get under Bloomberg’s own skin, he quipped, ‘Haters gonna hate. Bring it on.’”

“Bloomberg is trying to hone a crisp and energetic appeal to voters that will contrast with Biden— another white, male septuagenarian on stage, according to advisers. ... Other potential pitfalls for Bloomberg are his tendency to use dated language — words like ‘bawdy,’ for instance — to dismiss concerns about his financial news service’s work culture for female employees. Bloomberg has a history of losing his cool in public. He once grew visibly annoyed at a reporter in a wheelchair who interrupted his press conference when he dropped a recording device. More recently, he urged a reporter to 'get on with it' when he was pressed about his controversial stop-and-frisk policing tactic. Snapping at other candidates or a moderator could undermine his efforts to convey empathy and contrition."

The former New York City mayor is making inroads with black voters who backed Biden.

"Bloomberg has pummeled the airwaves in South Carolina, Nevada and Super Tuesday states with ads, so much so that a questioner at a Tennessee news conference thanked him for a $3.5 million buy at his media station before proceeding," Cleve Wootson, Bob Costa and Michael Scherer report. "Biden's unsteady turn — a fourth-place finish in Iowa preceded his decline in New Hampshire — has given an opening to rivals to make their own arguments to black and Latino voters. ... Rosemary Lawrence, a 75-year-old black woman who leads the political ministry at Charlotte's mostly black Friendship Missionary Baptist Church, ... supported Biden when he entered the race in April, laying out the argument for anyone who asked that he was the candidate most likely to defeat Trump. ... 'I love Joe Biden,' she said. ... 'I really wanted to support him, but what I've seen recently is he doesn't seem to be as energized and focused and alert as he was, say, eight years ago even. And now his funding is drying up. The bottom line is I want to find somebody who can beat Donald Trump.' Early voting has already started in North Carolina. Next week, Lawrence plans to cast a ballot for Bloomberg."

To be sure, Bloomberg has his own problems with stop-and-frisk, among other things. "While his crowds, even in southern states, are often affluent and white, he is regularly introduced by black leaders who testify to Bloomberg's understanding of the history of racism in the country and his commitment to nonwhite voters. Bloomberg has been endorsed by more than 100 mayors, many of them black. He has proposed a plan, named 'the Greenwood Initiative' for a black Tulsa community destroyed in a 1921 racial massacre, that sets a goal of helping 1 million black families buy a home, double the number of black-owned businesses and triple the

net worth of a typical black family.”

Bloomberg launched his first attack against Sanders. Others followed.

In a web video, Bloomberg compared Sanders’s campaign tactics to Trump’s. Sanders replied by comparing Bloomberg to Trump. Biden called on Sanders to disavow “Trump-like” attacks by some of his supporters on officials at the Nevada culinary workers union, per the Times. Elizabeth Warren also jumped into the fray, saying Sanders “has a lot of questions to answer” about his supporters’ behavior. “I am particularly worried about what happened in the attacks on members of the culinary union,” Warren said, per NBC. “That is not how we build an inclusive Democratic Party. ... We do not build on a foundation of hate.”

Biden's campaign is counting on at least a second-place finish in Nevada.

“First would be wonderful, but us getting a second place I think does the work that we need to do to win South Carolina,” Biden campaign manager Greg Schultz told supporters on a conference call. “We win South Carolina, we’re going to have ended the first four contests likely with a delegate advantage. ... I think the Democratic Party will sigh a collective sigh of relief when we finish second or better in Nevada.” (NYT)

The Afghanistan war shattered Biden’s faith in American military power.

“Biden talks about America in grand, almost Reaganesque, terms,” writes Greg Jaffe in the latest installment of our Pursuits series. “But inside the Obama administration Biden was a consistent voice of caution. The mismatch is a product of an approach to foreign policy that is guided largely by impulse and feeling rather than abiding philosophy. And it reflects a decades-long career in which Biden has been all over the map on the biggest questions of war and peace. ... In the 1990s, Biden had made an impassioned argument that U.S. credibility and the country’s moral standing demanded that it use military force to stop a slaughter in the Balkans. In Afghanistan, Biden rejected the notion that America had any moral obligation to improve the lives of Afghans or prevent civil wars. ‘He had that empathy for the people in the Balkans. He even had it for people in Iraq,’ said a senior Obama administration official... ‘I never saw it in Afghanistan.’”

Speaking of Afghanistan: Results released today, nearly five months after the election, show that President Ashraf Ghani has won a second term. “The announcement comes after months of political uncertainty and just days after U.S. and Taliban negotiators announced they had reached a conditional peace deal that could be signed as soon as the end of the month,” Sayed Salahuddin and Sharif Hassan report.

---

The coronavirus

The number of coronavirus cases in the U.S. is now 29.

“Fourteen Americans who tested positive for coronavirus were among the hundreds of U.S. citizens evacuated from a cruise ship off Japan to U.S. facilities over the holiday weekend, the result of a chaotic chain of events that put virus-stricken passengers on flights with other evacuees,” Anna Fifield, Alex Horton and Abha Bhattacharai report. “Their return almost doubles the number of confirmed coronavirus cases in the United States ... The 14 U.S. passengers tested positive for the virus after disembarking from the Diamond Princess, a cruise liner carrying 2,666 passengers and 1,045 crew members that had been quarantined for two weeks off the Japanese port of Yokohama. But by the time their test results arrived, they were already on a fleet of buses that took 328 asymptomatic passengers from the ship to two charter planes bound for U.S. military bases in Texas and California ...

"It was a wrench in a coordinated effort. While the buses sat on the tarmac, health experts mulled whether to put the 14 on the flights or divert them to hospitals in Japan ... The planes each included a sealed-off section of 18 seats in the back, and part of the plan was to isolate passengers there if they developed symptoms midflight ... Health authorities deemed the 14 'fit to fly' because they were not showing symptoms, the State Department and the Department of Health and Human Services said in a statement

Monday. They were cordoned off from the other passengers during the flights.” The Diamond Princess quarantine will end as scheduled on Wednesday, Japan’s health minister said today, as 88 more cases were discovered, bringing the total linked to the ship to 542. A total of 35 Filipino crew members on the cruise ship have tested positive for the coronavirus.

Apple said the virus will cause it to miss revenue targets.

Apple warned that “it expects to fall short of revenue goals in the current quarter because of the coronavirus outbreak, underscoring the far-reaching effects of the public health crisis on the global economy,” Derek Hawkins and Reed Albergotti report. “In a statement to investors, Apple said that while factories in China were reopening, iPhone production in the country was ramping up more slowly than expected. ... Demand for Apple products has also dampened in China, where all the company’s stores and many of its partner stores have shuttered...”

The virus killed the director of Wuhan’s main hospital.

“A respected neurologist who was the director of Wuchang Hospital in Wuhan died Tuesday after contracting the novel coronavirus,” Anna Fifield and Rick Noack report. Liu Zhiming, who was 51, passed away despite a “full effort rescue,” according to a statement from Wuhan’s municipal health commission. Zhiming “became the most prominent victim of the outbreak since another doctor, whistleblower Li Wenliang died Feb. 7, sparking an outpouring of public anger and grief. Liu’s death follows that last week of a nurse, Liu Fan, from the same hospital. A total of eight front-line health care workers have now died, while as many as 3,000 have been infected with the coronavirus. ...

“Officials have been sounding a more upbeat note in recent days about the prospects for containing the virus. But a renowned Chinese pulmonologist who predicted a peak this month clarified his remarks to say that the peak may be followed by a plateau, rather than an outright fall in cases. ... China reported 1,886 new coronavirus cases and 98 more deaths in its daily update on the outbreak Tuesday, bringing the death toll in mainland China to 1,868, with 72,436 confirmed cases. The overwhelming majority have been in Hubei province.”

In China, 200 million kids are back in school – thanks to the Internet.

“They didn’t stand in front of a flagpole and sing the national anthem. They watched it on screens. In some parts of the country, so many kids were watching at the same time that Internet speeds ground to a halt,” Fifield reports. “One middle school boy, sitting with his computer at his front door in Beijing, was asked what he was studying. He responded: physical education. Chinese authorities have taken extreme measures to try to contain the coronavirus, which has spread nationwide. More than half the country’s 1.4 billion people are now restricted from leaving their homes in some way. Public gatherings are banned, including those in schoolyards.”

Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.) keeps repeating a debunked conspiracy theory.

“Cotton referenced a laboratory in the city, the Wuhan National Biosafety Laboratory, in an interview on Fox News’s ‘Sunday Morning Futures.’ He said the lab was near a market some scientists initially thought was a starting point for the virus’s spread,” Paulina Firozi reports. “‘We don’t know where it originated, and we have to get to the bottom of that,’ Cotton said. ‘We also know that just a few miles away from that food market is China’s only biosafety level 4 super laboratory that researches human infectious diseases.’ Yet Cotton acknowledged there is no evidence that the disease originated at the lab. Instead, he suggested it’s necessary to ask Chinese authorities about the possibility, fanning the embers of a conspiracy theory that has been repeatedly debunked by experts.”

---

Domestic developments that shouldn't be overlooked

A Guatemalan family separated by the Trump administration has now been apart over two years.

“When her teacher, or her social worker, or her best friend Ashley asks, Adelaida sounds it out — one of the first words she learned in English. “They separated us,” Kevin Sieff reports. “Adelaida Reynoso and her mother, María, were among the first migrant families broken up by the Trump administration, on July 31, 2017, long before the government acknowledged it was separating parents and children at the border. They haven’t seen each other since. Adelaida is now 9, a third-grader in southwest Florida, one of the top students in her class, carrying a thick English dictionary in a purple backpack. María, now 31, was deported alone to rural Guatemala. She has met with lawyers and smugglers and priests about reuniting with her daughter. Nothing has worked.”

The administration will waive federal contracting laws to speed border wall construction.

The Department of Homeland Security said waiving 10 regulations would allow for 177 miles of wall to be built quickly in California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas. (AP)

The Boy Scouts of America filed for bankruptcy, facing a wave of lawsuits over allegations of sexual abuse.

“The long-anticipated Chapter 11 bankruptcy filing will allow the Boy Scouts to keep operating as it reorganizes its finances and handles claims from hundreds of potential victims,” Samantha Schmidt reports. “It will also give alleged victims a limited amount of time to come forward before being barred indefinitely from seeking compensation. ... Lawyers throughout the country have begun representing hundreds of clients and have filed lawsuits in states such as New York and Pennsylvania. ‘In a way, this is an acknowledgment finally on the part of the Boy Scouts that they had this enormous problem and the problem is so large that they can’t deal with it themselves,’ said Michael Pfau, a lawyer who said he represents about 300 victims. ...

“A key question will be whether the Boy Scouts of America will be able to protect the assets of the local councils, which own camps and properties in prime real estate throughout the country. The local councils are incorporated separately but hold 70 percent of the Boy Scouts’ wealth, [\[per the WSJ\]](#). ... Many of these institutions could be implicated in the claims, making for an even more complicated bankruptcy case, said Pfau.”

Cardinal McCarrick quietly gave nearly $1 million to a group led by a cleric accused of sexual misconduct.

“From 2004 to 2017, [Theodore] McCarrick sent the Institute of the Incarnate Word dozens of checks — some as large as $50,000 — from a charitable account he controlled at the Archdiocese of Washington,” according to ledgers obtained by Shawn Boburg and Robert O’Harrow Jr. “During those years, Carlos Buela, who founded the group decades ago in Argentina, repeatedly defied Vatican sanctions for alleged sexual misconduct with seminarians, according to a confidential Vatican order. ... Six current and former members of Incarnate Word said McCarrick was celebrated internally for using his influence to protect the group. They said multiple members had warned church officials about alleged sexual encounters between Buela and seminarians. They also complained to church officials that institute leaders stifled internal criticism and punished dissenters.”

The EPA is about to change a rule cutting mercury pollution. The industry doesn't even want it.

“Exelon, one of the nation’s largest utilities, told the EPA that its effort to change a rule that has cut emissions of mercury and other toxins is ‘an action that is entirely unnecessary, unreasonable, and universally opposed by the power generation sector,’” Juliet Eilperin and Brady Dennis report. “Despite a chorus of opposition from unions, business groups and electric utilities, the EPA is on the verge of finalizing its proposal as part of a broader effort to overhaul how the government calculates the health benefits of cleaner air. The agency plans to declare that it is not ‘appropriate and necessary’ for the government to limit harmful pollutants from power plants, even though every utility in America has complied with standards put in place in 2011 ...

“While it will technically keep existing restrictions on mercury in place, it means the government would not be able to count collateral benefits — such as reducing soot and smog — when it sets limits on toxic air pollutants. It’s a rollback that industry officials argue could open the door to new legal fights, prompt some plants to turn off their pollution controls and ultimately sicken more Americans — all so that the administration can rewire how the government weighs the costs of regulation. The changes could give a boost to struggling coal companies, while hamstringing future efforts to limit mercury emissions from the nation’s power plants. The rule in question, known as the Mercury and Air Toxics Standards (MATS), targets a powerful neurotoxin that can affect the IQ and motor skills of children, even in utero. Between 2006, when states began to curb mercury from coal plants, and 2016, when the Obama-era rule took full effect, emissions have declined 85 percent.”

Jeff Bezos will give $10 billion to fight climate change.

Through the Bezos Earth Fund, the Amazon founder and Washington Post owner will “provide $10 billion in grants to scientists and activists to fund their efforts to fight climate change,” Kimberly Kindy reports. “[Bezos] said the grants, which will be issued this summer, will go to individuals and organizations from around the globe, adding that the effort will ‘take collective action from big companies, small companies, nation states, global organizations, and individuals.”

The Virginia ban on assault weapons sales didn't make it through a state Senate committee.

The failed vote handed Gov. Ralph Northam (D) a big defeat as he attempts to push a package of eight gun-control measures, Laura Vozzella reports. “The House has passed all eight of Northam’s bills, but a handful of Democrats in the less liberal Senate have quashed three of them amid fears that the newly empowered party might overplay its hand. The same tension has been playing out on other fronts, with the Senate taking a more cautious approach on issues such as the minimum wage, collective bargaining and state budgeting.”

A college accredited by an Education Department-sanctioned group doesn't actually exist.

“Reagan National University was supposed to be a place of higher learning, but it was unclear how it awarded degrees. By all appearances, at present, it has no students, no faculty and no classrooms. An agency meant to serve as a gatekeeper for federal money gave the university approval to operate anyway,” USA Today reports. The Accrediting Council for Independent Colleges & Schools “exists mainly because it was saved by the Education Department in 2018.”

More than 2,000 Justice Department alumni are calling on Bill Barr to resign.

The nonpartisan group Protect Democracy wrote that “political interference in the conduct of a criminal prosecution is anathema to the Department's core mission and to its sacred obligation to ensure equal justice under the law,” according to ABC News. The former officials also said it is “outrageous” the way Barr interfered in the Roger Stone case. “Although there are times when political leadership appropriately weighs in on individual prosecutions, it is unheard of for the Department's top leaders to overrule line prosecutors, who are following established policies, in order to give preferential treatment to a close associate of the President, as Attorney General Barr did in the Stone case," they wrote.

An association of federal judges called an emergency meeting.

“Philadelphia U.S. District Judge Cynthia Rufe, who heads the independent Federal Judges Association, said the group ‘could not wait’ until its spring conference to weigh in on a deepening crisis that has enveloped the Justice Department and [Barr],” USA Today reports. Rufe “said the group of more than 1,000 federal jurists called for the meeting last week after Trump criticized prosecutors’ initial sentencing recommendation for Stone and the Department of Justice overruled them.”

Peter Navarro – Trump’s top trade adviser – has a side project: Hunting for “Anonymous.”

“Since at least the time of the impeachment process against Trump, Navarro—whom the president affectionately calls ‘my Peter’—began conducting his own private investigation into the identity of Anonymous,” reports the Daily Beast. “One of those sources described Navarro’s investigative efforts as partially an in-depth analysis of the language and phrases used in Anonymous’ book and other public writings. The process ... mimics forensic linguistic profiling, and the goal is to cross-reference Navarro’s ‘profile’ with a list of potential suspects.”

---

Quote of the day

“In my view, to pursue the right policies for America I was willing to put up with a lot. I’m not asking for martyrdom because of that,” said John Bolton, describing his work for the Trump administration. “I knew – think I knew what I was getting into. I did it for 17 months. I did the best I could. You can judge the results by what the policies are.” (The Atlantic)

---

Social media speed read

After Bloomberg's campaign called Sanders Trump's new "bro," the Vermont senator replied with this picture:

Bernie Sanders ✓

@BernieSanders

twitter.com/sahilkapur/sta...

Sahil Kapur ✓ @sahilkapur

Mike Bloomberg's campaign manager Kevin Sheekey releases a statement responding to attacks from Sanders.

Subject line: "BERNIE'S NEW BRO... DONALD TRUMP"

BERNIE'S NEW BRO... DONALD TRUMP

NEW YORK — In response to the repeated attacks by Bernie Sanders, his spokespeople and supporters, today Mike Bloomberg 2020 responded against baseless charges espoused online, in print, and on TV.

"It's a shameful turn of events to see Bernie

♥ 148K 10:01 PM - Feb 17, 2020

💬 41.1K people are talking about this

Cher endorsed Joe Biden:

Biden offered to meet up in Vegas:

Amy Klobuchar played along with an Internet joke about her branding strategy:

Amy Klobuchar ✓
@amyklobuchar

Busted.... twitter.com/shanajocrewws/s...

Shana Jo Crews @ShanaJoCrews

Just realized that @amyklobuchar's campaign colors are the same as Hidden Valley Ranch and now I desperately hope this was all part of her master plan to win the Midwest and unite the country #Election2020

♥ 60.2K 5:07 PM - Feb 17, 2020

🗨 5,524 people are talking about this

Pete Buttigieg got some sun:

Chuck Kennedy ✓
@ChuckKennedyDC

The desert sun. Las Vegas, NV on Feb. 16, 2020.

♥ 1,109 7:33 PM - Feb 17, 2020

💬 157 people are talking about this

A former presidential candidate made dinner for her husband:

Douglas Emhoff ✓

@douglasemhoff

Meanwhile, @KamalaHarris is home for the weekend and... 🍷🔥❤️😊

♥️ 13.2K 8:59 PM - Feb 17, 2020

💬 876 people are talking about this

Barack Obama highlighted the anniversary of the Recovery Act:

Barack Obama ✓

@BarackObama

Eleven years ago today, near the bottom of the worst recession in generations, I signed the Recovery Act, paving the way for more than a decade of economic growth and the longest streak of job creation in American history.

613K 3:46 PM - Feb 17, 2020

147K people are talking about this

And his successor seemed to respond:

Donald J. Trump ✓ @realDonaldTrump · 7h

Did you hear the latest con job? President Obama is now trying to take credit for the Economic Boom taking place under the Trump Administration. He had the WEAKEST recovery since the Great Depression, despite Zero Fed Rate & MASSIVE quantitative easing. NOW, best jobs numbers....

Donald J. Trump ✓

@realDonaldTrump

...ever. Had to rebuild our military, which was totally depleted. Fed Rate UP, taxes and regulations WAY DOWN. If Dems won in 2016, the USA would be in big economic (Depression?) & military trouble right now. THE BEST IS YET TO COME. KEEP AMERICA GREAT!

80.9K 11:40 PM - Feb 17, 2020

31K people are talking about this

Ivanka Trump's trip to the United Arab Emirates over the weekend drew attention to another conflict of interest:

Anna Massoglia @annalecta

Ivanka Trump's United Arab Emirates trip comes days before the 3 year anniversary celebration of Trump's Dubai golf club that opened weeks after President Trump's inauguration & doubled its income his 2nd year in the White House, raking in $43M+ since 2017
crp.org/trfi twitter.com/ivankatrump/st...

World of Influence: A guide to Trump...
Two years into his presidency, Donald Trump continues to make money from properties and licensing deals in nearly two
opensecrets.org

Ivanka Trump @IvankaTrump

Magical evening in Dubai with H.H. Sheikha Latifa bint Mohammed bin Rashid Al Maktoum, Prime Minister May, David Malpass and Kristalina Georgieva. ✨

1,736 6:48 PM - Feb 17, 2020 · Washington, DC

1,606 people are talking about this

And Stephen Miller, Trump's domestic policy adviser who oversees immigration policy, married Katie Waldman, Vice President Pence's press secretary, at the Trump hotel in D.C. on Sunday. The president attended – as did an Elvis impersonator:

Katie Rose Miller
@katiewaldman

The most perfect day, the most perfect man surrounded with more love than we both could have ever dreamed.

Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Miller

2.16.20

♥ 8,516 8:07 PM - Feb 17, 2020 · Trump® International Hotel Washington, D.C.

💬 4,489 people are talking about this

Videos of the day

John Oliver is back, and, in a very timely fashion, he talked about Medicare-for-all:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out The Trailer for news and insight on political campaigns around the country, from David Weigel. 435 districts. 50 states. Tuesday, Thursday and Sunday evenings. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Conservative intellectuals launch a new group to challenge free-market 'fundamentalism' on the right
Date: Tuesday, February 18, 2020 7:42:35 AM

COMMITTED TO
AFFORDABLE CARE
FOR THE HEALTH OF AMERICA<sup>SM</sup>

Powered by  LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Partnership for America's Health Care Future

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

Conservative intellectuals launch a new group to challenge free-market 'fundamentalism' on the right

Oren Cass believes conservatives have blundered by outsourcing GOP economic policymaking to libertarian “fundamentalists” who see the free market as an end unto itself, rather than as a means for improving quality of life to strengthen families and communities. The former domestic policy director on Mitt Romney’s 2012 presidential campaign quit his job as a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute to launch a new group called

American Compass that aims to reorient the right. He previewed their plans in an exclusive interview on Monday afternoon.

Joining him on the board of directors will be Sen. Marco Rubio's chief of staff Mike Needham, the former chief executive of Heritage Action for America; Julius Krein, the editor of American Affairs, a quarterly political journal; and David Azerrad, a Hillsdale College professor who was formerly a fellow at the Heritage Foundation. Wells King will be the research director. Until last week, the former McKinsey consultant was a policy adviser to Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah) on the Joint Economic Committee.

Cass compares President Trump to an earthquake.

Running as a populist, Trump challenged Republican orthodoxy on free trade and tapped into the disaffection of blue-collar workers in the heartland who have been left behind by the growing, but uneven, economy. For the most part, however, he said conservative elites in the think tank world have not followed suit.

President Trump speaks at the White House on Friday. (Jabin Botsford/The Washington Post)

“The goal, long term, is to think about what the post-Trump right-of-center is going to be,” said Cass. “One of the reasons we think this is such an important project is that, even four-plus years after Trump emerged on the scene, there really has been very little new and interesting ferment in the right of center. It’s pretty much the same set of institutions and publications and so forth. ... By and large, the establishment is what it was. And it seems to be keeping its head down and sort of hoping that everything can just go back post-Trump to the way that it was pre-Trump. To the extent that the future should sound different, and certainly I think it should, now is the time to start building the institutions and efforts that are going to make that a reality.”

Cass acknowledges the problems animating populism are very real, but he argues that they won’t be solved by the governing ideologies he blames for creating the crisis, nor by the populism itself, “which has demonstrated no ability to formulate or implement a coherent response.”

“An earthquake clears a lot of space for rebuilding, but an earthquake does not rebuild,” Cass explained. “And there are a lot of people who want to rush right back in and build what you already had after the earthquake. But something an earthquake shows you is which of the things that you'd already built were really not built very thoughtfully. It’s important to learn lessons from this disruption that has occurred. It's important to go back to first principles and ask: What do we actually believe and why? What do we care about and why?”

Inside the GOP coalition, Cass argues, traditional economic conservatives ceded economic policy to libertarians as part of a “bargain” to win the Cold War. Ronald Reagan called it a three-legged stool: economic libertarians, social conservatives and national security hawks. Cass believes this “fusionism” worked well – in the past. “When you had a situation where the free market was delivering the social outcomes that conservatives most prized, libertarians and conservatives tended to agree,” he said. “What we've seen more recently is a growing understanding that the market does not necessarily in all cases deliver a set of social outcomes that conservatives prize.”

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) leaves a luncheon with fellow GOP senators at the Capitol earlier this month. He's retrofitted his approach to economics since losing to Trump in 2016. (Amanda Voisard for The Washington Post)

---

Content from Partnership for America's Health Care Future

We Can't Afford Medicare for All

A graphic with a blue background on the left and a light blue background on the right. The text on the left reads "WE CAN'T AFFORD A NEW GOVERNMENT HEALTH INSURANCE SYSTEM". The text on the right reads "DOUBLED INCOME TAXES FOR EVERY FAMILY" and "POLITICIANS IN CONTROL OF YOUR HEALTH". There are icons of a pill and a hand holding a pill next to the text. At the bottom right, there is small text: "BUILT OFFERING: 'TRUMP SAVES!' ON MEDICARE FOR ALL," THE NEW YORK TIMES, APRIL 11, 2019. "YOUR NEW BILL WOULD BE THE 'ALL COUNTRY' COMMITTEE FOR A RESPONSIBLE FUTURE, MARCH 2019."

American families should not be forced to foot the bill for Medicare for All. And any new government insurance system would force them to pay more to wait longer for worse care.

---

A society's vitality, of course, cannot be judged solely

by its gross domestic product.

Markets are good, Cass explained, but life is about so much more than markets. He said American conservatism historically had a richer conception of the role of government beyond maximizing returns, such as strengthening domestic industry. He lamented the growing concentration of wealth, geographically on the coasts and in the big cities, as well as in a handful of industries, which has accelerated income inequality.

“When you zoom out, you can have a rising GDP, but if it's in the context of collapsing families and people no longer getting married and declining fertility rates and so on and so forth, you haven't necessarily enhanced well-being,” said Cass. “Likewise, if you are generating growth by trading off the non-market work that people historically performed within their households for a model where everyone goes to work and then they pay each other for the things they used to do in their own household, that's not great either. Obviously, there are times when disruption, even if unfortunate, is necessary, but it's important to recognize that, alongside the value that the hyper-efficient conglomerate brings, there is also an awful lot of value that the locally-owned small business brings.”

Cass said American Compass will “think differently” about labor vs. capital than Republicans have in recent generations. “A big component of the market fundamentalism – in many cases, held entirely in good faith; in some cases, more as a matter of political convenience – is the argument that whatever policies are best for shareholders in the short run are the best policies and will eventually be good for everyone else also,” he said. “That is something that's not actually part of real economics, and it's certainly not a conservative way of thinking about how a society operates. ... We need to recognize that sometimes we should feel just as comfortable saying, ‘What's good for workers is going to be good for shareholders in the long run.’”

Sen. Josh Hawley (R-Mo.) arrives at the Capitol for the impeachment trial last month. (Erin Scott/Reuters)

Two GOP senators have been championing this sort of an approach.

Freshman Sen. Josh Hawley (R-Mo.) has talked a great deal over the last year about the need for new policies that make it easier for people to stay in their hometowns if they want to, among other things. Rubio, the senior senator from Florida, has retrofitted his approach to economic policy since losing to Trump in the 2016 primaries. He's challenged shareholder primacy theory and even embraced Catholic social doctrine as a way to respond to capitalism's inevitable failures.

“As you look across the Republican conference, you've got Rubio and Hawley who are furthest out in front, but then right behind them is a very interesting group of folks who are really thoughtful and heterodox on these issues,” said Cass. He named Lee as part of that contingent, along with Sens. Tom Cotton (Ark.), Tim Scott (S.C.), Ben Sasse (Neb.) and Romney (Utah).

“In terms of how it fits ideologically, I think there are certainly

components of it that sound more Trumpian,” Cass said. “For instance, an actual conservative economics would be much more skeptical of free trade than is libertarian economics. But this is not an effort to codify and carry forward Trumpism.”

Cass, 36, graduated from Harvard Law School, where he was an editor of the law review, after working as a management consultant at Bain, Romney’s former firm, in the firm’s Boston and New Delhi offices. He emphasized that American Compass, the new initiative, is “not an exercise in starting from scratch.” He said the mission is really about “going back and finding things that always were part of the American tradition that have been important to conservative thinkers, but that seem to have gotten lost in in the more market fundamentalist mode of especially the last 20 to 30 years.”

“I think there is just tremendous intellectual energy ... that's working on and discussing and hashing these things out, but there aren't really any institutional trappings of it yet,” he said. “There is not really even a vocabulary for it. If you said, ‘Who are the people working on this stuff?,’ it's hard to know where to look. We want to provide that base. We'll just be one entity in the flotilla or the armada or the fleet. I don't know the difference between those three things. But hopefully one that has some prominent people on board and can facilitate communication and can bring people together and ... help focus attacks when there are fights to be had.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

2020 watch

Rep. Henry Cuellar (D-Tex.) holds up a border map as he speaks during a meeting with lawmakers on immigration policy at the White House in 2018. (Jabin Botsford/The Washington Post)

Scoop: The U.S. Chamber of Commerce will endorse Democratic Rep. Henry Cuellar in Texas.

The seven-term congressman is facing a vigorous challenge on his left from Jessica Cisneros in a March 3 primary. Cisneros, a 26-year-old immigration attorney, has endorsements from women's groups like EMILY's List, environmental groups like the Sierra Club and national liberal leaders like Bernie Sanders and Elizabeth Warren. The U.S. Chamber joins the Koch-backed group Libre Initiative Action, which endorsed Cuellar on Friday.

“At a time when the country continues to be polarized, it's important to elect centrist candidates who aim to find common ground on common sense solutions to better serve Americans and strengthen communities,” said Scott Reed, the U.S. Chamber's chief political strategist. He praised Cuellar for his early work on the U.S.-Mexico-Canada trade agreement, as well as business-friendly efforts to protect Texas's auto industry from tariffs and fighting for the oil and gas industry. “Cuellar has consistently stepped up to the plate,” said Reed.

Meanwhile, in Massachusetts, Sen. Edward Markey will square off tonight in the first televised debate with his Democratic primary challenger, Rep. Joe Kennedy III. (Karen Weintraub has a preview.)

Mike Bloomberg campaigns last Wednesday in Chattanooga, Tenn. (Doug Strickland/Reuters)

Mike Bloomberg has qualified for Wednesday's Democratic debate.

A new NPR-PBS-Marist poll showed him in second place with the support of 19 percent of Democratic primary voters nationally, trailing Bernie Sanders at 31 percent. Bloomberg has leapfrogged Joe Biden by spending more than $300 million on television in states that vote on Super Tuesday and beyond. Biden has fallen to third place with 15 percent, followed by Elizabeth Warren at 12 percent, Amy Klobuchar at 9 percent and Pete Buttigieg at 8 percent. Sanders and Bloomberg are tied at 22 percent in Virginia, according to a new Monmouth University poll that also came out this morning. Biden comes in third in the commonwealth, pulling in 18 percent.

Bloomberg has been preparing for the debate on the assumption he'd qualify.

“Top Bloomberg lieutenants and policy experts have been preparing him for what would be the most unscripted event yet of his three-month-old campaign,” Politico reports. “Howard Wolfson, the veteran Democratic strategist who joined Bloomberg’s orbit in 2009 after working on Hillary Clinton’s 2008 presidential race, is playing the role of Sanders; Julie Wood, Bloomberg’s national press secretary, is depicting [Warren]; and senior advisers Marc La Vorgna and Marcia Hale are stand-ins for [Buttigieg and Klobuchar], respectively. Wolfson joked that his inspiration for Sanders came from watching ‘Statler and Waldorf,’ the cantankerous elderly Muppets who lob critiques from their balcony seats. Asked about rivals trying to get under Bloomberg’s own skin, he quipped, ‘Haters gonna hate. Bring it on.’

“Bloomberg is trying to hone a crisp and energetic appeal to voters that will contrast with Biden— another white, male septuagenarian on stage, according to advisers. ... Other potential pitfalls for Bloomberg are his tendency to use dated language — words like ‘bawdy,’ for instance — to dismiss concerns about his financial news service’s work culture for female employees. Bloomberg has a history of losing his cool in public. He once grew visibly annoyed at a reporter in a wheelchair who interrupted his press conference when he dropped a recording device. More recently, he urged a reporter to 'get on with it' when he was pressed about his controversial stop-and-frisk policing tactic. Snapping at other candidates or a moderator could undermine his efforts to convey empathy and contrition."

The former New York City mayor is making inroads with black voters who backed Biden.

"Bloomberg has pummeled the airwaves in South Carolina, Nevada and Super Tuesday states with ads, so much so that a questioner at a Tennessee news conference thanked him for a $3.5 million buy at his media station before proceeding," Cleve Wootson, Bob Costa and Michael Scherer report. "Biden's unsteady turn — a fourth-place finish in Iowa preceded his decline in New Hampshire — has given an opening to rivals to make their own arguments to black and Latino voters. ... Rosemary Lawrence, a 75-year-old black woman who leads the political ministry at Charlotte's mostly black Friendship Missionary Baptist Church, ... supported Biden when he entered the race in April, laying out the argument for anyone who asked that he was the candidate most likely to defeat Trump. ... 'I love Joe Biden,' she said. ... 'I really wanted to support him, but what I've seen recently is he doesn't seem to be as energized and focused and alert as he was, say, eight years ago even. And now his funding is drying up. The bottom line is I want to find somebody who can beat Donald Trump.' Early voting has already started in North Carolina. Next week, Lawrence plans to cast a ballot for Bloomberg."

To be sure, Bloomberg has his own problems with stop-and-frisk, among other things. "While his crowds, even in southern states, are often affluent and white, he is regularly introduced by black leaders who testify to Bloomberg's understanding of the history of racism in the country and his commitment to nonwhite voters. Bloomberg has been endorsed by more than 100 mayors, many of them black. He has proposed a plan, named 'the Greenwood Initiative' for a black Tulsa community destroyed in a 1921 racial massacre, that sets a goal of helping 1 million black families buy a home, double the number of black-owned businesses and triple the

net worth of a typical black family.”

Bloomberg launched his first attack against Sanders. Others followed.

In a web video, Bloomberg compared Sanders’s campaign tactics to Trump’s. Sanders replied by comparing Bloomberg to Trump. Biden called on Sanders to disavow “Trump-like” attacks by some of his supporters on officials at the Nevada culinary workers union, per the Times. Elizabeth Warren also jumped into the fray, saying Sanders “has a lot of questions to answer” about his supporters’ behavior. “I am particularly worried about what happened in the attacks on members of the culinary union,” Warren said, per NBC. “That is not how we build an inclusive Democratic Party. ... We do not build on a foundation of hate.”

Biden's campaign is counting on at least a second-place finish in Nevada.

“First would be wonderful, but us getting a second place I think does the work that we need to do to win South Carolina,” Biden campaign manager Greg Schultz told supporters on a conference call. “We win South Carolina, we’re going to have ended the first four contests likely with a delegate advantage. ... I think the Democratic Party will sigh a collective sigh of relief when we finish second or better in Nevada.” (NYT)

The Afghanistan war shattered Biden’s faith in American military power.

“Biden talks about America in grand, almost Reaganesque, terms,” writes Greg Jaffe in the latest installment of our Pursuits series. “But inside the Obama administration Biden was a consistent voice of caution. The mismatch is a product of an approach to foreign policy that is guided largely by impulse and feeling rather than abiding philosophy. And it reflects a decades-long career in which Biden has been all over the map on the biggest questions of war and peace. ... In the 1990s, Biden had made an impassioned argument that U.S. credibility and the country’s moral standing demanded that it use military force to stop a slaughter in the Balkans. In Afghanistan, Biden rejected the notion that America had any moral obligation to improve the lives of Afghans or prevent civil wars. ‘He had that empathy for the people in the Balkans. He even had it for people in Iraq,’ said a senior Obama administration official... ‘I never saw it in Afghanistan.’”

Speaking of Afghanistan: Results released today, nearly five months after the election, show that President Ashraf Ghani has won a second term. “The announcement comes after months of political uncertainty and just days after U.S. and Taliban negotiators announced they had reached a conditional peace deal that could be signed as soon as the end of the month,” Sayed Salahuddin and Sharif Hassan report.

---

The coronavirus

The number of coronavirus cases in the U.S. is now 29.

“Fourteen Americans who tested positive for coronavirus were among the hundreds of U.S. citizens evacuated from a cruise ship off Japan to U.S. facilities over the holiday weekend, the result of a chaotic chain of events that put virus-stricken passengers on flights with other evacuees,” Anna Fifield, Alex Horton and Abha Bhattarai report. “Their return almost doubles the number of confirmed coronavirus cases in the United States ... The 14 U.S. passengers tested positive for the virus after disembarking from the Diamond Princess, a cruise liner carrying 2,666 passengers and 1,045 crew members that had been quarantined for two weeks off the Japanese port of Yokohama. But by the time their test results arrived, they were already on a fleet of buses that took 328 asymptomatic passengers from the ship to two charter planes bound for U.S. military bases in Texas and California ...

"It was a wrench in a coordinated effort. While the buses sat on the tarmac, health experts mulled whether to put the 14 on the flights or divert them to hospitals in Japan ... The planes each included a sealed-off section of 18 seats in the back, and part of the plan was to isolate passengers there if they developed symptoms midflight ... Health authorities deemed the 14 'fit to fly' because they were not showing symptoms, the State Department and the Department of Health and Human Services said in a statement

Monday. They were cordoned off from the other passengers during the flights.” The Diamond Princess quarantine will end as scheduled on Wednesday, Japan’s health minister said today, as 88 more cases were discovered, bringing the total linked to the ship to 542. A total of 35 Filipino crew members on the cruise ship have tested positive for the coronavirus.

Apple said the virus will cause it to miss revenue targets.

Apple warned that “it expects to fall short of revenue goals in the current quarter because of the coronavirus outbreak, underscoring the far-reaching effects of the public health crisis on the global economy,” Derek Hawkins and Reed Albergotti report. “In a statement to investors, Apple said that while factories in China were reopening, iPhone production in the country was ramping up more slowly than expected. ... Demand for Apple products has also dampened in China, where all the company’s stores and many of its partner stores have shuttered...”

The virus killed the director of Wuhan’s main hospital.

“A respected neurologist who was the director of Wuchang Hospital in Wuhan died Tuesday after contracting the novel coronavirus,” Anna Fifield and Rick Noack report. Liu Zhiming, who was 51, passed away despite a “full effort rescue,” according to a statement from Wuhan’s municipal health commission. Zhiming “became the most prominent victim of the outbreak since another doctor, whistleblower Li Wenliang died Feb. 7, sparking an outpouring of public anger and grief. Liu’s death follows that last week of a nurse, Liu Fan, from the same hospital. A total of eight front-line health care workers have now died, while as many as 3,000 have been infected with the coronavirus. ...

“Officials have been sounding a more upbeat note in recent days about the prospects for containing the virus. But a renowned Chinese pulmonologist who predicted a peak this month clarified his remarks to say that the peak may be followed by a plateau, rather than an outright fall in cases. ... China reported 1,886 new coronavirus cases and 98 more deaths in its daily update on the outbreak Tuesday, bringing the death toll in mainland China to 1,868, with 72,436 confirmed cases. The overwhelming majority have been in Hubei province.”

In China, 200 million kids are back in school – thanks to the Internet.

“They didn’t stand in front of a flagpole and sing the national anthem. They watched it on screens. In some parts of the country, so many kids were watching at the same time that Internet speeds ground to a halt,” Fifield reports. “One middle school boy, sitting with his computer at his front door in Beijing, was asked what he was studying. He responded: physical education. Chinese authorities have taken extreme measures to try to contain the coronavirus, which has spread nationwide. More than half the country’s 1.4 billion people are now restricted from leaving their homes in some way. Public gatherings are banned, including those in schoolyards.”

Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.) keeps repeating a debunked conspiracy theory.

“Cotton referenced a laboratory in the city, the Wuhan National Biosafety Laboratory, in an interview on Fox News’s ‘Sunday Morning Futures.’ He said the lab was near a market some scientists initially thought was a starting point for the virus’s spread,” Paulina Firozi reports. “‘We don’t know where it originated, and we have to get to the bottom of that,’ Cotton said. ‘We also know that just a few miles away from that food market is China’s only biosafety level 4 super laboratory that researches human infectious diseases.’ Yet Cotton acknowledged there is no evidence that the disease originated at the lab. Instead, he suggested it’s necessary to ask Chinese authorities about the possibility, fanning the embers of a conspiracy theory that has been repeatedly debunked by experts.”

---

Domestic developments that shouldn't be overlooked

A Guatemalan family separated by the Trump administration has now been apart over two years.

“When her teacher, or her social worker, or her best friend Ashley asks, Adelaida sounds it out — one of the first words she learned in English. “They separated us,” Kevin Sieff reports. “Adelaida Reynoso and her mother, María, were among the first migrant families broken up by the Trump administration, on July 31, 2017, long before the government acknowledged it was separating parents and children at the border. They haven’t seen each other since. Adelaida is now 9, a third-grader in southwest Florida, one of the top students in her class, carrying a thick English dictionary in a purple backpack. María, now 31, was deported alone to rural Guatemala. She has met with lawyers and smugglers and priests about reuniting with her daughter. Nothing has worked.”

The administration will waive federal contracting laws to speed border wall construction.

The Department of Homeland Security said waiving 10 regulations would allow for 177 miles of wall to be built quickly in California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas. (AP)

The Boy Scouts of America filed for bankruptcy, facing a wave of lawsuits over allegations of sexual abuse.

“The long-anticipated Chapter 11 bankruptcy filing will allow the Boy Scouts to keep operating as it reorganizes its finances and handles claims from hundreds of potential victims,” Samantha Schmidt reports. “It will also give alleged victims a limited amount of time to come forward before being barred indefinitely from seeking compensation. ... Lawyers throughout the country have begun representing hundreds of clients and have filed lawsuits in states such as New York and Pennsylvania. ‘In a way, this is an acknowledgment finally on the part of the Boy Scouts that they had this enormous problem and the problem is so large that they can’t deal with it themselves,’ said Michael Pfau, a lawyer who said he represents about 300 victims. ...

“A key question will be whether the Boy Scouts of America will be able to protect the assets of the local councils, which own camps and properties in prime real estate throughout the country. The local councils are incorporated separately but hold 70 percent of the Boy Scouts’ wealth, [\[per the WSJ\]](#). ... Many of these institutions could be implicated in the claims, making for an even more complicated bankruptcy case, said Pfau.”

Cardinal McCarrick quietly gave nearly $1 million to a group led by a cleric accused of sexual misconduct.

“From 2004 to 2017, [Theodore] McCarrick sent the Institute of the Incarnate Word dozens of checks — some as large as $50,000 — from a charitable account he controlled at the Archdiocese of Washington,” according to ledgers obtained by Shawn Boburg and Robert O’Harrow Jr. “During those years, Carlos Buela, who founded the group decades ago in Argentina, repeatedly defied Vatican sanctions for alleged sexual misconduct with seminarians, according to a confidential Vatican order. ... Six current and former members of Incarnate Word said McCarrick was celebrated internally for using his influence to protect the group. They said multiple members had warned church officials about alleged sexual encounters between Buela and seminarians. They also complained to church officials that institute leaders stifled internal criticism and punished dissenters.”

The EPA is about to change a rule cutting mercury pollution. The industry doesn't even want it.

“Exelon, one of the nation’s largest utilities, told the EPA that its effort to change a rule that has cut emissions of mercury and other toxins is ‘an action that is entirely unnecessary, unreasonable, and universally opposed by the power generation sector,’” Juliet Eilperin and Brady Dennis report. “Despite a chorus of opposition from unions, business groups and electric utilities, the EPA is on the verge of finalizing its proposal as part of a broader effort to overhaul how the government calculates the health benefits of cleaner air. The agency plans to declare that it is not ‘appropriate and necessary’ for the government to limit harmful pollutants from power plants, even though every utility in America has complied with standards put in place in 2011 ...

“While it will technically keep existing restrictions on mercury in place, it means the government would not be able to count collateral benefits — such as reducing soot and smog — when it sets limits on toxic air pollutants. It’s a rollback that industry officials argue could open the door to new legal fights, prompt some plants to turn off their pollution controls and ultimately sicken more Americans — all so that the administration can rewire how the government weighs the costs of regulation. The changes could give a boost to struggling coal companies, while hamstringing future efforts to limit mercury emissions from the nation’s power plants. The rule in question, known as the Mercury and Air Toxics Standards (MATS), targets a powerful neurotoxin that can affect the IQ and motor skills of children, even in utero. Between 2006, when states began to curb mercury from coal plants, and 2016, when the Obama-era rule took full effect, emissions have declined 85 percent.”

Jeff Bezos will give $10 billion to fight climate change.

Through the Bezos Earth Fund, the Amazon founder and Washington Post owner will “provide $10 billion in grants to scientists and activists to fund their efforts to fight climate change,” Kimberly Kindy reports. “[Bezos] said the grants, which will be issued this summer, will go to individuals and organizations from around the globe, adding that the effort will ‘take collective action from big companies, small companies, nation states, global organizations, and individuals.”

The Virginia ban on assault weapons sales didn't make it through a state Senate committee.

The failed vote handed Gov. Ralph Northam (D) a big defeat as he attempts to push a package of eight gun-control measures, Laura Vozzella reports. “The House has passed all eight of Northam’s bills, but a handful of Democrats in the less liberal Senate have quashed three of them amid fears that the newly empowered party might overplay its hand. The same tension has been playing out on other fronts, with the Senate taking a more cautious approach on issues such as the minimum wage, collective bargaining and state budgeting.”

A college accredited by an Education Department-sanctioned group doesn't actually exist.

“Reagan National University was supposed to be a place of higher learning, but it was unclear how it awarded degrees. By all appearances, at present, it has no students, no faculty and no classrooms. An agency meant to serve as a gatekeeper for federal money gave the university approval to operate anyway,” USA Today reports. The Accrediting Council for Independent Colleges & Schools “exists mainly because it was saved by the Education Department in 2018.”

More than 2,000 Justice Department alumni are calling on Bill Barr to resign.

The nonpartisan group Protect Democracy wrote that “political interference in the conduct of a criminal prosecution is anathema to the Department's core mission and to its sacred obligation to ensure equal justice under the law,” according to ABC News. The former officials also said it is “outrageous” the way Barr interfered in the Roger Stone case. “Although there are times when political leadership appropriately weighs in on individual prosecutions, it is unheard of for the Department's top leaders to overrule line prosecutors, who are following established policies, in order to give preferential treatment to a close associate of the President, as Attorney General Barr did in the Stone case," they wrote.

An association of federal judges called an emergency meeting.

“Philadelphia U.S. District Judge Cynthia Rufe, who heads the independent Federal Judges Association, said the group ‘could not wait’ until its spring conference to weigh in on a deepening crisis that has enveloped the Justice Department and [Barr],” USA Today reports. Rufe “said the group of more than 1,000 federal jurists called for the meeting last week after Trump criticized prosecutors’ initial sentencing recommendation for Stone and the Department of Justice overruled them.”

Peter Navarro – Trump’s top trade adviser – has a side project: Hunting for “Anonymous.”

“Since at least the time of the impeachment process against Trump, Navarro—whom the president affectionately calls ‘my Peter’—began conducting his own private investigation into the identity of Anonymous,” reports the Daily Beast. “One of those sources described Navarro’s investigative efforts as partially an in-depth analysis of the language and phrases used in Anonymous’ book and other public writings. The process ... mimics forensic linguistic profiling, and the goal is to cross-reference Navarro’s ‘profile’ with a list of potential suspects.”

---

Quote of the day

“In my view, to pursue the right policies for America I was willing to put up with a lot. I’m not asking for martyrdom because of that,” said John Bolton, describing his work for the Trump administration. “I knew – think I knew what I was getting into. I did it for 17 months. I did the best I could. You can judge the results by what the policies are.” (The Atlantic)

---

Social media speed read

After Bloomberg's campaign called Sanders Trump's new "bro," the Vermont senator replied with this picture:

Bernie Sanders ✓

@BernieSanders

twitter.com/sahilkapur/sta...

Sahil Kapur ✓ @sahilkapur

Mike Bloomberg's campaign manager Kevin Sheekey releases a statement responding to attacks from Sanders.

Subject line: "BERNIE'S NEW BRO... DONALD TRUMP"

BERNIE'S NEW BRO... DONALD TRUMP

NEW YORK — In response to the repeated attacks by Bernie Sanders, his spokespeople and supporters, today Mike Bloomberg 2020 responded against baseless charges espoused online, in print, and on TV.

"It's a shameful turn of events to see Bernie

♥ 148K 10:01 PM - Feb 17, 2020

💬 41.1K people are talking about this

Cher endorsed Joe Biden:

Biden offered to meet up in Vegas:

Amy Klobuchar played along with an Internet joke about her branding strategy:

Amy Klobuchar ✓

@amyklobuchar

Busted.... twitter.com/shanajocrewws/s...

Shana Jo Crews @ShanaJoCrews

Just realized that @amyklobuchar's campaign colors are the same as Hidden Valley Ranch and now I desperately hope this was all part of her master plan to win the Midwest and unite the country #Election2020

♥ 60.2K 5:07 PM - Feb 17, 2020

🗨 5,524 people are talking about this

Pete Buttigieg got some sun:

Chuck Kennedy ✓

@ChuckKennedyDC

The desert sun. Las Vegas, NV on Feb. 16, 2020.

♥ 1,109 7:33 PM - Feb 17, 2020

💬 157 people are talking about this

A former presidential candidate made dinner for her husband:

Douglas Emhoff ✓

@douglasemhoff

Meanwhile, @KamalaHarris is home for the weekend and... 🍷🔥❤️😊

♥️ 13.2K 8:59 PM - Feb 17, 2020

💬 876 people are talking about this

Barack Obama highlighted the anniversary of the Recovery Act:

Barack Obama ✓

@BarackObama

Eleven years ago today, near the bottom of the worst recession in generations, I signed the Recovery Act, paving the way for more than a decade of economic growth and the longest streak of job creation in American history.

613K 3:46 PM - Feb 17, 2020

147K people are talking about this

And his successor seemed to respond:

Donald J. Trump ✓ @realDonaldTrump · 7h

Did you hear the latest con job? President Obama is now trying to take credit for the Economic Boom taking place under the Trump Administration. He had the WEAKEST recovery since the Great Depression, despite Zero Fed Rate & MASSIVE quantitative easing. NOW, best jobs numbers....

Donald J. Trump ✓

@realDonaldTrump

...ever. Had to rebuild our military, which was totally depleted. Fed Rate UP, taxes and regulations WAY DOWN. If Dems won in 2016, the USA would be in big economic (Depression?) & military trouble right now. THE BEST IS YET TO COME. KEEP AMERICA GREAT!

80.9K 11:40 PM - Feb 17, 2020

31K people are talking about this

Ivanka Trump's trip to the United Arab Emirates over the weekend drew attention to another conflict of interest:

Anna Massoglia  @annalecta

Ivanka Trump's United Arab Emirates trip comes days before the 3 year anniversary celebration of Trump's Dubai golf club that opened weeks after President Trump's inauguration & doubled its income his 2nd year in the White House, raking in $43M+ since 2017 crp.org/trfi twitter.com/ivankatrump/st...

World of Influence: A guide to Trump...
Two years into his presidency, Donald Trump continues to make money from properties and licensing deals in nearly two opensecrets.org

Ivanka Trump  @IvankaTrump

Magical evening in Dubai with H.H. Sheikha Latifa bint Mohammed bin Rashid Al Maktoum, Prime Minister May, David Malpass and Kristalina Georgieva. ✨

♥ 1,736 6:48 PM - Feb 17, 2020 · Washington, DC

💬 1,606 people are talking about this

And Stephen Miller, Trump's domestic policy adviser who oversees immigration policy, married Katie Waldman, Vice President Pence's press secretary, at the Trump hotel in D.C. on Sunday. The president attended – as did an Elvis impersonator:

Katie Rose Miller

@katiewaldman

The most perfect day, the most perfect man surrounded with more love than we both could have ever dreamed.

Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Miller

2.16.20

♥ 8,516 8:07 PM - Feb 17, 2020 · Trump® International Hotel Washington, D.C.

💬 4,489 people are talking about this

Videos of the day

John Oliver is back, and, in a very timely fashion, he talked about Medicare-for-all:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out The Trailer for news and insight on political campaigns around the country, from David Weigel. 435 districts. 50 states. Tuesday, Thursday and Sunday evenings. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Conservative intellectuals launch a new group to challenge free-market 'fundamentalism' on the right
Date: Tuesday, February 18, 2020 7:42:57 AM

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Partnership for America's Health Care Future

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
✉ Email

Conservative intellectuals launch a new group to challenge free-market 'fundamentalism' on the right

Oren Cass believes conservatives have blundered by outsourcing GOP economic policymaking to libertarian "fundamentalists" who see the free market as an end unto itself, rather than as a means for improving quality of life to strengthen families and communities. The former domestic policy director on Mitt Romney's 2012 presidential campaign quit his job as a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute to launch a new group called

American Compass that aims to reorient the right. He previewed their plans in an exclusive interview on Monday afternoon.

Joining him on the board of directors will be Sen. Marco Rubio's chief of staff Mike Needham, the former chief executive of Heritage Action for America; Julius Krein, the editor of American Affairs, a quarterly political journal; and David Azerrad, a Hillsdale College professor who was formerly a fellow at the Heritage Foundation. Wells King will be the research director. Until last week, the former McKinsey consultant was a policy adviser to Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah) on the Joint Economic Committee.

Cass compares President Trump to an earthquake.

Running as a populist, Trump challenged Republican orthodoxy on free trade and tapped into the disaffection of blue-collar workers in the heartland who have been left behind by the growing, but uneven, economy. For the most part, however, he said conservative elites in the think tank world have not followed suit.

President Trump speaks at the White House on Friday. (Jabin Botsford/The Washington Post)

“The goal, long term, is to think about what the post-Trump right-of-center is going to be,” said Cass. “One of the reasons we think this is such an important project is that, even four-plus years after Trump emerged on the scene, there really has been very little new and interesting ferment in the right of center. It’s pretty much the same set of institutions and publications and so forth. ... By and large, the establishment is what it was. And it seems to be keeping its head down and sort of hoping that everything can just go back post-Trump to the way that it was pre-Trump. To the extent that the future should sound different, and certainly I think it should, now is the time to start building the institutions and efforts that are going to make that a reality.”

Cass acknowledges the problems animating populism are very real, but he argues that they won’t be solved by the governing ideologies he blames for creating the crisis, nor by the populism itself, “which has demonstrated no ability to formulate or implement a coherent response.”

“An earthquake clears a lot of space for rebuilding, but an earthquake does not rebuild,” Cass explained. “And there are a lot of people who want to rush right back in and build what you already had after the earthquake. But something an earthquake shows you is which of the things that you'd already built were really not built very thoughtfully. It’s important to learn lessons from this disruption that has occurred. It's important to go back to first principles and ask: What do we actually believe and why? What do we care about and why?”

Inside the GOP coalition, Cass argues, traditional economic conservatives ceded economic policy to libertarians as part of a “bargain” to win the Cold War. Ronald Reagan called it a three-legged stool: economic libertarians, social conservatives and national security hawks. Cass believes this “fusionism” worked well – in the past. “When you had a situation where the free market was delivering the social outcomes that conservatives most prized, libertarians and conservatives tended to agree,” he said. “What we've seen more recently is a growing understanding that the market does not necessarily in all cases deliver a set of social outcomes that conservatives prize.”

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) leaves a luncheon with fellow GOP senators at the Capitol earlier this month. He's retrofitted his approach to economics since losing to Trump in 2016. (Amanda Voisard for The Washington Post)

---

Content from Partnership for America's Health Care Future

We Can't Afford Medicare for All

A graphic with a blue background on the left and a light blue background on the right. The text on the left reads "WE CAN'T AFFORD A NEW GOVERNMENT HEALTH INSURANCE SYSTEM". The text on the right reads "DOUBLED INCOME TAXES FOR EVERY FAMILY" and "POLITICIANS IN CONTROL OF YOUR HEALTH". There are icons of a pill and a hand holding a pill next to the text. At the bottom right, there is small text: "BUILT OFFERING: 'TRUMP SAVES!' ON MEDICARE FOR ALL," THE NEW YORK TIMES, APRIL 11, 2019. "YOUR NEW BILL WOULD BE THE 'ALL COUNTRY' COMMITTEE FOR A RESPONSIBLE FUTURE, MARCH 2019."

American families should not be forced to foot the bill for Medicare for All. And any new government insurance system would force them to pay more to wait longer for worse care.

---

A society's vitality, of course, cannot be judged solely

by its gross domestic product.

Markets are good, Cass explained, but life is about so much more than markets. He said American conservatism historically had a richer conception of the role of government beyond maximizing returns, such as strengthening domestic industry. He lamented the growing concentration of wealth, geographically on the coasts and in the big cities, as well as in a handful of industries, which has accelerated income inequality.

“When you zoom out, you can have a rising GDP, but if it's in the context of collapsing families and people no longer getting married and declining fertility rates and so on and so forth, you haven't necessarily enhanced well-being,” said Cass. “Likewise, if you are generating growth by trading off the non-market work that people historically performed within their households for a model where everyone goes to work and then they pay each other for the things they used to do in their own household, that's not great either. Obviously, there are times when disruption, even if unfortunate, is necessary, but it's important to recognize that, alongside the value that the hyper-efficient conglomerate brings, there is also an awful lot of value that the locally-owned small business brings.”

Cass said American Compass will “think differently” about labor vs. capital than Republicans have in recent generations. “A big component of the market fundamentalism – in many cases, held entirely in good faith; in some cases, more as a matter of political convenience – is the argument that whatever policies are best for shareholders in the short run are the best policies and will eventually be good for everyone else also,” he said. “That is something that's not actually part of real economics, and it's certainly not a conservative way of thinking about how a society operates. ... We need to recognize that sometimes we should feel just as comfortable saying, ‘What's good for workers is going to be good for shareholders in the long run.’”

Sen. Josh Hawley (R-Mo.) arrives at the Capitol for the impeachment trial last month. (Erin Scott/Reuters)

Two GOP senators have been championing this sort of an approach.

Freshman Sen. Josh Hawley (R-Mo.) has talked a great deal over the last year about the need for new policies that make it easier for people to stay in their hometowns if they want to, among other things. Rubio, the senior senator from Florida, has retrofitted his approach to economic policy since losing to Trump in the 2016 primaries. He's challenged shareholder primacy theory and even embraced Catholic social doctrine as a way to respond to capitalism's inevitable failures.

“As you look across the Republican conference, you've got Rubio and Hawley who are furthest out in front, but then right behind them is a very interesting group of folks who are really thoughtful and heterodox on these issues,” said Cass. He named Lee as part of that contingent, along with Sens. Tom Cotton (Ark.), Tim Scott (S.C.), Ben Sasse (Neb.) and Romney (Utah).

“In terms of how it fits ideologically, I think there are certainly

components of it that sound more Trumpian,” Cass said. “For instance, an actual conservative economics would be much more skeptical of free trade than is libertarian economics. But this is not an effort to codify and carry forward Trumpism.”

Cass, 36, graduated from Harvard Law School, where he was an editor of the law review, after working as a management consultant at Bain, Romney’s former firm, in the firm’s Boston and New Delhi offices. He emphasized that American Compass, the new initiative, is “not an exercise in starting from scratch.” He said the mission is really about “going back and finding things that always were part of the American tradition that have been important to conservative thinkers, but that seem to have gotten lost in in the more market fundamentalist mode of especially the last 20 to 30 years.”

“I think there is just tremendous intellectual energy ... that's working on and discussing and hashing these things out, but there aren't really any institutional trappings of it yet,” he said. “There is not really even a vocabulary for it. If you said, ‘Who are the people working on this stuff?,’ it's hard to know where to look. We want to provide that base. We'll just be one entity in the flotilla or the armada or the fleet. I don't know the difference between those three things. But hopefully one that has some prominent people on board and can facilitate communication and can bring people together and ... help focus attacks when there are fights to be had.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

2020 watch

Rep. Henry Cuellar (D-Tex.) holds up a border map as he speaks during a meeting with lawmakers on immigration policy at the White House in 2018. (Jabin Botsford/The Washington Post)

Scoop: The U.S. Chamber of Commerce will endorse Democratic Rep. Henry Cuellar in Texas.

The seven-term congressman is facing a vigorous challenge on his left from Jessica Cisneros in a March 3 primary. Cisneros, a 26-year-old immigration attorney, has endorsements from women’s groups like EMILY’s List, environmental groups like the Sierra Club and national liberal leaders like Bernie Sanders and Elizabeth Warren. The U.S. Chamber joins the Koch-backed group Libre Initiative Action, which endorsed Cuellar on Friday.

“At a time when the country continues to be polarized, it’s important to elect centrist candidates who aim to find common ground on common sense solutions to better serve Americans and strengthen communities,” said Scott Reed, the U.S. Chamber’s chief political strategist. He praised Cuellar for his early work on the U.S.-Mexico-Canada trade agreement, as well as business-friendly efforts to protect Texas’s auto industry from tariffs and fighting for the oil and gas industry. “Cuellar has consistently stepped up to the plate,” said Reed.

Meanwhile, in Massachusetts, Sen. Edward Markey will square off tonight in the first televised debate with his Democratic primary challenger, Rep. Joe Kennedy III. (Karen Weintraub has a preview.)

Mike Bloomberg campaigns last Wednesday in Chattanooga, Tenn. (Doug Strickland/Reuters)

Mike Bloomberg has qualified for Wednesday's Democratic debate.

A new NPR-PBS-Marist poll showed him in second place with the support of 19 percent of Democratic primary voters nationally, trailing Bernie Sanders at 31 percent. Bloomberg has leapfrogged Joe Biden by spending more than $300 million on television in states that vote on Super Tuesday and beyond. Biden has fallen to third place with 15 percent, followed by Elizabeth Warren at 12 percent, Amy Klobuchar at 9 percent and Pete Buttigieg at 8 percent. Sanders and Bloomberg are tied at 22 percent in Virginia, according to a new Monmouth University poll that also came out this morning. Biden comes in third in the commonwealth, pulling in 18 percent.

Bloomberg has been preparing for the debate on the assumption he'd qualify.

“Top Bloomberg lieutenants and policy experts have been preparing him for what would be the most unscripted event yet of his three-month-old campaign,” Politico reports. “Howard Wolfson, the veteran Democratic strategist who joined Bloomberg’s orbit in 2009 after working on Hillary Clinton’s 2008 presidential race, is playing the role of Sanders; Julie Wood, Bloomberg’s national press secretary, is depicting [Warren]; and senior advisers Marc La Vorgna and Marcia Hale are stand-ins for [Buttigieg and Klobuchar], respectively. Wolfson joked that his inspiration for Sanders came from watching ‘Statler and Waldorf,’ the cantankerous elderly Muppets who lob critiques from their balcony seats. Asked about rivals trying to get under Bloomberg’s own skin, he quipped, ‘Haters gonna hate. Bring it on.’”

“Bloomberg is trying to hone a crisp and energetic appeal to voters that will contrast with Biden— another white, male septuagenarian on stage, according to advisers. ... Other potential pitfalls for Bloomberg are his tendency to use dated language — words like ‘bawdy,’ for instance — to dismiss concerns about his financial news service’s work culture for female employees. Bloomberg has a history of losing his cool in public. He once grew visibly annoyed at a reporter in a wheelchair who interrupted his press conference when he dropped a recording device. More recently, he urged a reporter to 'get on with it' when he was pressed about his controversial stop-and-frisk policing tactic. Snapping at other candidates or a moderator could undermine his efforts to convey empathy and contrition."

The former New York City mayor is making inroads with black voters who backed Biden.

"Bloomberg has pummeled the airwaves in South Carolina, Nevada and Super Tuesday states with ads, so much so that a questioner at a Tennessee news conference thanked him for a $3.5 million buy at his media station before proceeding," Cleve Wootson, Bob Costa and Michael Scherer report. "Biden's unsteady turn — a fourth-place finish in Iowa preceded his decline in New Hampshire — has given an opening to rivals to make their own arguments to black and Latino voters. ... Rosemary Lawrence, a 75-year-old black woman who leads the political ministry at Charlotte's mostly black Friendship Missionary Baptist Church, ... supported Biden when he entered the race in April, laying out the argument for anyone who asked that he was the candidate most likely to defeat Trump. ... 'I love Joe Biden,' she said. ... 'I really wanted to support him, but what I've seen recently is he doesn't seem to be as energized and focused and alert as he was, say, eight years ago even. And now his funding is drying up. The bottom line is I want to find somebody who can beat Donald Trump.' Early voting has already started in North Carolina. Next week, Lawrence plans to cast a ballot for Bloomberg."

To be sure, Bloomberg has his own problems with stop-and-frisk, among other things. "While his crowds, even in southern states, are often affluent and white, he is regularly introduced by black leaders who testify to Bloomberg's understanding of the history of racism in the country and his commitment to nonwhite voters. Bloomberg has been endorsed by more than 100 mayors, many of them black. He has proposed a plan, named 'the Greenwood Initiative' for a black Tulsa community destroyed in a 1921 racial massacre, that sets a goal of helping 1 million black families buy a home, double the number of black-owned businesses and triple the

net worth of a typical black family.”

Bloomberg launched his first attack against Sanders. Others followed.

In a web video, Bloomberg compared Sanders’s campaign tactics to Trump’s. Sanders replied by comparing Bloomberg to Trump. Biden called on Sanders to disavow “Trump-like” attacks by some of his supporters on officials at the Nevada culinary workers union, per the Times. Elizabeth Warren also jumped into the fray, saying Sanders “has a lot of questions to answer” about his supporters’ behavior. “I am particularly worried about what happened in the attacks on members of the culinary union,” Warren said, per NBC. “That is not how we build an inclusive Democratic Party. ... We do not build on a foundation of hate.”

Biden's campaign is counting on at least a second-place finish in Nevada.

“First would be wonderful, but us getting a second place I think does the work that we need to do to win South Carolina,” Biden campaign manager Greg Schultz told supporters on a conference call. “We win South Carolina, we’re going to have ended the first four contests likely with a delegate advantage. ... I think the Democratic Party will sigh a collective sigh of relief when we finish second or better in Nevada.” (NYT)

The Afghanistan war shattered Biden’s faith in American military power.

“Biden talks about America in grand, almost Reaganesque, terms,” writes Greg Jaffe in the latest installment of our Pursuits series. “But inside the Obama administration Biden was a consistent voice of caution. The mismatch is a product of an approach to foreign policy that is guided largely by impulse and feeling rather than abiding philosophy. And it reflects a decades-long career in which Biden has been all over the map on the biggest questions of war and peace. ... In the 1990s, Biden had made an impassioned argument that U.S. credibility and the country’s moral standing demanded that it use military force to stop a slaughter in the Balkans. In Afghanistan, Biden rejected the notion that America had any moral obligation to improve the lives of Afghans or prevent civil wars. ‘He had that empathy for the people in the Balkans. He even had it for people in Iraq,’ said a senior Obama administration official... ‘I never saw it in Afghanistan.’”

Speaking of Afghanistan: Results released today, nearly five months after the election, show that President Ashraf Ghani has won a second term. “The announcement comes after months of political uncertainty and just days after U.S. and Taliban negotiators announced they had reached a conditional peace deal that could be signed as soon as the end of the month,” Sayed Salahuddin and Sharif Hassan report.

---

The coronavirus

The number of coronavirus cases in the U.S. is now 29.

“Fourteen Americans who tested positive for coronavirus were among the hundreds of U.S. citizens evacuated from a cruise ship off Japan to U.S. facilities over the holiday weekend, the result of a chaotic chain of events that put virus-stricken passengers on flights with other evacuees,” Anna Fifield, Alex Horton and Abha Bhattacharai report. “Their return almost doubles the number of confirmed coronavirus cases in the United States ... The 14 U.S. passengers tested positive for the virus after disembarking from the Diamond Princess, a cruise liner carrying 2,666 passengers and 1,045 crew members that had been quarantined for two weeks off the Japanese port of Yokohama. But by the time their test results arrived, they were already on a fleet of buses that took 328 asymptomatic passengers from the ship to two charter planes bound for U.S. military bases in Texas and California ...

"It was a wrench in a coordinated effort. While the buses sat on the tarmac, health experts mulled whether to put the 14 on the flights or divert them to hospitals in Japan ... The planes each included a sealed-off section of 18 seats in the back, and part of the plan was to isolate passengers there if they developed symptoms midflight ... Health authorities deemed the 14 'fit to fly' because they were not showing symptoms, the State Department and the Department of Health and Human Services said in a statement

Monday. They were cordoned off from the other passengers during the flights.” The Diamond Princess quarantine will end as scheduled on Wednesday, Japan’s health minister said today, as 88 more cases were discovered, bringing the total linked to the ship to 542. A total of 35 Filipino crew members on the cruise ship have tested positive for the coronavirus.

Apple said the virus will cause it to miss revenue targets.

Apple warned that “it expects to fall short of revenue goals in the current quarter because of the coronavirus outbreak, underscoring the far-reaching effects of the public health crisis on the global economy,” Derek Hawkins and Reed Albergotti report. “In a statement to investors, Apple said that while factories in China were reopening, iPhone production in the country was ramping up more slowly than expected. ... Demand for Apple products has also dampened in China, where all the company’s stores and many of its partner stores have shuttered...”

The virus killed the director of Wuhan’s main hospital.

“A respected neurologist who was the director of Wuchang Hospital in Wuhan died Tuesday after contracting the novel coronavirus,” Anna Fifield and Rick Noack report. Liu Zhiming, who was 51, passed away despite a “full effort rescue,” according to a statement from Wuhan’s municipal health commission. Zhiming “became the most prominent victim of the outbreak since another doctor, whistleblower Li Wenliang died Feb. 7, sparking an outpouring of public anger and grief. Liu’s death follows that last week of a nurse, Liu Fan, from the same hospital. A total of eight front-line health care workers have now died, while as many as 3,000 have been infected with the coronavirus. ...

“Officials have been sounding a more upbeat note in recent days about the prospects for containing the virus. But a renowned Chinese pulmonologist who predicted a peak this month clarified his remarks to say that the peak may be followed by a plateau, rather than an outright fall in cases. ... China reported 1,886 new coronavirus cases and 98 more deaths in its daily update on the outbreak Tuesday, bringing the death toll in mainland China to 1,868, with 72,436 confirmed cases. The overwhelming majority have been in Hubei province.”

In China, 200 million kids are back in school – thanks to the Internet.

“They didn’t stand in front of a flagpole and sing the national anthem. They watched it on screens. In some parts of the country, so many kids were watching at the same time that Internet speeds ground to a halt,” Fifield reports. “One middle school boy, sitting with his computer at his front door in Beijing, was asked what he was studying. He responded: physical education. Chinese authorities have taken extreme measures to try to contain the coronavirus, which has spread nationwide. More than half the country’s 1.4 billion people are now restricted from leaving their homes in some way. Public gatherings are banned, including those in schoolyards.”

Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.) keeps repeating a debunked conspiracy theory.

“Cotton referenced a laboratory in the city, the Wuhan National Biosafety Laboratory, in an interview on Fox News’s ‘Sunday Morning Futures.’ He said the lab was near a market some scientists initially thought was a starting point for the virus’s spread,” Paulina Firozi reports. “‘We don’t know where it originated, and we have to get to the bottom of that,’ Cotton said. ‘We also know that just a few miles away from that food market is China’s only biosafety level 4 super laboratory that researches human infectious diseases.’ Yet Cotton acknowledged there is no evidence that the disease originated at the lab. Instead, he suggested it’s necessary to ask Chinese authorities about the possibility, fanning the embers of a conspiracy theory that has been repeatedly debunked by experts.”

---

Domestic developments that shouldn't be overlooked

A Guatemalan family separated by the Trump administration has now been apart over two years.

“When her teacher, or her social worker, or her best friend Ashley asks, Adelaida sounds it out — one of the first words she learned in English. “They separated us,” Kevin Sieff reports. “Adelaida Reynoso and her mother, María, were among the first migrant families broken up by the Trump administration, on July 31, 2017, long before the government acknowledged it was separating parents and children at the border. They haven’t seen each other since. Adelaida is now 9, a third-grader in southwest Florida, one of the top students in her class, carrying a thick English dictionary in a purple backpack. María, now 31, was deported alone to rural Guatemala. She has met with lawyers and smugglers and priests about reuniting with her daughter. Nothing has worked.”

The administration will waive federal contracting laws to speed border wall construction.

The Department of Homeland Security said waiving 10 regulations would allow for 177 miles of wall to be built quickly in California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas. (AP)

The Boy Scouts of America filed for bankruptcy, facing a wave of lawsuits over allegations of sexual abuse.

“The long-anticipated Chapter 11 bankruptcy filing will allow the Boy Scouts to keep operating as it reorganizes its finances and handles claims from hundreds of potential victims,” Samantha Schmidt reports. “It will also give alleged victims a limited amount of time to come forward before being barred indefinitely from seeking compensation. ... Lawyers throughout the country have begun representing hundreds of clients and have filed lawsuits in states such as New York and Pennsylvania. ‘In a way, this is an acknowledgment finally on the part of the Boy Scouts that they had this enormous problem and the problem is so large that they can’t deal with it themselves,’ said Michael Pfau, a lawyer who said he represents about 300 victims. ...

“A key question will be whether the Boy Scouts of America will be able to protect the assets of the local councils, which own camps and properties in prime real estate throughout the country. The local councils are incorporated separately but hold 70 percent of the Boy Scouts’ wealth, [\[per the WSJ\]](#). ... Many of these institutions could be implicated in the claims, making for an even more complicated bankruptcy case, said Pfau.”

Cardinal McCarrick quietly gave nearly $1 million to a group led by a cleric accused of sexual misconduct.

“From 2004 to 2017, [Theodore] McCarrick sent the Institute of the Incarnate Word dozens of checks — some as large as $50,000 — from a charitable account he controlled at the Archdiocese of Washington,” according to ledgers obtained by Shawn Boburg and Robert O’Harrow Jr. “During those years, Carlos Buela, who founded the group decades ago in Argentina, repeatedly defied Vatican sanctions for alleged sexual misconduct with seminarians, according to a confidential Vatican order. ... Six current and former members of Incarnate Word said McCarrick was celebrated internally for using his influence to protect the group. They said multiple members had warned church officials about alleged sexual encounters between Buela and seminarians. They also complained to church officials that institute leaders stifled internal criticism and punished dissenters.”

The EPA is about to change a rule cutting mercury pollution. The industry doesn't even want it.

“Exelon, one of the nation’s largest utilities, told the EPA that its effort to change a rule that has cut emissions of mercury and other toxins is ‘an action that is entirely unnecessary, unreasonable, and universally opposed by the power generation sector,’” Juliet Eilperin and Brady Dennis report. “Despite a chorus of opposition from unions, business groups and electric utilities, the EPA is on the verge of finalizing its proposal as part of a broader effort to overhaul how the government calculates the health benefits of cleaner air. The agency plans to declare that it is not ‘appropriate and necessary’ for the government to limit harmful pollutants from power plants, even though every utility in America has complied with standards put in place in 2011 ...

“While it will technically keep existing restrictions on mercury in place, it means the government would not be able to count collateral benefits — such as reducing soot and smog — when it sets limits on toxic air pollutants. It’s a rollback that industry officials argue could open the door to new legal fights, prompt some plants to turn off their pollution controls and ultimately sicken more Americans — all so that the administration can rewire how the government weighs the costs of regulation. The changes could give a boost to struggling coal companies, while hamstringing future efforts to limit mercury emissions from the nation’s power plants. The rule in question, known as the Mercury and Air Toxics Standards (MATS), targets a powerful neurotoxin that can affect the IQ and motor skills of children, even in utero. Between 2006, when states began to curb mercury from coal plants, and 2016, when the Obama-era rule took full effect, emissions have declined 85 percent.”

Jeff Bezos will give $10 billion to fight climate change.

Through the Bezos Earth Fund, the Amazon founder and Washington Post owner will “provide $10 billion in grants to scientists and activists to fund their efforts to fight climate change,” Kimberly Kindy reports. “[Bezos] said the grants, which will be issued this summer, will go to individuals and organizations from around the globe, adding that the effort will ‘take collective action from big companies, small companies, nation states, global organizations, and individuals.”

The Virginia ban on assault weapons sales didn't make it through a state Senate committee.

The failed vote handed Gov. Ralph Northam (D) a big defeat as he attempts to push a package of eight gun-control measures, Laura Vozzella reports. “The House has passed all eight of Northam’s bills, but a handful of Democrats in the less liberal Senate have quashed three of them amid fears that the newly empowered party might overplay its hand. The same tension has been playing out on other fronts, with the Senate taking a more cautious approach on issues such as the minimum wage, collective bargaining and state budgeting.”

A college accredited by an Education Department-sanctioned group doesn't actually exist.

“Reagan National University was supposed to be a place of higher learning, but it was unclear how it awarded degrees. By all appearances, at present, it has no students, no faculty and no classrooms. An agency meant to serve as a gatekeeper for federal money gave the university approval to operate anyway,” USA Today reports. The Accrediting Council for Independent Colleges & Schools “exists mainly because it was saved by the Education Department in 2018.”

More than 2,000 Justice Department alumni are calling on Bill Barr to resign.

The nonpartisan group Protect Democracy wrote that “political interference in the conduct of a criminal prosecution is anathema to the Department's core mission and to its sacred obligation to ensure equal justice under the law,” according to ABC News. The former officials also said it is “outrageous” the way Barr interfered in the Roger Stone case. “Although there are times when political leadership appropriately weighs in on individual prosecutions, it is unheard of for the Department's top leaders to overrule line prosecutors, who are following established policies, in order to give preferential treatment to a close associate of the President, as Attorney General Barr did in the Stone case," they wrote.

An association of federal judges called an emergency meeting.

“Philadelphia U.S. District Judge Cynthia Rufe, who heads the independent Federal Judges Association, said the group ‘could not wait’ until its spring conference to weigh in on a deepening crisis that has enveloped the Justice Department and [Barr],” USA Today reports. Rufe “said the group of more than 1,000 federal jurists called for the meeting last week after Trump criticized prosecutors’ initial sentencing recommendation for Stone and the Department of Justice overruled them.”

Peter Navarro – Trump’s top trade adviser – has a side project: Hunting for “Anonymous.”

“Since at least the time of the impeachment process against Trump, Navarro—whom the president affectionately calls ‘my Peter’—began conducting his own private investigation into the identity of Anonymous,” reports the Daily Beast. “One of those sources described Navarro’s investigative efforts as partially an in-depth analysis of the language and phrases used in Anonymous’ book and other public writings. The process ... mimics forensic linguistic profiling, and the goal is to cross-reference Navarro’s ‘profile’ with a list of potential suspects.”

---

Quote of the day

“In my view, to pursue the right policies for America I was willing to put up with a lot. I’m not asking for martyrdom because of that,” said John Bolton, describing his work for the Trump administration. “I knew – think I knew what I was getting into. I did it for 17 months. I did the best I could. You can judge the results by what the policies are.” (The Atlantic)

---

Social media speed read

After Bloomberg's campaign called Sanders Trump's new "bro," the Vermont senator replied with this picture:

Bernie Sanders ✓

@BernieSanders

twitter.com/sahilkapur/sta...

Sahil Kapur ✓ @sahilkapur

Mike Bloomberg's campaign manager Kevin Sheekey releases a statement responding to attacks from Sanders.

Subject line: "BERNIE'S NEW BRO... DONALD TRUMP"

BERNIE'S NEW BRO... DONALD TRUMP

NEW YORK — In response to the repeated attacks by Bernie Sanders, his spokespeople and supporters, today Mike Bloomberg 2020 responded against baseless charges espoused online, in print, and on TV.

"It's a shameful turn of events to see Bernie

♥ 148K 10:01 PM - Feb 17, 2020

💬 41.1K people are talking about this

Cher endorsed Joe Biden:

Biden offered to meet up in Vegas:

Amy Klobuchar played along with an Internet joke about her branding strategy:

Amy Klobuchar ✓

@amyklobuchar

Busted.... twitter.com/shanajocrews/s...

Shana Jo Crews @ShanaJoCrews

Just realized that @amyklobuchar's campaign colors are the same as Hidden Valley Ranch and now I desperately hope this was all part of her master plan to win the Midwest and unite the country #Election2020

♥ 60.2K 5:07 PM - Feb 17, 2020

🗨 5,524 people are talking about this

Pete Buttigieg got some sun:

Chuck Kennedy ✓
@ChuckKennedyDC

The desert sun. Las Vegas, NV on Feb. 16, 2020.

♥ 1,109 7:33 PM - Feb 17, 2020

💬 157 people are talking about this

A former presidential candidate made dinner for her husband:

Douglas Emhoff ✓

@douglasemhoff

Meanwhile, @KamalaHarris is home for the weekend and... 🍷🔥❤️😊

♥️ 13.2K 8:59 PM - Feb 17, 2020

💬 876 people are talking about this

Barack Obama highlighted the anniversary of the Recovery Act:

Barack Obama ✓

@BarackObama

Eleven years ago today, near the bottom of the worst recession in generations, I signed the Recovery Act, paving the way for more than a decade of economic growth and the longest streak of job creation in American history.

613K 3:46 PM - Feb 17, 2020

147K people are talking about this

And his successor seemed to respond:

Donald J. Trump ✓ @realDonaldTrump · 7h

Did you hear the latest con job? President Obama is now trying to take credit for the Economic Boom taking place under the Trump Administration. He had the WEAKEST recovery since the Great Depression, despite Zero Fed Rate & MASSIVE quantitative easing. NOW, best jobs numbers....

Donald J. Trump ✓

@realDonaldTrump

...ever. Had to rebuild our military, which was totally depleted. Fed Rate UP, taxes and regulations WAY DOWN. If Dems won in 2016, the USA would be in big economic (Depression?) & military trouble right now. THE BEST IS YET TO COME. KEEP AMERICA GREAT!

80.9K 11:40 PM - Feb 17, 2020

31K people are talking about this

Ivanka Trump's trip to the United Arab Emirates over the weekend drew attention to another conflict of interest:

Anna Massoglia  @annalecta

Ivanka Trump's United Arab Emirates trip comes days before the 3 year anniversary celebration of Trump's Dubai golf club that opened weeks after President Trump's inauguration & doubled its income his 2nd year in the White House, raking in $43M+ since 2017 crp.org/trfi twitter.com/ivankatrump/st...

World of Influence: A guide to Trump...
Two years into his presidency, Donald Trump continues to make money from properties and licensing deals in nearly two opensecrets.org

Ivanka Trump  @IvankaTrump

Magical evening in Dubai with H.H. Sheikha Latifa bint Mohammed bin Rashid Al Maktoum, Prime Minister May, David Malpass and Kristalina Georgieva. ✨

1,736 6:48 PM - Feb 17, 2020 · Washington, DC

1,606 people are talking about this

And Stephen Miller, Trump's domestic policy adviser who oversees immigration policy, married Katie Waldman, Vice President Pence's press secretary, at the Trump hotel in D.C. on Sunday. The president attended – as did an Elvis impersonator:

Katie Rose Miller
@katiewaldman

The most perfect day, the most perfect man surrounded with more love than we both could have ever dreamed.

Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Miller

2.16.20

♥ 8,516 8:07 PM - Feb 17, 2020 · Trump® International Hotel Washington, D.C.

💬 4,489 people are talking about this

Videos of the day

John Oliver is back, and, in a very timely fashion, he talked about Medicare-for-all:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out The Trailer for news and insight on political campaigns around the country, from David Weigel. 435 districts. 50 states. Tuesday, Thursday and Sunday evenings. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: E&E News
To: denise.germann@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] February 18 -- Greenwire is ready
Date: Tuesday, February 18, 2020 11:36:09 AM

Read today's Greenwire on the web

GREENWIRE

AN E&E NEWS PUBLICATION

GREENWIRE — Tue., February 18, 2020

 READ FULL EDITION

1. FEDERAL WORKFORCE:

EPA office closure will move 1,200 workers to headquarters

EPA is planning to close its Arlington, Va., office and shift hundreds of its employees into its sprawling headquarters in Washington's Federal Triangle. The General Services Administration disclosed the plans in its fiscal 2021 budget request.

TOP STORIES

2. DOE:

Political hire tapped for No. 2 efficiency post

3. CAMPAIGN 2020:

Hickenlooper hopes public lands will propel him to victory

4. ENDANGERED SPECIES:

Ore. governor urges removal of disputed dams

POLITICS

5. EPA:

Press aide moves to State Department

6. Q&A:

DNC official: 'There should've been a climate debate'

7. CAMPAIGN 2020:

Democrats tout infrastructure plans but reject hiking gas tax

8. LAW:

Ex-DOJ enviro attorneys call for Barr's resignation

CONGRESS

9. HOUSE:

Natural Resources panel to take up climate bills

10. CHEMICALS:

Democrats slam EPA for missed deadline on PFAS

NATURAL RESOURCES

---

11. ENDANGERED SPECIES:

Feds offer cash reward for information on wolf death

12. PROPERTY RIGHTS:

Malibu condo owners fined nearly $1M over beach access

13. WILDFIRES:

BLM to pay for 11,000 miles of fuel breaks in 6 states

14. WILDLIFE:

After federal rollback, Va. offers more bird protections

15. INVASIVE SPECIES:

McConnell, Ky. governor watch massive Asian carp roundup

LAW

---

16. CLEAN WATER ACT:

Greens say WOTUS violates species protections, plan to sue

17. COAL:

Indian villagers lose case against World Bank branch

18. CHEMICALS:

Enviros target La. permits that 'double toxic air pollution'

ENERGY

---

19. INTERIOR:

Public can weigh in on peer-reviewed polar bear study

20. OIL AND GAS:

Refinery fire extinguished in South Texas

AIR AND WATER

---

21. WATER POLLUTION:

211M gallons of sewage spills into Fla. city's waterways

WASTES & HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

---

22. PLASTICS:

Labels don't always mean product is recyclable — report

23. EPA:

Alaska official disputes toxic chemical release analysis

24. OIL AND GAS:

EPA orders hazardous waste probe at shuttered Ind. refinery

25. NEW YORK:

Some worry whether state's coming plastic bag ban is enough

STATES

---

26. ALABAMA:

About 300 birds killed in renewed sandhill crane hunt

27. ARIZONA:

Farmers push back against tracking data on groundwater wells

28. FLORIDA:

Manatee deaths drop as red tide's effect eases

29. SOUTHEAST:

Soggy neighborhoods under flash flood warning

INTERNATIONAL

---

30. IRAN:

8 green activists accused of spying for U.S. sentenced

31. PAKISTAN:

Death toll from mysterious toxic gas leak rises to 14

---

Get all of the stories in today's Greenwire, plus an in-depth archive with thousands of articles on your issues, detailed Special Reports and much more at <https://www.greenwire.com>.

Forgot your passcodes? Call us at 202-628-6500 now and we'll set you up instantly.

To send a press release, fax 202-737-5299 or email editorial@eenews.net.

ABOUT GREENWIRE – THE LEADER IN ENERGY AND ENVIRONMENT NEWS

---

Greenwire is written and produced by the staff of E&E News. The one-stop source for those who need to stay on top of all of today's major energy and environmental action with an average of more than 20 stories a day, Greenwire covers the complete spectrum, from electricity industry restructuring to Clean Air Act litigation to public lands management. Greenwire publishes daily at 1 p.m.

Unsubscribe | Our Privacy Policy

E&E News

122 C Street NW 7th Floor Washington, DC 20001

Phone: 202-628-6500 Fax: 202-737-5299

www.eenews.net

From: E&E News
To: denise.germann@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] February 18 -- Greenwire is ready
Date: Tuesday, February 18, 2020 11:36:41 AM

Read today's Greenwire on the web

GREENWIRE

AN E&E NEWS PUBLICATION

GREENWIRE — Tue., February 18, 2020

 READ FULL EDITION

1. FEDERAL WORKFORCE:

EPA office closure will move 1,200 workers to headquarters

EPA is planning to close its Arlington, Va., office and shift hundreds of its employees into its sprawling headquarters in Washington's Federal Triangle. The General Services Administration disclosed the plans in its fiscal 2021 budget request.

TOP STORIES

2. DOE:

Political hire tapped for No. 2 efficiency post

3. CAMPAIGN 2020:

Hickenlooper hopes public lands will propel him to victory

4. ENDANGERED SPECIES:

Ore. governor urges removal of disputed dams

POLITICS

5. EPA:

Press aide moves to State Department

6. Q&A:

DNC official: 'There should've been a climate debate'

7. CAMPAIGN 2020:

Democrats tout infrastructure plans but reject hiking gas tax

8. LAW:

Ex-DOJ enviro attorneys call for Barr's resignation

CONGRESS

9. HOUSE:

Natural Resources panel to take up climate bills

10. CHEMICALS:

Democrats slam EPA for missed deadline on PFAS

NATURAL RESOURCES

---

11. ENDANGERED SPECIES:

Feds offer cash reward for information on wolf death

12. PROPERTY RIGHTS:

Malibu condo owners fined nearly $1M over beach access

13. WILDFIRES:

BLM to pay for 11,000 miles of fuel breaks in 6 states

14. WILDLIFE:

After federal rollback, Va. offers more bird protections

15. INVASIVE SPECIES:

McConnell, Ky. governor watch massive Asian carp roundup

LAW

---

16. CLEAN WATER ACT:

Greens say WOTUS violates species protections, plan to sue

17. COAL:

Indian villagers lose case against World Bank branch

18. CHEMICALS:

Enviros target La. permits that 'double toxic air pollution'

ENERGY

---

19. INTERIOR:

Public can weigh in on peer-reviewed polar bear study

20. OIL AND GAS:

Refinery fire extinguished in South Texas

AIR AND WATER

---

21. WATER POLLUTION:

211M gallons of sewage spills into Fla. city's waterways

WASTES & HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

---

22. PLASTICS:

Labels don't always mean product is recyclable — report

23. EPA:

Alaska official disputes toxic chemical release analysis

24. OIL AND GAS:

EPA orders hazardous waste probe at shuttered Ind. refinery

25. NEW YORK:

Some worry whether state's coming plastic bag ban is enough

STATES

---

26. ALABAMA:

About 300 birds killed in renewed sandhill crane hunt

27. ARIZONA:

Farmers push back against tracking data on groundwater wells

28. FLORIDA:

Manatee deaths drop as red tide's effect eases

29. SOUTHEAST:

Soggy neighborhoods under flash flood warning

INTERNATIONAL

---

30. IRAN:

8 green activists accused of spying for U.S. sentenced

31. PAKISTAN:

Death toll from mysterious toxic gas leak rises to 14

---

Get all of the stories in today's Greenwire, plus an in-depth archive with thousands of articles on your issues, detailed Special Reports and much more at <https://www.greenwire.com>.

Forgot your passcodes? Call us at 202-628-6500 now and we'll set you up instantly.

To send a press release, fax 202-737-5299 or email editorial@eenews.net.

ABOUT GREENWIRE – THE LEADER IN ENERGY AND ENVIRONMENT NEWS

---

Greenwire is written and produced by the staff of E&E News. The one-stop source for those who need to stay on top of all of today's major energy and environmental action with an average of more than 20 stories a day, Greenwire covers the complete spectrum, from electricity industry restructuring to Clean Air Act litigation to public lands management. Greenwire publishes daily at 1 p.m.

Unsubscribe | Our Privacy Policy

E&E News

122 C Street NW 7th Floor Washington, DC 20001

Phone: 202-628-6500 Fax: 202-737-5299

www.eenews.net

All content is copyrighted and may not be reproduced or retransmitted without the express consent of Environment & Energy Publishing, LLC. Prefer plain text? Click here.

From: E&E News
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] February 18 -- Greenwire is ready
Date: Tuesday, February 18, 2020 11:38:17 AM

Read today's Greenwire on the web

GREENWIRE

AN E&E NEWS PUBLICATION

GREENWIRE — Tue., February 18, 2020

 READ FULL EDITION

1. FEDERAL WORKFORCE:

EPA office closure will move 1,200 workers to headquarters

EPA is planning to close its Arlington, Va., office and shift hundreds of its employees into its sprawling headquarters in Washington's Federal Triangle. The General Services Administration disclosed the plans in its fiscal 2021 budget request.

TOP STORIES

2. DOE:

Political hire tapped for No. 2 efficiency post

3. CAMPAIGN 2020:

Hickenlooper hopes public lands will propel him to victory

4. ENDANGERED SPECIES:

Ore. governor urges removal of disputed dams

POLITICS

5. EPA:

Press aide moves to State Department

6. Q&A:

DNC official: 'There should've been a climate debate'

7. CAMPAIGN 2020:

Democrats tout infrastructure plans but reject hiking gas tax

8. LAW:

Ex-DOJ enviro attorneys call for Barr's resignation

CONGRESS

9. HOUSE:

Natural Resources panel to take up climate bills

10. CHEMICALS:

Democrats slam EPA for missed deadline on PFAS

NATURAL RESOURCES

---

11. ENDANGERED SPECIES:

Feds offer cash reward for information on wolf death

12. PROPERTY RIGHTS:

Malibu condo owners fined nearly $1M over beach access

13. WILDFIRES:

BLM to pay for 11,000 miles of fuel breaks in 6 states

14. WILDLIFE:

After federal rollback, Va. offers more bird protections

15. INVASIVE SPECIES:

McConnell, Ky. governor watch massive Asian carp roundup

LAW

---

16. CLEAN WATER ACT:

Greens say WOTUS violates species protections, plan to sue

17. COAL:

Indian villagers lose case against World Bank branch

18. CHEMICALS:

Enviros target La. permits that 'double toxic air pollution'

ENERGY

---

19. INTERIOR:

Public can weigh in on peer-reviewed polar bear study

20. OIL AND GAS:

Refinery fire extinguished in South Texas

AIR AND WATER

---

21. WATER POLLUTION:

211M gallons of sewage spills into Fla. city's waterways

WASTES & HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

---

22. PLASTICS:

Labels don't always mean product is recyclable — report

23. EPA:

Alaska official disputes toxic chemical release analysis

24. OIL AND GAS:

EPA orders hazardous waste probe at shuttered Ind. refinery

25. NEW YORK:

Some worry whether state's coming plastic bag ban is enough

STATES

---

26. ALABAMA:

About 300 birds killed in renewed sandhill crane hunt

27. ARIZONA:

Farmers push back against tracking data on groundwater wells

28. FLORIDA:

Manatee deaths drop as red tide's effect eases

29. SOUTHEAST:

Soggy neighborhoods under flash flood warning

INTERNATIONAL

---

30. IRAN:

8 green activists accused of spying for U.S. sentenced

31. PAKISTAN:

Death toll from mysterious toxic gas leak rises to 14

---

Get all of the stories in today's Greenwire, plus an in-depth archive with thousands of articles on your issues, detailed Special Reports and much more at <https://www.greenwire.com>.

Forgot your passcodes? Call us at 202-628-6500 now and we'll set you up instantly.

To send a press release, fax 202-737-5299 or email editorial@eenews.net.

ABOUT GREENWIRE – THE LEADER IN ENERGY AND ENVIRONMENT NEWS

---

Greenwire is written and produced by the staff of E&E News. The one-stop source for those who need to stay on top of all of today's major energy and environmental action with an average of more than 20 stories a day, Greenwire covers the complete spectrum, from electricity industry restructuring to Clean Air Act litigation to public lands management. Greenwire publishes daily at 1 p.m.

Unsubscribe | Our Privacy Policy

E&E News

122 C Street NW 7th Floor Washington, DC 20001

Phone: 202-628-6500 Fax: 202-737-5299

www.eenews.net

From: E&E News
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] February 18 -- Greenwire is ready
Date: Tuesday, February 18, 2020 11:38:44 AM

Read today's Greenwire on the web

GREENWIRE

AN E&E NEWS PUBLICATION

GREENWIRE — Tue., February 18, 2020

 READ FULL EDITION

1. FEDERAL WORKFORCE:

EPA office closure will move 1,200 workers to headquarters

EPA is planning to close its Arlington, Va., office and shift hundreds of its employees into its sprawling headquarters in Washington's Federal Triangle. The General Services Administration disclosed the plans in its fiscal 2021 budget request.

TOP STORIES

2. DOE:

Political hire tapped for No. 2 efficiency post

3. CAMPAIGN 2020:

Hickenlooper hopes public lands will propel him to victory

4. ENDANGERED SPECIES:

Ore. governor urges removal of disputed dams

POLITICS

5. EPA:

Press aide moves to State Department

6. Q&A:

DNC official: 'There should've been a climate debate'

7. CAMPAIGN 2020:

Democrats tout infrastructure plans but reject hiking gas tax

8. LAW:

Ex-DOJ enviro attorneys call for Barr's resignation

CONGRESS

9. HOUSE:

Natural Resources panel to take up climate bills

10. CHEMICALS:

Democrats slam EPA for missed deadline on PFAS

NATURAL RESOURCES

---

11. ENDANGERED SPECIES:

Feds offer cash reward for information on wolf death

12. PROPERTY RIGHTS:

Malibu condo owners fined nearly $1M over beach access

13. WILDFIRES:

BLM to pay for 11,000 miles of fuel breaks in 6 states

14. WILDLIFE:

After federal rollback, Va. offers more bird protections

15. INVASIVE SPECIES:

McConnell, Ky. governor watch massive Asian carp roundup

LAW

---

16. CLEAN WATER ACT:

Greens say WOTUS violates species protections, plan to sue

17. COAL:

Indian villagers lose case against World Bank branch

18. CHEMICALS:

Enviros target La. permits that 'double toxic air pollution'

ENERGY

---

19. INTERIOR:

Public can weigh in on peer-reviewed polar bear study

20. OIL AND GAS:

Refinery fire extinguished in South Texas

AIR AND WATER

---

21. WATER POLLUTION:

211M gallons of sewage spills into Fla. city's waterways

WASTES & HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

---

22. PLASTICS:

Labels don't always mean product is recyclable — report

23. EPA:

Alaska official disputes toxic chemical release analysis

24. OIL AND GAS:

EPA orders hazardous waste probe at shuttered Ind. refinery

25. NEW YORK:

Some worry whether state's coming plastic bag ban is enough

STATES

---

26. ALABAMA:

About 300 birds killed in renewed sandhill crane hunt

27. ARIZONA:

Farmers push back against tracking data on groundwater wells

28. FLORIDA:

Manatee deaths drop as red tide's effect eases

29. SOUTHEAST:

Soggy neighborhoods under flash flood warning

INTERNATIONAL

---

30. IRAN:

8 green activists accused of spying for U.S. sentenced

31. PAKISTAN:

Death toll from mysterious toxic gas leak rises to 14

---

Get all of the stories in today's Greenwire, plus an in-depth archive with thousands of articles on your issues, detailed Special Reports and much more at <https://www.greenwire.com>.

Forgot your passcodes? Call us at 202-628-6500 now and we'll set you up instantly.

To send a press release, fax 202-737-5299 or email editorial@eenews.net.

ABOUT GREENWIRE – THE LEADER IN ENERGY AND ENVIRONMENT NEWS

---

Greenwire is written and produced by the staff of E&E News. The one-stop source for those who need to stay on top of all of today's major energy and environmental action with an average of more than 20 stories a day, Greenwire covers the complete spectrum, from electricity industry restructuring to Clean Air Act litigation to public lands management. Greenwire publishes daily at 1 p.m.

Unsubscribe | Our Privacy Policy

E&E News

122 C Street NW 7th Floor Washington, DC 20001

Phone: 202-628-6500 Fax: 202-737-5299

www.eenews.net

All content is copyrighted and may not be reproduced or retransmitted without the express consent of Environment & Energy Publishing, LLC. Prefer plain text? Click here.

From: E&E News
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] February 18 -- Greenwire is ready
Date: Tuesday, February 18, 2020 11:41:22 AM

Read today's Greenwire on the web

GREENWIRE

AN E&E NEWS PUBLICATION

GREENWIRE — Tue., February 18, 2020

 READ FULL EDITION

1. FEDERAL WORKFORCE:

EPA office closure will move 1,200 workers to headquarters

EPA is planning to close its Arlington, Va., office and shift hundreds of its employees into its sprawling headquarters in Washington's Federal Triangle. The General Services Administration disclosed the plans in its fiscal 2021 budget request.

TOP STORIES

2. DOE:

Political hire tapped for No. 2 efficiency post

3. CAMPAIGN 2020:

Hickenlooper hopes public lands will propel him to victory

4. ENDANGERED SPECIES:

Ore. governor urges removal of disputed dams

POLITICS

5. EPA:

Press aide moves to State Department

6. Q&A:

DNC official: 'There should've been a climate debate'

7. CAMPAIGN 2020:

Democrats tout infrastructure plans but reject hiking gas tax

8. LAW:

Ex-DOJ enviro attorneys call for Barr's resignation

CONGRESS

9. HOUSE:

Natural Resources panel to take up climate bills

10. CHEMICALS:

Democrats slam EPA for missed deadline on PFAS

NATURAL RESOURCES

---

11. ENDANGERED SPECIES:

Feds offer cash reward for information on wolf death

12. PROPERTY RIGHTS:

Malibu condo owners fined nearly $1M over beach access

13. WILDFIRES:

BLM to pay for 11,000 miles of fuel breaks in 6 states

14. WILDLIFE:

After federal rollback, Va. offers more bird protections

15. INVASIVE SPECIES:

McConnell, Ky. governor watch massive Asian carp roundup

LAW

---

16. CLEAN WATER ACT:

Greens say WOTUS violates species protections, plan to sue

17. COAL:

Indian villagers lose case against World Bank branch

18. CHEMICALS:

Enviros target La. permits that 'double toxic air pollution'

ENERGY

---

19. INTERIOR:

Public can weigh in on peer-reviewed polar bear study

20. OIL AND GAS:

Refinery fire extinguished in South Texas

AIR AND WATER

---

21. WATER POLLUTION:

211M gallons of sewage spills into Fla. city's waterways

WASTES & HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

---

22. PLASTICS:

Labels don't always mean product is recyclable — report

23. EPA:

Alaska official disputes toxic chemical release analysis

24. OIL AND GAS:

EPA orders hazardous waste probe at shuttered Ind. refinery

25. NEW YORK:

Some worry whether state's coming plastic bag ban is enough

STATES

---

26. ALABAMA:

About 300 birds killed in renewed sandhill crane hunt

27. ARIZONA:

Farmers push back against tracking data on groundwater wells

28. FLORIDA:

Manatee deaths drop as red tide's effect eases

29. SOUTHEAST:

Soggy neighborhoods under flash flood warning

INTERNATIONAL

---

30. IRAN:

8 green activists accused of spying for U.S. sentenced

31. PAKISTAN:

Death toll from mysterious toxic gas leak rises to 14

---

Get all of the stories in today's Greenwire, plus an in-depth archive with thousands of articles on your issues, detailed Special Reports and much more at <https://www.greenwire.com>.

Forgot your passcodes? Call us at 202-628-6500 now and we'll set you up instantly.

To send a press release, fax 202-737-5299 or email editorial@eenews.net.

ABOUT GREENWIRE – THE LEADER IN ENERGY AND ENVIRONMENT NEWS

---

Greenwire is written and produced by the staff of E&E News. The one-stop source for those who need to stay on top of all of today's major energy and environmental action with an average of more than 20 stories a day, Greenwire covers the complete spectrum, from electricity industry restructuring to Clean Air Act litigation to public lands management. Greenwire publishes daily at 1 p.m.

Unsubscribe | Our Privacy Policy

E&E News

122 C Street NW 7th Floor Washington, DC 20001

Phone: 202-628-6500 Fax: 202-737-5299

www.eenews.net

From: E&E News
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] February 18 -- Greenwire is ready
Date: Tuesday, February 18, 2020 11:41:48 AM

Read today's Greenwire on the web

GREENWIRE

AN E&E NEWS PUBLICATION

GREENWIRE — Tue., February 18, 2020

 READ FULL EDITION

1. FEDERAL WORKFORCE:

EPA office closure will move 1,200 workers to headquarters

EPA is planning to close its Arlington, Va., office and shift hundreds of its employees into its sprawling headquarters in Washington's Federal Triangle. The General Services Administration disclosed the plans in its fiscal 2021 budget request.

TOP STORIES

2. DOE:

Political hire tapped for No. 2 efficiency post

3. CAMPAIGN 2020:

Hickenlooper hopes public lands will propel him to victory

4. ENDANGERED SPECIES:

Ore. governor urges removal of disputed dams

POLITICS

5. EPA:

Press aide moves to State Department

6. Q&A:

DNC official: 'There should've been a climate debate'

7. CAMPAIGN 2020:

Democrats tout infrastructure plans but reject hiking gas tax

8. LAW:

Ex-DOJ enviro attorneys call for Barr's resignation

CONGRESS

9. HOUSE:

Natural Resources panel to take up climate bills

10. CHEMICALS:

Democrats slam EPA for missed deadline on PFAS

NATURAL RESOURCES

---

11. ENDANGERED SPECIES:

Feds offer cash reward for information on wolf death

12. PROPERTY RIGHTS:

Malibu condo owners fined nearly $1M over beach access

13. WILDFIRES:

BLM to pay for 11,000 miles of fuel breaks in 6 states

14. WILDLIFE:

After federal rollback, Va. offers more bird protections

15. INVASIVE SPECIES:

McConnell, Ky. governor watch massive Asian carp roundup

LAW

---

16. CLEAN WATER ACT:

Greens say WOTUS violates species protections, plan to sue

17. COAL:

Indian villagers lose case against World Bank branch

18. CHEMICALS:

Enviros target La. permits that 'double toxic air pollution'

ENERGY

---

19. INTERIOR:

Public can weigh in on peer-reviewed polar bear study

20. OIL AND GAS:

Refinery fire extinguished in South Texas

AIR AND WATER

---

21. WATER POLLUTION:

211M gallons of sewage spills into Fla. city's waterways

WASTES & HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

---

22. PLASTICS:

Labels don't always mean product is recyclable — report

23. EPA:

Alaska official disputes toxic chemical release analysis

24. OIL AND GAS:

EPA orders hazardous waste probe at shuttered Ind. refinery

25. NEW YORK:

Some worry whether state's coming plastic bag ban is enough

STATES

---

26. ALABAMA:

About 300 birds killed in renewed sandhill crane hunt

27. ARIZONA:

Farmers push back against tracking data on groundwater wells

28. FLORIDA:

Manatee deaths drop as red tide's effect eases

29. SOUTHEAST:

Soggy neighborhoods under flash flood warning

INTERNATIONAL

---

30. IRAN:

8 green activists accused of spying for U.S. sentenced

31. PAKISTAN:

Death toll from mysterious toxic gas leak rises to 14

---

Get all of the stories in today's Greenwire, plus an in-depth archive with thousands of articles on your issues, detailed Special Reports and much more at <https://www.greenwire.com>.

Forgot your passcodes? Call us at 202-628-6500 now and we'll set you up instantly.

To send a press release, fax 202-737-5299 or email editorial@eenews.net.

ABOUT GREENWIRE – THE LEADER IN ENERGY AND ENVIRONMENT NEWS

---

Greenwire is written and produced by the staff of E&E News. The one-stop source for those who need to stay on top of all of today's major energy and environmental action with an average of more than 20 stories a day, Greenwire covers the complete spectrum, from electricity industry restructuring to Clean Air Act litigation to public lands management. Greenwire publishes daily at 1 p.m.

Unsubscribe | Our Privacy Policy

E&E News

122 C Street NW 7th Floor Washington, DC 20001

Phone: 202-628-6500 Fax: 202-737-5299

www.eenews.net

All content is copyrighted and may not be reproduced or retransmitted without the express consent of Environment & Energy Publishing, LLC. Prefer plain text? Click here.

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Trump's clemency spree shows white-collar felons it's more about who you know than what you did
Date: Wednesday, February 19, 2020 8:46:27 AM

COMMITTED TO
AFFORDABLE CARE
FOR THE HEALTH OF AMERICA<sup>SM</sup>

BlueCross
BlueShield
Association

Powered by  LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Partnership for America's Health Care Future

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

Trump's clemency spree shows white-collar felons it's more about who you know than what you did

Billionaire investor Nelson Peltz hosted a fundraiser at his $95 million home in Florida on Saturday night that raised $10 million for President Trump's reelection campaign. On Tuesday, the White House listed Peltz in a news release as one of the people supporting Trump's pardon of Michael Milken.

Milken, “the junk bond king” who inspired Gordon Gekko’s “greed is good” character in the movie “Wall Street,” served two years in prison after pleading guilty in 1990 to six felony counts, including securities fraud, mail fraud and aiding in the filing of a false tax return.

Other megadonors, including casino mogul Sheldon Adelson, were also on the White House’s list of individuals supporting the Milken pardon. So was the president’s personal lawyer, Rudy Giuliani, as well as Fox Business host Maria Bartiromo and Fox News owner Rupert Murdoch. Secretary of Transportation Elaine Chao, who is married to Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), and House Minority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R-Calif.) were among the 33 names listed. Steven Mnuchin was not on the list, but the Wall Street Journal notes that Milken has cultivated a friendship with the Treasury secretary and even flew him from Washington to California last year on his private jet.

“You know, oftentimes — pretty much all the time — I really rely on the recommendations of people that know them,” Trump told reporters as he prepared to board Air Force One at Joint Base Andrews. He was explaining why, and how, he’d just issued seven pardons and four commutations.

The big-name endorsements rolled out by the White House press office gave the distinct impression that these presidential decisions to show mercy were driven as much by whom the convicted felons know as what they were convicted for.

The head of the Justice Department's pardon office during the first two years of the Trump administration told The Washington Post recently that he quit last year because the White House largely ignored the formal process in favor of taking recommendations from celebrities, political allies and Fox News.

Ariel Friedler is one of the least famous beneficiaries of Trump's Tuesday pardons. The former chief executive of Simplicity pleaded guilty in 2014 to conspiring to hack into the computer systems of two competitors to improve his company's software development and sales strategy. Chris Christie, who advises the president, also takes on legal clients. Friedler is one of them. Records show Friedler never even applied to the pardon office at the Justice Department. But the White House listed the former New Jersey governor as someone supporting Trump's full pardon.

Edward DeBartolo Jr., the billionaire former owner of the San Francisco 49ers, pleaded guilty in 1998 for failing to tell authorities when ex-Louisiana governor Edwin Edwards (D) sought a bribe for a riverboat casino license. On the White House's list of individuals advocating for his pardon were New England Patriots owner Robert Kraft and Dallas Cowboys owner Jerry Jones. Both of them gave a million bucks to Trump's inaugural committee.

Content from Partnership for America's Health Care Future

We Can't Afford Medicare for All

American families should not be forced to foot the bill for Medicare for All. And any new government insurance system would force them to pay more to wait longer for worse care.

The president also pardoned David Safavian, a senior official in the George W. Bush administration who was convicted of obstructing a federal investigation and making false statements related to his dealings with the lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Abramoff took him on a luxury golf trip to Scotland and London, and Safavian helped him with business before the General Services Administration. Safavian now works for the American Conservative Union Foundation and frequently tweets support for the president. His list of endorsers includes Republican lobbyist Matt Schlapp, who chairs the American Conservative Union, and his wife Mercedes Schlapp, who works on the president's reelection campaign and spent nearly two years as the director of strategic communications in the Trump White House.

Former New York police commissioner Bernie Kerik went to prison for tax fraud and lying to White House officials when George W. Bush was preparing to nominate him to be secretary of homeland security. Kerik would later withdraw. His pardon was pushed for by Giuliani, who was Kerik's boss as mayor of New York. Fox News personalities Andrew Napolitano and Geraldo Rivera were also named by the White House as advocates. So was attorney Sidney Powell, who represents former Trump national security adviser Michael Flynn.

The president seems to have something of a soft spot for white-collar criminals. For someone who has spent months professing to be so profoundly concerned about corruption in Ukraine, Trump signaled with these pardons and commutations that he's far less worried about taking a hard line against corruption here at home.

Here are four other takeaways from Trump's latest announcements:

1) Fox News remains immensely influential.

As he explained why he commuted former Democratic Illinois governor Rod Blagojevich's sentence, Trump told reporters: "I watched his wife on television."

Patti Blagojevich made at least seven appearances over the past two years on Fox News, appearing on the shows of Tucker Carlson, Laura Ingraham and Jeanine Pirro, to praise the president and plead for his mercy. (Blagojevich was also a contestant on Trump's show "The Celebrity Apprentice" in 2010.)

Kerik, a frequent Mar-a-Lago guest, appeared on Fox News as recently as

Monday night.

Angela Stanton was pardoned for her role in a car-stealing ring. The former “Real Housewives of Atlanta” star has previously appeared on Fox News, where she’s praised the president.

Former Illinois governor Rod Blagojevich arrives at his home in Chicago early Wednesday morning after Trump ordered his release from a Colorado prison. (Paul Beaty/AP)

2) The perceived enemy of Trump’s enemy is his friend.

The president said the 14-year prison sentence for Blagojevich, who was caught on a wiretap talking about trying to sell Barack Obama’s vacated Senate seat to the highest bidder, was “ridiculous.”

“It was a prosecution by the same people – Comey, Fitzpatrick – the same group,” Trump told reporters on Tuesday. Last year, Trump also falsely blamed Blagojevich’s treatment on “the Comey gang and all these sleazebags.”

In fact, however, former FBI director James Comey was in the private sector during Blagojevich’s prosecution. And “Fitzpatrick” seems to be a mistaken reference to Patrick Fitzgerald, who as U.S. attorney in Chicago did prosecute Blagojevich and is indeed good friends with Comey.

3) Trump is clearly not going to let up his attacks on the Justice Department.

Trump is deeply animated by his sense of grievance and victimhood. He told reporters on Tuesday as he discussed the pardons that he partially agreed with Attorney General Bill Barr that his tweets about active criminal cases do make his job more difficult. But he said that won't stop him. "Social media, for me, has been very important because it gives me a voice," said Trump, who as president controls the biggest bully pulpit in the world and has an enormous press corps that hangs on his every word.

Trump doesn't appear to see himself as "above the law." Instead, he seems to believe he is the law. "I'm allowed to be totally involved," he told reporters, as he defended his tweets about the case of his longtime adviser Roger Stone. "I'm actually, I guess, the chief law enforcement officer of the country. But I've chosen not to be involved."

The president clearly feels emboldened by the Senate's vote to acquit him. "The pardons and commutations followed Trump's moves to punish witnesses in his impeachment trial, publicly intervene in a pending legal case to urge leniency for a friend, attack a federal judge, accuse a juror of bias and threaten to sue his own government for investigating him,"

Toluse Olorunnipa and Beth Reinhard report.

Barr has told people close to Trump — both inside and outside the White House — that he is considering quitting over Trump’s tweets about Justice Department investigations, three administration officials told Matt Zapposky, Josh Dawsey, John Wagner and Rachel Weiner: “So far, Trump has defied Barr’s requests, both public and private, to keep quiet on matters of federal law enforcement. It was not immediately clear Tuesday whether Barr had made his posture known directly to Trump. The administration officials said Barr seemed to be sharing his position with advisers in hopes the president would get the message that he should stop weighing in publicly on the Justice Department’s ongoing criminal investigations. ‘He has his limits,’ said one person familiar with Barr’s thinking ...

“The standoff between Trump and Barr intensified Tuesday when Trump declared in a string of early morning tweets that he might sue those involved in the special counsel investigation into his 2016 campaign and suggested that [Stone], his friend convicted of lying to Congress in that probe, deserved a new trial. Hours later, a Justice Department official said prosecutors had filed a sealed motion in court arguing the opposite and that they had Barr’s personal approval to do so. Barr had a previously scheduled lunch with the White House counsel Tuesday and was still the attorney general by day’s end — indicating that the president’s moves that day were not enough to push him to resign.”

4) Follow the money.

“Paul Pogue, a construction company owner who pleaded guilty to underpaying his taxes by $473,000 and received three years probation, was issued a full pardon and clemency by the president,” the Daily Beast notes. “According to FEC filings, Pogue’s family has donated hundreds of thousands of dollars in direct contributions and in-kind air travel to the Trump Victory Committee. Beginning in August 2019, Ben Pogue—CEO of Pogue Construction and son of Paul Pogue—and his wife Ashleigh made over $200,000 in contributions to the campaign.

“In August alone, Ben Pogue donated $85,000 to Trump Victory while Ashleigh Pogue contributed $50,000 that month. The following month, Ben Pogue made an in-kind air travel contribution of $75,404.40. The couple also made several large donations to the Republican National Committee and each donated $5,600 to Donald Trump for President Inc. On the day of their first donation to the Trump campaign, Ashleigh posted an Instagram photo of her and her husband posing with Donald Trump Jr. and his girlfriend, Kimberly Guilfoyle, at the Hamptons.

“Prior to the Pogues’ sudden significant donating spree to Trump and the Republicans, the couple was not seen as big campaign spenders, having donated a few thousand dollars for Paul Ryan’s congressional campaign in 2017 and $5,400 for former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum’s 2016 Republican presidential run. Notably, one of the advocates for Pogue’s clemency: Santorum, who is now a CNN contributor.”

Listen to the podcast.

Every weekday, a few hours before this newsletter hits your inbox, I also put out a podcast called The Daily 202's Big Idea with the biggest stories and a preview of what will be in the email. Subscribe and listen wherever you get your podcasts. The audio briefing is always available here.

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost's essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

---

2020 watch

A new Washington Post-ABC News poll shows Bernie Sanders opening a significant national lead.

“Joe Biden, who led Sanders in a Post-ABC national poll in January, has seen a sharp drop in his support after finishing fourth in the Iowa caucuses and fifth in the New Hampshire primary,” Dan Balz and Scott

Clement report. Biden is now in a battle for second place with Mike Bloomberg and Elizabeth Warren. Pete Buttigieg is in single digits nationally, roughly even with Amy Klobuchar.

“By a wide margin, 58 percent to 38 percent, Democrats say they would rather nominate a candidate who can defeat Trump than one who agrees with them on major issues. ... In the new poll, Sanders is seen as the most electable, cited by 30 percent of Democratic leaners as best situated to beat Trump. Bloomberg is cited by 18 percent on this question, with no other Democrat close to double digits. ... In the past month, Biden has lost support among three key constituency groups: African Americans, older voters and whites without college degrees, previously the bulwarks of his campaign. ...

“Sanders has seen a big jump in support among voters under age 50 and is now backed by 50 percent of that group, up from 34 percent in January. He holds a 3-to-1 lead over his rivals among these voters. Sanders also has more than doubled his support among black voters and has gained among whites without college degrees. ... Bloomberg’s growth was fueled by more support among older voters and among white voters with college degrees. Buttigieg, Warren and Klobuchar saw no significant shifts in their coalitions. ...

“In a measure of how Democrats see Sanders as a candidate against Trump, 72 percent say they believe he would defeat the president. Among Democrats, 69 percent think Bloomberg would win against Trump, and 68 percent say that of Biden. ... If he were to become the nominee, about half of all Americans say it makes no difference in their vote that Sanders is a socialist, including about 7 in 10 Democrats. But nearly 4 in 10 adults say that fact makes them more likely to oppose him, including 37 percent of independents and 79 percent of Republicans. Just under 1 in 10 adults say it makes them more likely to support him. ... The president’s approval rating stands at 43 percent, with 53 percent disapproving, showing no real change in the past month.”

Young voters are Sanders's base, but he is competitive across racial, ideological and educational groups

Q: Please tell me whom you'd vote for in the primary or caucus in your state. Which candidate would you lean toward? (Among Democrats and Democratic-leaning independent registered voters)

Note: Candidates with 10% or less overall support and “no opinion” not shown.

Source: Feb. 14-17, 2020, Washington Post-ABC News poll of 408 Democratic and Democratic-leaning registered voters, with an error margin of +/- 6 percentage points.

BRITTANY RENEE MAYES/THE WASHINGTON POST

Tonight's debate requires Bloomberg to step out of his expensive comfort zone.

“When he steps onto the debate stage in Las Vegas for his first hostile and uncontrolled campaign test [at 9 p.m. Eastern on NBC and MSNBC], there will be no management decisions to make, teleprompters to lean on or endless ad budgets to filter his image with focus-grouped messaging,” Michael Scherer reports. “In preparation, his advisers have spent much of the past week drilling him for the big jump, which could make or break the momentum he has generated with his extravagant spending. In debate prep sessions, they have armed him with comebacks for the inevitable attacks on his enormous wealth and past record, while also coaching him to move beyond his sometimes distant, wonky and diffidently logical public persona. ...

"Wary of Bloomberg's rise in the polls, his rivals, with far more debate experience and Democratic longevity, have made clear that they will not go easy on the newcomer. [Sanders] spent Tuesday in Reno, Nev., denouncing Bloomberg's campaign as an example of 'oligarchy, not democracy.' [Biden] has been boasting for days about his desire to confront Bloomberg in person because he cannot compete with the billionaire's advertising budget. 'At least now primary voters curious about how each candidate will take on Donald Trump can get a live demonstration of how we each take on an egomaniac billionaire,' [Warren] warned...

"Bloomberg's rise in polling comes as he faces a barrage of negative news coverage, some of it promoted by rival campaigns. He has had to again address allegations that he made vulgar and sexist comments, his past defense of targeting stop-and-frisk police policies to black and Latino neighborhoods in New York, and an interview in which he blamed the 2008 financial crisis on politicians who had pushed to end racially discriminatory mortgage-lending policies known as 'redlining.' Bloomberg's past political leanings — he re-registered as a Democrat only in 2018 — and his refusal to file a financial disclosure or release his tax returns before the debate, even as he is self-financing his campaign, also could come into play Wednesday. A spokesman for his campaign said the financial disclosure would be filed by March 20, and Howard Wolfson, a senior adviser to the campaign, has previously said Bloomberg would release his tax returns, though no date has been set.”

Senior Bloomberg campaign adviser Timothy O'Brien said the billionaire will sell his business, Bloomberg LP, if he wins the presidency. “There will be no confusion about any of his financial holdings,” O'Brien told CNN. “We will be 180 degrees away from where Donald Trump is on these issues because Donald Trump is a walking financial conflict of interest.”

Retired ABC News anchor Sam Donaldson's endorsement of Bloomberg annoyed practicing journalists.

“Donaldson’s open partisanship has few precedents among leading national TV news figures, and raises several journalistic questions: Does a journalist’s vow of objectivity (or at least neutrality and balance) extend beyond his or her working years? Is a retired journalist subject to the same kinds of ethical restraints as a working one, such as not endorsing candidates and not contributing to political causes and campaigns?” writes Paul Farhi. “Donaldson, 85, says no. Since he no longer has any role in reporting or shaping the news, he believes he’s entitled to express his opinions about, well, everything.”

Sanders said he won't release any more medical records.

“We have released ... quite as much as any other candidate has,” Sanders said last night during a CNN town hall. “I think we have released a detailed report and I'm comfortable with what we have done. And, by the way, if you think I'm not in good health, come out with me on the campaign trail and I'll let you introduce me to the three or four rallies a day that we do.”

He also rejected a potential health-care compromise.

Sanders distanced himself from Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez’s “recent suggestion that compromising on health care would be acceptable, arguing that his Medicare-for-all plan is ‘already a compromise,’” Sean Sullivan reports. Last week, Ocasio-Cortez told HuffPost that some flexibility on the proposal was possible. “A president can’t wave a magic wand and pass any legislation they want,” she said. “The worst-case scenario? We compromise deeply and we end up getting a public option. Is that a nightmare? I don’t think so.”

And the Sanders camp plans to request a partial recount of the Iowa caucuses.

“The announcement came as the results further narrowed on Tuesday, following a recanvass of a small subset of precincts,” Isaac Stanley-Becker reports. “The revised figures did not change the allocation of delegates to the national convention. Still, they just barely shifted projected support at the state convention, which is typically the metric used to name a winner. The Iowa Democratic Party said [Buttigieg] would claim 563.207 state delegate equivalents, or SDEs, while Sanders (I-Vt.) would claim 563.127. What had been a difference of 2.774 shrank to 0.08.”

Klobuchar is scrambling to turn her moment into something more.

“Her staffers spent hours over the weekend hashing out a strategy for Super Tuesday, debating whether it’s worthwhile to compete in big, delegate-rich states like Texas and California,” Annie Linskey, Jenna Johnson and Holly Bailey report. “Some advisers want her to focus instead on independent-minded states that aren’t overly liberal, like Maine and Tennessee, because they might be receptive to her centrist message. But those states, of course, yield much fewer delegates. ... Klobuchar’s home state votes on Super Tuesday. She is adding staff in Minnesota as she battles with Buttigieg and Warren for the white, college-educated voters who fuel their campaigns.” As one adviser put it: “We’re putting the airplane together as we’re flying it.”

Buttigieg clapped back at Rush Limbaugh's homophobic attacks.

During his own town hall on CNN last night, Buttigieg offered “some of his most fiery responses yet to Limbaugh's assertion that President Trump told him not to apologize for saying that Americans wouldn't elect ‘a gay guy kissing his husband on the debate stage,’” Chelsea Janes reports. “Limbaugh, whom Trump recently awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom, doubled down on those comments Monday when he told listeners ‘Hell, the president even called me about this! He said, “Rush, I just got to tell you something. Never apologize. Don’t ever apologize.”’ Trump recently said he would have no trouble voting for a gay candidate. Buttigieg said he can’t take Trump at his word. ‘Not if he’s sending out his supporters to talk in this way. Look, the idea of the likes of Rush Limbaugh or Donald Trump lecturing anybody on family values,’ Buttigieg said. ‘Sorry, but one thing about my marriage is it’s never involved me having to send hush money to a porn star after cheating on my spouse.’”

A watchdog group claims Buttigieg and a super PAC improperly coordinated.

“In the complaint, filed Tuesday with the Federal Election Commission, the Campaign Legal Center alleged that Buttigieg’s campaign improperly accepted more than $639,000 in contributions, in violation of federal rules barring candidates from coordinating with independent groups that can raise and spend unlimited amounts of money,” Michelle Ye Hee Lee reports. “The complaint centers on a tweet by Buttigieg senior strategist Michael Halle analyzing the strengths of a particular campaign message in Nevada, and a subsequent ad campaign in that state by VoteVets that appeared to follow the strategy outlined in the tweet.”

Buttigieg was forced to clarify that comedian Keegan-

Michael Key hasn't endorsed him.

“Key appeared with Buttigieg on Saturday to drum up voter support at his Henderson, Nev., field office. The gaffe did not attract much attention. However, it was not the first time the Buttigieg campaign overstated having a tie with a prominent African American figure, or black business,” ABC News reports.

As Super Tuesday looms, rural California's delegate gold mine is suddenly a big deal.

“Buttigieg landed in this small Central Valley city of 74,000, addressing an excited crowd of 700 Stanislaus County Democrats ... Many said [they] couldn't believe their luck, not after decades of presidential candidates ignoring California's inland areas. ‘I've lived in California my whole life, and I've never seen a presidential candidate,’ said Kathy Causey, a [lifelong Democrat],” Politico reports. “Buttigieg's road trip into the region John Steinbeck once described as ‘America's Breadbasket’ underscores how candidates are going to far-flung regions of the state to mine for delegate gold in a competitive Democratic primary. ... California's primary rules award delegates proportionally by congressional district, meaning that candidates know they must essentially run their ground game ... ‘in 53 different states,’ the number of congressional districts in California.”

The Trump campaign hired a Cambridge Analytica alum.

The move is “likely to raise alarms among Trump critics and data privacy advocates who worry the president will push the technological envelope to get reelected in 2020,” Politico reports. “Matt Oczkowski, who served as head of product at Cambridge before it went bankrupt and shut down in 2018, is helping oversee the Trump campaign's data program ... People familiar with the hire say he will devote his time to data-focused projects like determining where Trump and surrogates ought to campaign in person, figuring out which states are the best targets on Trump's path to victory, and targeting media buys. Oczkowski has privately said he plans on using traditional data modeling rather than psychographics, the targeting of voters based upon their personality or behavior.”

---

The new world order

More than 2,000 have died of the coronavirus in China, but the nation is growing optimistic.

“Chinese leader Xi Jinping is striking an increasingly confident note that the country can control the coronavirus outbreak and manage the economic and social fallout as some Chinese health experts predict a peak in infections by the end of the month,” Gerry Shih reports. “Chinese leaders, eager to kick-start economic activity, have dismantled some highway checkpoints while businesses have begun to reopen. As of Wednesday, restrictions on personal mobility remained tight, suggesting wariness about rising infections. ...

“China on Wednesday reported new case numbers continuing to decline, but international experts, including U.S. National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases director Anthony Fauci, say they are wary of declaring that the pace of worldwide infections is slowing. ... China tallied a total of 1,749 new infections and 136 deaths through the end of Tuesday, making the cumulative total 74,185 infections and 2,004 deaths — the overwhelming majority still occurring in central Hubei province. Hong Kong reported its second death, a 70-year-old man.”

A machine sprays disinfectant at the entrance of a pork meat hall inside a wholesale market for agricultural products in Beijing. (Tingshu Wang/Reuters)

China expelled three Wall Street Journal reporters, blaming an opinion column.

“Deputy Bureau Chief Josh Chin and reporter Chao Deng, both American citizens, as well as reporter Philip Wen, an Australian national, have been ordered to leave the country within five days,” Anna Fifield reports. The Foreign Ministry has been criticizing the Journal since it published a coronavirus-related column on Feb. 3 by Walter Russell Mead, a professor at Bard College, under the headline “China Is the Real Sick Man of Asia.”

The move came after the U.S. designated major Chinese media outlets as government entities.

The Xinhua News Agency, China Global Television Network, China Radio International, China Daily and the People’s Daily will now be treated as diplomatic outposts of the Chinese government, subject to the same constraints. The move is the latest in a series of U.S. efforts to tackle China’s influence in the United States. (Fifield, Carol Morello and Emily Rauhala)

The Trump administration accused a Russian company of helping Venezuela export oil.

“The Trump administration directed its ‘maximum pressure’ campaign in Venezuela toward Russia on Tuesday, announcing sanctions against the trading and marketing arm of Rosneft, the state-controlled Russian oil giant that has taken over an increasing share of Venezuela’s own state-owned oil industry and reaped huge profits from exporting its crude,” Karen DeYoung and Anthony Faiola report. “Swiss-registered Rosneft Trading has ‘propped up the [Venezuelan] oil sector and actively tried to evade’ existing U.S. sanctions against those doing business with the Venezuelan government of Nicolás Maduro, according to [an administration official] ... The measures do not cover the parent company, Rosneft Oil. Its chairman, Igor Sechin, is a close ally of Russian President Vladimir Putin ... But U.S. officials said the steps would have a global effect. Although the sanctions directly target only property and interests held in the United States by the trading subsidiary and its chairman, Didier Casimiro, ‘most banks, whether U.S.-based or not,’ look to the U.S. measures ‘to guide their risk appetite,’ one of the officials said.”

The death of a young girl in Mexico sparked new outrage in a nation plagued by femicide.

Seven-year-old Fátima Aldrighett "disappeared Feb. 11 in the Mexico City neighborhood of Xochimilco, where she was waiting to be picked up from school. Four days later, her body was found naked in a plastic bag," Kevin Sieff reports. “Fátima’s killing is the latest in a string of brutal crimes against girls and women stirring enormous public outrage directed at Mexico’s president and other top officials. Last week, Ingrid Escamilla, 25, was found stabbed to death and partially skinned. That crime prompted a wave of protests in Mexico City; President Andrés Manuel López Obrador was accused of brushing them off. In the midst of a fundraising campaign linked to the sale of the presidential plane, he chastised a reporter who asked him about the attacks on women: ‘I don’t want femicides to distract from the raffle.’”

An immigration judge granted a Venezuelan father

entrance to the U.S. but sent his teen daughter to Mexico.

Officials “denied her claims that she was fleeing political repression and violence, even after they accepted the same claims from her father,” the AP reports. “The teenager, who is being identified by only her first name, Branyerly, is living alone in Matamoros, Mexico, across from Brownsville. U.S. border agents on Monday denied her request not to be sent back under the Trump administration’s so-called ‘Remain in Mexico’ program for migrants. ... ‘I already lived one nightmare in Venezuela and another here,’ Branyerly said.”

Boeing found debris in the fuel tanks of undelivered 737 Max jets.

This is a “potential safety hazard and yet another problem for the company as it tries to get the planes airborne again after two deadly crashes,” Ian Duncan reports. Debris “often includes tools or parts left behind when planes leave the production line. [A] Boeing spokesman said dealing with the debris is not likely to further delay the work of getting the planes off the ground.”

In Canada, anti-pipeline protesters have paralyzed the nation’s rail system.

“Demonstrators across the country have joined the blockades in support of the hereditary chiefs of the Wet’suwet’en Nation in British Columbia, who oppose the construction of a natural gas pipeline through their territory. They’ve brought most freight and passenger rail service to a standstill,” Amanda Coletta reports. Underlying the dispute are long-standing questions over land title, and who speaks for Canada’s indigenous people. In response, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau called for “dialogue and mutual respect.”

A storm brought mass flooding to the U.K. Brits asked, “Where’s Boris?”

“The Met Office called the thing Dennis, and the second-strongest ‘bomb cyclone' on record in the North Atlantic wreaked havoc across Britain," William Booth reports. "And with flood warnings still pinging on the telly like traffic alerts during a London rush hour, the storm is now raining on Prime Minister Boris Johnson, too, who is facing a torrent of criticism for his government's response. 'Where the bloody hell is Boris?' the Sun newspaper asked in a front-page headline. ... The hashtag #wheresBoris was trending in Britain on Twitter. The flooding begot by Storm Dennis is responsible for at least three deaths so far, as the waters continue to rise. ... The Labour Party said Johnson's decision not to visit the hard-hit areas or hold a cabinet-level emergency meeting was 'a disgrace.' ... It didn't help that when Storm Dennis hit, Johnson was spending the weekend at the 115-room lakeside mansion in Kent known as Chevening."

---

Quote of the day

"It's dangerous not to talk to your enemies." – Sen. Chris Murphy (D-Conn.) on why he met with Iran's foreign minister \(Michael Brice-Saddler and Reis Thebault\)

---

Social media speed read

A video showed Bloomberg describing transgender people as "he, she, or it," upsetting many activists on the left:

Charlotte Clymer 🏳️‍🌈 🇺🇸 @cmclymer · 5h
I am heartbroken and infuriated that @MikeBloomberg felt it appropriate to refer to trans people as "it" and trans women as "men in dresses". His remarks are cruel, inexcusable and enable violence and discrimination against trans + non-binary folks.
(1/6)buzzfeednews.com/article/domini...

Mike Bloomberg Referred To Transgender Peo...
Bloomberg suggested transgender rights would sink Democratic campaigns in comments recorded last
buzzfeednews.com

Charlotte Clymer 🏳️‍🌈 🇺🇸 @cmclymer

This comes two weeks after @MikeBloomberg was found to have made similar remarks in 2016. These latest comments were less than a year ago. It is disturbing that a leading Democratic presidential candidate would casually dehumanize trans people and degrade our existence.

👍 924 1:32 AM - Feb 19, 2020

💬 100 people are talking about this

Previewing a possible flashpoint in tonight's debate, Warren accused Bloomberg of using "racist justifications" to defend "stop and frisk":

Bloomberg's campaign manager kept his focus on Sanders:

Ted Cruz made fun of a Bloomberg News headline about Bloomberg:

Ted Cruz
@tedcruz

It's almost as if he owns the media.
twitter.com/yashar/status/...

Yashar Ali  @yashar

Bloomberg campaign says it's a two-man race for the nomination per Bloomberg the news organization owned and controlled by Bloomberg

Bloomberg

Subscribe

Politics

Bloomberg Campaign Says It's a Two-Man Race for the Nomination

By Mark Niquette

February 18, 2020, 4:14 PM EST

- ▶ Aide makes prediction before candidate has appeared on ballot
- ▶ Bloomberg to fight for first votes on Super Tuesday, March 3

 15.9K 12:03 AM - Feb 19, 2020

 5.283 people are talking about this

An NBC reporter noted quite a paradox in the new NBC-WSJ poll:

Congressional Democrats blasted Trump's pardons and commutations:

And the liberal uncle of the just-married Stephen Miller, the White House adviser who oversees immigration policy, directed his wedding present to an organization that works with refugees:

Videos of the day

Trump effusively praised Bloomberg seven years ago:

 JM Rieger
@RiegerReport

Donald Trump on Mike Bloomberg on March 25, 2013:

"He's made a tremendous fortune, he's a brilliant guy ... he's got some, you know, really amazing ideas, he's done a very, very good job as the mayor of New York"

 6  12:03 AM - Feb 19, 2020

 See JM Rieger's other Tweets

James Corden previewed the Democratic debate:

 Bernie Goes After Bloomberg Ahead Of Vega...

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Carolyn Hax for Post columnist Carolyn Hax's latest advice column every day. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Trump's clemency spree shows white-collar felons it's more about who you know than what you did
Date: Wednesday, February 19, 2020 8:46:33 AM

COMMITTED TO
AFFORDABLE CARE
FOR THE HEALTH OF AMERICA<sup>SM</sup>

BlueCross
BlueShield
Association

Powered by  LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Partnership for America's Health Care Future

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

Trump's clemency spree shows white-collar felons it's more about who you know than what you did

Billionaire investor Nelson Peltz hosted a fundraiser at his $95 million home in Florida on Saturday night that raised $10 million for President Trump's reelection campaign. On Tuesday, the White House listed Peltz in a news release as one of the people supporting Trump's pardon of Michael Milken.

Milken, “the junk bond king” who inspired Gordon Gekko’s “greed is good” character in the movie “Wall Street,” served two years in prison after pleading guilty in 1990 to six felony counts, including securities fraud, mail fraud and aiding in the filing of a false tax return.

Other megadonors, including casino mogul Sheldon Adelson, were also on the White House’s list of individuals supporting the Milken pardon. So was the president’s personal lawyer, Rudy Giuliani, as well as Fox Business host Maria Bartiromo and Fox News owner Rupert Murdoch. Secretary of Transportation Elaine Chao, who is married to Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), and House Minority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R-Calif.) were among the 33 names listed. Steven Mnuchin was not on the list, but the Wall Street Journal notes that Milken has cultivated a friendship with the Treasury secretary and even flew him from Washington to California last year on his private jet.

“You know, oftentimes — pretty much all the time — I really rely on the recommendations of people that know them,” Trump told reporters as he prepared to board Air Force One at Joint Base Andrews. He was explaining why, and how, he’d just issued seven pardons and four commutations.

The big-name endorsements rolled out by the White House press office gave the distinct impression that these presidential decisions to show mercy were driven as much by whom the convicted felons know as what they were convicted for.

The head of the Justice Department's pardon office during the first two years of the Trump administration told The Washington Post recently that he quit last year because the White House largely ignored the formal process in favor of taking recommendations from celebrities, political allies and Fox News.

Ariel Friedler is one of the least famous beneficiaries of Trump's Tuesday pardons. The former chief executive of Simplicity pleaded guilty in 2014 to conspiring to hack into the computer systems of two competitors to improve his company's software development and sales strategy. Chris Christie, who advises the president, also takes on legal clients. Friedler is one of them. Records show Friedler never even applied to the pardon office at the Justice Department. But the White House listed the former New Jersey governor as someone supporting Trump's full pardon.

Edward DeBartolo Jr., the billionaire former owner of the San Francisco 49ers, pleaded guilty in 1998 for failing to tell authorities when ex-Louisiana governor Edwin Edwards (D) sought a bribe for a riverboat casino license. On the White House's list of individuals advocating for his pardon were New England Patriots owner Robert Kraft and Dallas Cowboys owner Jerry Jones. Both of them gave a million bucks to Trump's inaugural committee.

Content from Partnership for America's Health Care Future

We Can't Afford Medicare for All

American families should not be forced to foot the bill for Medicare for All. And any new government insurance system would force them to pay more to wait longer for worse care.

The president also pardoned David Safavian, a senior official in the George W. Bush administration who was convicted of obstructing a federal investigation and making false statements related to his dealings with the lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Abramoff took him on a luxury golf trip to Scotland and London, and Safavian helped him with business before the General Services Administration. Safavian now works for the American Conservative Union Foundation and frequently tweets support for the president. His list of endorsers includes Republican lobbyist Matt Schlapp, who chairs the American Conservative Union, and his wife Mercedes Schlapp, who works on the president's reelection campaign and spent nearly two years as the director of strategic communications in the Trump White House.

Former New York police commissioner Bernie Kerik went to prison for tax fraud and lying to White House officials when George W. Bush was preparing to nominate him to be secretary of homeland security. Kerik would later withdraw. His pardon was pushed for by Giuliani, who was Kerik's boss as mayor of New York. Fox News personalities Andrew Napolitano and Geraldo Rivera were also named by the White House as advocates. So was attorney Sidney Powell, who represents former Trump national security adviser Michael Flynn.

The president seems to have something of a soft spot for white-collar criminals. For someone who has spent months professing to be so profoundly concerned about corruption in Ukraine, Trump signaled with these pardons and commutations that he's far less worried about taking a hard line against corruption here at home.

Here are four other takeaways from Trump's latest announcements:

1) Fox News remains immensely influential.

As he explained why he commuted former Democratic Illinois governor Rod Blagojevich's sentence, Trump told reporters: "I watched his wife on television."

Patti Blagojevich made at least seven appearances over the past two years on Fox News, appearing on the shows of Tucker Carlson, Laura Ingraham and Jeanine Pirro, to praise the president and plead for his mercy. (Blagojevich was also a contestant on Trump's show "The Celebrity Apprentice" in 2010.)

Kerik, a frequent Mar-a-Lago guest, appeared on Fox News as recently as

Monday night.

Angela Stanton was pardoned for her role in a car-stealing ring. The former “Real Housewives of Atlanta” star has previously appeared on Fox News, where she’s praised the president.

Former Illinois governor Rod Blagojevich arrives at his home in Chicago early Wednesday morning after Trump ordered his release from a Colorado prison. (Paul Beaty/AP)

2) The perceived enemy of Trump’s enemy is his friend.

The president said the 14-year prison sentence for Blagojevich, who was caught on a wiretap talking about trying to sell Barack Obama’s vacated Senate seat to the highest bidder, was “ridiculous.”

“It was a prosecution by the same people – Comey, Fitzpatrick – the same group,” Trump told reporters on Tuesday. Last year, Trump also falsely blamed Blagojevich’s treatment on “the Comey gang and all these sleazebags.”

In fact, however, former FBI director James Comey was in the private sector during Blagojevich’s prosecution. And “Fitzpatrick” seems to be a mistaken reference to Patrick Fitzgerald, who as U.S. attorney in Chicago did prosecute Blagojevich and is indeed good friends with Comey.

3) Trump is clearly not going to let up his attacks on the Justice Department.

Trump is deeply animated by his sense of grievance and victimhood. He told reporters on Tuesday as he discussed the pardons that he partially agreed with Attorney General Bill Barr that his tweets about active criminal cases do make his job more difficult. But he said that won't stop him. "Social media, for me, has been very important because it gives me a voice," said Trump, who as president controls the biggest bully pulpit in the world and has an enormous press corps that hangs on his every word.

Trump doesn't appear to see himself as "above the law." Instead, he seems to believe he is the law. "I'm allowed to be totally involved," he told reporters, as he defended his tweets about the case of his longtime adviser Roger Stone. "I'm actually, I guess, the chief law enforcement officer of the country. But I've chosen not to be involved."

The president clearly feels emboldened by the Senate's vote to acquit him. "The pardons and commutations followed Trump's moves to punish witnesses in his impeachment trial, publicly intervene in a pending legal case to urge leniency for a friend, attack a federal judge, accuse a juror of bias and threaten to sue his own government for investigating him,"

Toluse Olorunnipa and Beth Reinhard report.

Barr has told people close to Trump — both inside and outside the White House — that he is considering quitting over Trump’s tweets about Justice Department investigations, three administration officials told Matt Zapposky, Josh Dawsey, John Wagner and Rachel Weiner: “So far, Trump has defied Barr’s requests, both public and private, to keep quiet on matters of federal law enforcement. It was not immediately clear Tuesday whether Barr had made his posture known directly to Trump. The administration officials said Barr seemed to be sharing his position with advisers in hopes the president would get the message that he should stop weighing in publicly on the Justice Department’s ongoing criminal investigations. ‘He has his limits,’ said one person familiar with Barr’s thinking ...

“The standoff between Trump and Barr intensified Tuesday when Trump declared in a string of early morning tweets that he might sue those involved in the special counsel investigation into his 2016 campaign and suggested that [Stone], his friend convicted of lying to Congress in that probe, deserved a new trial. Hours later, a Justice Department official said prosecutors had filed a sealed motion in court arguing the opposite and that they had Barr’s personal approval to do so. Barr had a previously scheduled lunch with the White House counsel Tuesday and was still the attorney general by day’s end — indicating that the president’s moves that day were not enough to push him to resign.”

4) Follow the money.

“Paul Pogue, a construction company owner who pleaded guilty to underpaying his taxes by $473,000 and received three years probation, was issued a full pardon and clemency by the president,” the Daily Beast notes. “According to FEC filings, Pogue’s family has donated hundreds of thousands of dollars in direct contributions and in-kind air travel to the Trump Victory Committee. Beginning in August 2019, Ben Pogue—CEO of Pogue Construction and son of Paul Pogue—and his wife Ashleigh made over $200,000 in contributions to the campaign.

“In August alone, Ben Pogue donated $85,000 to Trump Victory while Ashleigh Pogue contributed $50,000 that month. The following month, Ben Pogue made an in-kind air travel contribution of $75,404.40. The couple also made several large donations to the Republican National Committee and each donated $5,600 to Donald Trump for President Inc. On the day of their first donation to the Trump campaign, Ashleigh posted an Instagram photo of her and her husband posing with Donald Trump Jr. and his girlfriend, Kimberly Guilfoyle, at the Hamptons.

“Prior to the Pogues’ sudden significant donating spree to Trump and the Republicans, the couple was not seen as big campaign spenders, having donated a few thousand dollars for Paul Ryan’s congressional campaign in 2017 and $5,400 for former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum’s 2016 Republican presidential run. Notably, one of the advocates for Pogue’s clemency: Santorum, who is now a CNN contributor.”

Listen to the podcast.

Every weekday, a few hours before this newsletter hits your inbox, I also put out a podcast called The Daily 202's Big Idea with the biggest stories and a preview of what will be in the email. Subscribe and listen wherever you get your podcasts. The audio briefing is always available here.

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost's essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

---

2020 watch

A new Washington Post-ABC News poll shows Bernie Sanders opening a significant national lead.

“Joe Biden, who led Sanders in a Post-ABC national poll in January, has seen a sharp drop in his support after finishing fourth in the Iowa caucuses and fifth in the New Hampshire primary,” Dan Balz and Scott Clement report. Biden is now in a battle for second place with Mike

Bloomberg and Elizabeth Warren. Pete Buttigieg is in single digits nationally, roughly even with Amy Klobuchar.

“By a wide margin, 58 percent to 38 percent, Democrats say they would rather nominate a candidate who can defeat Trump than one who agrees with them on major issues. ... In the new poll, Sanders is seen as the most electable, cited by 30 percent of Democratic leaners as best situated to beat Trump. Bloomberg is cited by 18 percent on this question, with no other Democrat close to double digits. ... In the past month, Biden has lost support among three key constituency groups: African Americans, older voters and whites without college degrees, previously the bulwarks of his campaign. ...

“Sanders has seen a big jump in support among voters under age 50 and is now backed by 50 percent of that group, up from 34 percent in January. He holds a 3-to-1 lead over his rivals among these voters. Sanders also has more than doubled his support among black voters and has gained among whites without college degrees. ... Bloomberg’s growth was fueled by more support among older voters and among white voters with college degrees. Buttigieg, Warren and Klobuchar saw no significant shifts in their coalitions. ...

“In a measure of how Democrats see Sanders as a candidate against Trump, 72 percent say they believe he would defeat the president. Among Democrats, 69 percent think Bloomberg would win against Trump, and 68 percent say that of Biden. ... If he were to become the nominee, about half of all Americans say it makes no difference in their vote that Sanders is a socialist, including about 7 in 10 Democrats. But nearly 4 in 10 adults say that fact makes them more likely to oppose him, including 37 percent of independents and 79 percent of Republicans. Just under 1 in 10 adults say it makes them more likely to support him. ... The president’s approval rating stands at 43 percent, with 53 percent disapproving, showing no real change in the past month.”

Young voters are Sanders's base, but he is competitive across racial, ideological and educational groups

Q: Please tell me whom you'd vote for in the primary or caucus in your state. Which candidate would you lean toward? (Among Democrats and Democratic-leaning independent registered voters)

Note: Candidates with 10% or less overall support and "no opinion" not shown.

Source: Feb. 14-17, 2020, Washington Post-ABC News poll of 408 Democratic and Democratic-leaning registered voters, with an error margin of +/- 6 percentage points.

BRITTANY RENEE MAYES/THE WASHINGTON POST

Tonight's debate requires Bloomberg to step out of his expensive comfort zone.

“When he steps onto the debate stage in Las Vegas for his first hostile and uncontrolled campaign test [at 9 p.m. Eastern on NBC and MSNBC], there will be no management decisions to make, teleprompters to lean on or endless ad budgets to filter his image with focus-grouped messaging,” Michael Scherer reports. “In preparation, his advisers have spent much of the past week drilling him for the big jump, which could make or break the momentum he has generated with his extravagant spending. In debate prep sessions, they have armed him with comebacks for the inevitable attacks on his enormous wealth and past record, while also coaching him to move beyond his sometimes distant, wonky and diffidently logical public persona. ...

"Wary of Bloomberg's rise in the polls, his rivals, with far more debate experience and Democratic longevity, have made clear that they will not go easy on the newcomer. [Sanders] spent Tuesday in Reno, Nev., denouncing Bloomberg's campaign as an example of 'oligarchy, not democracy.' [Biden] has been boasting for days about his desire to confront Bloomberg in person because he cannot compete with the billionaire's advertising budget. 'At least now primary voters curious about how each candidate will take on Donald Trump can get a live demonstration of how we each take on an egomaniac billionaire,' [Warren] warned...

"Bloomberg's rise in polling comes as he faces a barrage of negative news coverage, some of it promoted by rival campaigns. He has had to again address allegations that he made vulgar and sexist comments, his past defense of targeting stop-and-frisk police policies to black and Latino neighborhoods in New York, and an interview in which he blamed the 2008 financial crisis on politicians who had pushed to end racially discriminatory mortgage-lending policies known as 'redlining.' Bloomberg's past political leanings — he re-registered as a Democrat only in 2018 — and his refusal to file a financial disclosure or release his tax returns before the debate, even as he is self-financing his campaign, also could come into play Wednesday. A spokesman for his campaign said the financial disclosure would be filed by March 20, and Howard Wolfson, a senior adviser to the campaign, has previously said Bloomberg would release his tax returns, though no date has been set.”

Senior Bloomberg campaign adviser Timothy O'Brien said the billionaire will sell his business, Bloomberg LP, if he wins the presidency. “There will be no confusion about any of his financial holdings,” O'Brien told CNN. “We will be 180 degrees away from where Donald Trump is on these issues because Donald Trump is a walking financial conflict of interest.”

Retired ABC News anchor Sam Donaldson's endorsement of Bloomberg annoyed practicing journalists.

“Donaldson’s open partisanship has few precedents among leading national TV news figures, and raises several journalistic questions: Does a journalist’s vow of objectivity (or at least neutrality and balance) extend beyond his or her working years? Is a retired journalist subject to the same kinds of ethical restraints as a working one, such as not endorsing candidates and not contributing to political causes and campaigns?” writes Paul Farhi. “Donaldson, 85, says no. Since he no longer has any role in reporting or shaping the news, he believes he’s entitled to express his opinions about, well, everything.”

Sanders said he won't release any more medical records.

“We have released ... quite as much as any other candidate has,” Sanders said last night during a CNN town hall. “I think we have released a detailed report and I'm comfortable with what we have done. And, by the way, if you think I'm not in good health, come out with me on the campaign trail and I'll let you introduce me to the three or four rallies a day that we do.”

He also rejected a potential health-care compromise.

Sanders distanced himself from Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez’s “recent suggestion that compromising on health care would be acceptable, arguing that his Medicare-for-all plan is ‘already a compromise,’” Sean Sullivan reports. Last week, Ocasio-Cortez told HuffPost that some flexibility on the proposal was possible. “A president can’t wave a magic wand and pass any legislation they want,” she said. “The worst-case scenario? We compromise deeply and we end up getting a public option. Is that a nightmare? I don’t think so.”

And the Sanders camp plans to request a partial recount of the Iowa caucuses.

“The announcement came as the results further narrowed on Tuesday, following a canvass of a small subset of precincts,” Isaac Stanley-Becker reports. “The revised figures did not change the allocation of delegates to the national convention. Still, they just barely shifted projected support at the state convention, which is typically the metric used to name a winner. The Iowa Democratic Party said [Buttigieg] would claim 563.207 state delegate equivalents, or SDEs, while Sanders (I-Vt.) would claim 563.127. What had been a difference of 2.774 shrank to 0.08.”

Klobuchar is scrambling to turn her moment into something more.

“Her staffers spent hours over the weekend hashing out a strategy for Super Tuesday, debating whether it’s worthwhile to compete in big, delegate-rich states like Texas and California,” Annie Linskey, Jenna Johnson and Holly Bailey report. “Some advisers want her to focus instead on independent-minded states that aren’t overly liberal, like Maine and Tennessee, because they might be receptive to her centrist message. But those states, of course, yield much fewer delegates. ... Klobuchar’s home state votes on Super Tuesday. She is adding staff in Minnesota as she battles with Buttigieg and Warren for the white, college-educated voters who fuel their campaigns.” As one adviser put it: “We’re putting the airplane together as we’re flying it.”

Buttigieg clapped back at Rush Limbaugh's homophobic attacks.

During his own town hall on CNN last night, Buttigieg offered “some of his most fiery responses yet to Limbaugh's assertion that President Trump told him not to apologize for saying that Americans wouldn't elect ‘a gay guy kissing his husband on the debate stage,’” Chelsea Janes reports. “Limbaugh, whom Trump recently awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom, doubled down on those comments Monday when he told listeners ‘Hell, the president even called me about this! He said, “Rush, I just got to tell you something. Never apologize. Don’t ever apologize.”’ Trump recently said he would have no trouble voting for a gay candidate. Buttigieg said he can’t take Trump at his word. ‘Not if he’s sending out his supporters to talk in this way. Look, the idea of the likes of Rush Limbaugh or Donald Trump lecturing anybody on family values,’ Buttigieg said. ‘Sorry, but one thing about my marriage is it’s never involved me having to send hush money to a porn star after cheating on my spouse.’”

A watchdog group claims Buttigieg and a super PAC improperly coordinated.

“In the complaint, filed Tuesday with the Federal Election Commission, the Campaign Legal Center alleged that Buttigieg’s campaign improperly accepted more than $639,000 in contributions, in violation of federal rules barring candidates from coordinating with independent groups that can raise and spend unlimited amounts of money,” Michelle Ye Hee Lee reports. “The complaint centers on a tweet by Buttigieg senior strategist Michael Halle analyzing the strengths of a particular campaign message in Nevada, and a subsequent ad campaign in that state by VoteVets that appeared to follow the strategy outlined in the tweet.”

Buttigieg was forced to clarify that comedian Keegan-Michael Key hasn’t endorsed him.

“Key appeared with Buttigieg on Saturday to drum up voter support at his Henderson, Nev., field office. The gaffe did not attract much attention. However, it was not the first time the Buttigieg campaign overstated having a tie with a prominent African American figure, or black business,” ABC News reports.

As Super Tuesday looms, rural California’s delegate gold mine is suddenly a big deal.

“Buttigieg landed in this small Central Valley city of 74,000, addressing an excited crowd of 700 Stanislaus County Democrats ... Many said [they] couldn’t believe their luck, not after decades of presidential candidates ignoring California’s inland areas. ‘I’ve lived in California my whole life, and I’ve never seen a presidential candidate,’ said Kathy Causey, a [lifelong Democrat],” Politico reports. “Buttigieg’s road trip into the region John Steinbeck once described as ‘America’s Breadbasket’ underscores how candidates are going to far-flung regions of the state to mine for delegate gold in a competitive Democratic primary. ... California’s primary rules award delegates proportionally by congressional district, meaning that candidates know they must essentially run their ground game ... ‘in 53 different states,’ the number of congressional districts in California.”

The Trump campaign hired a Cambridge Analytica alum.

The move is “likely to raise alarms among Trump critics and data privacy advocates who worry the president will push the technological envelope to get reelected in 2020,” Politico reports. “Matt Oczkowski, who served as head of product at Cambridge before it went bankrupt and shut down in 2018, is helping oversee the Trump campaign’s data program ... People familiar with the hire say he will devote his time to data-focused projects like determining where Trump and surrogates ought to campaign in person, figuring out which states are the best targets on Trump’s path to victory, and targeting media buys. Oczkowski has privately said he plans on using traditional data modeling rather than psychographics, the targeting of voters based upon their personality or behavior.”

---

The new world order

More than 2,000 have died of the coronavirus in China, but the nation is growing optimistic.

“Chinese leader Xi Jinping is striking an increasingly confident note that the country can control the coronavirus outbreak and manage the economic and social fallout as some Chinese health experts predict a peak in infections by the end of the month,” Gerry Shih reports. “Chinese leaders, eager to kick-start economic activity, have dismantled some highway checkpoints while businesses have begun to reopen. As of Wednesday, restrictions on personal mobility remained tight, suggesting wariness about rising infections. ...

“China on Wednesday reported new case numbers continuing to decline, but international experts, including U.S. National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases director Anthony Fauci, say they are wary of declaring that the pace of worldwide infections is slowing. ... China tallied a total of 1,749 new infections and 136 deaths through the end of Tuesday, making the cumulative total 74,185 infections and 2,004 deaths — the overwhelming majority still occurring in central Hubei province. Hong Kong reported its second death, a 70-year-old man.”

A machine sprays disinfectant at the entrance of a pork meat hall inside a wholesale market for agricultural products in Beijing. (Tingshu Wang/Reuters)

China expelled three Wall Street Journal reporters, blaming an opinion column.

“Deputy Bureau Chief Josh Chin and reporter Chao Deng, both American citizens, as well as reporter Philip Wen, an Australian national, have been ordered to leave the country within five days,” Anna Fifield reports. The Foreign Ministry has been criticizing the Journal since it published a coronavirus-related column on Feb. 3 by Walter Russell Mead, a professor at Bard College, under the headline “China Is the Real Sick Man of Asia.”

The move came after the U.S. designated major Chinese media outlets as government entities.

The Xinhua News Agency, China Global Television Network, China Radio International, China Daily and the People’s Daily will now be treated as diplomatic outposts of the Chinese government, subject to the same constraints. The move is the latest in a series of U.S. efforts to tackle China’s influence in the United States. (Fifield, Carol Morello and Emily Rauhala)

The Trump administration accused a Russian company of helping Venezuela export oil.

“The Trump administration directed its ‘maximum pressure’ campaign in Venezuela toward Russia on Tuesday, announcing sanctions against the trading and marketing arm of Rosneft, the state-controlled Russian oil giant that has taken over an increasing share of Venezuela’s own state-owned oil industry and reaped huge profits from exporting its crude,” Karen DeYoung and Anthony Faiola report. “Swiss-registered Rosneft Trading has ‘propped up the [Venezuelan] oil sector and actively tried to evade’ existing U.S. sanctions against those doing business with the Venezuelan government of Nicolás Maduro, according to [an administration official] ... The measures do not cover the parent company, Rosneft Oil. Its chairman, Igor Sechin, is a close ally of Russian President Vladimir Putin ... But U.S. officials said the steps would have a global effect. Although the sanctions directly target only property and interests held in the United States by the trading subsidiary and its chairman, Didier Casimiro, ‘most banks, whether U.S.-based or not,’ look to the U.S. measures ‘to guide their risk appetite,’ one of the officials said.”

The death of a young girl in Mexico sparked new outrage in a nation plagued by femicide.

Seven-year-old Fátima Aldrighett "disappeared Feb. 11 in the Mexico City neighborhood of Xochimilco, where she was waiting to be picked up from school. Four days later, her body was found naked in a plastic bag," Kevin Sieff reports. “Fátima’s killing is the latest in a string of brutal crimes against girls and women stirring enormous public outrage directed at Mexico’s president and other top officials. Last week, Ingrid Escamilla, 25, was found stabbed to death and partially skinned. That crime prompted a wave of protests in Mexico City; President Andrés Manuel López Obrador was accused of brushing them off. In the midst of a fundraising campaign linked to the sale of the presidential plane, he chastised a reporter who asked him about the attacks on women: ‘I don’t want femicides to distract from the raffle.’”

An immigration judge granted a Venezuelan father

entrance to the U.S. but sent his teen daughter to Mexico.

Officials “denied her claims that she was fleeing political repression and violence, even after they accepted the same claims from her father,” the AP reports. “The teenager, who is being identified by only her first name, Branyerly, is living alone in Matamoros, Mexico, across from Brownsville. U.S. border agents on Monday denied her request not to be sent back under the Trump administration’s so-called ‘Remain in Mexico’ program for migrants. ... ‘I already lived one nightmare in Venezuela and another here,’ Branyerly said.”

Boeing found debris in the fuel tanks of undelivered 737 Max jets.

This is a “potential safety hazard and yet another problem for the company as it tries to get the planes airborne again after two deadly crashes,” Ian Duncan reports. Debris “often includes tools or parts left behind when planes leave the production line. [A] Boeing spokesman said dealing with the debris is not likely to further delay the work of getting the planes off the ground.”

In Canada, anti-pipeline protesters have paralyzed the nation’s rail system.

“Demonstrators across the country have joined the blockades in support of the hereditary chiefs of the Wet’suwet’en Nation in British Columbia, who oppose the construction of a natural gas pipeline through their territory. They’ve brought most freight and passenger rail service to a standstill,” Amanda Coletta reports. Underlying the dispute are long-standing questions over land title, and who speaks for Canada’s indigenous people. In response, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau called for “dialogue and mutual respect.”

A storm brought mass flooding to the U.K. Brits asked, “Where’s Boris?”

“The Met Office called the thing Dennis, and the second-strongest ‘bomb cyclone' on record in the North Atlantic wreaked havoc across Britain," William Booth reports. "And with flood warnings still pinging on the telly like traffic alerts during a London rush hour, the storm is now raining on Prime Minister Boris Johnson, too, who is facing a torrent of criticism for his government's response. 'Where the bloody hell is Boris?' the Sun newspaper asked in a front-page headline. ... The hashtag #wheresBoris was trending in Britain on Twitter. The flooding begot by Storm Dennis is responsible for at least three deaths so far, as the waters continue to rise. ... The Labour Party said Johnson's decision not to visit the hard-hit areas or hold a cabinet-level emergency meeting was 'a disgrace.'... It didn't help that when Storm Dennis hit, Johnson was spending the weekend at the 115-room lakeside mansion in Kent known as Chevening."

---

Quote of the day

"It's dangerous not to talk to your enemies." – Sen. Chris Murphy (D-Conn.) on why he met with Iran's foreign minister \(Michael Brice-Saddler and Reis Thebault\)

---

Social media speed read

A video showed Bloomberg describing transgender people as "he, she, or it," upsetting many activists on the left:

Charlotte Clymer 🏳️‍🌈 🗳️ @cmclymer · 5h
I am heartbroken and infuriated that @MikeBloomberg felt it appropriate to refer to trans people as "it" and trans women as "men in dresses". His remarks are cruel, inexcusable and enable violence and discrimination against trans + non-binary folks.
(1/6)buzzfeednews.com/article/domini...

Mike Bloomberg Referred To Transgender Peo...
Bloomberg suggested transgender rights would sink Democratic campaigns in comments recorded last
buzzfeednews.com

Charlotte Clymer 🏳️‍🌈 🗳️ @cmclymer

This comes two weeks after @MikeBloomberg was found to have made similar remarks in 2016. These latest comments were less than a year ago. It is disturbing that a leading Democratic presidential candidate would casually dehumanize trans people and degrade our existence.

👍 924 1:32 AM - Feb 19, 2020

💬 100 people are talking about this

Previewing a possible flashpoint in tonight's debate, Warren accused Bloomberg of using "racist justifications" to defend "stop and frisk":

Bloomberg's campaign manager kept his focus on Sanders:

Ted Cruz made fun of a Bloomberg News headline about Bloomberg:

Ted Cruz
@tedcruz

It's almost as if he owns the media.
twitter.com/yashar/status/...

Yashar Ali  @yashar

Bloomberg campaign says it's a two-man race for the nomination per Bloomberg the news organization owned and controlled by Bloomberg

Bloomberg

Subscribe

Politics

Bloomberg Campaign Says It's a Two-Man Race for the Nomination

By Mark Niquette

February 18, 2020, 4:14 PM EST

- ▶ Aide makes prediction before candidate has appeared on ballot
- ▶ Bloomberg to fight for first votes on Super Tuesday, March 3

 15.9K 12:03 AM - Feb 19, 2020

 5.283 people are talking about this

An NBC reporter noted quite a paradox in the new NBC-WSJ poll:

Ali Vitali
@allvitali

The top 3 unpopular qualities for a presidential candidate all apply to the very candidate leading this same poll (Sanders). What a world. twitter.com/mmurraypolitic...

Mark Murray
@mmurraypolitics

Replying to @mmurraypolitics

Most unpopular qualities for a prez candidate in the new NBC/WSJ poll (combined reservations + very uncomfortable):

Socialist: 67%
Heart attack in past year: 57%
75+: 53%
Self-funder: 41%
Under 40: 40%
Gay/lesbian: 27%
Woman: 14%

Feb 14-17, RVs, MOE +/- 3.3%

 213 10:10 PM - Feb 18, 2020

 155 people are talking about this

Congressional Democrats blasted Trump's pardons and commutations:

Maxine Waters
@RepMaxineWaters

Wow! Trump told us he could stand on 5th Ave, shoot someone & get away w/ it. Now we know he can sit in the Oval Office, & w/ the stroke of a pen, commute & pardon sentences for crooks & criminals while incarcerated individuals claiming innocence & asking for pardons are ignored!

 4,342 10:23 PM - Feb 18, 2020

 1,585 people are talking about this

And the liberal uncle of the just-married Stephen Miller, the White House adviser who oversees immigration policy, directed his wedding present to an organization that works with refugees:

Videos of the day

Trump effusively praised Bloomberg seven years ago:

 JM Rieger
@RiegerReport

Donald Trump on Mike Bloomberg on March 25, 2013:

"He's made a tremendous fortune, he's a brilliant guy ... he's got some, you know, really amazing ideas, he's done a very, very good job as the mayor of New York"

 6  12:03 AM - Feb 19, 2020

 See JM Rieger's other Tweets

James Corden previewed the Democratic debate:

 Bernie Goes After Bloomberg Ahead Of Vega...

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Carolyn Hax for Post columnist Carolyn Hax's latest advice column every day. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Trump's clemency spree shows white-collar felons it's more about who you know than what you did
Date: Wednesday, February 19, 2020 8:47:52 AM

COMMITTED TO
AFFORDABLE CARE
FOR THE HEALTH OF AMERICA<sup>SM</sup>

BlueCross
BlueShield
Association

Powered by  LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Partnership for America's Health Care Future

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

Trump's clemency spree shows white-collar felons it's more about who you know than what you did

Billionaire investor Nelson Peltz hosted a fundraiser at his $95 million home in Florida on Saturday night that raised $10 million for President Trump's reelection campaign. On Tuesday, the White House listed Peltz in a news release as one of the people supporting Trump's pardon of Michael Milken.

Milken, “the junk bond king” who inspired Gordon Gekko’s “greed is good” character in the movie “Wall Street,” served two years in prison after pleading guilty in 1990 to six felony counts, including securities fraud, mail fraud and aiding in the filing of a false tax return.

Other megadonors, including casino mogul Sheldon Adelson, were also on the White House’s list of individuals supporting the Milken pardon. So was the president’s personal lawyer, Rudy Giuliani, as well as Fox Business host Maria Bartiromo and Fox News owner Rupert Murdoch. Secretary of Transportation Elaine Chao, who is married to Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), and House Minority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R-Calif.) were among the 33 names listed. Steven Mnuchin was not on the list, but the Wall Street Journal notes that Milken has cultivated a friendship with the Treasury secretary and even flew him from Washington to California last year on his private jet.

“You know, oftentimes — pretty much all the time — I really rely on the recommendations of people that know them,” Trump told reporters as he prepared to board Air Force One at Joint Base Andrews. He was explaining why, and how, he’d just issued seven pardons and four commutations.

The big-name endorsements rolled out by the White House press office gave the distinct impression that these presidential decisions to show mercy were driven as much by whom the convicted felons know as what they were convicted for.

The head of the Justice Department's pardon office during the first two years of the Trump administration told The Washington Post recently that he quit last year because the White House largely ignored the formal process in favor of taking recommendations from celebrities, political allies and Fox News.

Ariel Friedler is one of the least famous beneficiaries of Trump's Tuesday pardons. The former chief executive of Simplicity pleaded guilty in 2014 to conspiring to hack into the computer systems of two competitors to improve his company's software development and sales strategy. Chris Christie, who advises the president, also takes on legal clients. Friedler is one of them. Records show Friedler never even applied to the pardon office at the Justice Department. But the White House listed the former New Jersey governor as someone supporting Trump's full pardon.

Edward DeBartolo Jr., the billionaire former owner of the San Francisco 49ers, pleaded guilty in 1998 for failing to tell authorities when ex-Louisiana governor Edwin Edwards (D) sought a bribe for a riverboat casino license. On the White House's list of individuals advocating for his pardon were New England Patriots owner Robert Kraft and Dallas Cowboys owner Jerry Jones. Both of them gave a million bucks to Trump's inaugural committee.

Content from Partnership for America's Health Care Future

We Can't Afford Medicare for All

American families should not be forced to foot the bill for Medicare for All. And any new government insurance system would force them to pay more to wait longer for worse care.

The president also pardoned David Safavian, a senior official in the George W. Bush administration who was convicted of obstructing a federal investigation and making false statements related to his dealings with the lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Abramoff took him on a luxury golf trip to Scotland and London, and Safavian helped him with business before the General Services Administration. Safavian now works for the American Conservative Union Foundation and frequently tweets support for the president. His list of endorsers includes Republican lobbyist Matt Schlapp, who chairs the American Conservative Union, and his wife Mercedes Schlapp, who works on the president's reelection campaign and spent nearly two years as the director of strategic communications in the Trump White House.

Former New York police commissioner Bernie Kerik went to prison for tax fraud and lying to White House officials when George W. Bush was preparing to nominate him to be secretary of homeland security. Kerik would later withdraw. His pardon was pushed for by Giuliani, who was Kerik's boss as mayor of New York. Fox News personalities Andrew Napolitano and Geraldo Rivera were also named by the White House as advocates. So was attorney Sidney Powell, who represents former Trump national security adviser Michael Flynn.

The president seems to have something of a soft spot for white-collar criminals. For someone who has spent months professing to be so profoundly concerned about corruption in Ukraine, Trump signaled with these pardons and commutations that he's far less worried about taking a hard line against corruption here at home.

Here are four other takeaways from Trump's latest announcements:

1) Fox News remains immensely influential.

As he explained why he commuted former Democratic Illinois governor Rod Blagojevich's sentence, Trump told reporters: "I watched his wife on television."

Patti Blagojevich made at least seven appearances over the past two years on Fox News, appearing on the shows of Tucker Carlson, Laura Ingraham and Jeanine Pirro, to praise the president and plead for his mercy. (Blagojevich was also a contestant on Trump's show "The Celebrity Apprentice" in 2010.)

Kerik, a frequent Mar-a-Lago guest, appeared on Fox News as recently as

Monday night.

Angela Stanton was pardoned for her role in a car-stealing ring. The former “Real Housewives of Atlanta” star has previously appeared on Fox News, where she’s praised the president.

Former Illinois governor Rod Blagojevich arrives at his home in Chicago early Wednesday morning after Trump ordered his release from a Colorado prison. (Paul Beaty/AP)

2) The perceived enemy of Trump’s enemy is his friend.

The president said the 14-year prison sentence for Blagojevich, who was caught on a wiretap talking about trying to sell Barack Obama’s vacated Senate seat to the highest bidder, was “ridiculous.”

“It was a prosecution by the same people – Comey, Fitzpatrick – the same group,” Trump told reporters on Tuesday. Last year, Trump also falsely blamed Blagojevich’s treatment on “the Comey gang and all these sleazebags.”

In fact, however, former FBI director James Comey was in the private sector during Blagojevich’s prosecution. And “Fitzpatrick” seems to be a mistaken reference to Patrick Fitzgerald, who as U.S. attorney in Chicago did prosecute Blagojevich and is indeed good friends with Comey.

3) Trump is clearly not going to let up his attacks on the Justice Department.

Trump is deeply animated by his sense of grievance and victimhood. He told reporters on Tuesday as he discussed the pardons that he partially agreed with Attorney General Bill Barr that his tweets about active criminal cases do make his job more difficult. But he said that won't stop him. "Social media, for me, has been very important because it gives me a voice," said Trump, who as president controls the biggest bully pulpit in the world and has an enormous press corps that hangs on his every word.

Trump doesn't appear to see himself as "above the law." Instead, he seems to believe he is the law. "I'm allowed to be totally involved," he told reporters, as he defended his tweets about the case of his longtime adviser Roger Stone. "I'm actually, I guess, the chief law enforcement officer of the country. But I've chosen not to be involved."

The president clearly feels emboldened by the Senate's vote to acquit him. "The pardons and commutations followed Trump's moves to punish witnesses in his impeachment trial, publicly intervene in a pending legal case to urge leniency for a friend, attack a federal judge, accuse a juror of bias and threaten to sue his own government for investigating him,"

Toluse Olorunnipa and Beth Reinhard report.

Barr has told people close to Trump — both inside and outside the White House — that he is considering quitting over Trump’s tweets about Justice Department investigations, three administration officials told Matt Zapposky, Josh Dawsey, John Wagner and Rachel Weiner: “So far, Trump has defied Barr’s requests, both public and private, to keep quiet on matters of federal law enforcement. It was not immediately clear Tuesday whether Barr had made his posture known directly to Trump. The administration officials said Barr seemed to be sharing his position with advisers in hopes the president would get the message that he should stop weighing in publicly on the Justice Department’s ongoing criminal investigations. ‘He has his limits,’ said one person familiar with Barr’s thinking ...

“The standoff between Trump and Barr intensified Tuesday when Trump declared in a string of early morning tweets that he might sue those involved in the special counsel investigation into his 2016 campaign and suggested that [Stone], his friend convicted of lying to Congress in that probe, deserved a new trial. Hours later, a Justice Department official said prosecutors had filed a sealed motion in court arguing the opposite and that they had Barr’s personal approval to do so. Barr had a previously scheduled lunch with the White House counsel Tuesday and was still the attorney general by day’s end — indicating that the president’s moves that day were not enough to push him to resign.”

4) Follow the money.

“Paul Pogue, a construction company owner who pleaded guilty to underpaying his taxes by $473,000 and received three years probation, was issued a full pardon and clemency by the president,” the Daily Beast notes. “According to FEC filings, Pogue’s family has donated hundreds of thousands of dollars in direct contributions and in-kind air travel to the Trump Victory Committee. Beginning in August 2019, Ben Pogue—CEO of Pogue Construction and son of Paul Pogue—and his wife Ashleigh made over $200,000 in contributions to the campaign.

“In August alone, Ben Pogue donated $85,000 to Trump Victory while Ashleigh Pogue contributed $50,000 that month. The following month, Ben Pogue made an in-kind air travel contribution of $75,404.40. The couple also made several large donations to the Republican National Committee and each donated $5,600 to Donald Trump for President Inc. On the day of their first donation to the Trump campaign, Ashleigh posted an Instagram photo of her and her husband posing with Donald Trump Jr. and his girlfriend, Kimberly Guilfoyle, at the Hamptons.

“Prior to the Pogues’ sudden significant donating spree to Trump and the Republicans, the couple was not seen as big campaign spenders, having donated a few thousand dollars for Paul Ryan’s congressional campaign in 2017 and $5,400 for former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum’s 2016 Republican presidential run. Notably, one of the advocates for Pogue’s clemency: Santorum, who is now a CNN contributor.”

Listen to the podcast.

Every weekday, a few hours before this newsletter hits your inbox, I also put out a podcast called The Daily 202's Big Idea with the biggest stories and a preview of what will be in the email. Subscribe and listen wherever you get your podcasts. The audio briefing is always available here.

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost's essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

---

2020 watch

A new Washington Post-ABC News poll shows Bernie Sanders opening a significant national lead.

“Joe Biden, who led Sanders in a Post-ABC national poll in January, has seen a sharp drop in his support after finishing fourth in the Iowa caucuses and fifth in the New Hampshire primary,” Dan Balz and Scott

Clement report. Biden is now in a battle for second place with Mike Bloomberg and Elizabeth Warren. Pete Buttigieg is in single digits nationally, roughly even with Amy Klobuchar.

“By a wide margin, 58 percent to 38 percent, Democrats say they would rather nominate a candidate who can defeat Trump than one who agrees with them on major issues. ... In the new poll, Sanders is seen as the most electable, cited by 30 percent of Democratic leaners as best situated to beat Trump. Bloomberg is cited by 18 percent on this question, with no other Democrat close to double digits. ... In the past month, Biden has lost support among three key constituency groups: African Americans, older voters and whites without college degrees, previously the bulwarks of his campaign. ...

“Sanders has seen a big jump in support among voters under age 50 and is now backed by 50 percent of that group, up from 34 percent in January. He holds a 3-to-1 lead over his rivals among these voters. Sanders also has more than doubled his support among black voters and has gained among whites without college degrees. ... Bloomberg’s growth was fueled by more support among older voters and among white voters with college degrees. Buttigieg, Warren and Klobuchar saw no significant shifts in their coalitions. ...

“In a measure of how Democrats see Sanders as a candidate against Trump, 72 percent say they believe he would defeat the president. Among Democrats, 69 percent think Bloomberg would win against Trump, and 68 percent say that of Biden. ... If he were to become the nominee, about half of all Americans say it makes no difference in their vote that Sanders is a socialist, including about 7 in 10 Democrats. But nearly 4 in 10 adults say that fact makes them more likely to oppose him, including 37 percent of independents and 79 percent of Republicans. Just under 1 in 10 adults say it makes them more likely to support him. ... The president’s approval rating stands at 43 percent, with 53 percent disapproving, showing no real change in the past month.”

Young voters are Sanders's base, but he is competitive across racial, ideological and educational groups

Q: Please tell me whom you'd vote for in the primary or caucus in your state. Which candidate would you lean toward? (Among Democrats and Democratic-leaning independent registered voters)

Note: Candidates with 10% or less overall support and “no opinion” not shown.

Source: Feb. 14-17, 2020, Washington Post-ABC News poll of 408 Democratic and Democratic-leaning registered voters, with an error margin of +/- 6 percentage points.

BRITTANY RENEE MAYES/THE WASHINGTON POST

Tonight's debate requires Bloomberg to step out of his expensive comfort zone.

“When he steps onto the debate stage in Las Vegas for his first hostile and uncontrolled campaign test [at 9 p.m. Eastern on NBC and MSNBC], there will be no management decisions to make, teleprompters to lean on or endless ad budgets to filter his image with focus-grouped messaging,” Michael Scherer reports. “In preparation, his advisers have spent much of the past week drilling him for the big jump, which could make or break the momentum he has generated with his extravagant spending. In debate prep sessions, they have armed him with comebacks for the inevitable attacks on his enormous wealth and past record, while also coaching him to move beyond his sometimes distant, wonky and diffidently logical public persona. ...

"Wary of Bloomberg's rise in the polls, his rivals, with far more debate experience and Democratic longevity, have made clear that they will not go easy on the newcomer. [Sanders] spent Tuesday in Reno, Nev., denouncing Bloomberg's campaign as an example of 'oligarchy, not democracy.' [Biden] has been boasting for days about his desire to confront Bloomberg in person because he cannot compete with the billionaire's advertising budget. 'At least now primary voters curious about how each candidate will take on Donald Trump can get a live demonstration of how we each take on an egomaniac billionaire,' [Warren] warned...

"Bloomberg's rise in polling comes as he faces a barrage of negative news coverage, some of it promoted by rival campaigns. He has had to again address allegations that he made vulgar and sexist comments, his past defense of targeting stop-and-frisk police policies to black and Latino neighborhoods in New York, and an interview in which he blamed the 2008 financial crisis on politicians who had pushed to end racially discriminatory mortgage-lending policies known as 'redlining.' Bloomberg's past political leanings — he re-registered as a Democrat only in 2018 — and his refusal to file a financial disclosure or release his tax returns before the debate, even as he is self-financing his campaign, also could come into play Wednesday. A spokesman for his campaign said the financial disclosure would be filed by March 20, and Howard Wolfson, a senior adviser to the campaign, has previously said Bloomberg would release his tax returns, though no date has been set.”

Senior Bloomberg campaign adviser Timothy O'Brien said the billionaire will sell his business, Bloomberg LP, if he wins the presidency. “There will be no confusion about any of his financial holdings,” O'Brien told CNN. “We will be 180 degrees away from where Donald Trump is on these issues because Donald Trump is a walking financial conflict of interest.”

Retired ABC News anchor Sam Donaldson's endorsement of Bloomberg annoyed practicing journalists.

“Donaldson’s open partisanship has few precedents among leading national TV news figures, and raises several journalistic questions: Does a journalist’s vow of objectivity (or at least neutrality and balance) extend beyond his or her working years? Is a retired journalist subject to the same kinds of ethical restraints as a working one, such as not endorsing candidates and not contributing to political causes and campaigns?” writes Paul Farhi. “Donaldson, 85, says no. Since he no longer has any role in reporting or shaping the news, he believes he’s entitled to express his opinions about, well, everything.”

Sanders said he won't release any more medical records.

“We have released ... quite as much as any other candidate has,” Sanders said last night during a CNN town hall. “I think we have released a detailed report and I'm comfortable with what we have done. And, by the way, if you think I'm not in good health, come out with me on the campaign trail and I'll let you introduce me to the three or four rallies a day that we do.”

He also rejected a potential health-care compromise.

Sanders distanced himself from Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez’s “recent suggestion that compromising on health care would be acceptable, arguing that his Medicare-for-all plan is ‘already a compromise,’” Sean Sullivan reports. Last week, Ocasio-Cortez told HuffPost that some flexibility on the proposal was possible. “A president can’t wave a magic wand and pass any legislation they want,” she said. “The worst-case scenario? We compromise deeply and we end up getting a public option. Is that a nightmare? I don’t think so.”

And the Sanders camp plans to request a partial recount of the Iowa caucuses.

“The announcement came as the results further narrowed on Tuesday, following a recanvass of a small subset of precincts,” Isaac Stanley-Becker reports. “The revised figures did not change the allocation of delegates to the national convention. Still, they just barely shifted projected support at the state convention, which is typically the metric used to name a winner. The Iowa Democratic Party said [Buttigieg] would claim 563.207 state delegate equivalents, or SDEs, while Sanders (I-Vt.) would claim 563.127. What had been a difference of 2.774 shrank to 0.08.”

Klobuchar is scrambling to turn her moment into something more.

“Her staffers spent hours over the weekend hashing out a strategy for Super Tuesday, debating whether it’s worthwhile to compete in big, delegate-rich states like Texas and California,” Annie Linskey, Jenna Johnson and Holly Bailey report. “Some advisers want her to focus instead on independent-minded states that aren’t overly liberal, like Maine and Tennessee, because they might be receptive to her centrist message. But those states, of course, yield much fewer delegates. ... Klobuchar’s home state votes on Super Tuesday. She is adding staff in Minnesota as she battles with Buttigieg and Warren for the white, college-educated voters who fuel their campaigns.” As one adviser put it: “We’re putting the airplane together as we’re flying it.”

Buttigieg clapped back at Rush Limbaugh's homophobic attacks.

During his own town hall on CNN last night, Buttigieg offered “some of his most fiery responses yet to Limbaugh's assertion that President Trump told him not to apologize for saying that Americans wouldn't elect ‘a gay guy kissing his husband on the debate stage,’” Chelsea Janes reports. “Limbaugh, whom Trump recently awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom, doubled down on those comments Monday when he told listeners ‘Hell, the president even called me about this! He said, “Rush, I just got to tell you something. Never apologize. Don’t ever apologize.”’ Trump recently said he would have no trouble voting for a gay candidate. Buttigieg said he can’t take Trump at his word. ‘Not if he’s sending out his supporters to talk in this way. Look, the idea of the likes of Rush Limbaugh or Donald Trump lecturing anybody on family values,’ Buttigieg said. ‘Sorry, but one thing about my marriage is it’s never involved me having to send hush money to a porn star after cheating on my spouse.’”

A watchdog group claims Buttigieg and a super PAC improperly coordinated.

“In the complaint, filed Tuesday with the Federal Election Commission, the Campaign Legal Center alleged that Buttigieg’s campaign improperly accepted more than $639,000 in contributions, in violation of federal rules barring candidates from coordinating with independent groups that can raise and spend unlimited amounts of money,” Michelle Ye Hee Lee reports. “The complaint centers on a tweet by Buttigieg senior strategist Michael Halle analyzing the strengths of a particular campaign message in Nevada, and a subsequent ad campaign in that state by VoteVets that appeared to follow the strategy outlined in the tweet.”

Buttigieg was forced to clarify that comedian Keegan-

Michael Key hasn't endorsed him.

“Key appeared with Buttigieg on Saturday to drum up voter support at his Henderson, Nev., field office. The gaffe did not attract much attention. However, it was not the first time the Buttigieg campaign overstated having a tie with a prominent African American figure, or black business,” ABC News reports.

As Super Tuesday looms, rural California's delegate gold mine is suddenly a big deal.

“Buttigieg landed in this small Central Valley city of 74,000, addressing an excited crowd of 700 Stanislaus County Democrats ... Many said [they] couldn't believe their luck, not after decades of presidential candidates ignoring California's inland areas. ‘I've lived in California my whole life, and I've never seen a presidential candidate,’ said Kathy Causey, a [lifelong Democrat],” Politico reports. “Buttigieg's road trip into the region John Steinbeck once described as ‘America's Breadbasket’ underscores how candidates are going to far-flung regions of the state to mine for delegate gold in a competitive Democratic primary. ... California's primary rules award delegates proportionally by congressional district, meaning that candidates know they must essentially run their ground game ... ‘in 53 different states,’ the number of congressional districts in California.”

The Trump campaign hired a Cambridge Analytica alum.

The move is “likely to raise alarms among Trump critics and data privacy advocates who worry the president will push the technological envelope to get reelected in 2020,” Politico reports. “Matt Oczkowski, who served as head of product at Cambridge before it went bankrupt and shut down in 2018, is helping oversee the Trump campaign's data program ... People familiar with the hire say he will devote his time to data-focused projects like determining where Trump and surrogates ought to campaign in person, figuring out which states are the best targets on Trump's path to victory, and targeting media buys. Oczkowski has privately said he plans on using traditional data modeling rather than psychographics, the targeting of voters based upon their personality or behavior.”

---

The new world order

More than 2,000 have died of the coronavirus in China, but the nation is growing optimistic.

“Chinese leader Xi Jinping is striking an increasingly confident note that the country can control the coronavirus outbreak and manage the economic and social fallout as some Chinese health experts predict a peak in infections by the end of the month,” Gerry Shih reports. “Chinese leaders, eager to kick-start economic activity, have dismantled some highway checkpoints while businesses have begun to reopen. As of Wednesday, restrictions on personal mobility remained tight, suggesting wariness about rising infections. ...

“China on Wednesday reported new case numbers continuing to decline, but international experts, including U.S. National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases director Anthony Fauci, say they are wary of declaring that the pace of worldwide infections is slowing. ... China tallied a total of 1,749 new infections and 136 deaths through the end of Tuesday, making the cumulative total 74,185 infections and 2,004 deaths — the overwhelming majority still occurring in central Hubei province. Hong Kong reported its second death, a 70-year-old man.”

A machine sprays disinfectant at the entrance of a pork meat hall inside a wholesale market for agricultural products in Beijing. (Tingshu Wang/Reuters)

China expelled three Wall Street Journal reporters, blaming an opinion column.

“Deputy Bureau Chief Josh Chin and reporter Chao Deng, both American citizens, as well as reporter Philip Wen, an Australian national, have been ordered to leave the country within five days,” Anna Fifield reports. The Foreign Ministry has been criticizing the Journal since it published a coronavirus-related column on Feb. 3 by Walter Russell Mead, a professor at Bard College, under the headline “China Is the Real Sick Man of Asia.”

The move came after the U.S. designated major Chinese media outlets as government entities.

The Xinhua News Agency, China Global Television Network, China Radio International, China Daily and the People’s Daily will now be treated as diplomatic outposts of the Chinese government, subject to the same constraints. The move is the latest in a series of U.S. efforts to tackle China’s influence in the United States. (Fifield, Carol Morello and Emily Rauhala)

The Trump administration accused a Russian company of helping Venezuela export oil.

“The Trump administration directed its ‘maximum pressure’ campaign in Venezuela toward Russia on Tuesday, announcing sanctions against the trading and marketing arm of Rosneft, the state-controlled Russian oil giant that has taken over an increasing share of Venezuela’s own state-owned oil industry and reaped huge profits from exporting its crude,” Karen DeYoung and Anthony Faiola report. “Swiss-registered Rosneft Trading has ‘propped up the [Venezuelan] oil sector and actively tried to evade’ existing U.S. sanctions against those doing business with the Venezuelan government of Nicolás Maduro, according to [an administration official] ... The measures do not cover the parent company, Rosneft Oil. Its chairman, Igor Sechin, is a close ally of Russian President Vladimir Putin ... But U.S. officials said the steps would have a global effect. Although the sanctions directly target only property and interests held in the United States by the trading subsidiary and its chairman, Didier Casimiro, ‘most banks, whether U.S.-based or not,’ look to the U.S. measures ‘to guide their risk appetite,’ one of the officials said.”

The death of a young girl in Mexico sparked new outrage in a nation plagued by femicide.

Seven-year-old Fátima Aldrighett "disappeared Feb. 11 in the Mexico City neighborhood of Xochimilco, where she was waiting to be picked up from school. Four days later, her body was found naked in a plastic bag," Kevin Sieff reports. “Fátima’s killing is the latest in a string of brutal crimes against girls and women stirring enormous public outrage directed at Mexico’s president and other top officials. Last week, Ingrid Escamilla, 25, was found stabbed to death and partially skinned. That crime prompted a wave of protests in Mexico City; President Andrés Manuel López Obrador was accused of brushing them off. In the midst of a fundraising campaign linked to the sale of the presidential plane, he chastised a reporter who asked him about the attacks on women: ‘I don’t want femicides to distract from the raffle.’”

An immigration judge granted a Venezuelan father

entrance to the U.S. but sent his teen daughter to Mexico.

Officials “denied her claims that she was fleeing political repression and violence, even after they accepted the same claims from her father,” the AP reports. “The teenager, who is being identified by only her first name, Branyerly, is living alone in Matamoros, Mexico, across from Brownsville. U.S. border agents on Monday denied her request not to be sent back under the Trump administration’s so-called ‘Remain in Mexico’ program for migrants. ... ‘I already lived one nightmare in Venezuela and another here,’ Branyerly said.”

Boeing found debris in the fuel tanks of undelivered 737 Max jets.

This is a “potential safety hazard and yet another problem for the company as it tries to get the planes airborne again after two deadly crashes,” Ian Duncan reports. Debris “often includes tools or parts left behind when planes leave the production line. [A] Boeing spokesman said dealing with the debris is not likely to further delay the work of getting the planes off the ground.”

In Canada, anti-pipeline protesters have paralyzed the nation’s rail system.

“Demonstrators across the country have joined the blockades in support of the hereditary chiefs of the Wet’suwet’en Nation in British Columbia, who oppose the construction of a natural gas pipeline through their territory. They’ve brought most freight and passenger rail service to a standstill,” Amanda Coletta reports. Underlying the dispute are long-standing questions over land title, and who speaks for Canada’s indigenous people. In response, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau called for “dialogue and mutual respect.”

A storm brought mass flooding to the U.K. Brits asked, “Where’s Boris?”

“The Met Office called the thing Dennis, and the second-strongest ‘bomb cyclone' on record in the North Atlantic wreaked havoc across Britain," William Booth reports. "And with flood warnings still pinging on the telly like traffic alerts during a London rush hour, the storm is now raining on Prime Minister Boris Johnson, too, who is facing a torrent of criticism for his government's response. 'Where the bloody hell is Boris?' the Sun newspaper asked in a front-page headline. ... The hashtag #wheresBoris was trending in Britain on Twitter. The flooding begot by Storm Dennis is responsible for at least three deaths so far, as the waters continue to rise. ... The Labour Party said Johnson's decision not to visit the hard-hit areas or hold a cabinet-level emergency meeting was 'a disgrace.' ... It didn't help that when Storm Dennis hit, Johnson was spending the weekend at the 115-room lakeside mansion in Kent known as Chevening."

---

Quote of the day

"It's dangerous not to talk to your enemies." – Sen. Chris Murphy (D-Conn.) on why he met with Iran's foreign minister \(Michael Brice-Saddler and Reis Thebault\)

---

Social media speed read

A video showed Bloomberg describing transgender people as "he, she, or it," upsetting many activists on the left:

Charlotte Clymer 🏳️‍🌈 🇺🇸 @cmclymer · 5h
I am heartbroken and infuriated that @MikeBloomberg felt it appropriate to refer to trans people as "it" and trans women as "men in dresses". His remarks are cruel, inexcusable and enable violence and discrimination against trans + non-binary folks.
(1/6)buzzfeednews.com/article/domini...

Mike Bloomberg Referred To Transgender Peo...
Bloomberg suggested transgender rights would sink Democratic campaigns in comments recorded last
buzzfeednews.com

Charlotte Clymer 🏳️‍🌈 🇺🇸 @cmclymer

This comes two weeks after @MikeBloomberg was found to have made similar remarks in 2016. These latest comments were less than a year ago. It is disturbing that a leading Democratic presidential candidate would casually dehumanize trans people and degrade our existence.

👍 924 1:32 AM - Feb 19, 2020

💬 100 people are talking about this

Previewing a possible flashpoint in tonight's debate, Warren accused Bloomberg of using "racist justifications" to defend "stop and frisk":

Bloomberg's campaign manager kept his focus on Sanders:

Ted Cruz made fun of a Bloomberg News headline about Bloomberg:

Ted Cruz
@tedcruz

It's almost as if he owns the media.
twitter.com/yashar/status/...

Yashar Ali  @yashar

Bloomberg campaign says it's a two-man race for the nomination per Bloomberg the news organization owned and controlled by Bloomberg

Bloomberg

Subscribe

Politics

Bloomberg Campaign Says It's a Two-Man Race for the Nomination

By Mark Niquette

February 18, 2020, 4:14 PM EST

- ▶ Aide makes prediction before candidate has appeared on ballot
- ▶ Bloomberg to fight for first votes on Super Tuesday, March 3

 15.9K 12:03 AM - Feb 19, 2020

 5.283 people are talking about this

An NBC reporter noted quite a paradox in the new NBC-WSJ poll:

Congressional Democrats blasted Trump's pardons and commutations:

And the liberal uncle of the just-married Stephen Miller, the White House adviser who oversees immigration policy, directed his wedding present to an organization that works with refugees:

Videos of the day

Trump effusively praised Bloomberg seven years ago:

 JM Rieger
@RiegerReport

Donald Trump on Mike Bloomberg on March 25, 2013:

"He's made a tremendous fortune, he's a brilliant guy ... he's got some, you know, really amazing ideas, he's done a very, very good job as the mayor of New York"

 6  12:03 AM - Feb 19, 2020

 See JM Rieger's other Tweets

James Corden previewed the Democratic debate:

 Bernie Goes After Bloomberg Ahead Of Vega...

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Carolyn Hax for Post columnist Carolyn Hax's latest advice column every day. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Trump's clemency spree shows white-collar felons it's more about who you know than what you did
Date: Wednesday, February 19, 2020 8:48:52 AM

COMMITTED TO
AFFORDABLE CARE
FOR THE HEALTH OF AMERICA<sup>SM</sup>

BlueCross
BlueShield
Association

Powered by  LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Partnership for America's Health Care Future

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

Trump's clemency spree shows white-collar felons it's more about who you know than what you did

Billionaire investor Nelson Peltz hosted a fundraiser at his $95 million home in Florida on Saturday night that raised $10 million for President Trump's reelection campaign. On Tuesday, the White House listed Peltz in a news release as one of the people supporting Trump's pardon of Michael Milken.

Milken, “the junk bond king” who inspired Gordon Gekko’s “greed is good” character in the movie “Wall Street,” served two years in prison after pleading guilty in 1990 to six felony counts, including securities fraud, mail fraud and aiding in the filing of a false tax return.

Other megadonors, including casino mogul Sheldon Adelson, were also on the White House’s list of individuals supporting the Milken pardon. So was the president’s personal lawyer, Rudy Giuliani, as well as Fox Business host Maria Bartiromo and Fox News owner Rupert Murdoch. Secretary of Transportation Elaine Chao, who is married to Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), and House Minority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R-Calif.) were among the 33 names listed. Steven Mnuchin was not on the list, but the Wall Street Journal notes that Milken has cultivated a friendship with the Treasury secretary and even flew him from Washington to California last year on his private jet.

“You know, oftentimes — pretty much all the time — I really rely on the recommendations of people that know them,” Trump told reporters as he prepared to board Air Force One at Joint Base Andrews. He was explaining why, and how, he’d just issued seven pardons and four commutations.

The big-name endorsements rolled out by the White House press office gave the distinct impression that these presidential decisions to show mercy were driven as much by whom the convicted felons know as what they were convicted for.

The head of the Justice Department's pardon office during the first two years of the Trump administration told The Washington Post recently that he quit last year because the White House largely ignored the formal process in favor of taking recommendations from celebrities, political allies and Fox News.

Ariel Friedler is one of the least famous beneficiaries of Trump's Tuesday pardons. The former chief executive of Simplicity pleaded guilty in 2014 to conspiring to hack into the computer systems of two competitors to improve his company's software development and sales strategy. Chris Christie, who advises the president, also takes on legal clients. Friedler is one of them. Records show Friedler never even applied to the pardon office at the Justice Department. But the White House listed the former New Jersey governor as someone supporting Trump's full pardon.

Edward DeBartolo Jr., the billionaire former owner of the San Francisco 49ers, pleaded guilty in 1998 for failing to tell authorities when ex-Louisiana governor Edwin Edwards (D) sought a bribe for a riverboat casino license. On the White House's list of individuals advocating for his pardon were New England Patriots owner Robert Kraft and Dallas Cowboys owner Jerry Jones. Both of them gave a million bucks to Trump's inaugural committee.

Content from Partnership for America's Health Care Future

We Can't Afford Medicare for All

American families should not be forced to foot the bill for Medicare for All. And any new government insurance system would force them to pay more to wait longer for worse care.

The president also pardoned David Safavian, a senior official in the George W. Bush administration who was convicted of obstructing a federal investigation and making false statements related to his dealings with the lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Abramoff took him on a luxury golf trip to Scotland and London, and Safavian helped him with business before the General Services Administration. Safavian now works for the American Conservative Union Foundation and frequently tweets support for the president. His list of endorsers includes Republican lobbyist Matt Schlapp, who chairs the American Conservative Union, and his wife Mercedes Schlapp, who works on the president's reelection campaign and spent nearly two years as the director of strategic communications in the Trump White House.

Former New York police commissioner Bernie Kerik went to prison for tax fraud and lying to White House officials when George W. Bush was preparing to nominate him to be secretary of homeland security. Kerik would later withdraw. His pardon was pushed for by Giuliani, who was Kerik's boss as mayor of New York. Fox News personalities Andrew Napolitano and Geraldo Rivera were also named by the White House as advocates. So was attorney Sidney Powell, who represents former Trump national security adviser Michael Flynn.

The president seems to have something of a soft spot for white-collar criminals. For someone who has spent months professing to be so profoundly concerned about corruption in Ukraine, Trump signaled with these pardons and commutations that he's far less worried about taking a hard line against corruption here at home.

Here are four other takeaways from Trump's latest announcements:

1) Fox News remains immensely influential.

As he explained why he commuted former Democratic Illinois governor Rod Blagojevich's sentence, Trump told reporters: "I watched his wife on television."

Patti Blagojevich made at least seven appearances over the past two years on Fox News, appearing on the shows of Tucker Carlson, Laura Ingraham and Jeanine Pirro, to praise the president and plead for his mercy. (Blagojevich was also a contestant on Trump's show "The Celebrity Apprentice" in 2010.)

Kerik, a frequent Mar-a-Lago guest, appeared on Fox News as recently as

Monday night.

Angela Stanton was pardoned for her role in a car-stealing ring. The former “Real Housewives of Atlanta” star has previously appeared on Fox News, where she’s praised the president.

Former Illinois governor Rod Blagojevich arrives at his home in Chicago early Wednesday morning after Trump ordered his release from a Colorado prison. (Paul Beaty/AP)

2) The perceived enemy of Trump’s enemy is his friend.

The president said the 14-year prison sentence for Blagojevich, who was caught on a wiretap talking about trying to sell Barack Obama’s vacated Senate seat to the highest bidder, was “ridiculous.”

“It was a prosecution by the same people – Comey, Fitzpatrick – the same group,” Trump told reporters on Tuesday. Last year, Trump also falsely blamed Blagojevich’s treatment on “the Comey gang and all these sleazebags.”

In fact, however, former FBI director James Comey was in the private sector during Blagojevich’s prosecution. And “Fitzpatrick” seems to be a mistaken reference to Patrick Fitzgerald, who as U.S. attorney in Chicago did prosecute Blagojevich and is indeed good friends with Comey.

3) Trump is clearly not going to let up his attacks on the Justice Department.

Trump is deeply animated by his sense of grievance and victimhood. He told reporters on Tuesday as he discussed the pardons that he partially agreed with Attorney General Bill Barr that his tweets about active criminal cases do make his job more difficult. But he said that won't stop him. "Social media, for me, has been very important because it gives me a voice," said Trump, who as president controls the biggest bully pulpit in the world and has an enormous press corps that hangs on his every word.

Trump doesn't appear to see himself as "above the law." Instead, he seems to believe he is the law. "I'm allowed to be totally involved," he told reporters, as he defended his tweets about the case of his longtime adviser Roger Stone. "I'm actually, I guess, the chief law enforcement officer of the country. But I've chosen not to be involved."

The president clearly feels emboldened by the Senate's vote to acquit him. "The pardons and commutations followed Trump's moves to punish witnesses in his impeachment trial, publicly intervene in a pending legal case to urge leniency for a friend, attack a federal judge, accuse a juror of bias and threaten to sue his own government for investigating him,"

Toluse Olorunnipa and Beth Reinhard report.

Barr has told people close to Trump — both inside and outside the White House — that he is considering quitting over Trump’s tweets about Justice Department investigations, three administration officials told Matt Zapposky, Josh Dawsey, John Wagner and Rachel Weiner: “So far, Trump has defied Barr’s requests, both public and private, to keep quiet on matters of federal law enforcement. It was not immediately clear Tuesday whether Barr had made his posture known directly to Trump. The administration officials said Barr seemed to be sharing his position with advisers in hopes the president would get the message that he should stop weighing in publicly on the Justice Department’s ongoing criminal investigations. ‘He has his limits,’ said one person familiar with Barr’s thinking ...

“The standoff between Trump and Barr intensified Tuesday when Trump declared in a string of early morning tweets that he might sue those involved in the special counsel investigation into his 2016 campaign and suggested that [Stone], his friend convicted of lying to Congress in that probe, deserved a new trial. Hours later, a Justice Department official said prosecutors had filed a sealed motion in court arguing the opposite and that they had Barr’s personal approval to do so. Barr had a previously scheduled lunch with the White House counsel Tuesday and was still the attorney general by day’s end — indicating that the president’s moves that day were not enough to push him to resign.”

4) Follow the money.

“Paul Pogue, a construction company owner who pleaded guilty to underpaying his taxes by $473,000 and received three years probation, was issued a full pardon and clemency by the president,” the Daily Beast notes. “According to FEC filings, Pogue’s family has donated hundreds of thousands of dollars in direct contributions and in-kind air travel to the Trump Victory Committee. Beginning in August 2019, Ben Pogue—CEO of Pogue Construction and son of Paul Pogue—and his wife Ashleigh made over $200,000 in contributions to the campaign.

“In August alone, Ben Pogue donated $85,000 to Trump Victory while Ashleigh Pogue contributed $50,000 that month. The following month, Ben Pogue made an in-kind air travel contribution of $75,404.40. The couple also made several large donations to the Republican National Committee and each donated $5,600 to Donald Trump for President Inc. On the day of their first donation to the Trump campaign, Ashleigh posted an Instagram photo of her and her husband posing with Donald Trump Jr. and his girlfriend, Kimberly Guilfoyle, at the Hamptons.

“Prior to the Pogues’ sudden significant donating spree to Trump and the Republicans, the couple was not seen as big campaign spenders, having donated a few thousand dollars for Paul Ryan’s congressional campaign in 2017 and $5,400 for former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum’s 2016 Republican presidential run. Notably, one of the advocates for Pogue’s clemency: Santorum, who is now a CNN contributor.”

Listen to the podcast.

Every weekday, a few hours before this newsletter hits your inbox, I also put out a podcast called The Daily 202's Big Idea with the biggest stories and a preview of what will be in the email. Subscribe and listen wherever you get your podcasts. The audio briefing is always available here.

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost's essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

---

2020 watch

A new Washington Post-ABC News poll shows Bernie Sanders opening a significant national lead.

“Joe Biden, who led Sanders in a Post-ABC national poll in January, has seen a sharp drop in his support after finishing fourth in the Iowa caucuses and fifth in the New Hampshire primary,” Dan Balz and Scott Clement report. Biden is now in a battle for second place with Mike

Bloomberg and Elizabeth Warren. Pete Buttigieg is in single digits nationally, roughly even with Amy Klobuchar.

“By a wide margin, 58 percent to 38 percent, Democrats say they would rather nominate a candidate who can defeat Trump than one who agrees with them on major issues. ... In the new poll, Sanders is seen as the most electable, cited by 30 percent of Democratic leaners as best situated to beat Trump. Bloomberg is cited by 18 percent on this question, with no other Democrat close to double digits. ... In the past month, Biden has lost support among three key constituency groups: African Americans, older voters and whites without college degrees, previously the bulwarks of his campaign. ...

“Sanders has seen a big jump in support among voters under age 50 and is now backed by 50 percent of that group, up from 34 percent in January. He holds a 3-to-1 lead over his rivals among these voters. Sanders also has more than doubled his support among black voters and has gained among whites without college degrees. ... Bloomberg’s growth was fueled by more support among older voters and among white voters with college degrees. Buttigieg, Warren and Klobuchar saw no significant shifts in their coalitions. ...

“In a measure of how Democrats see Sanders as a candidate against Trump, 72 percent say they believe he would defeat the president. Among Democrats, 69 percent think Bloomberg would win against Trump, and 68 percent say that of Biden. ... If he were to become the nominee, about half of all Americans say it makes no difference in their vote that Sanders is a socialist, including about 7 in 10 Democrats. But nearly 4 in 10 adults say that fact makes them more likely to oppose him, including 37 percent of independents and 79 percent of Republicans. Just under 1 in 10 adults say it makes them more likely to support him. ... The president’s approval rating stands at 43 percent, with 53 percent disapproving, showing no real change in the past month.”

Young voters are Sanders's base, but he is competitive across racial, ideological and educational groups

Q: Please tell me whom you'd vote for in the primary or caucus in your state. Which candidate would you lean toward? (Among Democrats and Democratic-leaning independent registered voters)

Note: Candidates with 10% or less overall support and "no opinion" not shown.

Source: Feb. 14-17, 2020, Washington Post-ABC News poll of 408 Democratic and Democratic-leaning registered voters, with an error margin of +/- 6 percentage points.

BRITTANY RENEE MAYES/THE WASHINGTON POST

Tonight's debate requires Bloomberg to step out of his expensive comfort zone.

“When he steps onto the debate stage in Las Vegas for his first hostile and uncontrolled campaign test [at 9 p.m. Eastern on NBC and MSNBC], there will be no management decisions to make, teleprompters to lean on or endless ad budgets to filter his image with focus-grouped messaging,” Michael Scherer reports. “In preparation, his advisers have spent much of the past week drilling him for the big jump, which could make or break the momentum he has generated with his extravagant spending. In debate prep sessions, they have armed him with comebacks for the inevitable attacks on his enormous wealth and past record, while also coaching him to move beyond his sometimes distant, wonky and diffidently logical public persona. ...

"Wary of Bloomberg's rise in the polls, his rivals, with far more debate experience and Democratic longevity, have made clear that they will not go easy on the newcomer. [Sanders] spent Tuesday in Reno, Nev., denouncing Bloomberg's campaign as an example of 'oligarchy, not democracy.' [Biden] has been boasting for days about his desire to confront Bloomberg in person because he cannot compete with the billionaire's advertising budget. 'At least now primary voters curious about how each candidate will take on Donald Trump can get a live demonstration of how we each take on an egomaniac billionaire,' [Warren] warned...

"Bloomberg's rise in polling comes as he faces a barrage of negative news coverage, some of it promoted by rival campaigns. He has had to again address allegations that he made vulgar and sexist comments, his past defense of targeting stop-and-frisk police policies to black and Latino neighborhoods in New York, and an interview in which he blamed the 2008 financial crisis on politicians who had pushed to end racially discriminatory mortgage-lending policies known as 'redlining.' Bloomberg's past political leanings — he re-registered as a Democrat only in 2018 — and his refusal to file a financial disclosure or release his tax returns before the debate, even as he is self-financing his campaign, also could come into play Wednesday. A spokesman for his campaign said the financial disclosure would be filed by March 20, and Howard Wolfson, a senior adviser to the campaign, has previously said Bloomberg would release his tax returns, though no date has been set.”

Senior Bloomberg campaign adviser Timothy O'Brien said the billionaire will sell his business, Bloomberg LP, if he wins the presidency. “There will be no confusion about any of his financial holdings,” O'Brien told CNN. “We will be 180 degrees away from where Donald Trump is on these issues because Donald Trump is a walking financial conflict of interest.”

Retired ABC News anchor Sam Donaldson's endorsement of Bloomberg annoyed practicing journalists.

“Donaldson’s open partisanship has few precedents among leading national TV news figures, and raises several journalistic questions: Does a journalist’s vow of objectivity (or at least neutrality and balance) extend beyond his or her working years? Is a retired journalist subject to the same kinds of ethical restraints as a working one, such as not endorsing candidates and not contributing to political causes and campaigns?” writes Paul Farhi. “Donaldson, 85, says no. Since he no longer has any role in reporting or shaping the news, he believes he’s entitled to express his opinions about, well, everything.”

Sanders said he won't release any more medical records.

“We have released ... quite as much as any other candidate has,” Sanders said last night during a CNN town hall. “I think we have released a detailed report and I'm comfortable with what we have done. And, by the way, if you think I'm not in good health, come out with me on the campaign trail and I'll let you introduce me to the three or four rallies a day that we do.”

He also rejected a potential health-care compromise.

Sanders distanced himself from Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez’s “recent suggestion that compromising on health care would be acceptable, arguing that his Medicare-for-all plan is ‘already a compromise,’” Sean Sullivan reports. Last week, Ocasio-Cortez told HuffPost that some flexibility on the proposal was possible. “A president can’t wave a magic wand and pass any legislation they want,” she said. “The worst-case scenario? We compromise deeply and we end up getting a public option. Is that a nightmare? I don’t think so.”

And the Sanders camp plans to request a partial recount of the Iowa caucuses.

“The announcement came as the results further narrowed on Tuesday, following a canvass of a small subset of precincts,” Isaac Stanley-Becker reports. “The revised figures did not change the allocation of delegates to the national convention. Still, they just barely shifted projected support at the state convention, which is typically the metric used to name a winner. The Iowa Democratic Party said [Buttigieg] would claim 563.207 state delegate equivalents, or SDEs, while Sanders (I-Vt.) would claim 563.127. What had been a difference of 2.774 shrank to 0.08.”

Klobuchar is scrambling to turn her moment into something more.

“Her staffers spent hours over the weekend hashing out a strategy for Super Tuesday, debating whether it’s worthwhile to compete in big, delegate-rich states like Texas and California,” Annie Linskey, Jenna Johnson and Holly Bailey report. “Some advisers want her to focus instead on independent-minded states that aren’t overly liberal, like Maine and Tennessee, because they might be receptive to her centrist message. But those states, of course, yield much fewer delegates. ... Klobuchar’s home state votes on Super Tuesday. She is adding staff in Minnesota as she battles with Buttigieg and Warren for the white, college-educated voters who fuel their campaigns.” As one adviser put it: “We’re putting the airplane together as we’re flying it.”

Buttigieg clapped back at Rush Limbaugh's homophobic attacks.

During his own town hall on CNN last night, Buttigieg offered “some of his most fiery responses yet to Limbaugh's assertion that President Trump told him not to apologize for saying that Americans wouldn't elect ‘a gay guy kissing his husband on the debate stage,’” Chelsea Janes reports. “Limbaugh, whom Trump recently awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom, doubled down on those comments Monday when he told listeners ‘Hell, the president even called me about this! He said, “Rush, I just got to tell you something. Never apologize. Don’t ever apologize.”’ Trump recently said he would have no trouble voting for a gay candidate. Buttigieg said he can’t take Trump at his word. ‘Not if he’s sending out his supporters to talk in this way. Look, the idea of the likes of Rush Limbaugh or Donald Trump lecturing anybody on family values,’ Buttigieg said. ‘Sorry, but one thing about my marriage is it’s never involved me having to send hush money to a porn star after cheating on my spouse.’”

A watchdog group claims Buttigieg and a super PAC improperly coordinated.

“In the complaint, filed Tuesday with the Federal Election Commission, the Campaign Legal Center alleged that Buttigieg’s campaign improperly accepted more than $639,000 in contributions, in violation of federal rules barring candidates from coordinating with independent groups that can raise and spend unlimited amounts of money,” Michelle Ye Hee Lee reports. “The complaint centers on a tweet by Buttigieg senior strategist Michael Halle analyzing the strengths of a particular campaign message in Nevada, and a subsequent ad campaign in that state by VoteVets that appeared to follow the strategy outlined in the tweet.”

Buttigieg was forced to clarify that comedian Keegan-Michael Key hasn’t endorsed him.

“Key appeared with Buttigieg on Saturday to drum up voter support at his Henderson, Nev., field office. The gaffe did not attract much attention. However, it was not the first time the Buttigieg campaign overstated having a tie with a prominent African American figure, or black business,” ABC News reports.

As Super Tuesday looms, rural California’s delegate gold mine is suddenly a big deal.

“Buttigieg landed in this small Central Valley city of 74,000, addressing an excited crowd of 700 Stanislaus County Democrats ... Many said [they] couldn’t believe their luck, not after decades of presidential candidates ignoring California’s inland areas. ‘I’ve lived in California my whole life, and I’ve never seen a presidential candidate,’ said Kathy Causey, a [lifelong Democrat],” Politico reports. “Buttigieg’s road trip into the region John Steinbeck once described as ‘America’s Breadbasket’ underscores how candidates are going to far-flung regions of the state to mine for delegate gold in a competitive Democratic primary. ... California’s primary rules award delegates proportionally by congressional district, meaning that candidates know they must essentially run their ground game ... ‘in 53 different states,’ the number of congressional districts in California.”

The Trump campaign hired a Cambridge Analytica alum.

The move is “likely to raise alarms among Trump critics and data privacy advocates who worry the president will push the technological envelope to get reelected in 2020,” Politico reports. “Matt Oczkowski, who served as head of product at Cambridge before it went bankrupt and shut down in 2018, is helping oversee the Trump campaign’s data program ... People familiar with the hire say he will devote his time to data-focused projects like determining where Trump and surrogates ought to campaign in person, figuring out which states are the best targets on Trump’s path to victory, and targeting media buys. Oczkowski has privately said he plans on using traditional data modeling rather than psychographics, the targeting of voters based upon their personality or behavior.”

---

The new world order

More than 2,000 have died of the coronavirus in China, but the nation is growing optimistic.

“Chinese leader Xi Jinping is striking an increasingly confident note that the country can control the coronavirus outbreak and manage the economic and social fallout as some Chinese health experts predict a peak in infections by the end of the month,” Gerry Shih reports. “Chinese leaders, eager to kick-start economic activity, have dismantled some highway checkpoints while businesses have begun to reopen. As of Wednesday, restrictions on personal mobility remained tight, suggesting wariness about rising infections. ...

“China on Wednesday reported new case numbers continuing to decline, but international experts, including U.S. National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases director Anthony Fauci, say they are wary of declaring that the pace of worldwide infections is slowing. ... China tallied a total of 1,749 new infections and 136 deaths through the end of Tuesday, making the cumulative total 74,185 infections and 2,004 deaths — the overwhelming majority still occurring in central Hubei province. Hong Kong reported its second death, a 70-year-old man.”

A machine sprays disinfectant at the entrance of a pork meat hall inside a wholesale market for agricultural products in Beijing. (Tingshu Wang/Reuters)

China expelled three Wall Street Journal reporters, blaming an opinion column.

“Deputy Bureau Chief Josh Chin and reporter Chao Deng, both American citizens, as well as reporter Philip Wen, an Australian national, have been ordered to leave the country within five days,” Anna Fifield reports. The Foreign Ministry has been criticizing the Journal since it published a coronavirus-related column on Feb. 3 by Walter Russell Mead, a professor at Bard College, under the headline “China Is the Real Sick Man of Asia.”

The move came after the U.S. designated major Chinese media outlets as government entities.

The Xinhua News Agency, China Global Television Network, China Radio International, China Daily and the People’s Daily will now be treated as diplomatic outposts of the Chinese government, subject to the same constraints. The move is the latest in a series of U.S. efforts to tackle China’s influence in the United States. (Fifield, Carol Morello and Emily Rauhala)

The Trump administration accused a Russian company of helping Venezuela export oil.

“The Trump administration directed its ‘maximum pressure’ campaign in Venezuela toward Russia on Tuesday, announcing sanctions against the trading and marketing arm of Rosneft, the state-controlled Russian oil giant that has taken over an increasing share of Venezuela’s own state-owned oil industry and reaped huge profits from exporting its crude,” Karen DeYoung and Anthony Faiola report. “Swiss-registered Rosneft Trading has ‘propped up the [Venezuelan] oil sector and actively tried to evade’ existing U.S. sanctions against those doing business with the Venezuelan government of Nicolás Maduro, according to [an administration official] ... The measures do not cover the parent company, Rosneft Oil. Its chairman, Igor Sechin, is a close ally of Russian President Vladimir Putin ... But U.S. officials said the steps would have a global effect. Although the sanctions directly target only property and interests held in the United States by the trading subsidiary and its chairman, Didier Casimiro, ‘most banks, whether U.S.-based or not,’ look to the U.S. measures ‘to guide their risk appetite,’ one of the officials said.”

The death of a young girl in Mexico sparked new outrage in a nation plagued by femicide.

Seven-year-old Fátima Aldrighett "disappeared Feb. 11 in the Mexico City neighborhood of Xochimilco, where she was waiting to be picked up from school. Four days later, her body was found naked in a plastic bag," Kevin Sieff reports. “Fátima’s killing is the latest in a string of brutal crimes against girls and women stirring enormous public outrage directed at Mexico’s president and other top officials. Last week, Ingrid Escamilla, 25, was found stabbed to death and partially skinned. That crime prompted a wave of protests in Mexico City; President Andrés Manuel López Obrador was accused of brushing them off. In the midst of a fundraising campaign linked to the sale of the presidential plane, he chastised a reporter who asked him about the attacks on women: ‘I don’t want femicides to distract from the raffle.’”

An immigration judge granted a Venezuelan father

entrance to the U.S. but sent his teen daughter to Mexico.

Officials “denied her claims that she was fleeing political repression and violence, even after they accepted the same claims from her father,” the AP reports. “The teenager, who is being identified by only her first name, Branyerly, is living alone in Matamoros, Mexico, across from Brownsville. U.S. border agents on Monday denied her request not to be sent back under the Trump administration’s so-called ‘Remain in Mexico’ program for migrants. ... ‘I already lived one nightmare in Venezuela and another here,’ Branyerly said.”

Boeing found debris in the fuel tanks of undelivered 737 Max jets.

This is a “potential safety hazard and yet another problem for the company as it tries to get the planes airborne again after two deadly crashes,” Ian Duncan reports. Debris “often includes tools or parts left behind when planes leave the production line. [A] Boeing spokesman said dealing with the debris is not likely to further delay the work of getting the planes off the ground.”

In Canada, anti-pipeline protesters have paralyzed the nation’s rail system.

“Demonstrators across the country have joined the blockades in support of the hereditary chiefs of the Wet’suwet’en Nation in British Columbia, who oppose the construction of a natural gas pipeline through their territory. They’ve brought most freight and passenger rail service to a standstill,” Amanda Coletta reports. Underlying the dispute are long-standing questions over land title, and who speaks for Canada’s indigenous people. In response, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau called for “dialogue and mutual respect.”

A storm brought mass flooding to the U.K. Brits asked, “Where’s Boris?”

“The Met Office called the thing Dennis, and the second-strongest ‘bomb cyclone' on record in the North Atlantic wreaked havoc across Britain," William Booth reports. "And with flood warnings still pinging on the telly like traffic alerts during a London rush hour, the storm is now raining on Prime Minister Boris Johnson, too, who is facing a torrent of criticism for his government's response. 'Where the floody hell is Boris?' the Sun newspaper asked in a front-page headline. ... The hashtag #wheresBoris was trending in Britain on Twitter. The flooding begot by Storm Dennis is responsible for at least three deaths so far, as the waters continue to rise. ... The Labour Party said Johnson's decision not to visit the hard-hit areas or hold a cabinet-level emergency meeting was 'a disgrace.'... It didn't help that when Storm Dennis hit, Johnson was spending the weekend at the 115-room lakeside mansion in Kent known as Chevening."

---

Quote of the day

"It's dangerous not to talk to your enemies." – Sen. Chris Murphy (D-Conn.) on why he met with Iran's foreign minister \(Michael Brice-Saddler and Reis Thebault\)

---

Social media speed read

A video showed Bloomberg describing transgender people as "he, she, or it," upsetting many activists on the left:

Charlotte Clymer 🏳️‍🌈🇺🇸 @cmclymer · 5h
I am heartbroken and infuriated that @MikeBloomberg felt it appropriate to refer to trans people as "it" and trans women as "men in dresses". His remarks are cruel, inexcusable and enable violence and discrimination against trans + non-binary folks.
(1/6)buzzfeednews.com/article/domini...

Mike Bloomberg Referred To Transgender Peo...
Bloomberg suggested transgender rights would sink Democratic campaigns in comments recorded last
buzzfeednews.com

Charlotte Clymer 🏳️‍🌈🇺🇸 @cmclymer

This comes two weeks after @MikeBloomberg was found to have made similar remarks in 2016. These latest comments were less than a year ago. It is disturbing that a leading Democratic presidential candidate would casually dehumanize trans people and degrade our existence.

👍 924 1:32 AM - Feb 19, 2020

💬 100 people are talking about this

Previewing a possible flashpoint in tonight's debate, Warren accused Bloomberg of using "racist justifications" to defend "stop and frisk":

Bloomberg's campaign manager kept his focus on Sanders:

Ted Cruz made fun of a Bloomberg News headline about Bloomberg:

Ted Cruz
@tedcruz

It's almost as if he owns the media.
twitter.com/yashar/status/...

Yashar Ali  @yashar

Bloomberg campaign says it's a two-man race for the nomination per Bloomberg the news organization owned and controlled by Bloomberg

Bloomberg

Subscribe

Politics

Bloomberg Campaign Says It's a Two-Man Race for the Nomination

By Mark Niquette

February 18, 2020, 4:14 PM EST

- ▶ Aide makes prediction before candidate has appeared on ballot
- ▶ Bloomberg to fight for first votes on Super Tuesday, March 3

 15.9K 12:03 AM - Feb 19, 2020

 5.283 people are talking about this

An NBC reporter noted quite a paradox in the new NBC-WSJ poll:

Ali Vitali
@allvitali

The top 3 unpopular qualities for a presidential candidate all apply to the very candidate leading this same poll (Sanders). What a world. twitter.com/mmurraypolitic...

Mark Murray
@mmurraypolitics

Replying to @mmurraypolitics

Most unpopular qualities for a prez candidate in the new NBC/WSJ poll (combined reservations + very uncomfortable):

Socialist: 67%
Heart attack in past year: 57%
75+: 53%
Self-funder: 41%
Under 40: 40%
Gay/lesbian: 27%
Woman: 14%

Feb 14-17, RVs, MOE +/- 3.3%

 213 10:10 PM - Feb 18, 2020

 155 people are talking about this

Congressional Democrats blasted Trump's pardons and commutations:

Maxine Waters
@RepMaxineWaters

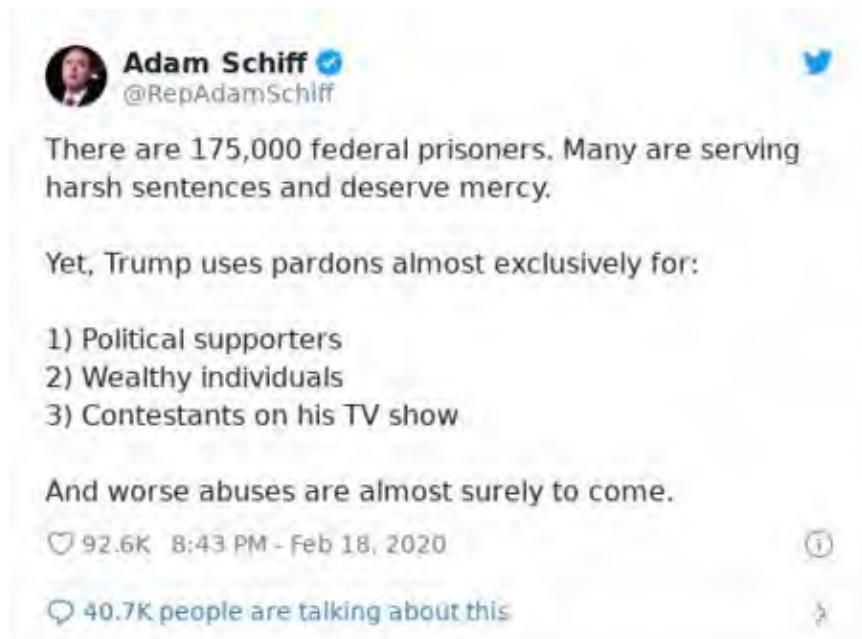

Wow! Trump told us he could stand on 5th Ave, shoot someone & get away w/ it. Now we know he can sit in the Oval Office, & w/ the stroke of a pen, commute & pardon sentences for crooks & criminals while incarcerated individuals claiming innocence & asking for pardons are ignored!

 4,342 10:23 PM - Feb 18, 2020

 1,585 people are talking about this

And the liberal uncle of the just-married Stephen Miller, the White House adviser who oversees immigration policy, directed his wedding present to an organization that works with refugees:

Videos of the day

Trump effusively praised Bloomberg seven years ago:

 JM Rieger
@RiegerReport

Donald Trump on Mike Bloomberg on March 25, 2013:

"He's made a tremendous fortune, he's a brilliant guy ... he's got some, you know, really amazing ideas, he's done a very, very good job as the mayor of New York"

 6  12:03 AM - Feb 19, 2020

 See JM Rieger's other Tweets

James Corden previewed the Democratic debate:

 Bernie Goes After Bloomberg Ahead Of Vega...

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Carolyn Hax for Post columnist Carolyn Hax's latest advice column every day. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: E&E News
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] February 20 -- Energywire is ready
Date: Thursday, February 20, 2020 5:16:25 AM

Read today's Energywire on the web

ENERGYWIRE

AN E&E NEWS PUBLICATION

ENERGYWIRE — Thu., February 20, 2020

 READ FULL EDITION

1. RENEWABLE ENERGY:

Deal emerges to bring 1st offshore wind farms to Calif.

The military has blocked the establishment of offshore wind lease areas off Southern and central California for years, holding back development across the entire state. Now, a compromise has emerged to bring the first offshore wind farms to the U.S. West Coast.

TOP STORIES

2. ENERGY MARKETS:

Could #MOPRmadness spread to N.Y.?

3. CARBON CAPTURE:

Federal CCS guidance stirs concerns about industry's future

4. Q&A:

EV alliance founders eye trail blazed by renewable energy

LAW

5. OFFSHORE DRILLING:

Judge blocks Trump challenge of seismic testing lawsuit

ENERGY TRANSITIONS

6. RENEWABLE ENERGY:

Google shuts down 'moonshot' wind unit once backed by DOE

7. ENERGY EFFICIENCY:

Utilities making 'dramatic' investments to cut CO2 — report

ELECTRICITY

8. UTILITIES:

Calif. regulator calls for strict safety oversight of PG&E

9. FRANCE:

Nation's oldest nuclear complex to close by end of June

OIL AND GAS

10. DAKOTA ACCESS:

N.D. regulators approve expanded pipeline capacity

11. OIL:

Saudi Arabia equates coronavirus impact to a house on fire

12. PIPELINES:

Trudeau urges patience, warns against force in rail protests

---

Get all of the stories in today's Energywire, plus an in-depth archive with thousands of articles on your issues, detailed Special Reports and much more at <https://www.energywire.com>.

Forgot your passcodes? Call us at 202-628-6500 now and we'll set you up instantly.

To send a press release, fax 202-737-5299 or email editorial@eenews.net.

---

ABOUT ENERGYWIRE – THE TRANSFORMATION OF THE ENERGY SECTOR

Energywire is written and produced by the staff of E&E News. Energywire is designed to bring readers deep, broad and insightful coverage of the transformation of the energy sector. Energywire focuses on the business, environmental and political issues surrounding the rapidly expanding unconventional energy industry and the numerous factors -- from expanding natural gas use to renewables and more -- that are altering the traditional electric utility industry. Energywire publishes daily at 9:00 a.m.

Unsubscribe | Our Privacy Policy

E&E News

122 C Street NW 7th Floor Washington, DC 20001

Phone: 202-628-6500 Fax: 202-737-5299

www.eenews.net

All content is copyrighted and may not be reproduced or retransmitted without the express consent of Environment & Energy Publishing, LLC.
Prefer plain text? Click here.

From: E&E News
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] February 20 -- Energywire is ready
Date: Thursday, February 20, 2020 5:16:46 AM

Read today's Energywire on the web

ENERGYWIRE

AN E&E NEWS PUBLICATION

ENERGYWIRE — Thu., February 20, 2020

 READ FULL EDITION

1. RENEWABLE ENERGY:

Deal emerges to bring 1st offshore wind farms to Calif.

The military has blocked the establishment of offshore wind lease areas off Southern and central California for years, holding back development across the entire state. Now, a compromise has emerged to bring the first offshore wind farms to the U.S. West Coast.

TOP STORIES

2. ENERGY MARKETS:

Could #MOPRmadness spread to N.Y.?

3. CARBON CAPTURE:

Federal CCS guidance stirs concerns about industry's future

4. Q&A:

EV alliance founders eye trail blazed by renewable energy

LAW

5. OFFSHORE DRILLING:

Judge blocks Trump challenge of seismic testing lawsuit

ENERGY TRANSITIONS

6. RENEWABLE ENERGY:

Google shuts down 'moonshot' wind unit once backed by DOE

7. ENERGY EFFICIENCY:

Utilities making 'dramatic' investments to cut CO2 — report

ELECTRICITY

8. UTILITIES:

Calif. regulator calls for strict safety oversight of PG&E

9. FRANCE:

Nation's oldest nuclear complex to close by end of June

OIL AND GAS

10. DAKOTA ACCESS:

N.D. regulators approve expanded pipeline capacity

11. OIL:

Saudi Arabia equates coronavirus impact to a house on fire

12. PIPELINES:

Trudeau urges patience, warns against force in rail protests

---

Get all of the stories in today's Energywire, plus an in-depth archive with thousands of articles on your issues, detailed Special Reports and much more at <https://www.energywire.com>.

Forgot your passcodes? Call us at 202-628-6500 now and we'll set you up instantly.

To send a press release, fax 202-737-5299 or email editorial@eenews.net.

---

ABOUT ENERGYWIRE – THE TRANSFORMATION OF THE ENERGY SECTOR

Energywire is written and produced by the staff of E&E News. Energywire is designed to bring readers deep, broad and insightful coverage of the transformation of the energy sector. Energywire focuses on the business, environmental and political issues surrounding the rapidly expanding unconventional energy industry and the numerous factors -- from expanding natural gas use to renewables and more -- that are altering the traditional electric utility industry. Energywire publishes daily at 9:00 a.m.

Unsubscribe | Our Privacy Policy

E&E News

122 C Street NW 7th Floor Washington, DC 20001

Phone: 202-628-6500 Fax: 202-737-5299

www.eenews.net

All content is copyrighted and may not be reproduced or retransmitted without the express consent of Environment & Energy Publishing, LLC. Prefer plain text? Click here.

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: The Democratic debate descends into class warfare, as the billionaire and socialist play off each other
Date: Thursday, February 20, 2020 9:48:19 AM

COMMITTED TO
AFFORDABLE CARE
FOR THE HEALTH OF AMERICA<sup>SM</sup>

BlueCross
BlueShield
Association

Powered by  LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Partnership for America's Health Care Future

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

The Democratic debate descends into class warfare, as the billionaire and socialist play off each other

“Should you exist?”

NBC anchor Chuck Todd’s question to Mike Bloomberg during the Democratic debate in Las Vegas was prompted by a tweet last year from Bernie Sanders. “Billionaires should not exist,” the senator from Vermont wrote.

“I can't speak for all billionaires,” the former New York mayor answered on Wednesday night. “All I know is I've been very lucky, made a lot of money, and I'm giving it all away to make this country better.”

Todd followed up: “Should you have earned that much money?”

“Yes,” Bloomberg replied. “I worked very hard for it.”

Sanders, who identifies as a democratic socialist, says the word billionaire like it's a grotesque slur. “Mike Bloomberg owns more wealth than the bottom 125 million Americans,” he replied. “That's wrong. That's immoral.”

The sizzling two-hour debate underscored the extent to which class has emerged as a stark dividing line inside the factionalized Democratic Party, as significant as race or gender. The proliferation of soak-the-rich rhetoric at this level of presidential politics would have been unthinkable in the not-distant past. Sanders has moved the Overton window to the left on a battery of issues, including the debate over the virtues of capitalism itself.

Bloomberg leaned on his financial success as a differentiator.

“I’m the only one here that’s ever started a business,” he said. The chief executive of Bloomberg LP has spent more than $409 million since launching his campaign just 10 weeks ago. That money has, essentially, bought him second place in national polling. It’s still less than 1 percent of his net worth, which Forbes estimates at $65.2 billion – making him the eighth richest person in America.

Elizabeth Warren compared Bloomberg to President Trump.

“Democrats take a huge risk if we just substitute one arrogant billionaire for another,” said the senator from Massachusetts, as he stood next to her, avoiding eye contact.

Just as Trump did four years ago, Bloomberg cites his wealth as evidence that he’s incorruptible. After Pete Buttigieg urged people to visit his campaign website, for example, Bloomberg joked that people can go to his, as well, but they won’t be able to give money because he’s not raising any. Unlike Trump, though, Bloomberg is not pretending to be a populist. He’s running as a managerial technocrat who can make the trains run on time.

Class-tinged resentments were a consistent undercurrent in the pile-on against Bloomberg. “As the lone person on this stage who’s not a millionaire, let alone a billionaire,” said the former mayor of South Bend, Ind., “I believe that part of what needs to change is for the voices of the communities that haven’t felt heard on Wall Street or in Washington to actually be brought to Capitol Hill.”

Joe Biden chimed in. “For 36 years [in the Senate] and as vice president, I was listed as the poorest man in Congress,” he said. “I made money when I wrote a book about my son, and it surprised me how much it sold. First time I’ve ever made any money.”

The crowd booed Bloomberg when he explained why it would take a few more “weeks” to release his tax returns.

“Unfortunately, or fortunately, I make a lot of money and we do business all around the world, and we are preparing it,” he explained. “The number of pages will probably be thousands of pages. I can't go to TurboTax."

"Pay overtime," said Warren, "and get it done."

Amy Klobuchar noted that her husband prepares their taxes. "We probably could go to TurboTax," said the senator from Minnesota.

Because of the ongoing realignment between the parties, the Democratic coalition writ large has become more affluent and highly educated. Many blue-collar, non-college-educated whites in places like the industrial Midwest have gravitated away from their ancestral home toward the GOP because of cultural grievances, among other factors.

Sanders, however, tailors his message more to the working class than the middle class. His rallies have a decidedly more blue-collar vibe than Buttigieg's or Klobuchar's or Warren's. During a town hall-style meeting the weekend before last in New Hampshire, for instance, a speaker warming up the crowd for Sanders asked how many people currently work for minimum wage. More than a third of the people in the audience raised their hands.

"What our movement is about is bringing working-class people together, black and white and Latino, Native American, Asian American, around an agenda that works for all of us and not just the billionaire class," Sanders said in the debate. "Real change never takes place from the top on down. It never takes place from an oligarchy controlled by billionaires."

Content from Partnership for America's Health Care Future

We Can't Afford Medicare for All

American families should not be forced to foot the bill for Medicare for All. And any new government insurance system would force them to pay more to wait longer for worse care.

Sanders continued to attack Buttigieg for having the temerity to even accept money from 46 billionaires. “We are giving a voice to people who are saying we are sick and tired of billionaires like Mr. Bloomberg seeing huge expansions of their wealth while half-a-million people sleep out on the street tonight,” said Sanders. “What we are saying, Pete, is maybe it's time for the working class of this country to have a little bit of power in Washington, rather than your billionaire campaign contributors.”

Buttigieg, who got pummeled at the December debate for holding a fundraiser in a Napa Valley wine cave, replied that the billionaires are “among the hundreds of thousands of contributors” to his campaign. “You're not the only one who cares about the working class,” he told Sanders. “Most Americans believe we need to empower workers.” Buttigieg added that “you're the one who is at war with the Culinary Union right here in Las Vegas.” To which Sanders replied: “We’ve got more union support than you have ever dreamed of.”

You could sense the urgency, even the desperation, in the air as several of the candidates whose futures hinge on the coming weeks waved their arms to be recognized. “We've got to wake up as a party,” Buttigieg pleaded with the audience. “We could wake up two weeks from today, the day after Super Tuesday, and the only candidates left standing will be Bernie Sanders and Mike Bloomberg, the two most polarizing figures on this stage. And most Americans don't see where they fit if they've got to choose between a socialist who thinks that capitalism is the root of all evil and a billionaire who thinks that money ought to be the root of all power.”

One reason Klobuchar’s clashes with Buttigieg were so intensely bitter is that they’re both trying to claim this middle ground. “I believe in capitalism, but I think the goal of someone in government ... should be a check on that,” she said. “I'm not going to limit what people make, but right now our tax code is so tilted against regular people, and that is what's wrong.”

Warren boasts in her stump speech about how she made a billionaire cry on television with her wealth tax proposal. People chant “two cents” at her events as she explains how anyone worth more than $50 million will need to pay 2 percent of their net worth in taxes every year – including, as she puts it, on their yachts, Rembrandts and diamonds. The cheers are louder when Warren talks about taxing the superrich than when she explains what she'll do with that extra revenue. That speaks volumes about the pitchfork populism that's been ascendant on the left.

For his part, even Bloomberg goes out of his way to say the rich must pay more in taxes. “I disagree with the senator on the wealth tax, but I do agree with her that the rich aren't paying their fair share,” Bloomberg volunteered during the debate. “We should raise taxes on the rich. I did that as mayor in New York City.” Then Sanders complimented Warren’s proposed wealth tax. “Ours is a little bit tougher on Mr. Bloomberg than hers,” he added, with pride.

Bloomberg and Sanders both saw the other as a useful foil since they appeal to different constituencies. “I believe in democratic socialism for working people, not billionaires,” said Sanders. “Creating a government that works for all, not just for Mr. Bloomberg.”

“What a wonderful country we have,” Bloomberg replied. “The best-known socialist in the country happens to be a millionaire with three houses. What did I miss here?”

Sanders replied that his first house is in Washington, where he works, and the second is in Burlington, Vt., where he lives. “And like thousands of other Vermonters, I do have a summer camp,” he added. “We have the insane situation that billionaires today, if you can believe it, have an effective tax rate lower than the middle class.” Bloomberg replied that Sanders, as a member of Congress, can write the tax code.

Asked whether workers should be able to sit on corporate boards, something Sanders and Warren support, Bloomberg said absolutely not. “I can’t think of a way that would make it easier for Donald Trump to get reelected than listening to this conversation,” he said. Bloomberg argued that Sanders couldn’t defeat Trump in a general election because he’s too far to the left and wants to take away people’s private health insurance.

“Maybe we can talk about a billionaire saying that we should not raise the minimum wage,” Sanders countered. “If that’s a way to beat Donald Trump, wow, I would be very surprised.”

NBC’s Lester Holt, another moderator, asked Sanders about the latest NBC-Wall Street Journal poll that found two-thirds of all voters said they were uncomfortable with a socialist candidate for president. Asked what message he has for them, Sanders replied that the same poll showed him leading among Democratic voters. “I was winning, and I think by a fairly comfortable margin,” he said. “You might mention that.”

Bloomberg suggested that Sanders is really a communist, not a socialist. “We’re not going to throw out capitalism. We tried that. Other countries tried that,” he said. “It was called communism, and it just didn’t work.”

“That’s a cheap shot,” Sanders replied, clarifying that what he stands for is democratic socialism. “We are living, in many ways, in a socialist society right now. The problem is, as Dr. Martin Luther King reminded us, we have socialism for the very rich [and] rugged individualism for the poor.”

There were class undertones even when the debate turned to topics related to gender. Klobuchar seized on a memo released by the

Bloomberg campaign that said the other moderates should step aside to “pave the way” for Bloomberg to stop Sanders from capturing the nomination. “As a woman,” the senator said, “I’ve been told many times to wait my turn and to step aside. And I’m not going to do that now. ... We need something different than Donald Trump. I don’t think you look at Donald Trump and say we need someone richer in the White House.”

Bloomberg’s riches also probably help explain the sense of entitlement he exuded. He seemed like a man unaccustomed to both waiting on others and being challenged. He was caught on camera rolling his eyes at criticism. When moderators didn’t come back to him during a discussion on health care, Bloomberg was clearly perturbed. “What am I,” he said, “chicken liver?”

Bloomberg hadn’t debated since 2009, and it showed. He’s not on the ballot in Nevada, which caucuses on Saturday, or in South Carolina, whose primary is the following Saturday. He’s invested in the states that vote on Super Tuesday, four days after that, so he can make up some for his wobbly debate debut during a CBS debate next week in the Palmetto State. “He was just warming up,” campaign manager Kevin Sheekey said in a statement afterward.

---

Quote of the day

Tom Steyer, the other billionaire seeking the Democratic nomination, didn’t qualify for this debate but tweeted throughout. “Looks like Mike Bloomberg might be running in the wrong primary,” he wrote.

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

More from our team coverage

- Dan Balz: "It's a critical moment in the Democratic race. The debate made that clear."
- Michael Kranish: "Bloomberg faces attacks for refusing to release women from confidentiality agreements.”

- Glenn Kessler, Salvador Rizzo and Sarah Cahlan fact-checked seven claims.

What pundits are saying about winners and losers

- The Fix's Aaron Blake declared Sanders the winner, along with Warren's takedowns of Bloomberg. His losers were Bloomberg, Biden and Klobuchar.
- CNN's Chris Cillizza said Warren, Sanders and a combo of Buttigieg and Biden won the night while Bloomberg and Klobuchar lost.
- Vox's team declared Warren and Sanders the winners and Bloomberg the loser.
- Mother Jones editor Clara Jeffery said Warren was the runaway winner, while Bloomberg delivered a “horribly bad” performance.
- FiveThirtyEight's Nate Silver's top takeaway is that Bloomberg bombed.
- Democratic operative Mary Anne Marsh, writing for Fox News, called Warren the winner and Bloomberg the loser. Fox anchor Bret Baier said Trump was actually the biggest winner.
- Washington Examiner's Becket Adams argued that Warren won the debate – for Sanders.

How it's playing elsewhere

- The Las Vegas Review-Journal's editorial board: “Nevada Democrats should reject extremism.”
- Politico's John Harris: “Thank you, Mike Bloomberg, for rescuing the debate.”
- Shira Scheindlin op-ed in the New York Times: “I Was the Judge in the Stop-and-Frisk Case. I Don't Think Bloomberg Is Racist.”
- The Boston Globe's Joan Vennochi: “The double standard for old sexist Democrats.”

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

More on 2020

Democrats won't commit to a same-day release of the Nevada results.

“Tom Perez, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, told The Associated Press that several factors, including early voting and potentially high turnout, could affect the tabulation and timing of results. In addition, Nevada, like Iowa, will be reporting three sets of data from the multistage caucus process. Perez said he doesn't know when results will be released. ‘We’re going to do our best to release results as soon as possible, but our North Star, again, is accuracy,’ he said late Tuesday after touring an early voting site in Las Vegas.”

Despite Warren’s rejection of super PACs, one launched to support her bid.

“The group, Persist PAC, filed its papers on Tuesday,” Michelle Ye Hee Lee reports. “It has already launched a 30-second ad in Nevada highlighting the senator’s record establishing a federal financial watchdog agency and supporting policies that help women and middle-class families. ... [Warren] has emphatically rejected super PACs and attacked her opponents receiving their help. In a statement, Warren’s campaign said the senator’s position has not changed. ... The statement did not address Warren’s feelings about Persist PAC, however, and the campaign did not respond to questions about whether the senator thinks the group should continue to exist to support her candidacy.”

Warren’s campaign announced that it raised more than $1 million during the debate and $2.8 million during the course of Wednesday.

Barack Obama has privately said he doesn’t like the idea of Sanders as a nominee.

“To Obama, Sanders is a lot of what’s wrong with Democrats: unrelenting, unrealistic, so deep in his own fight that he doesn’t see how many people disagree with him or that he’s turning off people who should be his allies,” the Atlantic’s Edward-Isaac Dove reports. “Obama has made clear in private conversations that he doesn’t like the idea of Sanders as the nominee (and has been only slightly more subtle in public comments), but he’s pushed back on some who have urged him to get involved, anxious that any move he makes could destroy the hope of him using his unique position to unite the party and defeat Trump during the general election. ... Obama is determined to make it work — if he has to.”

Sanders was serious enough about waging a primary challenge against Obama in 2012 that then-Senate majority leader Harry

Reid had to intervene to stop him, according to the story: “It took Reid two conversations over the summer of 2011 to get Sanders to scrap the idea, according to multiple people who remember the incident. ... That summer, Sanders privately discussed a potential primary challenge to Obama with several people, including Patrick Leahy, his fellow Vermont senator. Leahy, alarmed, warned Jim Messina, Obama’s presidential reelection-campaign manager. Obama’s campaign team was ‘absolutely panicked’ by Leahy’s report, Messina [said], since ‘every president who has gotten a real primary has lost a general [election].’ ... In another incident, in 2013, Sanders laid into Obama in a private meeting he held with Democratic senators, saying that the president was selling out to Republicans over Social Security benefits.” Obama replied that he didn't need to be lectured.

As Super Tuesday approaches, the candidates are rolling out endorsements.

- Bloomberg this morning unveiled endorsements from three more Democratic members of Congress – Nita Lowey (N.Y.), Pete Aguilar (Calif.) and Josh Gottheimer (N.J.) – bringing his total to 16.
- Rep. Sylvia Garcia (D-Tex.), one of the House impeachment managers, backed Biden, giving him his sixth supporter from the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. (Politico)
- Virginia state Sen. Creigh Deeds, the 2009 nominee for governor, endorsed Klobuchar. (Roanoke Times)
- Three Arizona state senators – Andrea Dalessandro, Jamescita Peshlakai and Victoria Steele – endorsed Warren on the first day of early voting in the state. The state votes March 17. (Arizona Mirror)

The Bloomberg campaign is paying people $2,500 a month to promote him to all their contacts.

The campaign is hiring more than 500 “deputy digital organizers” to work 20 to 30 hours a week, documents reviewed by the Wall Street Journal show. The workers are expected to promote Bloomberg weekly to everyone in their phone's contacts by text message and make daily social media posts supporting him.

Andrew Yang joined CNN as a political commentator.

“Learned a lot these past months and am glad to contribute to the public discussion,” said the former presidential contender, who dropped out after the New Hampshire primary.

Florida’s new law prohibiting certain ex-felons from voting was ruled unconstitutional.

The rule would’ve prohibited ex-felons who cannot pay certain legal fines from voting. The case “could have significant consequences for one of the country’s largest swing states,” Elise Viebeck reports. “In a unanimous ruling, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit affirmed a lower court’s finding that Florida’s S.B. 7066 violates the Constitution’s guarantee of equal protection under the law. The panel also upheld that court’s preliminary injunction barring enforcement for the plaintiffs. Florida’s governor immediately signaled that he would appeal the decision to the full circuit. ... ‘Continued disenfranchisement is indisputably punitive in nature,’ the judges wrote, adding, ‘Felons who are unable to pay are subject to continued punishment solely because of their inability to pay.’ ”

The White House predicts the economy will not grow at a rate of 3 percent or higher this year.

The Council of Economic Advisers forecasts that, unless Congress enacts a major infrastructure package and additional tax cuts, the U.S. economy will grow at a 2.4 percent pace this year and at a 2.3 percent pace in 2021. (Heather Long)

---

All the president's men

President Trump takes the stage at a campaign rally on Wednesday night at Veterans Memorial Coliseum in Phoenix. (Evan Vucci/AP)

Mick Mulvaney admitted that the GOP is hypocritical on deficits.

“My party is very interested in deficits when there is a Democrat in the White House. The worst thing in the whole world is deficits when Barack Obama was the president. Then Donald Trump became president, and we’re a lot less interested as a party,” he said at the Oxford Union to a group of several hundred people.

“Mulvaney, who ran the Office of Management and Budget before taking the acting chief of staff role, said he found the growing deficit — which reached almost $1 trillion in 2019, soaring in the Trump era — ‘extraordinarily disturbing’ but that neither party, nor voters, cared much about it,” Josh Dawsey reports. “Mulvaney’s comments, which lasted about an hour, came as he visited Britain and Ireland to talk about Brexit and other issues. ... He criticized his predecessor, John F. Kelly, as chief of staff, and railed against the ‘deep state,’ giving the audience examples of civil servants who he said were working against the Trump administration. ...

“Mulvaney robustly defended the president’s actions regarding Ukraine ... He said the president regularly complained that Europeans don’t give Ukraine enough money. ‘And number two, they’re corrupt as hell, which is true,’ Mulvaney said. ... He joked about his news conference last year in which he conceded, from the White House podium, that there was a ‘quid pro quo’ and that it was normal in foreign policy and that people should ‘get over it.’ Mulvaney said he realized he’d made a mistake when he walked away from the podium. Another White House official, he said, ‘came up to me and said, ‘Do you know you just said X?’ I said, ‘No I didn’t say that.’” Soon, he realized, ‘S---, I said X.’ Mulvaney issued a statement later that day attacking the media for mischaracterizing his comments.”

Trump fired the Pentagon’s policy chief, who spoke out internally against his freeze on Ukraine aid.

Undersecretary of Defense for Policy John Rood, who was charged with certifying that Ukraine met its anti-corruption targets in order to receive U.S. military aid, was dismissed after clashing with colleagues over the implementation of Trump’s foreign policy agenda for more than two years, Paul Sonne and Missy Ryan report. His last day is Feb. 28. “Rood wrote that he understood, from speaking to Defense Secretary Mark T. Esper, that Trump had requested his resignation. ... In an email to Esper hours after Trump’s July 25 call with Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelensky, Rood said that ‘placing a hold on security assistance at this time would jeopardize this unique window of opportunity and undermine our defense priorities with a key partner in the strategic competition with Russia.’ ... The hold proceeded anyway.”

Trump will install German ambassador Richard Grenell as acting director of national intelligence.

Trump is nominating “a fiercely loyal ally atop an intelligence structure he has frequently railed against,” Shane Harris, Anne Gearan and Dawsey report. “It is unclear whether Trump intends to nominate Grenell to fill the top intelligence post on a permanent basis, which would require Senate confirmation. The appointment took many in Washington, including on Capitol Hill, by surprise. Grenell, a former State Department official and communications executive, has been a Trump confidant and ad hoc adviser on issues beyond his ambassadorial work in Berlin. He is a conservative foreign policy hawk and sometime media critic, as well as a vocal supporter of Trump on social media. He has sparked controversy in his diplomatic role, but also won praise in Germany and elsewhere for taking on issues such as gay rights in Eastern Europe and the long-running tensions between Kosovo and Serbia. Grenell would be the first openly gay member of the Trump Cabinet.”

Trump continues to test his relationship with Bill Barr by tweeting about the Justice Department.

A day after it was revealed that the attorney general has told people close to Trump that he’s considered quitting, the president amplified “conservative allies demanding he ‘clean house’ at the Justice Department and target those involved in the Russia investigation that once threatened his presidency,” John Wagner, Matt Zaptosky and Devlin Barrett report. “The grievances shared by Trump in a flurry of morning tweets included claims of a ‘seditious conspiracy’ against him, and attacks on a ‘criminal gang’ at the FBI and the Justice Department.” The fragile equilibrium may be tested again Thursday, as Roger Stone is scheduled to be sentenced for lying to Congress and obstruction.

John Bolton said his testimony wouldn’t have changed the outcome of the impeachment trial.

The former national security adviser “denounced the House’s impeachment proceedings against [Trump] as ‘grossly partisan’ and said his testimony would not have changed Trump’s acquittal in the Senate,” the AP reports. “Bolton was on stage at Vanderbilt University with former national security adviser Susan Rice, who questioned Bolton’s refusal to discuss more details. ... Bolton contended that the House ‘committed impeachment malpractice,’ drawing some grumbling from the audience, saying ‘the process drove Republicans who might have voted for impeachment away because it was so partisan.’ He also said he didn’t expect the Senate to vote against having him testify. ‘People can argue about what I should have said and what I should have done,' Bolton said. 'I would bet you a dollar right here and now, my testimony would have made no difference to the ultimate outcome.'”

Mike Pompeo and lawmakers sparred over “deep state” attacks while in Munich.

“The meeting became contentious early on, when Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) confronted Pompeo about what the senator described as a severe morale problem among Foreign Service officers and civil servants working for the State Department both in Washington and around the world,” Josh Rogin reports. “Pompeo reacted angrily. The secretary didn’t just deny that he had failed to protect his employees sufficiently; he also claimed that morale at the State Department is great, according to four lawmakers who were in the room.”

Rod Blagojevich, the ex-Illinois governor convicted of trying to peddle Barack Obama's vacated U.S. Senate seat, waves as he exits his home after Trump commuted his prison sentence. (Joshua Lott/Reuters)

Trump is considering more pardons.

The president assembled a team of advisers to guide the clemency process. “The White House is moving to take more direct control over pardons and commutations, with Trump aiming to limit the role of the Justice Department in the clemency process as he weighs a flurry of additional pardon announcements,” Toluse Olorunnipa, Dawsey and Neena Satija report. “Trump, who granted clemency Tuesday to a group of 11 people that included several political allies and supporters, has assembled a team of advisers to recommend and vet candidates for pardons. ... The group, essentially an informal task force of at least a half-dozen presidential allies, has been meeting since late last year to discuss a revamped pardon system in the White House. Jared Kushner, Trump’s son-in-law and senior adviser, is taking a leading role in the new clemency initiative. ... Trump, who prefers granting clemency to people with compelling personal stories or lengthy sentences, is inclined to grant more pardons before facing voters in November, one official said.” (Interesting op-ed by John K. Carroll: “I was a prosecutor in the Michael Milken case. I’m outraged at the pardon process.”)

Julian Assange’s lawyer said a then-GOP congressman dangled a pardon if he would absolve Russia in the DNC hack. Assange’s attorney told a British judge that former Republican congressman Dana Rohrabacher, a Trump ally who lost in 2018, made an offer to the WikiLeaks founder on behalf of Trump in 2017 to pardon Assange in exchange for saying that Russia had nothing to do with the 2016 hack and leak of DNC emails. “Assange is in a British prison while he awaits a decision on an extradition request by the United States,” William Booth and Ellen Nakashima report. “In a statement posted to his website on Wednesday, Rohrabacher said ... ‘at no time did I offer Julian Assange anything from the President because I had not spoken with the President about this issue at all.’ But, he added, he told Assange that if he gave him evidence about who provided him the DNC emails, he would ask Trump to pardon him. White House press secretary Stephanie Grisham on Wednesday denied the allegation that Trump was seeking a trade with Assange.”

An unrepentant Rod Blagojevich declared himself “a freed political prisoner” as he spoke to reporters outside his Chicago home. “We want to express our most profound and everlasting gratitude to President Trump,” said the former Democratic governor of Illinois.

(Susan Berger and John Wagner)

Trump granted clemency to three of Alice Johnson’s friends.

The women said they hadn't spoken in years with Johnson, whom Trump freed in 2018, and were only vaguely aware of her efforts, Beth Reinhard reports.

Trump’s pardon of Bernie Kerik also apparently wiped out $103,000 of the former New York City police commissioner’s debt to taxpayers. The White House credited the president's personal lawyer Rudy Giuliani – Kerik’s friend and former boss – for convincing Trump to pardon Kerik. (The Week)

---

The new world order

People suspected of being infected with the coronavirus wait to receive tests at a medical center in Daegu, South Korea. (Lee Moo-ryul/AP)

Coronavirus cases surged in South Korea.

“Authorities worldwide warned about the spread of the coronavirus beyond China on Thursday as Japan reported the first two deaths from the Diamond Princess cruise liner, South Korea reported its first fatality and a major city there asked citizens to refrain from venturing outdoors,” Gerry Shih, Rick Noack and Teo Armus report. “A Japanese man and woman, both said to be in their 80s, were among more than 600 passengers who contracted the disease while on board the Diamond Princess. They left the ship last week and had been hospitalized but died on Thursday ... In nearby South Korea, cases soared by nearly two-thirds, mostly in the southern part of the peninsula ... The mayor of Daegu, the city where 10 South Koreans contracted the disease from a church service, asked residents to stay indoors.

“Iran also reported two infected that then died. Many international experts say the disease will continue to spread globally even as the Chinese government seeks to present the image that it is coming to grips with the epidemic. New cases inside China dropped again Wednesday, officials reported Thursday, after national authorities changed for the second time in a week the criteria for how cases are diagnosed and counted.”

A “xenophobic” motive is suspected in an overnight shooting that left 10 dead in Germany.

“A spokesman for the Public Prosecutor General said that the office had taken over the investigation. Nine people were killed in shootings at the two hookah bars in Hanau, which is about 15 miles east of Frankfurt, on Wednesday night,” Loveday Morris, Rick Noack and Luisa Beck report. “The body of the suspected attacker, and that of another person, were found in his home in the early hours of Thursday morning, police said. They didn't provide any additional information, but said there were ‘no indications of further perpetrators.’ German newspaper Bild reported the second body belonged to the suspect's mother. Police said they couldn't provide details on the attacker's motive or comment on German news reports saying the shooter left a confessional letter and video that indicated a confused, extreme-right, anti-immigrant ideology.”

Britain wants to close its borders to low-skill migrants and lure English-speaking engineers.

“Home Secretary Priti Patel called the immigration plan ‘a historic moment for the whole country,’ as the government pledged to transform the British economy by starving its businesses of low-wage workers from Europe and forcing companies to adopt technology and automation instead,” William Booth and Karla Adam report. “The government said that beginning next year, it will reduce the overall number of migrants allowed into the country, honoring what it sees as one of the main mandates of the Brexit vote in June 2016. Prime Minister Boris Johnson, who led the campaign for Brexit, has called the new immigration regime revolutionary. His government formally outlined the new plan Wednesday, confirming that Britain will install a new ‘points-based’ system, which will take back control of its borders and end what it described as the country’s overreliance on low-skilled workers.”

A Mexican national was arrested in Florida on accusation of spying for Russia.

Hector Cabrera was arrested on charges that he collected information about a U.S. government informant on Russia, Brittany Shammas reports. “U.S. prosecutors claim he was carrying out orders from a Russian official who had recruited him with promises of helping his family. A Singapore resident and researcher at the country’s National Heart Center, Fuentes made several trips to Moscow to meet with the official, who directed him to rent a specific property in Miami-Dade County and report back to Russia the license plate and location of the informant’s car.”

Chris Steele said he feared assassination, directed by Russia, after he outlined alleged links between Trump and the Kremlin before the 2016 election. The Telegraph reports that the former MI6 agent feared reprisals after he circulated memos that become known as the Steele dossier.

Mexico is investigating ex-president Enrique Peña Nieto, a top official said. Peña Nieto has been linked to the high-profile bribery case against the former CEO of Pemex, the Wall Street Journal reports.

Saudi Prince Mohammed bin Salman is sparring no detail in the planning of the Group of 20 summit, which he hopes will shift focus from the killing of Washington Post contributing columnist Jamal Khashoggi. (Bloomberg News)

Scientists say we've dramatically underestimated how much methane gas we're emitting.

“The contention emerges in a new study in the influential journal Nature, which draws on samples of ancient air extracted from within the Greenland ice sheet to measure levels of atmospheric methane before humans started burning fossil fuels,” Chris Mooney reports. “If the researchers are right, then tens of millions of tons of methane could be wafting into the atmosphere, unaccounted for, from oil and gas fields around the world.”

---

Social media speed read

Elizabeth Warren got the most online buzz during the debate:

Most Tweeted About Democratic Candidates

Elizabeth Warren

Mike Bloomberg

Bernie Sanders

Joe Biden

Pete Buttigieg

Amy Klobuchar

Ninth Debate: February 19, 2020

Bloomberg's hometown papers were not gentle with their former mayor's debut performance:

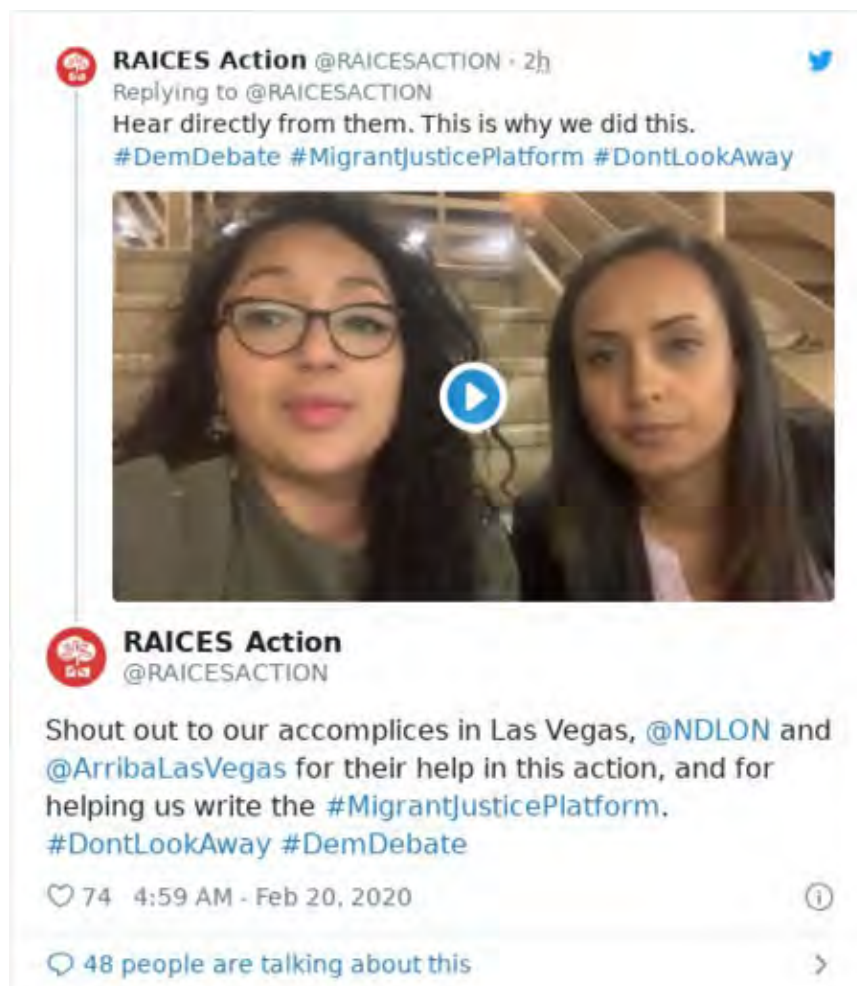

Not surprisingly, Trump also panned the former mayor's performance:

Warren didn't want to become an accidental influencer:

The activists who interrupted Biden's closing statement said they did so because there have been too few immigration questions in this cycle's debates:

The Bloomberg campaign shared old clips of Biden praising the former mayor, and Biden hit back:

Videos of the day

A group glued tiny "Make America Great Again" hats onto pigeons in Las Vegas:

Group glues tiny MAGA hats onto pigeons in Las Vegas

▶ 0:57

Trevor Noah shared what his ideal presidential debate would look like:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Book Club for our weekly selection of book reviews and recommendations from Book World editor Ron Charles. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: The Democratic debate descends into class warfare, as the billionaire and socialist play off each other
Date: Thursday, February 20, 2020 9:48:41 AM

COMMITTED TO
AFFORDABLE CARE
FOR THE HEALTH OF AMERICA<sup>SM</sup>

BlueCross
BlueShield
Association

Powered by  LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Partnership for America's Health Care Future

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

The Democratic debate descends into class warfare, as the billionaire and socialist play off each other

“Should you exist?”

NBC anchor Chuck Todd’s question to Mike Bloomberg during the Democratic debate in Las Vegas was prompted by a tweet last year from Bernie Sanders. “Billionaires should not exist,” the senator from Vermont wrote.

“I can't speak for all billionaires,” the former New York mayor answered on Wednesday night. “All I know is I've been very lucky, made a lot of money, and I'm giving it all away to make this country better.”

Todd followed up: “Should you have earned that much money?”

“Yes,” Bloomberg replied. “I worked very hard for it.”

Sanders, who identifies as a democratic socialist, says the word billionaire like it's a grotesque slur. “Mike Bloomberg owns more wealth than the bottom 125 million Americans,” he replied. “That's wrong. That's immoral.”

The sizzling two-hour debate underscored the extent to which class has emerged as a stark dividing line inside the factionalized Democratic Party, as significant as race or gender. The proliferation of soak-the-rich rhetoric at this level of presidential politics would have been unthinkable in the not-distant past. Sanders has moved the Overton window to the left on a battery of issues, including the debate over the virtues of capitalism itself.

Bloomberg leaned on his financial success as a differentiator.

“I’m the only one here that’s ever started a business,” he said. The chief executive of Bloomberg LP has spent more than $409 million since launching his campaign just 10 weeks ago. That money has, essentially, bought him second place in national polling. It’s still less than 1 percent of his net worth, which Forbes estimates at $65.2 billion – making him the eighth richest person in America.

Elizabeth Warren compared Bloomberg to President Trump.

“Democrats take a huge risk if we just substitute one arrogant billionaire for another,” said the senator from Massachusetts, as he stood next to her, avoiding eye contact.

Just as Trump did four years ago, Bloomberg cites his wealth as evidence that he’s incorruptible. After Pete Buttigieg urged people to visit his campaign website, for example, Bloomberg joked that people can go to his, as well, but they won’t be able to give money because he’s not raising any. Unlike Trump, though, Bloomberg is not pretending to be a populist. He’s running as a managerial technocrat who can make the trains run on time.

Class-tinged resentments were a consistent undercurrent in the pile-on against Bloomberg. “As the lone person on this stage who’s not a millionaire, let alone a billionaire,” said the former mayor of South Bend, Ind., “I believe that part of what needs to change is for the voices of the communities that haven’t felt heard on Wall Street or in Washington to actually be brought to Capitol Hill.”

Joe Biden chimed in. “For 36 years [in the Senate] and as vice president, I was listed as the poorest man in Congress,” he said. “I made money when I wrote a book about my son, and it surprised me how much it sold. First time I’ve ever made any money.”

The crowd booed Bloomberg when he explained why it would take a few more “weeks” to release his tax returns.

“Unfortunately, or fortunately, I make a lot of money and we do business all around the world, and we are preparing it,” he explained. “The number of pages will probably be thousands of pages. I can't go to TurboTax."

"Pay overtime," said Warren, "and get it done."

Amy Klobuchar noted that her husband prepares their taxes. "We probably could go to TurboTax," said the senator from Minnesota.

Because of the ongoing realignment between the parties, the Democratic coalition writ large has become more affluent and highly educated. Many blue-collar, non-college-educated whites in places like the industrial Midwest have gravitated away from their ancestral home toward the GOP because of cultural grievances, among other factors.

Sanders, however, tailors his message more to the working class than the middle class. His rallies have a decidedly more blue-collar vibe than Buttigieg's or Klobuchar's or Warren's. During a town hall-style meeting the weekend before last in New Hampshire, for instance, a speaker warming up the crowd for Sanders asked how many people currently work for minimum wage. More than a third of the people in the audience raised their hands.

"What our movement is about is bringing working-class people together, black and white and Latino, Native American, Asian American, around an agenda that works for all of us and not just the billionaire class," Sanders said in the debate. "Real change never takes place from the top on down. It never takes place from an oligarchy controlled by billionaires."

Content from Partnership for America's Health Care Future

We Can't Afford Medicare for All

American families should not be forced to foot the bill for Medicare for All. And any new government insurance system would force them to pay more to wait longer for worse care.

Sanders continued to attack Buttigieg for having the temerity to even accept money from 46 billionaires. “We are giving a voice to people who are saying we are sick and tired of billionaires like Mr. Bloomberg seeing huge expansions of their wealth while half-a-million people sleep out on the street tonight,” said Sanders. “What we are saying, Pete, is maybe it's time for the working class of this country to have a little bit of power in Washington, rather than your billionaire campaign contributors.”

Buttigieg, who got pummeled at the December debate for holding a fundraiser in a Napa Valley wine cave, replied that the billionaires are “among the hundreds of thousands of contributors” to his campaign. “You're not the only one who cares about the working class,” he told Sanders. “Most Americans believe we need to empower workers.” Buttigieg added that “you're the one who is at war with the Culinary Union right here in Las Vegas.” To which Sanders replied: “We’ve got more union support than you have ever dreamed of.”

You could sense the urgency, even the desperation, in the air as several of the candidates whose futures hinge on the coming weeks waved their arms to be recognized. “We've got to wake up as a party,” Buttigieg pleaded with the audience. “We could wake up two weeks from today, the day after Super Tuesday, and the only candidates left standing will be Bernie Sanders and Mike Bloomberg, the two most polarizing figures on this stage. And most Americans don't see where they fit if they've got to choose between a socialist who thinks that capitalism is the root of all evil and a billionaire who thinks that money ought to be the root of all power.”

One reason Klobuchar’s clashes with Buttigieg were so intensely bitter is that they’re both trying to claim this middle ground. “I believe in capitalism, but I think the goal of someone in government ... should be a check on that,” she said. “I'm not going to limit what people make, but right now our tax code is so tilted against regular people, and that is what's wrong.”

Warren boasts in her stump speech about how she made a billionaire cry on television with her wealth tax proposal. People chant “two cents” at her events as she explains how anyone worth more than $50 million will need to pay 2 percent of their net worth in taxes every year – including, as she puts it, on their yachts, Rembrandts and diamonds. The cheers are louder when Warren talks about taxing the superrich than when she explains what she'll do with that extra revenue. That speaks volumes about the pitchfork populism that's been ascendant on the left.

For his part, even Bloomberg goes out of his way to say the rich must pay more in taxes. “I disagree with the senator on the wealth tax, but I do agree with her that the rich aren't paying their fair share,” Bloomberg volunteered during the debate. “We should raise taxes on the rich. I did that as mayor in New York City.” Then Sanders complimented Warren’s proposed wealth tax. “Ours is a little bit tougher on Mr. Bloomberg than hers,” he added, with pride.

Bloomberg and Sanders both saw the other as a useful foil since they appeal to different constituencies. “I believe in democratic socialism for working people, not billionaires,” said Sanders. “Creating a government that works for all, not just for Mr. Bloomberg.”

“What a wonderful country we have,” Bloomberg replied. “The best-known socialist in the country happens to be a millionaire with three houses. What did I miss here?”

Sanders replied that his first house is in Washington, where he works, and the second is in Burlington, Vt., where he lives. “And like thousands of other Vermonters, I do have a summer camp,” he added. “We have the insane situation that billionaires today, if you can believe it, have an effective tax rate lower than the middle class.” Bloomberg replied that Sanders, as a member of Congress, can write the tax code.

Asked whether workers should be able to sit on corporate boards, something Sanders and Warren support, Bloomberg said absolutely not. “I can’t think of a way that would make it easier for Donald Trump to get reelected than listening to this conversation,” he said. Bloomberg argued that Sanders couldn’t defeat Trump in a general election because he’s too far to the left and wants to take away people’s private health insurance.

“Maybe we can talk about a billionaire saying that we should not raise the minimum wage,” Sanders countered. “If that’s a way to beat Donald Trump, wow, I would be very surprised.”

NBC’s Lester Holt, another moderator, asked Sanders about the latest NBC-Wall Street Journal poll that found two-thirds of all voters said they were uncomfortable with a socialist candidate for president. Asked what message he has for them, Sanders replied that the same poll showed him leading among Democratic voters. “I was winning, and I think by a fairly comfortable margin,” he said. “You might mention that.”

Bloomberg suggested that Sanders is really a communist, not a socialist. “We’re not going to throw out capitalism. We tried that. Other countries tried that,” he said. “It was called communism, and it just didn’t work.”

“That’s a cheap shot,” Sanders replied, clarifying that what he stands for is democratic socialism. “We are living, in many ways, in a socialist society right now. The problem is, as Dr. Martin Luther King reminded us, we have socialism for the very rich [and] rugged individualism for the poor.”

There were class undertones even when the debate turned to topics related to gender. Klobuchar seized on a memo released by the

Bloomberg campaign that said the other moderates should step aside to “pave the way” for Bloomberg to stop Sanders from capturing the nomination. “As a woman,” the senator said, “I've been told many times to wait my turn and to step aside. And I'm not going to do that now. ... We need something different than Donald Trump. I don't think you look at Donald Trump and say we need someone richer in the White House.”

Bloomberg's riches also probably help explain the sense of entitlement he exuded. He seemed like a man unaccustomed to both waiting on others and being challenged. He was caught on camera rolling his eyes at criticism. When moderators didn't come back to him during a discussion on health care, Bloomberg was clearly perturbed. “What am I,” he said, “chicken liver?”

Bloomberg hadn't debated since 2009, and it showed. He's not on the ballot in Nevada, which caucuses on Saturday, or in South Carolina, whose primary is the following Saturday. He's invested in the states that vote on Super Tuesday, four days after that, so he can make up some for his wobbly debate debut during a CBS debate next week in the Palmetto State. “He was just warming up,” campaign manager Kevin Sheekey said in a statement afterward.

---

Quote of the day

Tom Steyer, the other billionaire seeking the Democratic nomination, didn't qualify for this debate but tweeted throughout. “Looks like Mike Bloomberg might be running in the wrong primary,” he wrote.

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

More from our team coverage

- Dan Balz: “It’s a critical moment in the Democratic race. The debate made that clear.”
- Michael Kranish: “Bloomberg faces attacks for refusing to release women from confidentiality agreements.”

- Glenn Kessler, Salvador Rizzo and Sarah Cahlan fact-checked seven claims.

What pundits are saying about winners and losers

- The Fix's Aaron Blake declared Sanders the winner, along with Warren's takedowns of Bloomberg. His losers were Bloomberg, Biden and Klobuchar.
- CNN's Chris Cillizza said Warren, Sanders and a combo of Buttigieg and Biden won the night while Bloomberg and Klobuchar lost.
- Vox's team declared Warren and Sanders the winners and Bloomberg the loser.
- Mother Jones editor Clara Jeffery said Warren was the runaway winner, while Bloomberg delivered a “horribly bad” performance.
- FiveThirtyEight's Nate Silver's top takeaway is that Bloomberg bombed.
- Democratic operative Mary Anne Marsh, writing for Fox News, called Warren the winner and Bloomberg the loser. Fox anchor Bret Baier said Trump was actually the biggest winner.
- Washington Examiner's Becket Adams argued that Warren won the debate – for Sanders.

How it's playing elsewhere

- The Las Vegas Review-Journal's editorial board: “Nevada Democrats should reject extremism.”
- Politico's John Harris: “Thank you, Mike Bloomberg, for rescuing the debate.”
- Shira Scheindlin op-ed in the New York Times: “I Was the Judge in the Stop-and-Frisk Case. I Don't Think Bloomberg Is Racist.”
- The Boston Globe's Joan Vennochi: “The double standard for old sexist Democrats.”

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

More on 2020

Democrats won't commit to a same-day release of the Nevada results.

“Tom Perez, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, told The Associated Press that several factors, including early voting and potentially high turnout, could affect the tabulation and timing of results. In addition, Nevada, like Iowa, will be reporting three sets of data from the multistage caucus process. Perez said he doesn't know when results will be released. ‘We’re going to do our best to release results as soon as possible, but our North Star, again, is accuracy,’ he said late Tuesday after touring an early voting site in Las Vegas.”

Despite Warren’s rejection of super PACs, one launched to support her bid.

“The group, Persist PAC, filed its papers on Tuesday,” Michelle Ye Hee Lee reports. “It has already launched a 30-second ad in Nevada highlighting the senator’s record establishing a federal financial watchdog agency and supporting policies that help women and middle-class families. ... [Warren] has emphatically rejected super PACs and attacked her opponents receiving their help. In a statement, Warren’s campaign said the senator’s position has not changed. ... The statement did not address Warren’s feelings about Persist PAC, however, and the campaign did not respond to questions about whether the senator thinks the group should continue to exist to support her candidacy.”

Warren’s campaign announced that it raised more than $1 million during the debate and $2.8 million during the course of Wednesday.

Barack Obama has privately said he doesn’t like the idea of Sanders as a nominee.

“To Obama, Sanders is a lot of what’s wrong with Democrats: unrelenting, unrealistic, so deep in his own fight that he doesn’t see how many people disagree with him or that he’s turning off people who should be his allies,” the Atlantic’s Edward-Isaac Dove reports. “Obama has made clear in private conversations that he doesn’t like the idea of Sanders as the nominee (and has been only slightly more subtle in public comments), but he’s pushed back on some who have urged him to get involved, anxious that any move he makes could destroy the hope of him using his unique position to unite the party and defeat Trump during the general election. ... Obama is determined to make it work — if he has to.”

Sanders was serious enough about waging a primary challenge against Obama in 2012 that then-Senate majority leader Harry

Reid had to intervene to stop him, according to the story: “It took Reid two conversations over the summer of 2011 to get Sanders to scrap the idea, according to multiple people who remember the incident. ... That summer, Sanders privately discussed a potential primary challenge to Obama with several people, including Patrick Leahy, his fellow Vermont senator. Leahy, alarmed, warned Jim Messina, Obama’s presidential reelection-campaign manager. Obama’s campaign team was ‘absolutely panicked’ by Leahy’s report, Messina [said], since ‘every president who has gotten a real primary has lost a general [election].’ ... In another incident, in 2013, Sanders laid into Obama in a private meeting he held with Democratic senators, saying that the president was selling out to Republicans over Social Security benefits.” Obama replied that he didn't need to be lectured.

As Super Tuesday approaches, the candidates are rolling out endorsements.

- Bloomberg this morning unveiled endorsements from three more Democratic members of Congress – Nita Lowey (N.Y.), Pete Aguilar (Calif.) and Josh Gottheimer (N.J.) – bringing his total to 16.
- Rep. Sylvia Garcia (D-Tex.), one of the House impeachment managers, backed Biden, giving him his sixth supporter from the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. (Politico)
- Virginia state Sen. Creigh Deeds, the 2009 nominee for governor, endorsed Klobuchar. (Roanoke Times)
- Three Arizona state senators – Andrea Dalessandro, Jamescita Peshlakai and Victoria Steele – endorsed Warren on the first day of early voting in the state. The state votes March 17. (Arizona Mirror)

The Bloomberg campaign is paying people $2,500 a month to promote him to all their contacts.

The campaign is hiring more than 500 “deputy digital organizers” to work 20 to 30 hours a week, documents reviewed by the Wall Street Journal show. The workers are expected to promote Bloomberg weekly to everyone in their phone's contacts by text message and make daily social media posts supporting him.

Andrew Yang joined CNN as a political commentator.

“Learned a lot these past months and am glad to contribute to the public discussion,” said the former presidential contender, who dropped out after the New Hampshire primary.

Florida’s new law prohibiting certain ex-felons from voting was ruled unconstitutional.

The rule would’ve prohibited ex-felons who cannot pay certain legal fines from voting. The case “could have significant consequences for one of the country’s largest swing states,” Elise Viebeck reports. “In a unanimous ruling, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit affirmed a lower court’s finding that Florida’s S.B. 7066 violates the Constitution’s guarantee of equal protection under the law. The panel also upheld that court’s preliminary injunction barring enforcement for the plaintiffs. Florida’s governor immediately signaled that he would appeal the decision to the full circuit. ... ‘Continued disenfranchisement is indisputably punitive in nature,’ the judges wrote, adding, ‘Felons who are unable to pay are subject to continued punishment solely because of their inability to pay.’ ”

The White House predicts the economy will not grow at a rate of 3 percent or higher this year.

The Council of Economic Advisers forecasts that, unless Congress enacts a major infrastructure package and additional tax cuts, the U.S. economy will grow at a 2.4 percent pace this year and at a 2.3 percent pace in 2021. (Heather Long)

---

All the president's men

President Trump takes the stage at a campaign rally on Wednesday night at Veterans Memorial Coliseum in Phoenix. (Evan Vucci/AP)

Mick Mulvaney admitted that the GOP is hypocritical on deficits.

“My party is very interested in deficits when there is a Democrat in the White House. The worst thing in the whole world is deficits when Barack Obama was the president. Then Donald Trump became president, and we’re a lot less interested as a party,” he said at the Oxford Union to a group of several hundred people.

“Mulvaney, who ran the Office of Management and Budget before taking the acting chief of staff role, said he found the growing deficit — which reached almost $1 trillion in 2019, soaring in the Trump era — ‘extraordinarily disturbing’ but that neither party, nor voters, cared much about it,” Josh Dawsey reports. “Mulvaney’s comments, which lasted about an hour, came as he visited Britain and Ireland to talk about Brexit and other issues. ... He criticized his predecessor, John F. Kelly, as chief of staff, and railed against the ‘deep state,’ giving the audience examples of civil servants who he said were working against the Trump administration. ...

“Mulvaney robustly defended the president’s actions regarding Ukraine ... He said the president regularly complained that Europeans don’t give Ukraine enough money. ‘And number two, they’re corrupt as hell, which is true,’ Mulvaney said. ... He joked about his news conference last year in which he conceded, from the White House podium, that there was a ‘quid pro quo’ and that it was normal in foreign policy and that people should ‘get over it.’ Mulvaney said he realized he’d made a mistake when he walked away from the podium. Another White House official, he said, ‘came up to me and said, ‘Do you know you just said X?’ I said, ‘No I didn’t say that.’” Soon, he realized, ‘S---, I said X.’ Mulvaney issued a statement later that day attacking the media for mischaracterizing his comments.”

Trump fired the Pentagon’s policy chief, who spoke out internally against his freeze on Ukraine aid.

Undersecretary of Defense for Policy John Rood, who was charged with certifying that Ukraine met its anti-corruption targets in order to receive U.S. military aid, was dismissed after clashing with colleagues over the implementation of Trump’s foreign policy agenda for more than two years, Paul Sonne and Missy Ryan report. His last day is Feb. 28. “Rood wrote that he understood, from speaking to Defense Secretary Mark T. Esper, that Trump had requested his resignation. ... In an email to Esper hours after Trump’s July 25 call with Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelensky, Rood said that ‘placing a hold on security assistance at this time would jeopardize this unique window of opportunity and undermine our defense priorities with a key partner in the strategic competition with Russia.’ ... The hold proceeded anyway.”

Trump will install German ambassador Richard Grenell as acting director of national intelligence.

Trump is nominating “a fiercely loyal ally atop an intelligence structure he has frequently railed against,” Shane Harris, Anne Gearan and Dawsey report. “It is unclear whether Trump intends to nominate Grenell to fill the top intelligence post on a permanent basis, which would require Senate confirmation. The appointment took many in Washington, including on Capitol Hill, by surprise. Grenell, a former State Department official and communications executive, has been a Trump confidant and ad hoc adviser on issues beyond his ambassadorial work in Berlin. He is a conservative foreign policy hawk and sometime media critic, as well as a vocal supporter of Trump on social media. He has sparked controversy in his diplomatic role, but also won praise in Germany and elsewhere for taking on issues such as gay rights in Eastern Europe and the long-running tensions between Kosovo and Serbia. Grenell would be the first openly gay member of the Trump Cabinet.”

Trump continues to test his relationship with Bill Barr by tweeting about the Justice Department.

A day after it was revealed that the attorney general has told people close to Trump that he’s considered quitting, the president amplified “conservative allies demanding he ‘clean house’ at the Justice Department and target those involved in the Russia investigation that once threatened his presidency,” John Wagner, Matt Zapposky and Devlin Barrett report. “The grievances shared by Trump in a flurry of morning tweets included claims of a ‘seditious conspiracy’ against him, and attacks on a ‘criminal gang’ at the FBI and the Justice Department.” The fragile equilibrium may be tested again Thursday, as Roger Stone is scheduled to be sentenced for lying to Congress and obstruction.

John Bolton said his testimony wouldn’t have changed the outcome of the impeachment trial.

The former national security adviser “denounced the House’s impeachment proceedings against [Trump] as ‘grossly partisan’ and said his testimony would not have changed Trump’s acquittal in the Senate,” the AP reports. “Bolton was on stage at Vanderbilt University with former national security adviser Susan Rice, who questioned Bolton’s refusal to discuss more details. ... Bolton contended that the House ‘committed impeachment malpractice,’ drawing some grumbling from the audience, saying ‘the process drove Republicans who might have voted for impeachment away because it was so partisan.’ He also said he didn’t expect the Senate to vote against having him testify. ‘People can argue about what I should have said and what I should have done,' Bolton said. 'I would bet you a dollar right here and now, my testimony would have made no difference to the ultimate outcome.'”

Mike Pompeo and lawmakers sparred over “deep state” attacks while in Munich.

“The meeting became contentious early on, when Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) confronted Pompeo about what the senator described as a severe morale problem among Foreign Service officers and civil servants working for the State Department both in Washington and around the world,” Josh Rogin reports. “Pompeo reacted angrily. The secretary didn’t just deny that he had failed to protect his employees sufficiently; he also claimed that morale at the State Department is great, according to four lawmakers who were in the room.”

Rod Blagojevich, the ex-Illinois governor convicted of trying to peddle Barack Obama's vacated U.S. Senate seat, waves as he exits his home after Trump commuted his prison sentence. (Joshua Lott/Reuters)

Trump is considering more pardons.

The president assembled a team of advisers to guide the clemency process. “The White House is moving to take more direct control over pardons and commutations, with Trump aiming to limit the role of the Justice Department in the clemency process as he weighs a flurry of additional pardon announcements,” Toluse Olorunnipa, Dawsey and Neena Satija report. “Trump, who granted clemency Tuesday to a group of 11 people that included several political allies and supporters, has assembled a team of advisers to recommend and vet candidates for pardons. ... The group, essentially an informal task force of at least a half-dozen presidential allies, has been meeting since late last year to discuss a revamped pardon system in the White House. Jared Kushner, Trump’s son-in-law and senior adviser, is taking a leading role in the new clemency initiative. ... Trump, who prefers granting clemency to people with compelling personal stories or lengthy sentences, is inclined to grant more pardons before facing voters in November, one official said.” (Interesting op-ed by John K. Carroll: “I was a prosecutor in the Michael Milken case. I’m outraged at the pardon process.”)

Julian Assange’s lawyer said a then-GOP congressman dangled a pardon if he would absolve Russia in the DNC hack. Assange’s attorney told a British judge that former Republican congressman Dana Rohrabacher, a Trump ally who lost in 2018, made an offer to the WikiLeaks founder on behalf of Trump in 2017 to pardon Assange in exchange for saying that Russia had nothing to do with the 2016 hack and leak of DNC emails. “Assange is in a British prison while he awaits a decision on an extradition request by the United States,” William Booth and Ellen Nakashima report. “In a statement posted to his website on Wednesday, Rohrabacher said ... ‘at no time did I offer Julian Assange anything from the President because I had not spoken with the President about this issue at all.’ But, he added, he told Assange that if he gave him evidence about who provided him the DNC emails, he would ask Trump to pardon him. White House press secretary Stephanie Grisham on Wednesday denied the allegation that Trump was seeking a trade with Assange.”

An unrepentant Rod Blagojevich declared himself “a freed political prisoner” as he spoke to reporters outside his Chicago home. “We want to express our most profound and everlasting gratitude to President Trump,” said the former Democratic governor of Illinois.

(Susan Berger and John Wagner)

Trump granted clemency to three of Alice Johnson’s friends.

The women said they hadn't spoken in years with Johnson, whom Trump freed in 2018, and were only vaguely aware of her efforts, Beth Reinhard reports.

Trump’s pardon of Bernie Kerik also apparently wiped out $103,000 of the former New York City police commissioner’s debt to taxpayers. The White House credited the president's personal lawyer Rudy Giuliani – Kerik’s friend and former boss – for convincing Trump to pardon Kerik. (The Week)

---

The new world order

People suspected of being infected with the coronavirus wait to receive tests at a medical center in Daegu, South Korea. (Lee Moo-ryul/AP)

Coronavirus cases surged in South Korea.

“Authorities worldwide warned about the spread of the coronavirus beyond China on Thursday as Japan reported the first two deaths from the Diamond Princess cruise liner, South Korea reported its first fatality and a major city there asked citizens to refrain from venturing outdoors,” Gerry Shih, Rick Noack and Teo Armus report. “A Japanese man and woman, both said to be in their 80s, were among more than 600 passengers who contracted the disease while on board the Diamond Princess. They left the ship last week and had been hospitalized but died on Thursday ... In nearby South Korea, cases soared by nearly two-thirds, mostly in the southern part of the peninsula ... The mayor of Daegu, the city where 10 South Koreans contracted the disease from a church service, asked residents to stay indoors.

“Iran also reported two infected that then died. Many international experts say the disease will continue to spread globally even as the Chinese government seeks to present the image that it is coming to grips with the epidemic. New cases inside China dropped again Wednesday, officials reported Thursday, after national authorities changed for the second time in a week the criteria for how cases are diagnosed and counted.”

A “xenophobic” motive is suspected in an overnight shooting that left 10 dead in Germany.

“A spokesman for the Public Prosecutor General said that the office had taken over the investigation. Nine people were killed in shootings at the two hookah bars in Hanau, which is about 15 miles east of Frankfurt, on Wednesday night,” Loveday Morris, Rick Noack and Luisa Beck report. “The body of the suspected attacker, and that of another person, were found in his home in the early hours of Thursday morning, police said. They didn't provide any additional information, but said there were ‘no indications of further perpetrators.’ German newspaper Bild reported the second body belonged to the suspect's mother. Police said they couldn't provide details on the attacker's motive or comment on German news reports saying the shooter left a confessional letter and video that indicated a confused, extreme-right, anti-immigrant ideology.”

Britain wants to close its borders to low-skill migrants and lure English-speaking engineers.

“Home Secretary Priti Patel called the immigration plan ‘a historic moment for the whole country,’ as the government pledged to transform the British economy by starving its businesses of low-wage workers from Europe and forcing companies to adopt technology and automation instead,” William Booth and Karla Adam report. “The government said that beginning next year, it will reduce the overall number of migrants allowed into the country, honoring what it sees as one of the main mandates of the Brexit vote in June 2016. Prime Minister Boris Johnson, who led the campaign for Brexit, has called the new immigration regime revolutionary. His government formally outlined the new plan Wednesday, confirming that Britain will install a new ‘points-based’ system, which will take back control of its borders and end what it described as the country’s overreliance on low-skilled workers.”

A Mexican national was arrested in Florida on accusation of spying for Russia.

Hector Cabrera was arrested on charges that he collected information about a U.S. government informant on Russia, Brittany Shammas reports. “U.S. prosecutors claim he was carrying out orders from a Russian official who had recruited him with promises of helping his family. A Singapore resident and researcher at the country’s National Heart Center, Fuentes made several trips to Moscow to meet with the official, who directed him to rent a specific property in Miami-Dade County and report back to Russia the license plate and location of the informant’s car.”

Chris Steele said he feared assassination, directed by Russia, after he outlined alleged links between Trump and the Kremlin before the 2016 election. The Telegraph reports that the former MI6 agent feared reprisals after he circulated memos that become known as the Steele dossier.

Mexico is investigating ex-president Enrique Peña Nieto, a top official said. Peña Nieto has been linked to the high-profile bribery case against the former CEO of Pemex, the Wall Street Journal reports.

Saudi Prince Mohammed bin Salman is sparring no detail in the planning of the Group of 20 summit, which he hopes will shift focus from the killing of Washington Post contributing columnist Jamal Khashoggi. (Bloomberg News)

Scientists say we've dramatically underestimated how much methane gas we're emitting.

“The contention emerges in a new study in the influential journal Nature, which draws on samples of ancient air extracted from within the Greenland ice sheet to measure levels of atmospheric methane before humans started burning fossil fuels,” Chris Mooney reports. “If the researchers are right, then tens of millions of tons of methane could be wafting into the atmosphere, unaccounted for, from oil and gas fields around the world.”

---

Social media speed read

Elizabeth Warren got the most online buzz during the debate:

Most Tweeted About Democratic Candidates

Elizabeth Warren

Mike Bloomberg

Bernie Sanders

Joe Biden

Pete Buttigieg

Amy Klobuchar

Ninth Debate: February 19, 2020

Bloomberg's hometown papers were not gentle with their former mayor's debut performance:

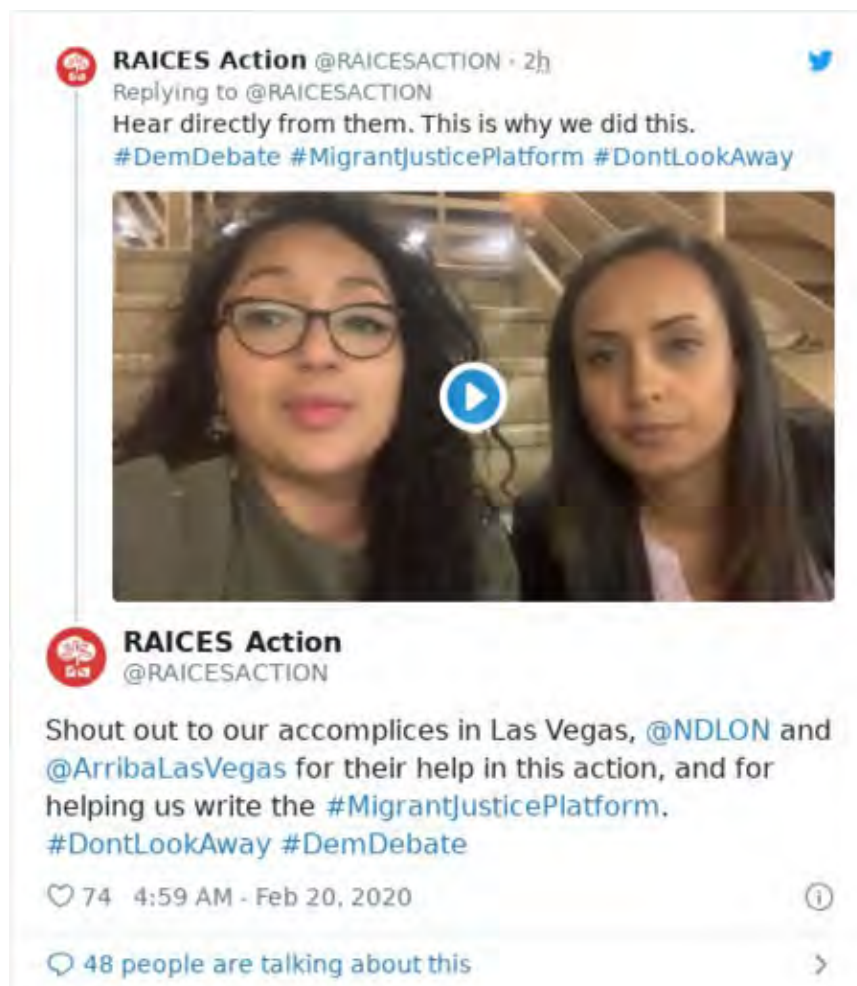

Not surprisingly, Trump also panned the former mayor's performance:

Warren didn't want to become an accidental influencer:

The activists who interrupted Biden's closing statement said they did so because there have been too few immigration questions in this cycle's debates:

The Bloomberg campaign shared old clips of Biden praising the former mayor, and Biden hit back:

Videos of the day

A group glued tiny "Make America Great Again" hats onto pigeons in Las Vegas:

Group glues tiny MAGA hats onto pigeons in Las Vegas

▶ 0:57

Trevor Noah shared what his ideal presidential debate would look like:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Book Club for our weekly selection of book reviews and recommendations from Book World editor Ron Charles. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: The Democratic debate descends into class warfare, as the billionaire and socialist play off each other
Date: Thursday, February 20, 2020 9:48:44 AM

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Partnership for America's Health Care Future

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
✉ Email

The Democratic debate descends into class warfare, as the billionaire and socialist play off each other

“Should you exist?”

NBC anchor Chuck Todd’s question to Mike Bloomberg during the Democratic debate in Las Vegas was prompted by a tweet last year from Bernie Sanders. “Billionaires should not exist,” the senator from Vermont wrote.

“I can't speak for all billionaires,” the former New York mayor answered on Wednesday night. “All I know is I've been very lucky, made a lot of money, and I'm giving it all away to make this country better.”

Todd followed up: “Should you have earned that much money?”

“Yes,” Bloomberg replied. “I worked very hard for it.”

Sanders, who identifies as a democratic socialist, says the word billionaire like it's a grotesque slur. “Mike Bloomberg owns more wealth than the bottom 125 million Americans,” he replied. “That's wrong. That's immoral.”

The sizzling two-hour debate underscored the extent to which class has emerged as a stark dividing line inside the factionalized Democratic Party, as significant as race or gender. The proliferation of soak-the-rich rhetoric at this level of presidential politics would have been unthinkable in the not-distant past. Sanders has moved the Overton window to the left on a battery of issues, including the debate over the virtues of capitalism itself.

Bloomberg leaned on his financial success as a differentiator.

“I’m the only one here that’s ever started a business,” he said. The chief executive of Bloomberg LP has spent more than $409 million since launching his campaign just 10 weeks ago. That money has, essentially, bought him second place in national polling. It’s still less than 1 percent of his net worth, which Forbes estimates at $65.2 billion – making him the eighth richest person in America.

Elizabeth Warren compared Bloomberg to President Trump.

“Democrats take a huge risk if we just substitute one arrogant billionaire for another,” said the senator from Massachusetts, as he stood next to her, avoiding eye contact.

Just as Trump did four years ago, Bloomberg cites his wealth as evidence that he’s incorruptible. After Pete Buttigieg urged people to visit his campaign website, for example, Bloomberg joked that people can go to his, as well, but they won’t be able to give money because he’s not raising any. Unlike Trump, though, Bloomberg is not pretending to be a populist. He’s running as a managerial technocrat who can make the trains run on time.

Class-tinged resentments were a consistent undercurrent in the pile-on against Bloomberg. “As the lone person on this stage who’s not a millionaire, let alone a billionaire,” said the former mayor of South Bend, Ind., “I believe that part of what needs to change is for the voices of the communities that haven’t felt heard on Wall Street or in Washington to actually be brought to Capitol Hill.”

Joe Biden chimed in. “For 36 years [in the Senate] and as vice president, I was listed as the poorest man in Congress,” he said. “I made money when I wrote a book about my son, and it surprised me how much it sold. First time I’ve ever made any money.”

The crowd booed Bloomberg when he explained why it would take a few more “weeks” to release his tax returns.

“Unfortunately, or fortunately, I make a lot of money and we do business all around the world, and we are preparing it,” he explained. “The number of pages will probably be thousands of pages. I can't go to TurboTax."

"Pay overtime," said Warren, "and get it done."

Amy Klobuchar noted that her husband prepares their taxes. "We probably could go to TurboTax," said the senator from Minnesota.

Because of the ongoing realignment between the parties, the Democratic coalition writ large has become more affluent and highly educated. Many blue-collar, non-college-educated whites in places like the industrial Midwest have gravitated away from their ancestral home toward the GOP because of cultural grievances, among other factors.

Sanders, however, tailors his message more to the working class than the middle class. His rallies have a decidedly more blue-collar vibe than Buttigieg's or Klobuchar's or Warren's. During a town hall-style meeting the weekend before last in New Hampshire, for instance, a speaker warming up the crowd for Sanders asked how many people currently work for minimum wage. More than a third of the people in the audience raised their hands.

"What our movement is about is bringing working-class people together, black and white and Latino, Native American, Asian American, around an agenda that works for all of us and not just the billionaire class," Sanders said in the debate. "Real change never takes place from the top on down. It never takes place from an oligarchy controlled by billionaires."

Content from Partnership for America's Health Care Future

We Can't Afford Medicare for All

American families should not be forced to foot the bill for Medicare for All. And any new government insurance system would force them to pay more to wait longer for worse care.

Sanders continued to attack Buttigieg for having the temerity to even accept money from 46 billionaires. “We are giving a voice to people who are saying we are sick and tired of billionaires like Mr. Bloomberg seeing huge expansions of their wealth while half-a-million people sleep out on the street tonight,” said Sanders. “What we are saying, Pete, is maybe it's time for the working class of this country to have a little bit of power in Washington, rather than your billionaire campaign contributors.”

Buttigieg, who got pummeled at the December debate for holding a fundraiser in a Napa Valley wine cave, replied that the billionaires are “among the hundreds of thousands of contributors” to his campaign. “You're not the only one who cares about the working class,” he told Sanders. “Most Americans believe we need to empower workers.” Buttigieg added that “you're the one who is at war with the Culinary Union right here in Las Vegas.” To which Sanders replied: “We’ve got more union support than you have ever dreamed of.”

You could sense the urgency, even the desperation, in the air as several of the candidates whose futures hinge on the coming weeks waved their arms to be recognized. “We've got to wake up as a party,” Buttigieg pleaded with the audience. “We could wake up two weeks from today, the day after Super Tuesday, and the only candidates left standing will be Bernie Sanders and Mike Bloomberg, the two most polarizing figures on this stage. And most Americans don't see where they fit if they've got to choose between a socialist who thinks that capitalism is the root of all evil and a billionaire who thinks that money ought to be the root of all power.”

One reason Klobuchar’s clashes with Buttigieg were so intensely bitter is that they’re both trying to claim this middle ground. “I believe in capitalism, but I think the goal of someone in government ... should be a check on that,” she said. “I'm not going to limit what people make, but right now our tax code is so tilted against regular people, and that is what's wrong.”

Warren boasts in her stump speech about how she made a billionaire cry on television with her wealth tax proposal. People chant “two cents” at her events as she explains how anyone worth more than $50 million will need to pay 2 percent of their net worth in taxes every year – including, as she puts it, on their yachts, Rembrandts and diamonds. The cheers are louder when Warren talks about taxing the superrich than when she explains what she'll do with that extra revenue. That speaks volumes about the pitchfork populism that's been ascendant on the left.

For his part, even Bloomberg goes out of his way to say the rich must pay more in taxes. “I disagree with the senator on the wealth tax, but I do agree with her that the rich aren't paying their fair share,” Bloomberg volunteered during the debate. “We should raise taxes on the rich. I did that as mayor in New York City.” Then Sanders complimented Warren’s proposed wealth tax. “Ours is a little bit tougher on Mr. Bloomberg than hers,” he added, with pride.

Bloomberg and Sanders both saw the other as a useful foil since they appeal to different constituencies. “I believe in democratic socialism for working people, not billionaires,” said Sanders. “Creating a government that works for all, not just for Mr. Bloomberg.”

“What a wonderful country we have,” Bloomberg replied. “The best-known socialist in the country happens to be a millionaire with three houses. What did I miss here?”

Sanders replied that his first house is in Washington, where he works, and the second is in Burlington, Vt., where he lives. “And like thousands of other Vermonters, I do have a summer camp,” he added. “We have the insane situation that billionaires today, if you can believe it, have an effective tax rate lower than the middle class.” Bloomberg replied that Sanders, as a member of Congress, can write the tax code.

Asked whether workers should be able to sit on corporate boards, something Sanders and Warren support, Bloomberg said absolutely not. “I can’t think of a way that would make it easier for Donald Trump to get reelected than listening to this conversation,” he said. Bloomberg argued that Sanders couldn’t defeat Trump in a general election because he’s too far to the left and wants to take away people’s private health insurance.

“Maybe we can talk about a billionaire saying that we should not raise the minimum wage,” Sanders countered. “If that’s a way to beat Donald Trump, wow, I would be very surprised.”

NBC’s Lester Holt, another moderator, asked Sanders about the latest NBC-Wall Street Journal poll that found two-thirds of all voters said they were uncomfortable with a socialist candidate for president. Asked what message he has for them, Sanders replied that the same poll showed him leading among Democratic voters. “I was winning, and I think by a fairly comfortable margin,” he said. “You might mention that.”

Bloomberg suggested that Sanders is really a communist, not a socialist. “We’re not going to throw out capitalism. We tried that. Other countries tried that,” he said. “It was called communism, and it just didn’t work.”

“That’s a cheap shot,” Sanders replied, clarifying that what he stands for is democratic socialism. “We are living, in many ways, in a socialist society right now. The problem is, as Dr. Martin Luther King reminded us, we have socialism for the very rich [and] rugged individualism for the poor.”

There were class undertones even when the debate turned to topics related to gender. Klobuchar seized on a memo released by the

Bloomberg campaign that said the other moderates should step aside to “pave the way” for Bloomberg to stop Sanders from capturing the nomination. “As a woman,” the senator said, “I’ve been told many times to wait my turn and to step aside. And I’m not going to do that now. ... We need something different than Donald Trump. I don’t think you look at Donald Trump and say we need someone richer in the White House.”

Bloomberg’s riches also probably help explain the sense of entitlement he exuded. He seemed like a man unaccustomed to both waiting on others and being challenged. He was caught on camera rolling his eyes at criticism. When moderators didn’t come back to him during a discussion on health care, Bloomberg was clearly perturbed. “What am I,” he said, “chicken liver?”

Bloomberg hadn’t debated since 2009, and it showed. He’s not on the ballot in Nevada, which caucuses on Saturday, or in South Carolina, whose primary is the following Saturday. He’s invested in the states that vote on Super Tuesday, four days after that, so he can make up some for his wobbly debate debut during a CBS debate next week in the Palmetto State. “He was just warming up,” campaign manager Kevin Sheekey said in a statement afterward.

---

Quote of the day

Tom Steyer, the other billionaire seeking the Democratic nomination, didn’t qualify for this debate but tweeted throughout. “Looks like Mike Bloomberg might be running in the wrong primary,” he wrote.

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

More from our team coverage

- Dan Balz: “It’s a critical moment in the Democratic race. The debate made that clear.”
- Michael Kranish: “Bloomberg faces attacks for refusing to release women from confidentiality agreements.”

- Glenn Kessler, Salvador Rizzo and Sarah Cahlan fact-checked seven claims.

What pundits are saying about winners and losers

- The Fix's Aaron Blake declared Sanders the winner, along with Warren's takedowns of Bloomberg. His losers were Bloomberg, Biden and Klobuchar.
- CNN's Chris Cillizza said Warren, Sanders and a combo of Buttigieg and Biden won the night while Bloomberg and Klobuchar lost.
- Vox's team declared Warren and Sanders the winners and Bloomberg the loser.
- Mother Jones editor Clara Jeffery said Warren was the runaway winner, while Bloomberg delivered a “horribly bad” performance.
- FiveThirtyEight's Nate Silver's top takeaway is that Bloomberg bombed.
- Democratic operative Mary Anne Marsh, writing for Fox News, called Warren the winner and Bloomberg the loser. Fox anchor Bret Baier said Trump was actually the biggest winner.
- Washington Examiner's Becket Adams argued that Warren won the debate – for Sanders.

How it's playing elsewhere

- The Las Vegas Review-Journal's editorial board: “Nevada Democrats should reject extremism.”
- Politico's John Harris: “Thank you, Mike Bloomberg, for rescuing the debate.”
- Shira Scheindlin op-ed in the New York Times: “I Was the Judge in the Stop-and-Frisk Case. I Don't Think Bloomberg Is Racist.”
- The Boston Globe's Joan Vennochi: “The double standard for old sexist Democrats.”

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

More on 2020

Democrats won't commit to a same-day release of the Nevada results.

“Tom Perez, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, told The Associated Press that several factors, including early voting and potentially high turnout, could affect the tabulation and timing of results. In addition, Nevada, like Iowa, will be reporting three sets of data from the multistage caucus process. Perez said he doesn't know when results will be released. ‘We’re going to do our best to release results as soon as possible, but our North Star, again, is accuracy,' he said late Tuesday after touring an early voting site in Las Vegas.”

Despite Warren’s rejection of super PACs, one launched to support her bid.

“The group, Persist PAC, filed its papers on Tuesday,” Michelle Ye Hee Lee reports. “It has already launched a 30-second ad in Nevada highlighting the senator’s record establishing a federal financial watchdog agency and supporting policies that help women and middle-class families. ... [Warren] has emphatically rejected super PACs and attacked her opponents receiving their help. In a statement, Warren’s campaign said the senator’s position has not changed. ... The statement did not address Warren’s feelings about Persist PAC, however, and the campaign did not respond to questions about whether the senator thinks the group should continue to exist to support her candidacy.”

Warren’s campaign announced that it raised more than $1 million during the debate and $2.8 million during the course of Wednesday.

Barack Obama has privately said he doesn’t like the idea of Sanders as a nominee.

“To Obama, Sanders is a lot of what’s wrong with Democrats: unrelenting, unrealistic, so deep in his own fight that he doesn’t see how many people disagree with him or that he’s turning off people who should be his allies,” the Atlantic’s Edward-Isaac Dove reports. “Obama has made clear in private conversations that he doesn’t like the idea of Sanders as the nominee (and has been only slightly more subtle in public comments), but he’s pushed back on some who have urged him to get involved, anxious that any move he makes could destroy the hope of him using his unique position to unite the party and defeat Trump during the general election. ... Obama is determined to make it work — if he has to.”

Sanders was serious enough about waging a primary challenge against Obama in 2012 that then-Senate majority leader Harry Reid had to intervene to stop him, according to the story: “It took Reid two conversations over the summer of 2011 to get Sanders to scrap the idea, according to multiple people who remember the incident. ... That summer, Sanders privately discussed a potential primary challenge to Obama with several people, including Patrick Leahy, his fellow Vermont senator. Leahy, alarmed, warned Jim Messina, Obama's presidential reelection-campaign manager. Obama's campaign team was 'absolutely panicked' by Leahy's report, Messina [said], since 'every president who has gotten a real primary has lost a general [election].' ... In another incident, in 2013, Sanders laid into Obama in a private meeting he held with Democratic senators, saying that the president was selling out to Republicans over Social Security benefits." Obama replied that he didn't need to be lectured.

As Super Tuesday approaches, the candidates are rolling out endorsements.

- Bloomberg this morning unveiled endorsements from three more Democratic members of Congress – Nita Lowey (N.Y.), Pete Aguilar (Calif.) and Josh Gottheimer (N.J.) – bringing his total to 16.
- Rep. Sylvia Garcia (D-Tex.), one of the House impeachment managers, backed Biden, giving him his sixth supporter from the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. (Politico)
- Virginia state Sen. Creigh Deeds, the 2009 nominee for governor, endorsed Klobuchar. (Roanoke Times)
- Three Arizona state senators – Andrea Dalessandro, Jamescita Peshlakai and Victoria Steele – endorsed Warren on the first day of early voting in the state. The state votes March 17. (Arizona Mirror)

The Bloomberg campaign is paying people $2,500 a month to promote him to all their contacts.

The campaign is hiring more than 500 “deputy digital organizers” to work 20 to 30 hours a week, documents reviewed by the Wall Street Journal show. The workers are expected to promote Bloomberg weekly to everyone in their phone's contacts by text message and make daily social media posts supporting him.

Andrew Yang joined CNN as a political commentator.

“Learned a lot these past months and am glad to contribute to the public discussion,” said the former presidential contender, who dropped out after the New Hampshire primary.

Florida’s new law prohibiting certain ex-felons from voting was ruled unconstitutional.

The rule would’ve prohibited ex-felons who cannot pay certain legal fines from voting. The case “could have significant consequences for one of the country’s largest swing states,” Elise Viebeck reports. “In a unanimous ruling, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit affirmed a lower court’s finding that Florida’s S.B. 7066 violates the Constitution’s guarantee of equal protection under the law. The panel also upheld that court’s preliminary injunction barring enforcement for the plaintiffs. Florida’s governor immediately signaled that he would appeal the decision to the full circuit. ... ‘Continued disenfranchisement is indisputably punitive in nature,’ the judges wrote, adding, ‘Felons who are unable to pay are subject to continued punishment solely because of their inability to pay.’ ”

The White House predicts the economy will not grow at a rate of 3 percent or higher this year.

The Council of Economic Advisers forecasts that, unless Congress enacts a major infrastructure package and additional tax cuts, the U.S. economy will grow at a 2.4 percent pace this year and at a 2.3 percent pace in 2021. (Heather Long)

---

All the president's men

President Trump takes the stage at a campaign rally on Wednesday night at Veterans Memorial Coliseum in Phoenix. (Evan Vucci/AP)

Mick Mulvaney admitted that the GOP is hypocritical on deficits.

“My party is very interested in deficits when there is a Democrat in the White House. The worst thing in the whole world is deficits when Barack Obama was the president. Then Donald Trump became president, and we’re a lot less interested as a party,” he said at the Oxford Union to a group of several hundred people.

“Mulvaney, who ran the Office of Management and Budget before taking the acting chief of staff role, said he found the growing deficit — which reached almost $1 trillion in 2019, soaring in the Trump era — ‘extraordinarily disturbing’ but that neither party, nor voters, cared much about it,” Josh Dawsey reports. “Mulvaney’s comments, which lasted about an hour, came as he visited Britain and Ireland to talk about Brexit and other issues. ... He criticized his predecessor, John F. Kelly, as chief of staff, and railed against the ‘deep state,’ giving the audience examples of civil servants who he said were working against the Trump administration. ...

“Mulvaney robustly defended the president’s actions regarding Ukraine ... He said the president regularly complained that Europeans don’t give Ukraine enough money. ‘And number two, they’re corrupt as hell, which is true,’ Mulvaney said. ... He joked about his news conference last year in which he conceded, from the White House podium, that there was a ‘quid pro quo’ and that it was normal in foreign policy and that people should ‘get over it.’ Mulvaney said he realized he’d made a mistake when he walked away from the podium. Another White House official, he said, ‘came up to me and said, ‘Do you know you just said X?’ I said, ‘No I didn’t say that.’” Soon, he realized, ‘S---, I said X.’ Mulvaney issued a statement later that day attacking the media for mischaracterizing his comments.”

Trump fired the Pentagon’s policy chief, who spoke out internally against his freeze on Ukraine aid.

Undersecretary of Defense for Policy John Rood, who was charged with certifying that Ukraine met its anti-corruption targets in order to receive U.S. military aid, was dismissed after clashing with colleagues over the implementation of Trump’s foreign policy agenda for more than two years, Paul Sonne and Missy Ryan report. His last day is Feb. 28. “Rood wrote that he understood, from speaking to Defense Secretary Mark T. Esper, that Trump had requested his resignation. ... In an email to Esper hours after Trump’s July 25 call with Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelensky, Rood said that ‘placing a hold on security assistance at this time would jeopardize this unique window of opportunity and undermine our defense priorities with a key partner in the strategic competition with Russia.’ ... The hold proceeded anyway.”

Trump will install German ambassador Richard Grenell as acting director of national intelligence.

Trump is nominating “a fiercely loyal ally atop an intelligence structure he has frequently railed against,” Shane Harris, Anne Gearan and Dawsey report. “It is unclear whether Trump intends to nominate Grenell to fill the top intelligence post on a permanent basis, which would require Senate confirmation. The appointment took many in Washington, including on Capitol Hill, by surprise. Grenell, a former State Department official and communications executive, has been a Trump confidant and ad hoc adviser on issues beyond his ambassadorial work in Berlin. He is a conservative foreign policy hawk and sometime media critic, as well as a vocal supporter of Trump on social media. He has sparked controversy in his diplomatic role, but also won praise in Germany and elsewhere for taking on issues such as gay rights in Eastern Europe and the long-running tensions between Kosovo and Serbia. Grenell would be the first openly gay member of the Trump Cabinet.”

Trump continues to test his relationship with Bill Barr by tweeting about the Justice Department.

A day after it was revealed that the attorney general has told people close to Trump that he’s considered quitting, the president amplified “conservative allies demanding he ‘clean house’ at the Justice Department and target those involved in the Russia investigation that once threatened his presidency,” John Wagner, Matt Zaptosky and Devlin Barrett report. “The grievances shared by Trump in a flurry of morning tweets included claims of a ‘seditious conspiracy’ against him, and attacks on a ‘criminal gang’ at the FBI and the Justice Department.” The fragile equilibrium may be tested again Thursday, as Roger Stone is scheduled to be sentenced for lying to Congress and obstruction.

John Bolton said his testimony wouldn’t have changed the outcome of the impeachment trial.

The former national security adviser “denounced the House’s impeachment proceedings against [Trump] as ‘grossly partisan’ and said his testimony would not have changed Trump’s acquittal in the Senate,” the AP reports. “Bolton was on stage at Vanderbilt University with former national security adviser Susan Rice, who questioned Bolton’s refusal to discuss more details. ... Bolton contended that the House ‘committed impeachment malpractice,’ drawing some grumbling from the audience, saying ‘the process drove Republicans who might have voted for impeachment away because it was so partisan.’ He also said he didn’t expect the Senate to vote against having him testify. ‘People can argue about what I should have said and what I should have done,' Bolton said. 'I would bet you a dollar right here and now, my testimony would have made no difference to the ultimate outcome.'”

Mike Pompeo and lawmakers sparred over “deep state” attacks while in Munich.

“The meeting became contentious early on, when Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) confronted Pompeo about what the senator described as a severe morale problem among Foreign Service officers and civil servants working for the State Department both in Washington and around the world,” Josh Rogin reports. “Pompeo reacted angrily. The secretary didn’t just deny that he had failed to protect his employees sufficiently; he also claimed that morale at the State Department is great, according to four lawmakers who were in the room.”

Rod Blagojevich, the ex-Illinois governor convicted of trying to peddle Barack Obama's vacated U.S. Senate seat, waves as he exits his home after Trump commuted his prison sentence. (Joshua Lott/Reuters)

Trump is considering more pardons.

The president assembled a team of advisers to guide the clemency process. “The White House is moving to take more direct control over pardons and commutations, with Trump aiming to limit the role of the Justice Department in the clemency process as he weighs a flurry of additional pardon announcements,” Toluse Olorunnipa, Dawsey and Neena Satija report. “Trump, who granted clemency Tuesday to a group of 11 people that included several political allies and supporters, has assembled a team of advisers to recommend and vet candidates for pardons. ... The group, essentially an informal task force of at least a half-dozen presidential allies, has been meeting since late last year to discuss a revamped pardon system in the White House. Jared Kushner, Trump’s son-in-law and senior adviser, is taking a leading role in the new clemency initiative. ... Trump, who prefers granting clemency to people with compelling personal stories or lengthy sentences, is inclined to grant more pardons before facing voters in November, one official said.” (Interesting op-ed by John K. Carroll: “I was a prosecutor in the Michael Milken case. I’m outraged at the pardon process.”)

Julian Assange’s lawyer said a then-GOP congressman dangled a pardon if he would absolve Russia in the DNC hack. Assange’s attorney told a British judge that former Republican congressman Dana Rohrabacher, a Trump ally who lost in 2018, made an offer to the WikiLeaks founder on behalf of Trump in 2017 to pardon Assange in exchange for saying that Russia had nothing to do with the 2016 hack and leak of DNC emails. “Assange is in a British prison while he awaits a decision on an extradition request by the United States,” William Booth and Ellen Nakashima report. “In a statement posted to his website on Wednesday, Rohrabacher said ... ‘at no time did I offer Julian Assange anything from the President because I had not spoken with the President about this issue at all.’ But, he added, he told Assange that if he gave him evidence about who provided him the DNC emails, he would ask Trump to pardon him. White House press secretary Stephanie Grisham on Wednesday denied the allegation that Trump was seeking a trade with Assange.”

An unrepentant Rod Blagojevich declared himself “a freed political prisoner” as he spoke to reporters outside his Chicago home. “We want to express our most profound and everlasting gratitude to President Trump,” said the former Democratic governor of Illinois.

(Susan Berger and John Wagner)

Trump granted clemency to three of Alice Johnson’s friends.

The women said they hadn't spoken in years with Johnson, whom Trump freed in 2018, and were only vaguely aware of her efforts, Beth Reinhard reports.

Trump’s pardon of Bernie Kerik also apparently wiped out $103,000 of the former New York City police commissioner’s debt to taxpayers. The White House credited the president's personal lawyer Rudy Giuliani – Kerik’s friend and former boss – for convincing Trump to pardon Kerik. (The Week)

---

The new world order

People suspected of being infected with the coronavirus wait to receive tests at a medical center in Daegu, South Korea. (Lee Moo-ryul/AP)

Coronavirus cases surged in South Korea.

“Authorities worldwide warned about the spread of the coronavirus beyond China on Thursday as Japan reported the first two deaths from the Diamond Princess cruise liner, South Korea reported its first fatality and a major city there asked citizens to refrain from venturing outdoors,” Gerry Shih, Rick Noack and Teo Armus report. “A Japanese man and woman, both said to be in their 80s, were among more than 600 passengers who contracted the disease while on board the Diamond Princess. They left the ship last week and had been hospitalized but died on Thursday ... In nearby South Korea, cases soared by nearly two-thirds, mostly in the southern part of the peninsula ... The mayor of Daegu, the city where 10 South Koreans contracted the disease from a church service, asked residents to stay indoors.

“Iran also reported two infected that then died. Many international experts say the disease will continue to spread globally even as the Chinese government seeks to present the image that it is coming to grips with the epidemic. New cases inside China dropped again Wednesday, officials reported Thursday, after national authorities changed for the second time in a week the criteria for how cases are diagnosed and counted.”

A “xenophobic” motive is suspected in an overnight shooting that left 10 dead in Germany.

“A spokesman for the Public Prosecutor General said that the office had taken over the investigation. Nine people were killed in shootings at the two hookah bars in Hanau, which is about 15 miles east of Frankfurt, on Wednesday night,” Loveday Morris, Rick Noack and Luisa Beck report. “The body of the suspected attacker, and that of another person, were found in his home in the early hours of Thursday morning, police said. They didn't provide any additional information, but said there were ‘no indications of further perpetrators.’ German newspaper Bild reported the second body belonged to the suspect's mother. Police said they couldn't provide details on the attacker's motive or comment on German news reports saying the shooter left a confessional letter and video that indicated a confused, extreme-right, anti-immigrant ideology.”

Britain wants to close its borders to low-skill migrants and lure English-speaking engineers.

“Home Secretary Priti Patel called the immigration plan ‘a historic moment for the whole country,’ as the government pledged to transform the British economy by starving its businesses of low-wage workers from Europe and forcing companies to adopt technology and automation instead,” William Booth and Karla Adam report. “The government said that beginning next year, it will reduce the overall number of migrants allowed into the country, honoring what it sees as one of the main mandates of the Brexit vote in June 2016. Prime Minister Boris Johnson, who led the campaign for Brexit, has called the new immigration regime revolutionary. His government formally outlined the new plan Wednesday, confirming that Britain will install a new ‘points-based’ system, which will take back control of its borders and end what it described as the country’s overreliance on low-skilled workers.”

A Mexican national was arrested in Florida on accusation of spying for Russia.

Hector Cabrera was arrested on charges that he collected information about a U.S. government informant on Russia, Brittany Shammas reports. “U.S. prosecutors claim he was carrying out orders from a Russian official who had recruited him with promises of helping his family. A Singapore resident and researcher at the country’s National Heart Center, Fuentes made several trips to Moscow to meet with the official, who directed him to rent a specific property in Miami-Dade County and report back to Russia the license plate and location of the informant’s car.”

Chris Steele said he feared assassination, directed by Russia, after he outlined alleged links between Trump and the Kremlin before the 2016 election. The Telegraph reports that the former MI6 agent feared reprisals after he circulated memos that become known as the Steele dossier.

Mexico is investigating ex-president Enrique Peña Nieto, a top official said. Peña Nieto has been linked to the high-profile bribery case against the former CEO of Pemex, the Wall Street Journal reports.

Saudi Prince Mohammed bin Salman is sparring no detail in the planning of the Group of 20 summit, which he hopes will shift focus from the killing of Washington Post contributing columnist Jamal Khashoggi. (Bloomberg News)

Scientists say we've dramatically underestimated how much methane gas we're emitting.

“The contention emerges in a new study in the influential journal Nature, which draws on samples of ancient air extracted from within the Greenland ice sheet to measure levels of atmospheric methane before humans started burning fossil fuels,” Chris Mooney reports. “If the researchers are right, then tens of millions of tons of methane could be wafting into the atmosphere, unaccounted for, from oil and gas fields around the world.”

---

Social media speed read

Elizabeth Warren got the most online buzz during the debate:

Most Tweeted About Democratic Candidates

Elizabeth Warren

Mike Bloomberg

Bernie Sanders

Joe Biden

Pete Buttigieg

Amy Klobuchar

Ninth Debate: February 19, 2020

Bloomberg's hometown papers were not gentle with their former mayor's debut performance:

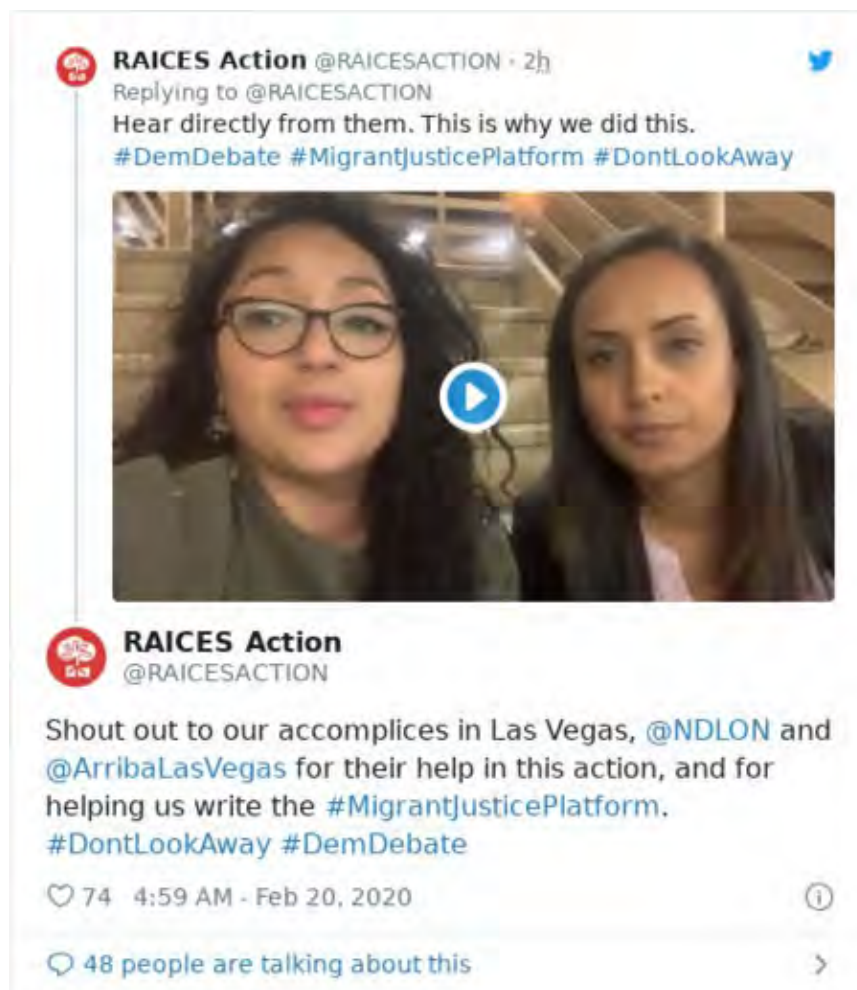

Not surprisingly, Trump also panned the former mayor's performance:

Warren didn't want to become an accidental influencer:

The activists who interrupted Biden's closing statement said they did so because there have been too few immigration questions in this cycle's debates:

The Bloomberg campaign shared old clips of Biden praising the former mayor, and Biden hit back:

Videos of the day

A group glued tiny "Make America Great Again" hats onto pigeons in Las Vegas:

Trevor Noah shared what his ideal presidential debate would look like:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Book Club for our weekly selection of book reviews and recommendations from Book World editor Ron Charles. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: The Democratic debate descends into class warfare, as the billionaire and socialist play off each other
Date: Thursday, February 20, 2020 9:49:17 AM

COMMITTED TO
AFFORDABLE CARE
FOR THE HEALTH OF AMERICA<sup>SM</sup>

BlueCross
BlueShield
Association

Powered by  LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Partnership for America's Health Care Future

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

The Democratic debate descends into class warfare, as the billionaire and socialist play off each other

“Should you exist?”

NBC anchor Chuck Todd’s question to Mike Bloomberg during the Democratic debate in Las Vegas was prompted by a tweet last year from Bernie Sanders. “Billionaires should not exist,” the senator from Vermont wrote.

“I can't speak for all billionaires,” the former New York mayor answered on Wednesday night. “All I know is I've been very lucky, made a lot of money, and I'm giving it all away to make this country better.”

Todd followed up: “Should you have earned that much money?”

“Yes,” Bloomberg replied. “I worked very hard for it.”

Sanders, who identifies as a democratic socialist, says the word billionaire like it's a grotesque slur. “Mike Bloomberg owns more wealth than the bottom 125 million Americans,” he replied. “That's wrong. That's immoral.”

The sizzling two-hour debate underscored the extent to which class has emerged as a stark dividing line inside the factionalized Democratic Party, as significant as race or gender. The proliferation of soak-the-rich rhetoric at this level of presidential politics would have been unthinkable in the not-distant past. Sanders has moved the Overton window to the left on a battery of issues, including the debate over the virtues of capitalism itself.

Bloomberg leaned on his financial success as a differentiator.

“I’m the only one here that’s ever started a business,” he said. The chief executive of Bloomberg LP has spent more than $409 million since launching his campaign just 10 weeks ago. That money has, essentially, bought him second place in national polling. It’s still less than 1 percent of his net worth, which Forbes estimates at $65.2 billion – making him the eighth richest person in America.

Elizabeth Warren compared Bloomberg to President Trump.

“Democrats take a huge risk if we just substitute one arrogant billionaire for another,” said the senator from Massachusetts, as he stood next to her, avoiding eye contact.

Just as Trump did four years ago, Bloomberg cites his wealth as evidence that he’s incorruptible. After Pete Buttigieg urged people to visit his campaign website, for example, Bloomberg joked that people can go to his, as well, but they won’t be able to give money because he’s not raising any. Unlike Trump, though, Bloomberg is not pretending to be a populist. He’s running as a managerial technocrat who can make the trains run on time.

Class-tinged resentments were a consistent undercurrent in the pile-on against Bloomberg. “As the lone person on this stage who’s not a millionaire, let alone a billionaire,” said the former mayor of South Bend, Ind., “I believe that part of what needs to change is for the voices of the communities that haven’t felt heard on Wall Street or in Washington to actually be brought to Capitol Hill.”

Joe Biden chimed in. “For 36 years [in the Senate] and as vice president, I was listed as the poorest man in Congress,” he said. “I made money when I wrote a book about my son, and it surprised me how much it sold. First time I’ve ever made any money.”

The crowd booed Bloomberg when he explained why it would take a few more “weeks” to release his tax returns.

“Unfortunately, or fortunately, I make a lot of money and we do business all around the world, and we are preparing it,” he explained. “The number of pages will probably be thousands of pages. I can't go to TurboTax."

"Pay overtime," said Warren, "and get it done."

Amy Klobuchar noted that her husband prepares their taxes. "We probably could go to TurboTax," said the senator from Minnesota.

Because of the ongoing realignment between the parties, the Democratic coalition writ large has become more affluent and highly educated. Many blue-collar, non-college-educated whites in places like the industrial Midwest have gravitated away from their ancestral home toward the GOP because of cultural grievances, among other factors.

Sanders, however, tailors his message more to the working class than the middle class. His rallies have a decidedly more blue-collar vibe than Buttigieg's or Klobuchar's or Warren's. During a town hall-style meeting the weekend before last in New Hampshire, for instance, a speaker warming up the crowd for Sanders asked how many people currently work for minimum wage. More than a third of the people in the audience raised their hands.

"What our movement is about is bringing working-class people together, black and white and Latino, Native American, Asian American, around an agenda that works for all of us and not just the billionaire class," Sanders said in the debate. "Real change never takes place from the top on down. It never takes place from an oligarchy controlled by billionaires."

Content from Partnership for America's Health Care Future

We Can't Afford Medicare for All

American families should not be forced to foot the bill for Medicare for All. And any new government insurance system would force them to pay more to wait longer for worse care.

Sanders continued to attack Buttigieg for having the temerity to even accept money from 46 billionaires. “We are giving a voice to people who are saying we are sick and tired of billionaires like Mr. Bloomberg seeing huge expansions of their wealth while half-a-million people sleep out on the street tonight,” said Sanders. “What we are saying, Pete, is maybe it's time for the working class of this country to have a little bit of power in Washington, rather than your billionaire campaign contributors.”

Buttigieg, who got pummeled at the December debate for holding a fundraiser in a Napa Valley wine cave, replied that the billionaires are “among the hundreds of thousands of contributors” to his campaign. “You're not the only one who cares about the working class,” he told Sanders. “Most Americans believe we need to empower workers.” Buttigieg added that “you're the one who is at war with the Culinary Union right here in Las Vegas.” To which Sanders replied: “We’ve got more union support than you have ever dreamed of.”

You could sense the urgency, even the desperation, in the air as several of the candidates whose futures hinge on the coming weeks waved their arms to be recognized. “We've got to wake up as a party,” Buttigieg pleaded with the audience. “We could wake up two weeks from today, the day after Super Tuesday, and the only candidates left standing will be Bernie Sanders and Mike Bloomberg, the two most polarizing figures on this stage. And most Americans don't see where they fit if they've got to choose between a socialist who thinks that capitalism is the root of all evil and a billionaire who thinks that money ought to be the root of all power.”

One reason Klobuchar’s clashes with Buttigieg were so intensely bitter is that they’re both trying to claim this middle ground. “I believe in capitalism, but I think the goal of someone in government ... should be a check on that,” she said. “I'm not going to limit what people make, but right now our tax code is so tilted against regular people, and that is what's wrong.”

Warren boasts in her stump speech about how she made a billionaire cry on television with her wealth tax proposal. People chant “two cents” at her events as she explains how anyone worth more than $50 million will need to pay 2 percent of their net worth in taxes every year – including, as she puts it, on their yachts, Rembrandts and diamonds. The cheers are louder when Warren talks about taxing the superrich than when she explains what she'll do with that extra revenue. That speaks volumes about the pitchfork populism that's been ascendant on the left.

For his part, even Bloomberg goes out of his way to say the rich must pay more in taxes. “I disagree with the senator on the wealth tax, but I do agree with her that the rich aren't paying their fair share,” Bloomberg volunteered during the debate. “We should raise taxes on the rich. I did that as mayor in New York City.” Then Sanders complimented Warren’s proposed wealth tax. “Ours is a little bit tougher on Mr. Bloomberg than hers,” he added, with pride.

Bloomberg and Sanders both saw the other as a useful foil since they appeal to different constituencies. “I believe in democratic socialism for working people, not billionaires,” said Sanders. “Creating a government that works for all, not just for Mr. Bloomberg.”

“What a wonderful country we have,” Bloomberg replied. “The best-known socialist in the country happens to be a millionaire with three houses. What did I miss here?”

Sanders replied that his first house is in Washington, where he works, and the second is in Burlington, Vt., where he lives. “And like thousands of other Vermonters, I do have a summer camp,” he added. “We have the insane situation that billionaires today, if you can believe it, have an effective tax rate lower than the middle class.” Bloomberg replied that Sanders, as a member of Congress, can write the tax code.

Asked whether workers should be able to sit on corporate boards, something Sanders and Warren support, Bloomberg said absolutely not. “I can’t think of a way that would make it easier for Donald Trump to get reelected than listening to this conversation,” he said. Bloomberg argued that Sanders couldn’t defeat Trump in a general election because he’s too far to the left and wants to take away people’s private health insurance.

“Maybe we can talk about a billionaire saying that we should not raise the minimum wage,” Sanders countered. “If that’s a way to beat Donald Trump, wow, I would be very surprised.”

NBC’s Lester Holt, another moderator, asked Sanders about the latest NBC-Wall Street Journal poll that found two-thirds of all voters said they were uncomfortable with a socialist candidate for president. Asked what message he has for them, Sanders replied that the same poll showed him leading among Democratic voters. “I was winning, and I think by a fairly comfortable margin,” he said. “You might mention that.”

Bloomberg suggested that Sanders is really a communist, not a socialist. “We’re not going to throw out capitalism. We tried that. Other countries tried that,” he said. “It was called communism, and it just didn’t work.”

“That’s a cheap shot,” Sanders replied, clarifying that what he stands for is democratic socialism. “We are living, in many ways, in a socialist society right now. The problem is, as Dr. Martin Luther King reminded us, we have socialism for the very rich [and] rugged individualism for the poor.”

There were class undertones even when the debate turned to topics related to gender. Klobuchar seized on a memo released by the

Bloomberg campaign that said the other moderates should step aside to “pave the way” for Bloomberg to stop Sanders from capturing the nomination. “As a woman,” the senator said, “I’ve been told many times to wait my turn and to step aside. And I’m not going to do that now. ... We need something different than Donald Trump. I don’t think you look at Donald Trump and say we need someone richer in the White House.”

Bloomberg’s riches also probably help explain the sense of entitlement he exuded. He seemed like a man unaccustomed to both waiting on others and being challenged. He was caught on camera rolling his eyes at criticism. When moderators didn’t come back to him during a discussion on health care, Bloomberg was clearly perturbed. “What am I,” he said, “chicken liver?”

Bloomberg hadn’t debated since 2009, and it showed. He’s not on the ballot in Nevada, which caucuses on Saturday, or in South Carolina, whose primary is the following Saturday. He’s invested in the states that vote on Super Tuesday, four days after that, so he can make up some for his wobbly debate debut during a CBS debate next week in the Palmetto State. “He was just warming up,” campaign manager Kevin Sheekey said in a statement afterward.

---

Quote of the day

Tom Steyer, the other billionaire seeking the Democratic nomination, didn’t qualify for this debate but tweeted throughout. “Looks like Mike Bloomberg might be running in the wrong primary,” he wrote.

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

More from our team coverage

- Dan Balz: “It’s a critical moment in the Democratic race. The debate made that clear.”
- Michael Kranish: “Bloomberg faces attacks for refusing to release women from confidentiality agreements.”

- Glenn Kessler, Salvador Rizzo and Sarah Cahlan fact-checked seven claims.

What pundits are saying about winners and losers

- The Fix's Aaron Blake declared Sanders the winner, along with Warren's takedowns of Bloomberg. His losers were Bloomberg, Biden and Klobuchar.
- CNN's Chris Cillizza said Warren, Sanders and a combo of Buttigieg and Biden won the night while Bloomberg and Klobuchar lost.
- Vox's team declared Warren and Sanders the winners and Bloomberg the loser.
- Mother Jones editor Clara Jeffery said Warren was the runaway winner, while Bloomberg delivered a “horribly bad” performance.
- FiveThirtyEight's Nate Silver's top takeaway is that Bloomberg bombed.
- Democratic operative Mary Anne Marsh, writing for Fox News, called Warren the winner and Bloomberg the loser. Fox anchor Bret Baier said Trump was actually the biggest winner.
- Washington Examiner's Becket Adams argued that Warren won the debate – for Sanders.

How it's playing elsewhere

- The Las Vegas Review-Journal's editorial board: “Nevada Democrats should reject extremism.”
- Politico's John Harris: “Thank you, Mike Bloomberg, for rescuing the debate.”
- Shira Scheindlin op-ed in the New York Times: “I Was the Judge in the Stop-and-Frisk Case. I Don't Think Bloomberg Is Racist.”
- The Boston Globe's Joan Vennochi: “The double standard for old sexist Democrats.”

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

More on 2020

Democrats won't commit to a same-day release of the Nevada results.

“Tom Perez, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, told The Associated Press that several factors, including early voting and potentially high turnout, could affect the tabulation and timing of results. In addition, Nevada, like Iowa, will be reporting three sets of data from the multistage caucus process. Perez said he doesn't know when results will be released. ‘We’re going to do our best to release results as soon as possible, but our North Star, again, is accuracy,' he said late Tuesday after touring an early voting site in Las Vegas.”

Despite Warren’s rejection of super PACs, one launched to support her bid.

“The group, Persist PAC, filed its papers on Tuesday,” Michelle Ye Hee Lee reports. “It has already launched a 30-second ad in Nevada highlighting the senator’s record establishing a federal financial watchdog agency and supporting policies that help women and middle-class families. ... [Warren] has emphatically rejected super PACs and attacked her opponents receiving their help. In a statement, Warren’s campaign said the senator’s position has not changed. ... The statement did not address Warren’s feelings about Persist PAC, however, and the campaign did not respond to questions about whether the senator thinks the group should continue to exist to support her candidacy.”

Warren’s campaign announced that it raised more than $1 million during the debate and $2.8 million during the course of Wednesday.

Barack Obama has privately said he doesn’t like the idea of Sanders as a nominee.

“To Obama, Sanders is a lot of what’s wrong with Democrats: unrelenting, unrealistic, so deep in his own fight that he doesn’t see how many people disagree with him or that he’s turning off people who should be his allies,” the Atlantic’s Edward-Isaac Dove reports. “Obama has made clear in private conversations that he doesn’t like the idea of Sanders as the nominee (and has been only slightly more subtle in public comments), but he’s pushed back on some who have urged him to get involved, anxious that any move he makes could destroy the hope of him using his unique position to unite the party and defeat Trump during the general election. ... Obama is determined to make it work — if he has to.”

Sanders was serious enough about waging a primary challenge against Obama in 2012 that then-Senate majority leader Harry Reid had to intervene to stop him, according to the story: “It took Reid two conversations over the summer of 2011 to get Sanders to scrap the idea, according to multiple people who remember the incident. ... That summer, Sanders privately discussed a potential primary challenge to Obama with several people, including Patrick Leahy, his fellow Vermont senator. Leahy, alarmed, warned Jim Messina, Obama's presidential reelection-campaign manager. Obama's campaign team was 'absolutely panicked' by Leahy's report, Messina [said], since 'every president who has gotten a real primary has lost a general [election].' ... In another incident, in 2013, Sanders laid into Obama in a private meeting he held with Democratic senators, saying that the president was selling out to Republicans over Social Security benefits." Obama replied that he didn't need to be lectured.

As Super Tuesday approaches, the candidates are rolling out endorsements.

- Bloomberg this morning unveiled endorsements from three more Democratic members of Congress – Nita Lowey (N.Y.), Pete Aguilar (Calif.) and Josh Gottheimer (N.J.) – bringing his total to 16.
- Rep. Sylvia Garcia (D-Tex.), one of the House impeachment managers, backed Biden, giving him his sixth supporter from the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. (Politico)
- Virginia state Sen. Creigh Deeds, the 2009 nominee for governor, endorsed Klobuchar. (Roanoke Times)
- Three Arizona state senators – Andrea Dalessandro, Jamescita Peshlakai and Victoria Steele – endorsed Warren on the first day of early voting in the state. The state votes March 17. (Arizona Mirror)

The Bloomberg campaign is paying people $2,500 a month to promote him to all their contacts.

The campaign is hiring more than 500 “deputy digital organizers” to work 20 to 30 hours a week, documents reviewed by the Wall Street Journal show. The workers are expected to promote Bloomberg weekly to everyone in their phone's contacts by text message and make daily social media posts supporting him.

Andrew Yang joined CNN as a political commentator.

“Learned a lot these past months and am glad to contribute to the public discussion,” said the former presidential contender, who dropped out after the New Hampshire primary.

Florida’s new law prohibiting certain ex-felons from voting was ruled unconstitutional.

The rule would’ve prohibited ex-felons who cannot pay certain legal fines from voting. The case “could have significant consequences for one of the country’s largest swing states,” Elise Viebeck reports. “In a unanimous ruling, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit affirmed a lower court’s finding that Florida’s S.B. 7066 violates the Constitution’s guarantee of equal protection under the law. The panel also upheld that court’s preliminary injunction barring enforcement for the plaintiffs. Florida’s governor immediately signaled that he would appeal the decision to the full circuit. ... ‘Continued disenfranchisement is indisputably punitive in nature,’ the judges wrote, adding, ‘Felons who are unable to pay are subject to continued punishment solely because of their inability to pay.’ ”

The White House predicts the economy will not grow at a rate of 3 percent or higher this year.

The Council of Economic Advisers forecasts that, unless Congress enacts a major infrastructure package and additional tax cuts, the U.S. economy will grow at a 2.4 percent pace this year and at a 2.3 percent pace in 2021. (Heather Long)

---

All the president's men

President Trump takes the stage at a campaign rally on Wednesday night at Veterans Memorial Coliseum in Phoenix. (Evan Vucci/AP)

Mick Mulvaney admitted that the GOP is hypocritical on deficits.

“My party is very interested in deficits when there is a Democrat in the White House. The worst thing in the whole world is deficits when Barack Obama was the president. Then Donald Trump became president, and we’re a lot less interested as a party,” he said at the Oxford Union to a group of several hundred people.

“Mulvaney, who ran the Office of Management and Budget before taking the acting chief of staff role, said he found the growing deficit — which reached almost $1 trillion in 2019, soaring in the Trump era — ‘extraordinarily disturbing’ but that neither party, nor voters, cared much about it,” Josh Dawsey reports. “Mulvaney’s comments, which lasted about an hour, came as he visited Britain and Ireland to talk about Brexit and other issues. ... He criticized his predecessor, John F. Kelly, as chief of staff, and railed against the ‘deep state,’ giving the audience examples of civil servants who he said were working against the Trump administration. ...

“Mulvaney robustly defended the president’s actions regarding Ukraine ... He said the president regularly complained that Europeans don’t give Ukraine enough money. ‘And number two, they’re corrupt as hell, which is true,’ Mulvaney said. ... He joked about his news conference last year in which he conceded, from the White House podium, that there was a ‘quid pro quo’ and that it was normal in foreign policy and that people should ‘get over it.’ Mulvaney said he realized he’d made a mistake when he walked away from the podium. Another White House official, he said, ‘came up to me and said, ‘Do you know you just said X?’ I said, ‘No I didn’t say that.’” Soon, he realized, ‘S---, I said X.’ Mulvaney issued a statement later that day attacking the media for mischaracterizing his comments.”

Trump fired the Pentagon’s policy chief, who spoke out internally against his freeze on Ukraine aid.

Undersecretary of Defense for Policy John Rood, who was charged with certifying that Ukraine met its anti-corruption targets in order to receive U.S. military aid, was dismissed after clashing with colleagues over the implementation of Trump’s foreign policy agenda for more than two years, Paul Sonne and Missy Ryan report. His last day is Feb. 28. “Rood wrote that he understood, from speaking to Defense Secretary Mark T. Esper, that Trump had requested his resignation. ... In an email to Esper hours after Trump’s July 25 call with Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelensky, Rood said that ‘placing a hold on security assistance at this time would jeopardize this unique window of opportunity and undermine our defense priorities with a key partner in the strategic competition with Russia.’ ... The hold proceeded anyway.”

Trump will install German ambassador Richard Grenell as acting director of national intelligence.

Trump is nominating “a fiercely loyal ally atop an intelligence structure he has frequently railed against,” Shane Harris, Anne Gearan and Dawsey report. “It is unclear whether Trump intends to nominate Grenell to fill the top intelligence post on a permanent basis, which would require Senate confirmation. The appointment took many in Washington, including on Capitol Hill, by surprise. Grenell, a former State Department official and communications executive, has been a Trump confidant and ad hoc adviser on issues beyond his ambassadorial work in Berlin. He is a conservative foreign policy hawk and sometime media critic, as well as a vocal supporter of Trump on social media. He has sparked controversy in his diplomatic role, but also won praise in Germany and elsewhere for taking on issues such as gay rights in Eastern Europe and the long-running tensions between Kosovo and Serbia. Grenell would be the first openly gay member of the Trump Cabinet.”

Trump continues to test his relationship with Bill Barr by tweeting about the Justice Department.

A day after it was revealed that the attorney general has told people close to Trump that he’s considered quitting, the president amplified “conservative allies demanding he ‘clean house’ at the Justice Department and target those involved in the Russia investigation that once threatened his presidency,” John Wagner, Matt Zaptosky and Devlin Barrett report. “The grievances shared by Trump in a flurry of morning tweets included claims of a ‘seditious conspiracy’ against him, and attacks on a ‘criminal gang’ at the FBI and the Justice Department.” The fragile equilibrium may be tested again Thursday, as Roger Stone is scheduled to be sentenced for lying to Congress and obstruction.

John Bolton said his testimony wouldn’t have changed the outcome of the impeachment trial.

The former national security adviser “denounced the House’s impeachment proceedings against [Trump] as ‘grossly partisan’ and said his testimony would not have changed Trump’s acquittal in the Senate,” the AP reports. “Bolton was on stage at Vanderbilt University with former national security adviser Susan Rice, who questioned Bolton’s refusal to discuss more details. ... Bolton contended that the House ‘committed impeachment malpractice,’ drawing some grumbling from the audience, saying ‘the process drove Republicans who might have voted for impeachment away because it was so partisan.’ He also said he didn’t expect the Senate to vote against having him testify. ‘People can argue about what I should have said and what I should have done,' Bolton said. 'I would bet you a dollar right here and now, my testimony would have made no difference to the ultimate outcome.'”

Mike Pompeo and lawmakers sparred over “deep state” attacks while in Munich.

“The meeting became contentious early on, when Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) confronted Pompeo about what the senator described as a severe morale problem among Foreign Service officers and civil servants working for the State Department both in Washington and around the world,” Josh Rogin reports. “Pompeo reacted angrily. The secretary didn’t just deny that he had failed to protect his employees sufficiently; he also claimed that morale at the State Department is great, according to four lawmakers who were in the room.”

Rod Blagojevich, the ex-Illinois governor convicted of trying to peddle Barack Obama's vacated U.S. Senate seat, waves as he exits his home after Trump commuted his prison sentence. (Joshua Lott/Reuters)

Trump is considering more pardons.

The president assembled a team of advisers to guide the clemency process. “The White House is moving to take more direct control over pardons and commutations, with Trump aiming to limit the role of the Justice Department in the clemency process as he weighs a flurry of additional pardon announcements,” Toluse Olorunnipa, Dawsey and Neena Satija report. “Trump, who granted clemency Tuesday to a group of 11 people that included several political allies and supporters, has assembled a team of advisers to recommend and vet candidates for pardons. ... The group, essentially an informal task force of at least a half-dozen presidential allies, has been meeting since late last year to discuss a revamped pardon system in the White House. Jared Kushner, Trump’s son-in-law and senior adviser, is taking a leading role in the new clemency initiative. ... Trump, who prefers granting clemency to people with compelling personal stories or lengthy sentences, is inclined to grant more pardons before facing voters in November, one official said.” (Interesting op-ed by John K. Carroll: “I was a prosecutor in the Michael Milken case. I’m outraged at the pardon process.”)

Julian Assange’s lawyer said a then-GOP congressman dangled a pardon if he would absolve Russia in the DNC hack. Assange’s attorney told a British judge that former Republican congressman Dana Rohrabacher, a Trump ally who lost in 2018, made an offer to the WikiLeaks founder on behalf of Trump in 2017 to pardon Assange in exchange for saying that Russia had nothing to do with the 2016 hack and leak of DNC emails. “Assange is in a British prison while he awaits a decision on an extradition request by the United States,” William Booth and Ellen Nakashima report. “In a statement posted to his website on Wednesday, Rohrabacher said ... ‘at no time did I offer Julian Assange anything from the President because I had not spoken with the President about this issue at all.’ But, he added, he told Assange that if he gave him evidence about who provided him the DNC emails, he would ask Trump to pardon him. White House press secretary Stephanie Grisham on Wednesday denied the allegation that Trump was seeking a trade with Assange.”

An unrepentant Rod Blagojevich declared himself “a freed political prisoner” as he spoke to reporters outside his Chicago home. “We want to express our most profound and everlasting gratitude to President Trump,” said the former Democratic governor of Illinois.

(Susan Berger and John Wagner)

Trump granted clemency to three of Alice Johnson’s friends.

The women said they hadn't spoken in years with Johnson, whom Trump freed in 2018, and were only vaguely aware of her efforts, Beth Reinhard reports.

Trump’s pardon of Bernie Kerik also apparently wiped out $103,000 of the former New York City police commissioner’s debt to taxpayers. The White House credited the president's personal lawyer Rudy Giuliani – Kerik’s friend and former boss – for convincing Trump to pardon Kerik. (The Week)

---

The new world order

People suspected of being infected with the coronavirus wait to receive tests at a medical center in Daegu, South Korea. (Lee Moo-ryul/AP)

Coronavirus cases surged in South Korea.

“Authorities worldwide warned about the spread of the coronavirus beyond China on Thursday as Japan reported the first two deaths from the Diamond Princess cruise liner, South Korea reported its first fatality and a major city there asked citizens to refrain from venturing outdoors,” Gerry Shih, Rick Noack and Teo Armus report. “A Japanese man and woman, both said to be in their 80s, were among more than 600 passengers who contracted the disease while on board the Diamond Princess. They left the ship last week and had been hospitalized but died on Thursday ... In nearby South Korea, cases soared by nearly two-thirds, mostly in the southern part of the peninsula ... The mayor of Daegu, the city where 10 South Koreans contracted the disease from a church service, asked residents to stay indoors.

“Iran also reported two infected that then died. Many international experts say the disease will continue to spread globally even as the Chinese government seeks to present the image that it is coming to grips with the epidemic. New cases inside China dropped again Wednesday, officials reported Thursday, after national authorities changed for the second time in a week the criteria for how cases are diagnosed and counted.”

A “xenophobic” motive is suspected in an overnight shooting that left 10 dead in Germany.

“A spokesman for the Public Prosecutor General said that the office had taken over the investigation. Nine people were killed in shootings at the two hookah bars in Hanau, which is about 15 miles east of Frankfurt, on Wednesday night,” Loveday Morris, Rick Noack and Luisa Beck report. “The body of the suspected attacker, and that of another person, were found in his home in the early hours of Thursday morning, police said. They didn't provide any additional information, but said there were ‘no indications of further perpetrators.’ German newspaper Bild reported the second body belonged to the suspect's mother. Police said they couldn't provide details on the attacker's motive or comment on German news reports saying the shooter left a confessional letter and video that indicated a confused, extreme-right, anti-immigrant ideology.”

Britain wants to close its borders to low-skill migrants and lure English-speaking engineers.

“Home Secretary Priti Patel called the immigration plan ‘a historic moment for the whole country,’ as the government pledged to transform the British economy by starving its businesses of low-wage workers from Europe and forcing companies to adopt technology and automation instead,” William Booth and Karla Adam report. “The government said that beginning next year, it will reduce the overall number of migrants allowed into the country, honoring what it sees as one of the main mandates of the Brexit vote in June 2016. Prime Minister Boris Johnson, who led the campaign for Brexit, has called the new immigration regime revolutionary. His government formally outlined the new plan Wednesday, confirming that Britain will install a new ‘points-based’ system, which will take back control of its borders and end what it described as the country’s overreliance on low-skilled workers.”

A Mexican national was arrested in Florida on accusation of spying for Russia.

Hector Cabrera was arrested on charges that he collected information about a U.S. government informant on Russia, Brittany Shammas reports. “U.S. prosecutors claim he was carrying out orders from a Russian official who had recruited him with promises of helping his family. A Singapore resident and researcher at the country’s National Heart Center, Fuentes made several trips to Moscow to meet with the official, who directed him to rent a specific property in Miami-Dade County and report back to Russia the license plate and location of the informant’s car.”

Chris Steele said he feared assassination, directed by Russia, after he outlined alleged links between Trump and the Kremlin before the 2016 election. The Telegraph reports that the former MI6 agent feared reprisals after he circulated memos that become known as the Steele dossier.

Mexico is investigating ex-president Enrique Peña Nieto, a top official said. Peña Nieto has been linked to the high-profile bribery case against the former CEO of Pemex, the Wall Street Journal reports.

Saudi Prince Mohammed bin Salman is sparring no detail in the planning of the Group of 20 summit, which he hopes will shift focus from the killing of Washington Post contributing columnist Jamal Khashoggi. (Bloomberg News)

Scientists say we've dramatically underestimated how much methane gas we're emitting.

“The contention emerges in a new study in the influential journal Nature, which draws on samples of ancient air extracted from within the Greenland ice sheet to measure levels of atmospheric methane before humans started burning fossil fuels,” Chris Mooney reports. “If the researchers are right, then tens of millions of tons of methane could be wafting into the atmosphere, unaccounted for, from oil and gas fields around the world.”

---

Social media speed read

Elizabeth Warren got the most online buzz during the debate:

Most Tweeted About Democratic Candidates

Elizabeth Warren

Mike Bloomberg

Bernie Sanders

Joe Biden

Pete Buttigieg

Amy Klobuchar

Ninth Debate: February 19, 2020

Bloomberg's hometown papers were not gentle with their former mayor's debut performance:

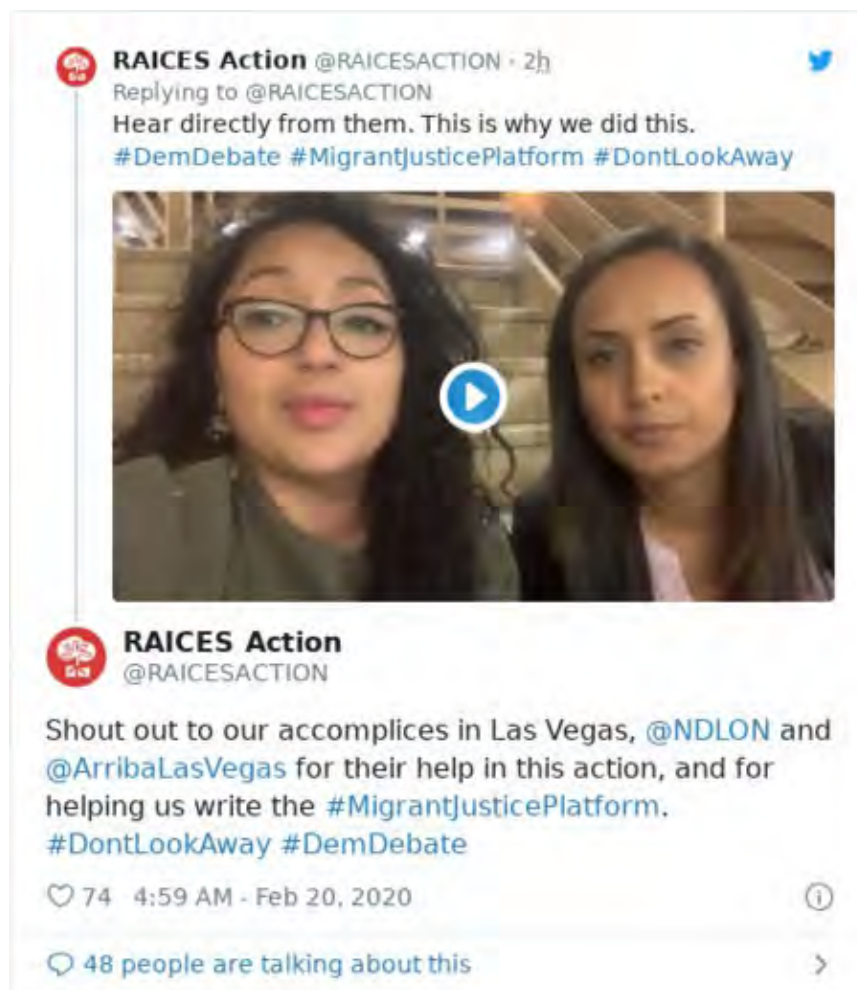

Not surprisingly, Trump also panned the former mayor's performance:

Warren didn't want to become an accidental influencer:

The activists who interrupted Biden's closing statement said they did so because there have been too few immigration questions in this cycle's debates:

The Bloomberg campaign shared old clips of Biden praising the former mayor, and Biden hit back:

Videos of the day

A group glued tiny “Make America Great Again” hats onto pigeons in Las Vegas:

Trevor Noah shared what his ideal presidential debate would look like:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Book Club for our weekly selection of book reviews and recommendations from Book World editor Ron Charles. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] Book Club: Donald Trump pardons fellow authors, and Hermione Granger runs for president.
Date: Friday, February 21, 2020 7:54:29 AM

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

The Washington Post

Book Club

Reviews and recommendations from critic Ron Charles.

By Ron Charles

✉ Email

(Phoenix Books; Threshold Editions; Time Life Education; Augustus Publishing)

President Trump pleased his sycophants and political allies on Tuesday by doling out pardons and commuting sentences.

Among the folks Trump favored were also several fellow authors:

- Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich was impeached and imprisoned after making a “perfect phone call” of his own in which he tried to sell

President Obama's old senate seat. Before he went to prison, though, Blagojevich published a much-lampooned memoir titled "The Governor," which asserted his heroic innocence. Early in the book, Blagojevich proclaims, "I'm Icarus." But this week, he's more like a phoenix rising from America's ashes.

- Former New York police commissioner Bernard Kerik, who was convicted of tax fraud, feels equally aggrieved in his memoir "From Jailer to Jailed," but he's a better writer. The one-time 9/11 hero gives a harrowing description of incarceration and calls on members of both parties to stop "putting people in prison and treating them like animals." Kerik also devotes a particularly lachrymose chapter to how Rudy Giuliani, the godfather of Kerik's daughters, cut him off when he became a political liability. Presumably, they've made up now.
  - Junk bond king Michael Milken, who went to prison for securities fraud, has been the subject of several books, including James Stewart's "Den of Thieves" and Connie Bruck's "The Predators' Ball." A few years after he was released from prison and treated for prostate cancer, Milken and his personal chef, Beth Ginsberg, published "The Taste for Living Cookbook: Mike Milken's Favorite Recipes for Fighting Cancer."
  - Angela Stanton, who was convicted for her role in a car-stealing ring, was once a cast member on the reality show "From the Bottom Up." In 2013, she published a memoir called "Lies of a Real Housewife," which opens with this striking moral innovation: "Many of you may feel that people who have committed crimes don't deserve a second chance. I've got news for you. We all play our role in society. Without crime, there would be no cops, no lawyers, no judges, no prisons, no police stations, and more importantly, no justice system. I think you understand where I am going with this." (Not a clue!) "Like it or not, criminals employ half of the country. The sad part about all of this is that for someone to do right -- someone has to do wrong."
-

A building in Beijing amid the country's COVID-19 coronavirus outbreak, Feb. 20, 2020. (Photo by Greg Baker/AFP via Getty Images)

The coronavirus epidemic threatens to slow down parts of the U.S. publishing industry. A significant segment of the American book market -- particularly children's books, cookbooks, Bibles, technical books and other titles that use full-color -- is now printed in China. As factories in different regions are hit by the virus, U.S. publishers are trying to determine how their products might be affected. A spokesperson for the Association of American Publishers tells me, "While the situation is fluid and subject to change, publishers are operating under the assumption that there could be anywhere from a two-to-six week delay to projected ship dates from Chinese suppliers."

Meanwhile, almost 100 academic journals, institutes and scholarly publishers have responded to the epidemic by lowering the paywalls on their websites to facilitate greater access to research on the coronavirus. Edward Campion, executive editor of the New England Journal of Medicine, told the Scientist website, "The responsible thing to do is to make all research freely available during epidemics or possibly pandemics where there are people at risk."

The witch hunt just got personal. Hermione Granger is running for president. The proud Hogwarts graduate announced her candidacy on Tuesday. Of course, there are challenges ahead. First, Hermione was not born in the United States, which is bound to inspire new birther conspiracy claims. Second, Hermione is not a real person, but recent history suggests that's not a disqualifier. Actually, Granger 2020 is largely a voter registration campaign sponsored by the Harry Potter Alliance, a nonprofit organization with 200 chapters in 30 countries that encourages fans of J.K. Rowling's novels to improve the world through social activism. (Rowling is not involved in any way.) Katie Bowers, a spokesperson for the Alliance, assures me that Hermione's voter registration efforts are entirely nonpartisan, but with one party using dark magic to disenfranchise as many voters as possible, that's a complicated situation. Granger 2020 is yet another dramatic demonstration of the extraordinary influence of the Harry Potter novels. "They give a common language to now multiple generations of people who see this story repeated of the world falling apart," Bowers says. "So all the young people are going to band together and use the skills we have, and we're going to work with this crew of adults that we trust. It's going to be up to us to save the world, and we're just going to do it." Ascendio!

Tote bag ($20), socks ($12), cap ($18), unisex t-shirt ($30) (Courtesy of Out of Print/PRH)

Speaking of the presidential campaign, Out of Print is offering some fun products in their new Get PoLITical Collection. My favorite is the 2020 campaign t-shirt supporting "Someone Literate." Once that would have seemed like a low bar; now it's a cry of desperation. Out of Print, a division of Penguin Random House, is the title sponsor of PEN America's "Free Speech 2020" campaign "to defend press freedom, fight online harassment, combat disinformation, and uphold protest rights." More information here.

ADVERTISEMENT

U.S. Bank
Earn 5% cash back in two categories of your choice
With the U.S. Bank Cash+™ Visa Signature® Card, you earn 5% cash back in two categories of your choosing and 2% in an everyday category.
LEARN MORE
Powered by LiveIntent

It is a truth universally acknowledged that a journalist in possession of a story about Jane Austen must start with that cliché. The PBS Masterpiece adaptation of “Sanditon” -- Austen’s unfinished novel -- concludes on Sunday (review), and tonight “Emma,” starring Anya Taylor-Joy, opens in U.S. theaters. (Both adaptations are causing a little stir with their Regency-era nude scenes. Get my smelling salts!) The new movie adaptation of “Emma” was written by New Zealand novelist Eleanor Catton, who won the 2013 Booker Prize for “The Luminaries” (review). Like Emma, Catton was in her 20s at the time -- the youngest person ever to win a Booker. (“Not badly done, Eleanor!”) Of course, anyone who thinks we can all agree on the best “Emma” adaptation is clueless, but I’m partial to Romola Garai in the title role, which Masterpiece Classic released a decade ago. Still, I’ll go see this new version, if only to catch the hilarious Miranda Hart as Miss Bates.

Author Etgar Keret (Photo by Alessandro Moggi); Keret Cake created by Breads Bakery (Photo by Ashley Solter)

The way to readers' hearts is through their stomachs. Yesterday, Breads Bakery in New York began selling Keret Cake, a pastry specially designed to honor Israeli writer Etgar Keret. Breads Bakery owner Gadi Peleg was reportedly inspired by "Crumb Cake," a poignant story in Keret's 2019 collection "Fly Already" (review). Keret writes very short, sometimes surreal, always clever pieces (think a gentler Kafka). Described as "a moist crumble cake with a hint of olive oil," each loaf of Keret Cake ($18) is wrapped in a story titled "Cake Break" that Keret wrote just for the bakery. (It's a typically heartbreaking Keret story -- impossibly condensed, spiced with gallows humor.) Peleg says, "We hope to move publishing from books and tablets to anywhere words are printed." If that means more cake, I'm in. "I love the idea of stories existing far away from bookshelves," Keret tells me, "preying on unsuspecting sweet-toothed innocent bystanders."

---

defamation (noun):

the act of communicating false statements about a person that injure the reputation of that person

This month marks the 40th anniversary of Lillian Hellman's infamous defamation suit against Mary McCarthy. The trouble started, as some of you will remember, on the Dick Cavett show when McCarthy said of the famous playwright: "Every word she writes is a lie, including 'and' and 'the.'" The audience laughed, but Hellman sued McCarthy, PBS and Cavett for more than $2 million. The case quickly became a cause célèbre, involving complicated issues about who is a public figure and what is truth in literature. Norman Mailer, always the peacemaker, published an essay in the New York Times Book Review condemning McCarthy's attack on Hellman's honor as "a barbarity and a brutality." But he went on to plead with Hellman to drop her suit. "If Lillian wins," he worried, "then every American writer will have to feel that much more tongue-tied at daring to criticize another American writer without qualification." Both sides dug in, but no verdict ever came down.

Hellman died in 1984, and her estate dropped the case. McCarthy, as always, got the last word: “I didn't want her to die. I wanted her to lose in court.”

(Baen; Redhook; Tor; Del Rey; Tor; Berkley)

Out of this world. The Science Fiction & Fantasy Writers of America announced the finalists for the annual Nebula Awards in several categories. The awards will be presented on May 30th. Here are the finalists for best novel of 2019:

- “Marque of Caine,” by Charles E. Gannon.
- “The Ten Thousand Doors of January,” by Alix E. Harrow.
- “A Memory Called Empire,” by Arkady Martine.
- “Gods of Jade and Shadow,” by Silvia Moreno-Garcia.
- “Gideon the Ninth,” by Tamsyn Muir.
- “A Song for a New Day,” by Sarah Pinsker.

City Lights Booksellers & Publishers in San Francisco, Calif. (Ron Charles/The Washington Post)

Listen up. Robert Siegel hosted a terrific episode of “On Point” this week about the resurrection of indie bookstores. His in-studio guest was Harvard Business School Professor Ryan Raffaelli, who’s been studying the industry for the past eight years. After talking with hundreds of booksellers across the country, Raffaelli has concluded that their ability to survive the retail apocalypse depends on three Cs: Community, Curation and Convening. That is, establishing a strong relationship with their local community, curating a relevant selection of books and providing a comfortable place for people to convene. When Siegel asked what's keeping indies from becoming mere showrooms for Amazon, Raffaelli said, "Bookstores, ironically, have been quite sophisticated at operating in the digital world in terms of creating community online. One of the key success factors is that they've been able to drive a significant social media presence where they bring people and extend the conversation through Instagram." Bookstore lovers and owners called in to enrich the conversation, which you can listen to here.

LeBron James of the Los Angeles Lakers in Chicago, Feb. 16, 2020 (AP Photo/Nam Huh); HarperCollins

LeBron James is working on a picture book called "I Promise," illustrated by Nina Mata. The NBA champion plans to release his debut children's book in August. It's inspired by the LeBron James Family Foundation in Akron, Ohio, which in 2018 funded the creation of the I Promise public elementary school to help struggling children. In a statement, James said, "We wanted to make sure these stories are ones that every single kid can see themselves in." This is Mata's second collaboration with an Olympic gold-medal winner. In 2018, she illustrated "She's Got This," by gymnast Laurie Hernandez. HarperCollins announced that James will also publish an intermediate-level novel next year.

Poet Carl Phillips (Reston Allen/FSG); FSG

The New Yorker’s poetry critic Dan Chiasson once said that Carl Phillips may write “the most interesting contemporary English sentences.” It’s true. Phillips, who has published more than a dozen collections, is always drawing readers through sentences that seem as fascinating as what they describe. Here’s a poem from his gorgeous new book, “Pale Colors in a Tall Field,” which will be released on March 3.

If It Must Be Winter

Not crowns,
not conquest defined in terms of how many fear you, or fear to say otherwise, not by these will you know your own royalty, but in smaller ways, how to the least gesture there’s more power than seems reasonable, though it will feel deserved . . . So I was told, and they have not proved wrong. I’ve but to open my hand, bees come to it, the slick fur of bees
assembling as toward an honor in no way expected

though each time the honor remains mine, as if almost it should, as if certain privileges had to do with destiny—
Do I believe that? Do I? My hand a sea across which the wings of the bees flash
like signal flags whose patterns, instead of translating,
I make up my own translations for. I shall do as I please.
As a lovely argument can make a difficult truth more clear, if not more sweet, though is there not a sweetness to clarity that can almost make the truth seem worth it? To say I'm not quite sure makes me no less king, here. Sometimes, I open my hand and there's no sea at all, just a windy plain, what appear to be dust storms crossing it turn out, on reaching me, to be the disappointments—

all of them—that I never intended, each one on horseback, my cavalry, each face raised toward mine, as if awaiting command—hungering for it. Forgetful, or stupid. I can see no difference.        Look away from me. I haven't said you can look at me.

From "Pale Colors in a Tall Field," by Carl Phillips (FSG). Reprinted by permission of the author.

(L to R) Mark Murphey (William Joad) and Tony Sancho (Martín Jodes) in "Mother Road" at Arena

Stage at the Mead Center for American Theater, in Washington, D.C. (Photo by Margot Schulman/Arena Stage)

This weekend, my wife and I are going to see Octavio Solis’s play “Mother Road” (review). It’s a present-day sequel to “The Grapes of Wrath,” involving a drive from California back to Oklahoma. I haven’t read John Steinbeck’s 1939 classic since high school, but his portrayal of migrant workers and economic inequality made a lasting impression on me. The novel won a National Book Award, a Pulitzer Prize and, two decades later, was celebrated in Steinbeck’s Nobel Prize citation.

Till next week, if you have any questions or comments about The Post's book coverage, contact me at ron.charles@washpost.com. And if you know someone who would enjoy this newsletter, please forward it to them. To subscribe, click here.

---

A.D. Miller’s ‘Independence Square’ imagines how one diplomat tried to secretly manage Ukraine’s revolution

Review • By Ron Charles • Read more »

---

Five new thrillers and mysteries to help escape reality — or see it in another light

Review • By Richard Lipez • Read more »

---

In ‘Counterpoint,’ a memoirist reflects on love, loss and Bach

Review • By Marcia Butler • Read more »

A memoirist faces the consequences of revealing her family's secret past

Review • By Marion Winik • Read more »

---

In 'Amnesty,' an immigrant is put in an impossible position

Review • By Kristen Millares Young • Read more »

---

Gish Jen's 'The Resisters' reminds us of the importance of standing up for what's right

Review • By Diana Abu-Jaber • Read more »

---

In 'The Mercies,' a deadly storm isn't the only danger for a Scandinavian community

Review • By Bethanne Patrick • Read more »

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Carolyn Hax for Post columnist Carolyn Hax's latest advice column every day. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from Book Club | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for Book Club or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] Book Club: Donald Trump pardons fellow authors, and Hermione Granger runs for president.
Date: Friday, February 21, 2020 7:54:52 AM

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

The Washington Post

Book Club

Reviews and recommendations from critic Ron Charles.

By Ron Charles

✉ Email

(Phoenix Books; Threshold Editions; Time Life Education; Augustus Publishing)

President Trump pleased his sycophants and political allies on Tuesday by doling out pardons and commuting sentences.

Among the folks Trump favored were also several fellow authors:

- Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich was impeached and imprisoned after making a “perfect phone call” of his own in which he tried to sell

President Obama's old senate seat. Before he went to prison, though, Blagojevich published a much-lampooned memoir titled "The Governor," which asserted his heroic innocence. Early in the book, Blagojevich proclaims, "I'm Icarus." But this week, he's more like a phoenix rising from America's ashes.

- Former New York police commissioner Bernard Kerik, who was convicted of tax fraud, feels equally aggrieved in his memoir "From Jailer to Jailed," but he's a better writer. The one-time 9/11 hero gives a harrowing description of incarceration and calls on members of both parties to stop "putting people in prison and treating them like animals." Kerik also devotes a particularly lachrymose chapter to how Rudy Giuliani, the godfather of Kerik's daughters, cut him off when he became a political liability. Presumably, they've made up now.
  - Junk bond king Michael Milken, who went to prison for securities fraud, has been the subject of several books, including James Stewart's "Den of Thieves" and Connie Bruck's "The Predators' Ball." A few years after he was released from prison and treated for prostate cancer, Milken and his personal chef, Beth Ginsberg, published "The Taste for Living Cookbook: Mike Milken's Favorite Recipes for Fighting Cancer."
  - Angela Stanton, who was convicted for her role in a car-stealing ring, was once a cast member on the reality show "From the Bottom Up." In 2013, she published a memoir called "Lies of a Real Housewife," which opens with this striking moral innovation: "Many of you may feel that people who have committed crimes don't deserve a second chance. I've got news for you. We all play our role in society. Without crime, there would be no cops, no lawyers, no judges, no prisons, no police stations, and more importantly, no justice system. I think you understand where I am going with this." (Not a clue!) "Like it or not, criminals employ half of the country. The sad part about all of this is that for someone to do right -- someone has to do wrong."
-

A building in Beijing amid the country's COVID-19 coronavirus outbreak, Feb. 20, 2020. (Photo by Greg Baker/AFP via Getty Images)

The coronavirus epidemic threatens to slow down parts of the U.S. publishing industry. A significant segment of the American book market -- particularly children's books, cookbooks, Bibles, technical books and other titles that use full-color -- is now printed in China. As factories in different regions are hit by the virus, U.S. publishers are trying to determine how their products might be affected. A spokesperson for the Association of American Publishers tells me, "While the situation is fluid and subject to change, publishers are operating under the assumption that there could be anywhere from a two-to-six week delay to projected ship dates from Chinese suppliers."

Meanwhile, almost 100 academic journals, institutes and scholarly publishers have responded to the epidemic by lowering the paywalls on their websites to facilitate greater access to research on the coronavirus. Edward Campion, executive editor of the New England Journal of Medicine, told the Scientist website, "The responsible thing to do is to make all research freely available during epidemics or possibly pandemics where there are people at risk."

The witch hunt just got personal. Hermione Granger is running for president. The proud Hogwarts graduate announced her candidacy on Tuesday. Of course, there are challenges ahead. First, Hermione was not born in the United States, which is bound to inspire new birther conspiracy claims. Second, Hermione is not a real person, but recent history suggests that's not a disqualifier. Actually, Granger 2020 is largely a voter registration campaign sponsored by the Harry Potter Alliance, a nonprofit organization with 200 chapters in 30 countries that encourages fans of J.K. Rowling's novels to improve the world through social activism. (Rowling is not involved in any way.) Katie Bowers, a spokesperson for the Alliance, assures me that Hermione's voter registration efforts are entirely nonpartisan, but with one party using dark magic to disenfranchise as many voters as possible, that's a complicated situation. Granger 2020 is yet another dramatic demonstration of the extraordinary influence of the Harry Potter novels. "They give a common language to now multiple generations of people who see this story repeated of the world falling apart," Bowers says. "So all the young people are going to band together and use the skills we have, and we're going to work with this crew of adults that we trust. It's going to be up to us to save the world, and we're just going to do it." Ascendio!

Tote bag ($20), socks ($12), cap ($18), unisex t-shirt ($30) (Courtesy of Out of Print/PRH)

Speaking of the presidential campaign, Out of Print is offering some fun products in their new Get PoLITical Collection. My favorite is the 2020 campaign t-shirt supporting "Someone Literate." Once that would have seemed like a low bar; now it's a cry of desperation. Out of Print, a division of Penguin Random House, is the title sponsor of PEN America's "Free Speech 2020" campaign "to defend press freedom, fight online harassment, combat disinformation, and uphold protest rights." More information here.

ADVERTISEMENT

U.S. Bank
Earn 5% cash back in two categories of your choice
With the U.S. Bank Cash+™ Visa Signature® Card, you earn 5% cash back in two categories of your choosing and 2% in an everyday category.
LEARN MORE

Powered by  LiveIntent

It is a truth universally acknowledged that a journalist in possession of a story about Jane Austen must start with that cliché. The PBS Masterpiece adaptation of “Sanditon” -- Austen’s unfinished novel -- concludes on Sunday (review), and tonight “Emma,” starring Anya Taylor-Joy, opens in U.S. theaters. (Both adaptations are causing a little stir with their Regency-era nude scenes. Get my smelling salts!) The new movie adaptation of “Emma” was written by New Zealand novelist Eleanor Catton, who won the 2013 Booker Prize for “The Luminaries” (review). Like Emma, Catton was in her 20s at the time -- the youngest person ever to win a Booker. (“Not badly done, Eleanor!”) Of course, anyone who thinks we can all agree on the best “Emma” adaptation is clueless, but I’m partial to Romola Garai in the title role, which Masterpiece Classic released a decade ago. Still, I’ll go see this new version, if only to catch the hilarious Miranda Hart as Miss Bates.

Author Etgar Keret (Photo by Alessandro Moggi); Keret Cake created by Breads Bakery (Photo by Ashley Solter)

The way to readers' hearts is through their stomachs. Yesterday, Breads Bakery in New York began selling Keret Cake, a pastry specially designed to honor Israeli writer Etgar Keret. Breads Bakery owner Gadi Peleg was reportedly inspired by "Crumb Cake," a poignant story in Keret's 2019 collection "Fly Already" (review). Keret writes very short, sometimes surreal, always clever pieces (think a gentler Kafka). Described as "a moist crumble cake with a hint of olive oil," each loaf of Keret Cake ($18) is wrapped in a story titled "Cake Break" that Keret wrote just for the bakery. (It's a typically heartbreaking Keret story -- impossibly condensed, spiced with gallows humor.) Peleg says, "We hope to move publishing from books and tablets to anywhere words are printed." If that means more cake, I'm in. "I love the idea of stories existing far away from bookshelves," Keret tells me, "preying on unsuspecting sweet-toothed innocent bystanders."

---

defamation (noun):

the act of communicating false statements about a person that injure the reputation of that person

This month marks the 40th anniversary of Lillian Hellman's infamous defamation suit against Mary McCarthy. The trouble started, as some of you will remember, on the Dick Cavett show when McCarthy said of the famous playwright: "Every word she writes is a lie, including 'and' and 'the.'" The audience laughed, but Hellman sued McCarthy, PBS and Cavett for more than $2 million. The case quickly became a cause célèbre, involving complicated issues about who is a public figure and what is truth in literature. Norman Mailer, always the peacemaker, published an essay in the New York Times Book Review condemning McCarthy's attack on Hellman's honor as "a barbarity and a brutality." But he went on to plead with Hellman to drop her suit. "If Lillian wins," he worried, "then every American writer will have to feel that much more tongue-tied at daring to criticize another American writer without qualification." Both sides dug in, but no verdict ever came down. Hellman died in 1984, and her estate dropped the case. McCarthy, as always, got the last word: “I didn't want her to die. I wanted her to lose in court.”

(Baen; Redhook; Tor; Del Rey; Tor; Berkley)

Out of this world. The Science Fiction & Fantasy Writers of America announced the finalists for the annual Nebula Awards in several categories. The awards will be presented on May 30th. Here are the finalists for best novel of 2019:

- “Marque of Caine,” by Charles E. Gannon.
- “The Ten Thousand Doors of January,” by Alix E. Harrow.
- “A Memory Called Empire,” by Arkady Martine.
- “Gods of Jade and Shadow,” by Silvia Moreno-Garcia.
- “Gideon the Ninth,” by Tamsyn Muir.
- “A Song for a New Day,” by Sarah Pinsker.

City Lights Booksellers & Publishers in San Francisco, Calif. (Ron Charles/The Washington Post)

Listen up. Robert Siegel hosted a terrific episode of “On Point” this week about the resurrection of indie bookstores. His in-studio guest was Harvard Business School Professor Ryan Raffaelli, who’s been studying the industry for the past eight years. After talking with hundreds of booksellers across the country, Raffaelli has concluded that their ability to survive the retail apocalypse depends on three Cs: Community, Curation and Convening. That is, establishing a strong relationship with their local community, curating a relevant selection of books and providing a comfortable place for people to convene. When Siegel asked what's keeping indies from becoming mere showrooms for Amazon, Raffaelli said, "Bookstores, ironically, have been quite sophisticated at operating in the digital world in terms of creating community online. One of the key success factors is that they've been able to drive a significant social media presence where they bring people and extend the conversation through Instagram." Bookstore lovers and owners called in to enrich the conversation, which you can listen to here.

LeBron James of the Los Angeles Lakers in Chicago, Feb. 16, 2020 (AP Photo/Nam Huh); HarperCollins

LeBron James is working on a picture book called "I Promise," illustrated by Nina Mata. The NBA champion plans to release his debut children's book in August. It's inspired by the LeBron James Family Foundation in Akron, Ohio, which in 2018 funded the creation of the I Promise public elementary school to help struggling children. In a statement, James said, "We wanted to make sure these stories are ones that every single kid can see themselves in." This is Mata's second collaboration with an Olympic gold-medal winner. In 2018, she illustrated "She's Got This," by gymnast Laurie Hernandez. HarperCollins announced that James will also publish an intermediate-level novel next year.

Poet Carl Phillips (Reston Allen/FSG); FSG

The New Yorker’s poetry critic Dan Chiasson once said that Carl Phillips may write “the most interesting contemporary English sentences.” It’s true. Phillips, who has published more than a dozen collections, is always drawing readers through sentences that seem as fascinating as what they describe. Here’s a poem from his gorgeous new book, “Pale Colors in a Tall Field,” which will be released on March 3.

If It Must Be Winter

Not crowns,
not conquest defined in terms of how many fear you, or fear to say otherwise, not by these will you know your own royalty, but in smaller ways, how to the least gesture there’s more power than seems reasonable, though it will feel deserved . . . So I was told, and they have not proved wrong. I’ve but to open my hand, bees come to it, the slick fur of bees
assembling as toward an honor in no way expected

though each time the honor remains mine, as if almost it should, as if certain privileges had to do with destiny—

Do I believe that? Do I? My hand a sea
across which the wings of the bees flash
like signal flags whose patterns, instead of translating,
I make up my own translations for. I shall do as I please.
As a lovely argument can make a difficult truth
more clear, if not more sweet, though is there not a sweetness to clarity that can almost make the truth

seem worth it? To say I'm not quite sure makes me no less king, here. Sometimes, I open my hand and there's no sea at all, just a windy plain, what appear to be dust storms crossing it
turn out, on reaching me, to be the disappointments—
all of them—that I never intended, each one
on horseback, my cavalry, each face
raised toward mine, as if awaiting command—hungering for it. Forgetful, or stupid. I can see no difference. Look away from me. I haven't said you can look at me.

From "Pale Colors in a Tall Field," by Carl Phillips (FSG). Reprinted by permission of the author.

(L to R) Mark Murphey (William Joad) and Tony Sancho (Martín Jodes) in "Mother Road" at Arena Stage at the Mead Center for American Theater, in Washington, D.C. (Photo by Margot

This weekend, my wife and I are going to see Octavio Solis’s play “Mother Road” (review). It’s a present-day sequel to “The Grapes of Wrath,” involving a drive from California back to Oklahoma. I haven’t read John Steinbeck’s 1939 classic since high school, but his portrayal of migrant workers and economic inequality made a lasting impression on me. The novel won a National Book Award, a Pulitzer Prize and, two decades later, was celebrated in Steinbeck’s Nobel Prize citation.

Till next week, if you have any questions or comments about The Post's book coverage, contact me at ron.charles@washpost.com. And if you know someone who would enjoy this newsletter, please forward it to them. To subscribe, click here.

---

A.D. Miller’s ‘Independence Square’ imagines how one diplomat tried to secretly manage Ukraine’s revolution

Review • By Ron Charles • Read more »

---

Five new thrillers and mysteries to help escape reality — or see it in another light

Review • By Richard Lipez • Read more »

---

In ‘Counterpoint,’ a memoirist reflects on love, loss and Bach

Review • By Marcia Butler • Read more »

---

A memoirist faces the consequences of

revealing her family's secret past

Review • By Marion Winik • Read more »

---

In 'Amnesty,' an immigrant is put in an impossible position

Review • By Kristen Millares Young • Read more »

---

Gish Jen's 'The Resisters' reminds us of the importance of standing up for what's right

Review • By Diana Abu-Jaber • Read more »

---

In 'The Mercies,' a deadly storm isn't the only danger for a Scandinavian community

Review • By Bethanne Patrick • Read more »

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Carolyn Hax for Post columnist Carolyn Hax's latest advice column every day. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from Book Club | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for Book Club or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

---

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Bernie Sanders shows some Trumpian tendencies as he refuses to release promised medical records
Date: Friday, February 21, 2020 8:13:07 AM

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Partnership for America's Health Care Future

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
✉ Email

Bernie Sanders shows some Trumpian tendencies as he refuses to release promised medical records

He enjoys talking about his lead in the polls, the size of his crowds and his number of Twitter followers. He routinely criticizes the mainstream media and insists he cannot control his most zealous supporters online. Most people in his adopted party don't want him to be their nominee, but the establishment cannot agree on who is best to stop him.

Elizabeth Warren likened Mike Bloomberg to President Trump at the top of Wednesday night's debate, warning Democrats not to substitute one "arrogant billionaire" with a history of misogyny for another. But it was Bernie Sanders who displayed flashes of his Trumpian side during the two-hour clash. The most significant illustration of this came as the senator from Vermont sought to justify his refusal to release his full medical records.

Bernie Sanders delivers his victory speech after winning the New Hampshire primary last week. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

The 78-year-old would be the oldest president ever elected. Sanders suffered a heart attack in October just a few miles from the site of the debate, but his campaign refused to acknowledge the extent of what happened until three days later – late on a Friday. During the two weeks he spent recuperating at home, the senator told CNN's Sanjay Gupta that the American people have a right to "full disclosure" about the health of someone running for president. "And we will make, at the appropriate time, all of our medical records public for you or anybody else who wants to see them," he said.

On New Year's Eve, Sanders released summary letters from three

physicians that concluded he's healthy enough to be president. That's far from his full medical records. Now leading in the national polls, after winning the most votes in the first two states, Sanders says that will have to suffice for people worried about his physical fitness to be commander in chief.

NBC correspondent Hallie Jackson, one of the debate moderators, noted that Sanders has attacked Trump for refusing to release his tax returns. "What," she asked, "happened to your promise of full transparency?"

After thanking the doctors who took care of him, Sanders began his answer with the kind of whataboutism that we've grown to expect from Trump. "I think the one area maybe that Mayor Bloomberg and I share, you have two stents, as well," he said. The former New York mayor, who has never had a heart attack, replied that those were installed two decades ago. "Well, we both have two stents," Sanders replied. "It's a procedure that is done about a million times a year."

Then the septuagenarian claimed he's released "the full report" of "all of my history," which he has not. Sanders finished his answer by challenging anyone who doubts that he can deal with the stress of being president to "follow me around" on the campaign trail. "See how you're doing compared to me," he said.

When John McCain ran for president in 2008, the then-72-year-old allowed reporters to review 1,173 pages of his medical records. But Trump, too, would only release a letter in 2016 from his doctor that said he was "in excellent physical health." Like Sanders, he pointed to his stamina at rallies as evidence he was in good shape. He won anyway. The 73-year-old president raised a round of fresh questions about his medial status in November after making an unscheduled trip to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center and then insisting that he merely wanted to get an early start on his physical.

After kneecapping Bloomberg during Wednesday's debate,

Warren trained her fire toward Sanders on Thursday. Asked what differentiates her from Sanders, she told MSNBC last night: “I get stuff done. ... I don't want to be president just to yell at people. I want to be president to change things.” During a gaggle with reporters earlier in the day in Las Vegas, Warren attacked Sanders for not releasing his full medical records. “He had made a promise,” she said. “I don't think that's a question of opinion. Those aren't medical records.”

The 70-year-old senator from Massachusetts released a letter from her physician and five pages of supporting medical data last year. Former vice president Joe Biden, 77, released a three-page letter from his physician outlining his current condition and medical history. The youngest candidate in the race, 38-year-old Pete Buttigieg, noted that Barack Obama released his full medical records and details of annual physicals. “President Trump lowered that standard,” Buttigieg said during the debate. “He said just a letter from a doctor is enough. And a lot of folks on this stage are now saying that's enough. But I am certainly prepared to get a physical and put out the results. I think everybody here should be willing to do the same.”

When Sanders spokeswoman Briahna Joy Gray was pressed during a CNN appearance on Wednesday about why he hasn't put out more medical records, she called it a “smear.” She even likened requests for more health information from Sanders to demands that Obama release his birth certificate.

Bernie Sanders speaks on Oct. 19 in Queens. It was his first big rally after the heart attack, which allowed him to reset his campaign and helped secure the endorsement of New York Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez. (Jeenah Moon/Bloomberg)

---

Content from Partnership for America's Health Care Future

We Can't Afford Medicare for All

American families should not be forced to foot the bill for Medicare for All. And any new government insurance system would force them to pay more to wait longer for worse care.

---

To be sure, Trump and Sanders have vastly different agendas and stand on different sides of the ideological spectrum. It would be unfair to put too much emphasis on similarities. But one reason Sanders supporters like him, indisputably, is that he promises to fight Trump's fire with more fire. His Trumpian flashes this week foreshadow what the general election might look like if he won the nomination.

Sanders has been attacked for more than a week now after some of his supporters harassed Culinary Union officials on social media after they criticized his Medicare-for-all plan.

Asked about this during the debate, Sanders distanced himself. "We have over 10.6 million people on Twitter, and 99.9 percent of them are decent human beings," he said. "And if there are a few people who make ugly remarks, who attack trade union leaders, I disown those people. They are not part of our movement."

Then he deflected in a way that seemed reminiscent of how Trump has deflected in the face of similar attacks. Sanders said his own surrogates, especially women of color, face similarly vicious attacks online. "And let me say something else about this, not being too paranoid," he added. "All of us remember 2016, and what we remember is efforts by Russians and others to try to interfere in our election and divide us up. I'm not saying that's happening, but it would not shock me."

Experts say there's no evidence of Russians masquerading as Bernie Bros. "Absent direct evidence, researchers said Sanders's comments threaten to foment further doubt about a campaign that has been buffeted by confidence-shaking missteps, beginning with the technical glitches that marred the Iowa caucuses earlier this month," Isaac Stanley-Becker and Tony Romm report. "Facebook spokesman Andy Stone said Thursday it also had not seen evidence of Russian trolls masquerading as Sanders supporters. Twitter spokeswoman Katie Rosborough said the company would 'disclose' activity by Russia or other foreign actors if it had 'reasonable evidence of state-backed information operations.' ... Researchers have found some of the most divisive tweets and memes during the 2020 election originate with specific, verified Sanders supporters. That includes the viral #mayorcheat hashtag that attacked Buttigieg for ties between the former mayor's presidential campaign and Iowa caucus organizers, said Ben Nimmo, director of investigations at Graphika.”

“The problem we face is the impression of meddling can be as damaging to the legitimacy of an election as meddling itself,” said Jessica Brandt, the head of policy and research at the Alliance for Securing Democracy, an arm of the German Marshall Fund.

House minority whip Steve Scalise (R-La.) recalled Thursday that he was wounded by a Sanders supporter during baseball practice 2017:

Both Trump and Sanders didn’t adopt the parties they now lead until late in life. Sanders, who still hasn’t formally become a Democrat, reportedly considered a primary challenge against Obama from the left in 2011 more seriously than he’s acknowledged. In 1987, Sanders – as a mayor of Burlington, Vt., -- told the University of Vermont student newspaper that he was “physically nauseated” as a young man when he watched John F. Kennedy speak out against Fidel Castro’s revolution in Cuba. He said this was a factor in his decision to work outside the party system. That same year, Trump paid to run full-page ads in The Washington Post attacking Ronald Reagan’s foreign policy for lacking “backbone.”

Ironically, Trump now touts Reagan and Sanders is currently airing a television commercial that likens him to Kennedy. After playing the sound bite from the speech in which Kennedy said that “we choose to go to the moon ... not because it is easy but because it is hard,” Sanders narrates: “President Kennedy knew that settling for half-measures wasn't good enough. So when candidates say we can't guarantee health care for all, make college affordable for all, combat climate change, or create a world at peace, remember: America is best when we strive to do big things, even when it's hard.”

The debate again put in stark relief the collective action problem facing those who want to be the leading Sanders alternative, a dynamic I wrote about on the eve of the New Hampshire primary. Bloomberg's spotty performance will prevent him from consolidating support in that lane. Buttigieg and Amy Klobuchar went after each other because both are running close to even and competing for the same set of voters. It was the most-watched Democratic debate ever, with nearly 20 million people tuning into the telecast on NBC and MSNBC. The Sanders campaign said it raised $2.7 million from about 150,000 donors on Wednesday, his best haul of any of the nine debate days this cycle.

Of the six candidates onstage, Sanders was the only one who said the person with the most pledged delegates going into the convention this summer should definitely be the nominee. This represents a reversal from 2016 when he trailed Hillary Clinton among pledged delegates but thought he might persuade superdelegates that he'd be more electable. "What's clear out of [Wednesday] night is, it's hard to see what forces will stop Bernie from becoming the front-runner and just as hard to see how there will be any consolidation into a single candidate to oppose him," said Robby Mook, who was Clinton's campaign manager.

"The dawning realization for many in the party is that what Democrats had envisioned as a jubilant national convention in Milwaukee ... has the potential to turn into a pitched battle among multiple candidates and their supporters, each representing dueling ideological wings of the party and convinced that the other side would lose to Trump," Matt Viser, Dan Balz and Annie Linskey report. "Top campaigns have not only staffed up with delegate experts to guide them through the intricacies of the primaries, but they also have built legal teams preparing to challenge any results that don't go their way, according to interviews with 16 top party officials and strategists. And in preparation for a contested convention, some campaigns have started to reach out to superdelegates, in an attempt to secure support for a second ballot when they would come into play."

Former Senate majority leader Harry Reid said no candidate should be given the nomination without winning an outright majority of delegates. “I don’t think that anybody — Bernie Sanders or anyone else — should simply get the nomination because they have 30 percent of the delegates and no one else has that many,” the Nevada Democrat told Paul Kane during an interview in his office at the Bellagio hotel. “We have to let the system work its way out. I do not believe anyone should get the nomination unless they have 50-plus-one.” Reid added that moderates could align themselves in an attempt to combine their delegates and overtake Sanders.

A favorite parlor game for Washington elites right now is speculating about how badly Sanders might lose in a general election. Veterans Democratic operatives wonder whether Democrats would lose the House if he’s at the top of the ticket. Many of them privately fear a blowout more akin to Michael Dukakis’s in 1988 than George McGovern’s in 1972. These conversations sound similar to the ones Republican operatives had as Trump took over their party four years ago.

Republicans are increasingly using Sanders as a foil to target down-ballot Democrats. “Arizona Sen. Martha McSally launched a TV ad titled ‘Bernie Bro’ likening her Democratic opponent, retired astronaut Mark Kelly, to the Vermont senator,” Politico’s Alex Isenstadt notes.

“North Carolina Sen. Thom Tillis held a press conference last week linking his Democratic rivals to the Sanders-backed Green New Deal. In Michigan, a conservative group has aired a series of commercials that go after Democratic Sen. Gary Peters by invoking Sanders and his support for Medicare for All. And the Republican State Leadership Committee, which focuses on state legislative races, has been running digital ads asking whether down-ballot Democrats in more than a half-dozen states are ‘feeling burned yet’ — a take on the Sanders mantra, ‘Feel the Bern.’”

Sanders is dismissive of electability concerns. Asked during the debate about a poll that showed two-thirds of Americans uncomfortable with a socialist president, Sanders replied that the same poll showed him winning. “You might mention that,” he told NBC moderator Lester Holt. Indeed, the NBC-Wall Street Journal poll showed Sanders leading among Democratic primary voters, with 27 percent, followed by four candidates bunched together with support between 15 percent to 13 percent. It also found Sanders beating Trump 50 percent to 46 percent in a hypothetical head-to-head matchup, which was within the margin of error. The same survey discovered that 67 percent said they have “reservations” or are “very uncomfortable” with a socialist candidate, 57 percent said the same about someone who had a heart attack in the last year and 53 percent said the same about someone who's older than 75.

After Buttigieg accused Sanders of wanting “to burn this party down,” Holt asked Sanders whether he’s polarizing. “If speaking to the needs and the pain of a long-neglected working class is polarizing,” he said, “I think you got the wrong word.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

Check out my podcast.

Thank you to everyone who has sent feedback on the newsletter's redesign. It's immensely helpful for our team as we seek to optimize your reader experience. One of the changes has meant that the hyperlink to my Big Idea podcast is less pronounced than before. But it's still here: You can listen by clicking on the right side of the share bar immediately above this item. The audio briefing goes live around 7 a.m. Eastern each weekday and includes a preview of the key stories that I cover here in greater detail. You can also always download the podcast on this landing page. Thanks again. Have an awesome weekend.

The Trump presidency

A senior U.S. intelligence official said Russia wants to see Trump reelected.

“After learning of that analysis, which was provided to House lawmakers in a classified hearing, Trump grew angry at his acting director of national intelligence, Joseph Maguire, in the Oval Office, seeing Maguire and his staff as disloyal for speaking to Congress about Russia’s perceived preference,” Ellen Nakashima, Shane Harris, Josh Dawsey and Anne Gearan report. “The intelligence official’s analysis and Trump’s furious response ruined Maguire’s chances of becoming the permanent intelligence chief. ... It was not clear what specific steps, if any, U.S. intelligence officials think Russia may have taken to help Trump. ... Trump announced on Wednesday that he was replacing Maguire with a vocal loyalist, Richard Grenell. ... Maguire, a career official who is respected by the intelligence rank and file, was considered a leading candidate to be nominated to the post of DNI, White House aides had said. ...

“The official, Shelby Pierson, said several times during the briefing that Russia had ‘developed a preference’ for Trump. ... That conclusion was part of a broader discussion of election security that also touched on when the U.S. government should warn Democratic candidates if they are being targeted by foreign governments. ... Trump erroneously believed that Pierson had given the assessment exclusively to Rep. Adam B. Schiff (D-Calif.). ... Trump also believed that the information would be helpful to Democrats if it were released publicly. ... Trump learned about Pierson's remarks from Rep. Devin Nunes (Calif.). ...

"Trump became angry with Maguire and blamed him for Pierson's remarks when the two met the next day during a special briefing for Trump on election security attended by officials from other agencies, but not Pierson. ... He said that Maguire should not have let the Capitol Hill briefing happen. ... Trump told Maguire and other aides in the Oval Office that he did not believe Russia was interfering to help him or planning to do so, and that the intelligence community was getting 'played.' ... He said that the information would be used against him unfairly and that he could not believe that people were believing such a story again, reflecting his opinion that Russian interference in 2016 was a 'hoax' made up by officials with a political agenda. ... Maguire struck an apologetic tone ...

"White House officials said Trump's decision to make Grenell the acting director rather than nominate him for the permanent position reflected concerns that he might not win confirmation in the Senate, given his polarizing reputation. ... The president told reporters aboard Air Force One that Rep. Doug Collins (R-Ga.), a staunch Trump supporter who also is running for U.S. Senate, is under consideration for the permanent post. ...

"The shake-up at the top of the intelligence community is the latest move in a post-impeachment purge. ... The deputy national security adviser, Victoria Coates, has also been removed from her post after some colleagues, including trade adviser Peter Navarro, accused her of being the author of 'Anonymous.' ... Coates has strenuously denied the accusation. She was moved to an advisory position in the Energy Department." Meanwhile, a former NSC aide who tried to discredit the Russia probe has been promoted. Kash Patel is now a senior adviser for Grenell, per Politico. It's not clear what exact role Patel, who used to work for Nunes, will play.

Breaking this morning: The U.S. plans to sign a peace deal with the Taliban on Feb. 29.

The deal will pass as long as a week-long reduction in violence across the country holds, according to Secretary of State Mike Pompeo. Susannah George and John Hudson report: “The violence reduction, the decisive condition of the possible peace deal, is set to begin early Saturday — just after midnight, according to Afghanistan's National Security Council and a senior State Department official. ‘U.S. negotiators in Doha have come to an understanding with the Taliban on a significant and nationwide reduction in violence across Afghanistan,’ Pompeo said in a statement Friday, referring to U.S.-Taliban talks in the Qatari capital. ... The Taliban said ‘both parties will now create a suitable security situation in advance of agreement signing date, extend invitations to senior representatives of numerous countries and organizations to participate in the signing ceremony, make arrangements for the release of prisoners’ and prepare for intra-Afghan negotiations, according to the group's statement released to the media Friday. The U.S. military command in Kabul said it has nothing to announce at this time. ... The week-long reduction in violence will require the Taliban, the United States and Afghan government-aligned forces to largely cease all planned offensive operations nationwide.”

Roger Stone arrives for his sentencing on Thursday at the federal courthouse in Washington. (Marvin Joseph/The Washington Post)

Trump confidant and former adviser Roger Stone was sentenced to 40 months in prison.

“The penalty from U.S. District Judge Amy Berman Jackson comes after weeks of infighting over the politically charged case that threw the Justice Department into crisis, and it is likely not to be the final word. Even before the sentencing hearing began, Trump seemed to suggest on Twitter that he might pardon Stone,” Rachel Weiner, Matt Zapposky, Tom Jackman and Devlin Barrett report. “With the proceedings ongoing, Trump questioned whether his ally was being treated fairly. Afterward, he attacked the jury in the case and said he would ‘love to see Roger exonerated.’ ... In a lengthy speech before imposing the penalty, Jackson seemed to take aim at Trump, saying Stone ‘was not prosecuted for standing up for the president; he was prosecuted for covering up for the president.’ She also appeared to call out Attorney General William P. Barr, saying his intervention to reduce career prosecutors’ sentencing recommendation was ‘unprecedented.’ But she said the politics surrounding the case had not influenced her decision.”

“Stone did not speak in court and showed no visible emotion as

the sentence was read. Emerging from the courtroom in a wide-striped suit and polka-dot tie, he appeared calm. ‘I have nothing to say,’ Stone said. ... Stone, 67, was convicted by a federal jury on seven counts of lying to Congress and tampering with a witness about his efforts to learn about hacked Democratic emails related to Clinton. ... Stone, his wife and a large entourage exited the courthouse to a large crowd of photographers, supporters and antagonists. As he climbed into an SUV, protesters shouted ‘Lock him up!’ while supporters yelled ‘Pardon Roger Stone!’ ...

“Stone requested a new trial last week, after Trump suggested the forewoman in Stone’s case had ‘significant bias.’ Jackson, the judge, said previously that she would delay implementing his sentence until she resolves that request. A filing is due from Stone’s defense team Monday. In addition to prison, Jackson ordered Stone to pay a $20,000 fine and serve two years of supervised release. He remains out of prison on bond, and even if he loses his motion for a new trial, he will have at least two weeks to turn himself in — unless an appeal further delays things.”

The Justice Department breathed a sigh of relief as Stone’s sentence hit Barr’s target. “It was messier than we wanted, but we ended up in the same place,’ said one senior official,” Barrett and Zapotosky report. “Another Justice Department official called Stone’s sentence a ‘vindication’ of the attorney general’s decision last week to insert himself into the process, calling for a revised sentencing memorandum that undercut the line prosecutors’ prior recommendation of seven to nine years in prison. ... After a week of nervous tension atop the agency, anxiety levels have dropped, at least for the moment. ... Senior Justice Department officials are, however, increasingly resigned to the idea that Trump is likely to continue upbraiding the department and the FBI, and that it may be a staple of his reelection campaign rhetoric — the odd spectacle of an incumbent president bashing his own Justice Department.”

---

Quote of the day

“The truth still exists; the truth still matters,” Judge Jackson said. “Roger Stone’s insistence that it doesn’t, his belligerence, his pride in his own lies are a threat to our most fundamental institutions, to the foundations of our democracy. If it goes unpunished, it will not be a victory for one party or another. Everyone loses. ... The dismay and disgust at the defendant’s belligerence should transcend party.”

Former congressman Dana Rohrabacher confirmed that he offered a Trump pardon to Julian Assange.

“Rohrabacher (R-Calif.) said his goal during the meeting was to find proof for a widely debunked conspiracy theory: that WikiLeaks’ real source for the DNC emails was not Russian intelligence agents, as U.S. officials have since concluded, but former DNC staffer Seth Rich, who was murdered on the streets of Washington in July 2016 in what police believe was a botched robbery,” Yahoo News reports.

Rudy Giuliani’s work for a candidate in the Dominican Republic raised eyebrows amid the Ukraine swirl.

“The politics of this Caribbean island nation do not frequently capture the attention of the stewards of America’s foreign policy, but Secretary of State Mike Pompeo phoned down last summer with a clear message,” Joshua Partlow and Josh Dawsey report. “Dominican President Danilo Medina’s supporters were pushing to change the country’s constitution to allow him to run for an unprecedented third term. In a call with the president, Pompeo emphasized the importance of ‘adherence to rule of law and the constitution,’ according to a State Department readout. That message was echoed a week later in person by [Giuliani]. ... [But] Giuliani was not in the Dominican Republic as Trump’s representative. He was speaking as a paid consultant to an opposition presidential candidate.”

A man was charged with making death threats against the Ukraine whistleblower’s attorney.

A day after Trump lashed out against Mark Zaid during a 2019 rally, the

attorney received a disquieting email. “All traitors must die miserable deaths,” the message read. “Those that represent traitors shall meet the same fate. We will hunt you down and bleed you out like the pigs you are.” Federal prosecutors have indicted Brittan J. Atkinson and accused him of sending the message. (Reis Thebault)

Mick Mulvaney said the U.S. is “desperate” for more legal immigrants.

The acting White House chief of staff told a crowd at a gathering in England that the Trump administration “needs more immigration” for the U.S. economy to continue growing, according to audio of his remarks obtained by Nick Miroff and Josh Dawsey. “‘We are desperate — desperate — for more people,’ Mulvaney said. ‘We are running out of people to fuel the economic growth that we’ve had in our nation over the last four years. We need more immigrants.’ The Trump administration wants those immigrants to come in a ‘legal fashion,’ Mulvaney said. ... Mulvaney’s remarks appear in contrast to the public position of several top figures in Trump’s White House — especially that of senior policy adviser Stephen Miller. ... Mulvaney’s private remarks were more in line with conventional GOP views of immigration as a major engine for the U.S. economy. ... He praised the immigration systems in Canada and Australia and said the Trump administration wants the United States to embrace a model closer to those nations.”

Trump’s “Remain in Mexico” program is dwindling as more migrants are sent to Guatemala.

“Immigration attorneys and migrant advocates say the Trump administration is phasing out its year-old Migrant Protection Protocols policy, ... instead prioritizing newer, more restrictive programs that make qualifying for asylum in the United States extremely difficult,” Arelis R. Hernández and Kevin Sieff report. “‘MPP is dying,’ said Charlene D’Cruz, a lawyer who represents Central American asylum seekers and has advocated for dozens of vulnerable migrants to be removed from the program and allowed into the United States. ‘And something worse is taking its place. Everything is changing.’”

A Mexican man just became the seventh immigrant to die in ICE custody since October. BuzzFeed News reported that the preliminary cause appears to be suicide. He was 34.

The State Department delayed the visa of a renowned German professor and far-right extremism expert.

Academic Hajo Funke delivered documentation for a visa to the U.S. Consulate in Berlin in November 2019, Moriah Balingit reports. But when the consulate returned his passport, “it was accompanied not by a visa but by a letter that said a decision about his visa had been delayed for three to six months. The two classes he was set to teach — one on far-right populism and another on political memory in Germany — were in jeopardy.” The professor finally got his visa granted Thursday, but questions have been raised about what prompted the delay. Last year, Funke “wrote an article for the website of the American Institute for Contemporary German Studies at Johns Hopkins University linking violence in Charlottesville, where a white nationalist rally turned deadly in 2017, to [Trump’s election]. He has also visited Iran ... for an academic conference and to visit the family of his wife, who emigrated from Iran to Germany in the 1980s and is now a German citizen.”

---

More on 2020

Elizabeth Warren signs a cardboard cutout of herself at her campaign office in North Las Vegas on Thursday. (John Locher/AP)

Warren flip-flopped on outside money, refusing to disavow a new super PAC.

Warren refused to disavow a new super PAC created to support her candidacy after spending a year criticizing her Democratic rivals for not disavowing super PACs set up to help them. “We reached the point a few weeks ago, where all of the men who were still in this race, and on the debate stage, all had either super PACs or they were multi-billionaires, and could just rummage around in their sock drawers and find enough money to be able to fund a campaign,” the senator told reporters. “And the only people who didn't have them were the two women. And at that point, there are some women saying, you know, that's just not right.” CNN reports that Persist PAC will spend more than $1 million to air a biography-focused television ad that links Warren to Obama.

During Thursday night's CNN town hall, Warren said Bloomberg's refusal to release former employees from nondisclosure agreements is disqualifying. She showed up with her own version of a “release and covenant not to sue” document for him to sign and release his past employees from their NDAs. She even offered to text it to him. Warren said that if Bloomberg is ultimately the nominee, she'll support him, but added that “what we’ve got right now is a chance for the Nevada voters to make sure that Michael Bloomberg is not our nominee, and that’s what I’m asking.”

Warren desperately needed a post-debate cash infusion.

Warren’s campaign says her fiery performance Wednesday has turned February into her best fundraising month yet. “But January figures show the Massachusetts senator was in deep trouble before her sudden apparent reversal — so much so that her campaign took out a $3 million line of credit and tapped into $400,000 of it as a loan, as contingency cash before the Iowa caucuses. She spent more than double ($22.3 million) the amount she raised ($10.8 million) in January,” per Michelle Ye Hee Lee and Anu Narayanswamy.

Two Bloomborgs are running for president at the same time.

“One is the tough, get-it-done, rich guy who stars in $340 million worth of advertising, emotes in scripted speeches and is praised daily by his surrogate army,” write Michael Scherer, Josh Dawsey and Michael Kranish. “The other is the sometimes bumbling, frequently ineffective and often peevish politician who showed up Wednesday night, operating on the fly. ... Bloomberg’s advisers, well aware of his uneven public performance as New York mayor, have tried to reconcile the two identities. They have scripted a campaign message that focuses heavily on the sheer scale of his operation and power of his purse, not the campaign talents of the candidate. On the trail, he boasts of having ‘the record and the resources’ to challenge Trump, not the heart or the passion.”

“So, how was your night last night?” Bloomberg asked a crowd in Salt Lake City Thursday night. \(AP\)

Conservatives have learned to wield power inside Facebook.

“Trump and other party leaders have pressured Facebook by making unproven claims of bias against conservatives amid rising signs of government action on the issue, including investigations by Congress and the Justice Department. Republicans also have leveraged Facebook’s fears of alienating conservative Americans to win concessions from a company whose most widely shared news content typically includes stories from Fox News and other right-leaning sources,” Craig Timberg reports. “These sensitivities — in conjunction with the company’s long-standing resistance to acting as ‘an arbiter of truth’ — have affected Facebook’s responses to a range of major issues, from how to address fake news and Russian manipulation of American voters on the platform to, more recently, the advertising policies that have set the political ground rules for the 2020 election, say people privy to internal debates. ... Critics — both outside Facebook and within its ranks — see something more akin to corporate realpolitik, a willingness to accede to political demands in an era when Republicans control most levers of power in Washington.”

Twitter is testing new ways to fight misinformation.

“Twitter is experimenting with adding brightly colored labels directly beneath lies and misinformation posted by politicians and other public figures,” according to a demo sent to NBC News. “Twitter confirmed that the leaked demo, which was accessible on a publicly available site, is one possible iteration of a new policy to target misinformation. The company does not have a date to roll out any new misinformation features. In this version, disinformation or misleading information posted by public figures would be corrected directly beneath a tweet by fact-checkers and journalists who are verified on the platform and possibly by other users who would participate in a new ‘community reports’ feature, which the demo claims is ‘like Wikipedia.’”

Quinnipiac polling shows Trump running strong in the Rust Belt.

The president leads in head-to-head matchups against the top Democratic candidates in Wisconsin, loses or trails within the margin of error in Pennsylvania, and is locked in tight competitions in Michigan.

The coronavirus

Infected Americans were flown home from Japan against the CDC's advice.

“In the wee hours of a rainy Monday, more than a dozen buses sat on the tarmac at Tokyo’s Haneda Airport. Inside, 328 weary Americans wearing surgical masks and gloves waited anxiously to fly home after weeks in quarantine aboard the Diamond Princess, the luxury liner where the novel coronavirus had exploded into a shipwide epidemic,” Lena Sun, Lenny Bernstein, Shibani Mahtani and Joel Achenbach report. “But as the buses idled, U.S. officials wrestled with troubling news. New test results showed that 14 passengers were infected with the virus. The U.S. State Department had promised that no one with the infection would be allowed to board the planes. ... In Washington, where it was still Sunday afternoon, a fierce debate broke out: The State Department and a top Trump administration health official wanted to forge ahead. The infected passengers had no symptoms and could be segregated on the plane in a plastic-lined enclosure. But officials at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention disagreed, contending they could still spread the virus. The CDC believed the 14 should not be flown back with uninfected passengers.

... The State Department won the argument. But unhappy CDC officials demanded to be left out of the news release that explained that infected people were being flown back to the United States — a move that would nearly double the number of known coronavirus cases in this country.”

A coronavirus outbreak in Chinese prisons raised alarm.

“Chinese authorities on Friday reported hundreds of new coronavirus infections at prisons around the country,” Gerry Shih reports. “A handful of prisons reported nearly 500 new cases, a significant portion of the more than 1,100 new cases reported in mainland China on Friday — and a marked increase after several days of declines. Tests at a prison in eastern Shandong province showed 207 out of 2,077 inmates and staff were infected, and the provincial justice department’s Communist Party secretary was dismissed as a result. ... Another jail in Zhejiang province found 34 cases. Hubei province, at the center of the outbreak, said Friday it found 220 new cases inside penitentiaries. ...

“In South Korea, new cases skyrocketed, bringing the national total to 204, as worries mounted that the country is becoming a new hot spot. Many of the new cases have been traced to ... a regional branch of a fringe religious sect named Shincheonji Church of God in the southern city of Daegu, according to the KCDC. The church’s founder Lee Man-hee called the outbreak ‘the devil’s deed to curb the rapid growth of Shincheonji,’ in an internal message published by South Korea’s Yonhap News Agency on Friday. Daegu city and surrounding North Gyeongsang province have been designated ‘special care zones’ after a jump in cases in the area, Prime Minister Chung Sye Kyun said earlier Friday.”

Chinese researchers could submit a vaccine for clinical trials in late April.

“Animal models of mice and monkeys infected with the novel coronavirus have also been constructed, which will provide support for drug screening, vaccine development and research on viral transmission mechanism.

China set up a coronavirus scientific research group about one month ago, with 14 experts led by renowned pulmonologist Zhong Nanshan,” Liu Yang reports.

Confusion continues to grow over China’s counting methods, as infection numbers swing wildly.

“Early Friday, China’s National Health Commission reported new infections increased again to 889. There are now a cumulative total of 75,465 infections and 2,236 deaths, mostly in Hubei province, the agency said. Hubei authorities have changed their criteria for counting cases twice in the past week,” Shih and Miriam Berger report. “The latest inconsistency — under which one city appeared to have more cases than the total in the province — apparently arose because Hubei province deducted cases that have not been confirmed through genetic tests from a total reported case number, which includes all diagnoses made by physicians using other methods. At best, the constant changes have frustrated scholars. At worst, they have raised suspicions.”

The USDA estimates that China will not buy as much U.S. farm output as Trump claims.

“The U.S. Department of Agriculture’s chief economist, Robert Johansson, projected that agricultural exports to China would reach roughly $14 billion in the year that ends Sept. 30, a $4 billion increase from one year ago. But that amount would still fall far short of what White House officials said would take place based on the recently announced ‘Phase One’ trade deal with Chinese leaders,” Laura Reiley reports. “White House officials have said agricultural exports to China would be between $40 billion and $50 billion in each of the next two years. Last year, when he was promising the trade deal would lead to a huge increase in purchases, Trump told farmers to buy ‘more land’ and ‘bigger tractors.’”

---

Social media speed read

After Trump attacked him again, former FBI director James Comey posted an image from Mariah Carey's music video for her song "Obsessed":

Several of the 2020 candidates attacked Trump's response to the intelligence community's conclusion that Russia favors his reelection:

Obama's former political director celebrated Stone's sentence:

The New York Times has published an op-ed by the deputy leader of the Taliban: "What We, the Taliban, Want." The paper's senior Afghanistan correspondent criticized his own publication for running the piece:

Videos of the day

James Corden wondered if Democrats are headed to an Iowa-repeat in Nevada:

Mike Bloomberg's campaign posted a highly misleading video from the debate:

Trump complained that the movie "Parasite" won the Academy Award for best picture, even though it's not an American movie:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Must Reads for a curated selection of our best journalism in your inbox every Saturday, plus a peek behind the scenes into how one story came together. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Bernie Sanders shows some Trumpian tendencies as he refuses to release promised medical records
Date: Friday, February 21, 2020 8:13:34 AM

COMMITTED TO
AFFORDABLE CARE
FOR THE HEALTH OF AMERICA<sup>SM</sup>

BlueCross
BlueShield
Association

Powered by  LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Partnership for America's Health Care Future

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

Bernie Sanders shows some Trumpian tendencies as he refuses to release promised medical records

He enjoys talking about his lead in the polls, the size of his crowds and his number of Twitter followers. He routinely criticizes the mainstream media and insists he cannot control his most zealous supporters online. Most people in his adopted party don't want him to be their nominee, but the establishment cannot agree on who is best to stop him.

Elizabeth Warren likened Mike Bloomberg to President Trump at the top of Wednesday night's debate, warning Democrats not to substitute one "arrogant billionaire" with a history of misogyny for another. But it was Bernie Sanders who displayed flashes of his Trumpian side during the two-hour clash. The most significant illustration of this came as the senator from Vermont sought to justify his refusal to release his full medical records.

Bernie Sanders delivers his victory speech after winning the New Hampshire primary last week. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

The 78-year-old would be the oldest president ever elected. Sanders suffered a heart attack in October just a few miles from the site of the debate, but his campaign refused to acknowledge the extent of what happened until three days later – late on a Friday. During the two weeks he spent recuperating at home, the senator told CNN's Sanjay Gupta that the American people have a right to "full disclosure" about the health of someone running for president. "And we will make, at the appropriate time, all of our medical records public for you or anybody else who wants to see them," he said.

On New Year's Eve, Sanders released summary letters from three

physicians that concluded he's healthy enough to be president. That's far from his full medical records. Now leading in the national polls, after winning the most votes in the first two states, Sanders says that will have to suffice for people worried about his physical fitness to be commander in chief.

NBC correspondent Hallie Jackson, one of the debate moderators, noted that Sanders has attacked Trump for refusing to release his tax returns. "What," she asked, "happened to your promise of full transparency?"

After thanking the doctors who took care of him, Sanders began his answer with the kind of whataboutism that we've grown to expect from Trump. "I think the one area maybe that Mayor Bloomberg and I share, you have two stents, as well," he said. The former New York mayor, who has never had a heart attack, replied that those were installed two decades ago. "Well, we both have two stents," Sanders replied. "It's a procedure that is done about a million times a year."

Then the septuagenarian claimed he's released "the full report" of "all of my history," which he has not. Sanders finished his answer by challenging anyone who doubts that he can deal with the stress of being president to "follow me around" on the campaign trail. "See how you're doing compared to me," he said.

When John McCain ran for president in 2008, the then-72-year-old allowed reporters to review 1,173 pages of his medical records. But Trump, too, would only release a letter in 2016 from his doctor that said he was "in excellent physical health." Like Sanders, he pointed to his stamina at rallies as evidence he was in good shape. He won anyway. The 73-year-old president raised a round of fresh questions about his medial status in November after making an unscheduled trip to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center and then insisting that he merely wanted to get an early start on his physical.

After kneecapping Bloomberg during Wednesday's debate,

Warren trained her fire toward Sanders on Thursday. Asked what differentiates her from Sanders, she told MSNBC last night: “I get stuff done. ... I don't want to be president just to yell at people. I want to be president to change things.” During a gaggle with reporters earlier in the day in Las Vegas, Warren attacked Sanders for not releasing his full medical records. “He had made a promise,” she said. “I don't think that's a question of opinion. Those aren't medical records.”

The 70-year-old senator from Massachusetts released a letter from her physician and five pages of supporting medical data last year. Former vice president Joe Biden, 77, released a three-page letter from his physician outlining his current condition and medical history. The youngest candidate in the race, 38-year-old Pete Buttigieg, noted that Barack Obama released his full medical records and details of annual physicals. “President Trump lowered that standard,” Buttigieg said during the debate. “He said just a letter from a doctor is enough. And a lot of folks on this stage are now saying that's enough. But I am certainly prepared to get a physical and put out the results. I think everybody here should be willing to do the same.”

When Sanders spokeswoman Briahna Joy Gray was pressed during a CNN appearance on Wednesday about why he hasn't put out more medical records, she called it a “smear.” She even likened requests for more health information from Sanders to demands that Obama release his birth certificate.

Bernie Sanders speaks on Oct. 19 in Queens. It was his first big rally after the heart attack, which allowed him to reset his campaign and helped secure the endorsement of New York Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez. (Jeenah Moon/Bloomberg)

---

Content from Partnership for America's Health Care Future

We Can't Afford Medicare for All

American families should not be forced to foot the bill for Medicare for All. And any new government insurance system would force them to pay more to wait longer for worse care.

---

To be sure, Trump and Sanders have vastly different agendas and stand on different sides of the ideological spectrum. It would be unfair to put too much emphasis on similarities. But one reason Sanders supporters like him, indisputably, is that he promises to fight Trump's fire with more fire. His Trumpian flashes this week foreshadow what the general election might look like if he won the nomination.

Sanders has been attacked for more than a week now after some of his supporters harassed Culinary Union officials on social media after they criticized his Medicare-for-all plan.

Asked about this during the debate, Sanders distanced himself. "We have over 10.6 million people on Twitter, and 99.9 percent of them are decent human beings," he said. "And if there are a few people who make ugly remarks, who attack trade union leaders, I disown those people. They are not part of our movement."

Then he deflected in a way that seemed reminiscent of how Trump has deflected in the face of similar attacks. Sanders said his own surrogates, especially women of color, face similarly vicious attacks online. "And let me say something else about this, not being too paranoid," he added. "All of us remember 2016, and what we remember is efforts by Russians and others to try to interfere in our election and divide us up. I'm not saying that's happening, but it would not shock me."

Experts say there's no evidence of Russians masquerading as Bernie Bros. "Absent direct evidence, researchers said Sanders's comments threaten to foment further doubt about a campaign that has been buffeted by confidence-shaking missteps, beginning with the technical glitches that marred the Iowa caucuses earlier this month," Isaac Stanley-Becker and Tony Romm report. "Facebook spokesman Andy Stone said Thursday it also had not seen evidence of Russian trolls masquerading as Sanders supporters. Twitter spokeswoman Katie Rosborough said the company would 'disclose' activity by Russia or other foreign actors if it had 'reasonable evidence of state-backed information operations.' ... Researchers have found some of the most divisive tweets and memes during the 2020 election originate with specific, verified Sanders supporters. That includes the viral #mayorcheat hashtag that attacked Buttigieg for ties between the former mayor's presidential campaign and Iowa caucus organizers, said Ben Nimmo, director of investigations at Graphika.”

“The problem we face is the impression of meddling can be as damaging to the legitimacy of an election as meddling itself,” said Jessica Brandt, the head of policy and research at the Alliance for Securing Democracy, an arm of the German Marshall Fund.

House minority whip Steve Scalise (R-La.) recalled Thursday that he was wounded by a Sanders supporter during baseball practice 2017:

Both Trump and Sanders didn’t adopt the parties they now lead until late in life. Sanders, who still hasn’t formally become a Democrat, reportedly considered a primary challenge against Obama from the left in 2011 more seriously than he’s acknowledged. In 1987, Sanders – as a mayor of Burlington, Vt., -- told the University of Vermont student newspaper that he was “physically nauseated” as a young man when he watched John F. Kennedy speak out against Fidel Castro’s revolution in Cuba. He said this was a factor in his decision to work outside the party system. That same year, Trump paid to run full-page ads in The Washington Post attacking Ronald Reagan’s foreign policy for lacking “backbone.”

Ironically, Trump now touts Reagan and Sanders is currently airing a television commercial that likens him to Kennedy. After playing the sound bite from the speech in which Kennedy said that “we choose to go to the moon ... not because it is easy but because it is hard,” Sanders narrates: “President Kennedy knew that settling for half-measures wasn't good enough. So when candidates say we can't guarantee health care for all, make college affordable for all, combat climate change, or create a world at peace, remember: America is best when we strive to do big things, even when it's hard.”

The debate again put in stark relief the collective action problem facing those who want to be the leading Sanders alternative, a dynamic I wrote about on the eve of the New Hampshire primary. Bloomberg's spotty performance will prevent him from consolidating support in that lane. Buttigieg and Amy Klobuchar went after each other because both are running close to even and competing for the same set of voters. It was the most-watched Democratic debate ever, with nearly 20 million people tuning into the telecast on NBC and MSNBC. The Sanders campaign said it raised $2.7 million from about 150,000 donors on Wednesday, his best haul of any of the nine debate days this cycle.

Of the six candidates onstage, Sanders was the only one who said the person with the most pledged delegates going into the convention this summer should definitely be the nominee. This represents a reversal from 2016 when he trailed Hillary Clinton among pledged delegates but thought he might persuade superdelegates that he'd be more electable. "What's clear out of [Wednesday] night is, it's hard to see what forces will stop Bernie from becoming the front-runner and just as hard to see how there will be any consolidation into a single candidate to oppose him," said Robby Mook, who was Clinton's campaign manager.

"The dawning realization for many in the party is that what Democrats had envisioned as a jubilant national convention in Milwaukee ... has the potential to turn into a pitched battle among multiple candidates and their supporters, each representing dueling ideological wings of the party and convinced that the other side would lose to Trump," Matt Viser, Dan Balz and Annie Linskey report. "Top campaigns have not only staffed up with delegate experts to guide them through the intricacies of the primaries, but they also have built legal teams preparing to challenge any results that don't go their way, according to interviews with 16 top party officials and strategists. And in preparation for a contested convention, some campaigns have started to reach out to superdelegates, in an attempt to secure support for a second ballot when they would come into play."

Former Senate majority leader Harry Reid said no candidate should be given the nomination without winning an outright majority of delegates. “I don’t think that anybody — Bernie Sanders or anyone else — should simply get the nomination because they have 30 percent of the delegates and no one else has that many,” the Nevada Democrat told Paul Kane during an interview in his office at the Bellagio hotel. “We have to let the system work its way out. I do not believe anyone should get the nomination unless they have 50-plus-one.” Reid added that moderates could align themselves in an attempt to combine their delegates and overtake Sanders.

A favorite parlor game for Washington elites right now is speculating about how badly Sanders might lose in a general election. Veterans Democratic operatives wonder whether Democrats would lose the House if he’s at the top of the ticket. Many of them privately fear a blowout more akin to Michael Dukakis’s in 1988 than George McGovern’s in 1972. These conversations sound similar to the ones Republican operatives had as Trump took over their party four years ago.

Republicans are increasingly using Sanders as a foil to target down-ballot Democrats. “Arizona Sen. Martha McSally launched a TV ad titled ‘Bernie Bro’ likening her Democratic opponent, retired astronaut Mark Kelly, to the Vermont senator,” Politico’s Alex Isenstadt notes.

“North Carolina Sen. Thom Tillis held a press conference last week linking his Democratic rivals to the Sanders-backed Green New Deal. In Michigan, a conservative group has aired a series of commercials that go after Democratic Sen. Gary Peters by invoking Sanders and his support for Medicare for All. And the Republican State Leadership Committee, which focuses on state legislative races, has been running digital ads asking whether down-ballot Democrats in more than a half-dozen states are ‘feeling burned yet’ — a take on the Sanders mantra, ‘Feel the Bern.’”

Sanders is dismissive of electability concerns. Asked during the debate about a poll that showed two-thirds of Americans uncomfortable with a socialist president, Sanders replied that the same poll showed him winning. “You might mention that,” he told NBC moderator Lester Holt. Indeed, the NBC-Wall Street Journal poll showed Sanders leading among Democratic primary voters, with 27 percent, followed by four candidates bunched together with support between 15 percent to 13 percent. It also found Sanders beating Trump 50 percent to 46 percent in a hypothetical head-to-head matchup, which was within the margin of error. The same survey discovered that 67 percent said they have “reservations” or are “very uncomfortable” with a socialist candidate, 57 percent said the same about someone who had a heart attack in the last year and 53 percent said the same about someone who's older than 75.

After Buttigieg accused Sanders of wanting “to burn this party down,” Holt asked Sanders whether he’s polarizing. “If speaking to the needs and the pain of a long-neglected working class is polarizing,” he said, “I think you got the wrong word.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

Check out my podcast.

Thank you to everyone who has sent feedback on the newsletter's redesign. It's immensely helpful for our team as we seek to optimize your reader experience. One of the changes has meant that the hyperlink to my Big Idea podcast is less pronounced than before. But it's still here: You can listen by clicking on the right side of the share bar immediately above this item. The audio briefing goes live around 7 a.m. Eastern each weekday and includes a preview of the key stories that I cover here in greater detail. You can also always download the podcast on this landing page. Thanks again. Have an awesome weekend.

The Trump presidency

A senior U.S. intelligence official said Russia wants to see Trump reelected.

“After learning of that analysis, which was provided to House lawmakers in a classified hearing, Trump grew angry at his acting director of national intelligence, Joseph Maguire, in the Oval Office, seeing Maguire and his staff as disloyal for speaking to Congress about Russia’s perceived preference,” Ellen Nakashima, Shane Harris, Josh Dawsey and Anne Gearan report. “The intelligence official’s analysis and Trump’s furious response ruined Maguire’s chances of becoming the permanent intelligence chief. ... It was not clear what specific steps, if any, U.S. intelligence officials think Russia may have taken to help Trump. ... Trump announced on Wednesday that he was replacing Maguire with a vocal loyalist, Richard Grenell. ... Maguire, a career official who is respected by the intelligence rank and file, was considered a leading candidate to be nominated to the post of DNI, White House aides had said. ...

“The official, Shelby Pierson, said several times during the briefing that Russia had ‘developed a preference’ for Trump. ... That conclusion was part of a broader discussion of election security that also touched on when the U.S. government should warn Democratic candidates if they are being targeted by foreign governments. ... Trump erroneously believed that Pierson had given the assessment exclusively to Rep. Adam B. Schiff (D-Calif.). ... Trump also believed that the information would be helpful to Democrats if it were released publicly. ... Trump learned about Pierson's remarks from Rep. Devin Nunes (Calif.). ...

"Trump became angry with Maguire and blamed him for Pierson's remarks when the two met the next day during a special briefing for Trump on election security attended by officials from other agencies, but not Pierson. ... He said that Maguire should not have let the Capitol Hill briefing happen. ... Trump told Maguire and other aides in the Oval Office that he did not believe Russia was interfering to help him or planning to do so, and that the intelligence community was getting 'played.' ... He said that the information would be used against him unfairly and that he could not believe that people were believing such a story again, reflecting his opinion that Russian interference in 2016 was a 'hoax' made up by officials with a political agenda. ... Maguire struck an apologetic tone ...

"White House officials said Trump's decision to make Grenell the acting director rather than nominate him for the permanent position reflected concerns that he might not win confirmation in the Senate, given his polarizing reputation. ... The president told reporters aboard Air Force One that Rep. Doug Collins (R-Ga.), a staunch Trump supporter who also is running for U.S. Senate, is under consideration for the permanent post. ...

"The shake-up at the top of the intelligence community is the latest move in a post-impeachment purge. ... The deputy national security adviser, Victoria Coates, has also been removed from her post after some colleagues, including trade adviser Peter Navarro, accused her of being the author of 'Anonymous.' ... Coates has strenuously denied the accusation. She was moved to an advisory position in the Energy Department." Meanwhile, a former NSC aide who tried to discredit the Russia probe has been promoted. Kash Patel is now a senior adviser for Grenell, per Politico. It's not clear what exact role Patel, who used to work for Nunes, will play.

Breaking this morning: The U.S. plans to sign a peace deal with the Taliban on Feb. 29.

The deal will pass as long as a week-long reduction in violence across the country holds, according to Secretary of State Mike Pompeo. Susannah George and John Hudson report: “The violence reduction, the decisive condition of the possible peace deal, is set to begin early Saturday — just after midnight, according to Afghanistan's National Security Council and a senior State Department official. ‘U.S. negotiators in Doha have come to an understanding with the Taliban on a significant and nationwide reduction in violence across Afghanistan,’ Pompeo said in a statement Friday, referring to U.S.-Taliban talks in the Qatari capital. ... The Taliban said ‘both parties will now create a suitable security situation in advance of agreement signing date, extend invitations to senior representatives of numerous countries and organizations to participate in the signing ceremony, make arrangements for the release of prisoners’ and prepare for intra-Afghan negotiations, according to the group's statement released to the media Friday. The U.S. military command in Kabul said it has nothing to announce at this time. ... The week-long reduction in violence will require the Taliban, the United States and Afghan government-aligned forces to largely cease all planned offensive operations nationwide.”

Roger Stone arrives for his sentencing on Thursday at the federal courthouse in Washington. (Marvin Joseph/The Washington Post)

Trump confidant and former adviser Roger Stone was sentenced to 40 months in prison.

“The penalty from U.S. District Judge Amy Berman Jackson comes after weeks of infighting over the politically charged case that threw the Justice Department into crisis, and it is likely not to be the final word. Even before the sentencing hearing began, Trump seemed to suggest on Twitter that he might pardon Stone,” Rachel Weiner, Matt Zapposky, Tom Jackman and Devlin Barrett report. “With the proceedings ongoing, Trump questioned whether his ally was being treated fairly. Afterward, he attacked the jury in the case and said he would ‘love to see Roger exonerated.’ ... In a lengthy speech before imposing the penalty, Jackson seemed to take aim at Trump, saying Stone ‘was not prosecuted for standing up for the president; he was prosecuted for covering up for the president.’ She also appeared to call out Attorney General William P. Barr, saying his intervention to reduce career prosecutors’ sentencing recommendation was ‘unprecedented.’ But she said the politics surrounding the case had not influenced her decision.”

“Stone did not speak in court and showed no visible emotion as

the sentence was read. Emerging from the courtroom in a wide-striped suit and polka-dot tie, he appeared calm. ‘I have nothing to say,’ Stone said. ... Stone, 67, was convicted by a federal jury on seven counts of lying to Congress and tampering with a witness about his efforts to learn about hacked Democratic emails related to Clinton. ... Stone, his wife and a large entourage exited the courthouse to a large crowd of photographers, supporters and antagonists. As he climbed into an SUV, protesters shouted ‘Lock him up!’ while supporters yelled ‘Pardon Roger Stone!’ ...

“Stone requested a new trial last week, after Trump suggested the forewoman in Stone’s case had ‘significant bias.’ Jackson, the judge, said previously that she would delay implementing his sentence until she resolves that request. A filing is due from Stone’s defense team Monday. In addition to prison, Jackson ordered Stone to pay a $20,000 fine and serve two years of supervised release. He remains out of prison on bond, and even if he loses his motion for a new trial, he will have at least two weeks to turn himself in — unless an appeal further delays things.”

The Justice Department breathed a sigh of relief as Stone’s sentence hit Barr’s target. “It was messier than we wanted, but we ended up in the same place,’ said one senior official,” Barrett and Zapotosky report. “Another Justice Department official called Stone’s sentence a ‘vindication’ of the attorney general’s decision last week to insert himself into the process, calling for a revised sentencing memorandum that undercut the line prosecutors’ prior recommendation of seven to nine years in prison. ... After a week of nervous tension atop the agency, anxiety levels have dropped, at least for the moment. ... Senior Justice Department officials are, however, increasingly resigned to the idea that Trump is likely to continue upbraiding the department and the FBI, and that it may be a staple of his reelection campaign rhetoric — the odd spectacle of an incumbent president bashing his own Justice Department.”

---

Quote of the day

“The truth still exists; the truth still matters,” Judge Jackson said. “Roger Stone’s insistence that it doesn’t, his belligerence, his pride in his own lies are a threat to our most fundamental institutions, to the foundations of our democracy. If it goes unpunished, it will not be a victory for one party or another. Everyone loses. ... The dismay and disgust at the defendant’s belligerence should transcend party.”

Former congressman Dana Rohrabacher confirmed that he offered a Trump pardon to Julian Assange.

“Rohrabacher (R-Calif.) said his goal during the meeting was to find proof for a widely debunked conspiracy theory: that WikiLeaks’ real source for the DNC emails was not Russian intelligence agents, as U.S. officials have since concluded, but former DNC staffer Seth Rich, who was murdered on the streets of Washington in July 2016 in what police believe was a botched robbery,” Yahoo News reports.

Rudy Giuliani’s work for a candidate in the Dominican Republic raised eyebrows amid the Ukraine swirl.

“The politics of this Caribbean island nation do not frequently capture the attention of the stewards of America’s foreign policy, but Secretary of State Mike Pompeo phoned down last summer with a clear message,” Joshua Partlow and Josh Dawsey report. “Dominican President Danilo Medina’s supporters were pushing to change the country’s constitution to allow him to run for an unprecedented third term. In a call with the president, Pompeo emphasized the importance of ‘adherence to rule of law and the constitution,’ according to a State Department readout. That message was echoed a week later in person by [Giuliani]. ... [But] Giuliani was not in the Dominican Republic as Trump’s representative. He was speaking as a paid consultant to an opposition presidential candidate.”

A man was charged with making death threats against the Ukraine whistleblower’s attorney.

A day after Trump lashed out against Mark Zaid during a 2019 rally, the

attorney received a disquieting email. “All traitors must die miserable deaths,” the message read. “Those that represent traitors shall meet the same fate. We will hunt you down and bleed you out like the pigs you are.” Federal prosecutors have indicted Brittan J. Atkinson and accused him of sending the message. (Reis Thebault)

Mick Mulvaney said the U.S. is “desperate” for more legal immigrants.

The acting White House chief of staff told a crowd at a gathering in England that the Trump administration “needs more immigration” for the U.S. economy to continue growing, according to audio of his remarks obtained by Nick Miroff and Josh Dawsey. “‘We are desperate — desperate — for more people,’ Mulvaney said. ‘We are running out of people to fuel the economic growth that we’ve had in our nation over the last four years. We need more immigrants.’ The Trump administration wants those immigrants to come in a ‘legal fashion,’ Mulvaney said. ... Mulvaney’s remarks appear in contrast to the public position of several top figures in Trump’s White House — especially that of senior policy adviser Stephen Miller. ... Mulvaney’s private remarks were more in line with conventional GOP views of immigration as a major engine for the U.S. economy. ... He praised the immigration systems in Canada and Australia and said the Trump administration wants the United States to embrace a model closer to those nations.”

Trump’s “Remain in Mexico” program is dwindling as more migrants are sent to Guatemala.

“Immigration attorneys and migrant advocates say the Trump administration is phasing out its year-old Migrant Protection Protocols policy, ... instead prioritizing newer, more restrictive programs that make qualifying for asylum in the United States extremely difficult,” Arelis R. Hernández and Kevin Sieff report. “‘MPP is dying,’ said Charlene D’Cruz, a lawyer who represents Central American asylum seekers and has advocated for dozens of vulnerable migrants to be removed from the program and allowed into the United States. ‘And something worse is taking its place. Everything is changing.’”

A Mexican man just became the seventh immigrant to die in ICE custody since October. BuzzFeed News reported that the preliminary cause appears to be suicide. He was 34.

The State Department delayed the visa of a renowned German professor and far-right extremism expert.

Academic Hajo Funke delivered documentation for a visa to the U.S. Consulate in Berlin in November 2019, Moriah Balingit reports. But when the consulate returned his passport, “it was accompanied not by a visa but by a letter that said a decision about his visa had been delayed for three to six months. The two classes he was set to teach — one on far-right populism and another on political memory in Germany — were in jeopardy.” The professor finally got his visa granted Thursday, but questions have been raised about what prompted the delay. Last year, Funke “wrote an article for the website of the American Institute for Contemporary German Studies at Johns Hopkins University linking violence in Charlottesville, where a white nationalist rally turned deadly in 2017, to [Trump’s election]. He has also visited Iran ... for an academic conference and to visit the family of his wife, who emigrated from Iran to Germany in the 1980s and is now a German citizen.”

---

More on 2020

Elizabeth Warren signs a cardboard cutout of herself at her campaign office in North Las Vegas on Thursday. (John Locher/AP)

Warren flip-flopped on outside money, refusing to disavow a new super PAC.

Warren refused to disavow a new super PAC created to support her candidacy after spending a year criticizing her Democratic rivals for not disavowing super PACs set up to help them. “We reached the point a few weeks ago, where all of the men who were still in this race, and on the debate stage, all had either super PACs or they were multi-billionaires, and could just rummage around in their sock drawers and find enough money to be able to fund a campaign,” the senator told reporters. “And the only people who didn't have them were the two women. And at that point, there are some women saying, you know, that's just not right.” CNN reports that Persist PAC will spend more than $1 million to air a biography-focused television ad that links Warren to Obama.

During Thursday night's CNN town hall, Warren said Bloomberg's refusal to release former employees from nondisclosure agreements is disqualifying. She showed up with her own version of a “release and covenant not to sue” document for him to sign and release his past employees from their NDAs. She even offered to text it to him. Warren said that if Bloomberg is ultimately the nominee, she'll support him, but added that “what we’ve got right now is a chance for the Nevada voters to make sure that Michael Bloomberg is not our nominee, and that’s what I’m asking.”

Warren desperately needed a post-debate cash infusion.

Warren’s campaign says her fiery performance Wednesday has turned February into her best fundraising month yet. “But January figures show the Massachusetts senator was in deep trouble before her sudden apparent reversal — so much so that her campaign took out a $3 million line of credit and tapped into $400,000 of it as a loan, as contingency cash before the Iowa caucuses. She spent more than double ($22.3 million) the amount she raised ($10.8 million) in January,” per Michelle Ye Hee Lee and Anu Narayanswamy.

Two Bloomborgs are running for president at the same time.

“One is the tough, get-it-done, rich guy who stars in $340 million worth of advertising, emotes in scripted speeches and is praised daily by his surrogate army,” write Michael Scherer, Josh Dawsey and Michael Kranish. “The other is the sometimes bumbling, frequently ineffective and often peevish politician who showed up Wednesday night, operating on the fly. ... Bloomberg’s advisers, well aware of his uneven public performance as New York mayor, have tried to reconcile the two identities. They have scripted a campaign message that focuses heavily on the sheer scale of his operation and power of his purse, not the campaign talents of the candidate. On the trail, he boasts of having ‘the record and the resources’ to challenge Trump, not the heart or the passion.”

“So, how was your night last night?” Bloomberg asked a crowd in Salt Lake City Thursday night. \(AP\)

Conservatives have learned to wield power inside Facebook.

“Trump and other party leaders have pressured Facebook by making unproven claims of bias against conservatives amid rising signs of government action on the issue, including investigations by Congress and the Justice Department. Republicans also have leveraged Facebook’s fears of alienating conservative Americans to win concessions from a company whose most widely shared news content typically includes stories from Fox News and other right-leaning sources,” Craig Timberg reports. “These sensitivities — in conjunction with the company’s long-standing resistance to acting as ‘an arbiter of truth’ — have affected Facebook’s responses to a range of major issues, from how to address fake news and Russian manipulation of American voters on the platform to, more recently, the advertising policies that have set the political ground rules for the 2020 election, say people privy to internal debates. ... Critics — both outside Facebook and within its ranks — see something more akin to corporate realpolitik, a willingness to accede to political demands in an era when Republicans control most levers of power in Washington.”

Twitter is testing new ways to fight misinformation.

“Twitter is experimenting with adding brightly colored labels directly beneath lies and misinformation posted by politicians and other public figures,” according to a demo sent to NBC News. “Twitter confirmed that the leaked demo, which was accessible on a publicly available site, is one possible iteration of a new policy to target misinformation. The company does not have a date to roll out any new misinformation features. In this version, disinformation or misleading information posted by public figures would be corrected directly beneath a tweet by fact-checkers and journalists who are verified on the platform and possibly by other users who would participate in a new ‘community reports’ feature, which the demo claims is ‘like Wikipedia.’”

Quinnipiac polling shows Trump running strong in the Rust Belt.

The president leads in head-to-head matchups against the top Democratic candidates in Wisconsin, loses or trails within the margin of error in Pennsylvania, and is locked in tight competitions in Michigan.

The coronavirus

Infected Americans were flown home from Japan against the CDC's advice.

“In the wee hours of a rainy Monday, more than a dozen buses sat on the tarmac at Tokyo’s Haneda Airport. Inside, 328 weary Americans wearing surgical masks and gloves waited anxiously to fly home after weeks in quarantine aboard the Diamond Princess, the luxury liner where the novel coronavirus had exploded into a shipwide epidemic,” Lena Sun, Lenny Bernstein, Shibani Mahtani and Joel Achenbach report. “But as the buses idled, U.S. officials wrestled with troubling news. New test results showed that 14 passengers were infected with the virus. The U.S. State Department had promised that no one with the infection would be allowed to board the planes. ... In Washington, where it was still Sunday afternoon, a fierce debate broke out: The State Department and a top Trump administration health official wanted to forge ahead. The infected passengers had no symptoms and could be segregated on the plane in a plastic-lined enclosure. But officials at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention disagreed, contending they could still spread the virus. The CDC believed the 14 should not be flown back with uninfected passengers.

... The State Department won the argument. But unhappy CDC officials demanded to be left out of the news release that explained that infected people were being flown back to the United States — a move that would nearly double the number of known coronavirus cases in this country.”

A coronavirus outbreak in Chinese prisons raised alarm.

“Chinese authorities on Friday reported hundreds of new coronavirus infections at prisons around the country,” Gerry Shih reports. “A handful of prisons reported nearly 500 new cases, a significant portion of the more than 1,100 new cases reported in mainland China on Friday — and a marked increase after several days of declines. Tests at a prison in eastern Shandong province showed 207 out of 2,077 inmates and staff were infected, and the provincial justice department’s Communist Party secretary was dismissed as a result. ... Another jail in Zhejiang province found 34 cases. Hubei province, at the center of the outbreak, said Friday it found 220 new cases inside penitentiaries. ...

“In South Korea, new cases skyrocketed, bringing the national total to 204, as worries mounted that the country is becoming a new hot spot. Many of the new cases have been traced to ... a regional branch of a fringe religious sect named Shincheonji Church of God in the southern city of Daegu, according to the KCDC. The church’s founder Lee Man-hee called the outbreak ‘the devil’s deed to curb the rapid growth of Shincheonji,’ in an internal message published by South Korea’s Yonhap News Agency on Friday. Daegu city and surrounding North Gyeongsang province have been designated ‘special care zones’ after a jump in cases in the area, Prime Minister Chung Sye Kyun said earlier Friday.”

Chinese researchers could submit a vaccine for clinical trials in late April.

“Animal models of mice and monkeys infected with the novel coronavirus have also been constructed, which will provide support for drug screening, vaccine development and research on viral transmission mechanism. China set up a coronavirus scientific research group about one month ago, with 14 experts led by renowned pulmonologist Zhong Nanshan,” Liu Yang reports.

Confusion continues to grow over China’s counting methods, as infection numbers swing wildly.

“Early Friday, China’s National Health Commission reported new infections increased again to 889. There are now a cumulative total of 75,465 infections and 2,236 deaths, mostly in Hubei province, the agency said. Hubei authorities have changed their criteria for counting cases twice in the past week,” Shih and Miriam Berger report. “The latest inconsistency — under which one city appeared to have more cases than the total in the province — apparently arose because Hubei province deducted cases that have not been confirmed through genetic tests from a total reported case number, which includes all diagnoses made by physicians using other methods. At best, the constant changes have frustrated scholars. At worst, they have raised suspicions.”

The USDA estimates that China will not buy as much U.S. farm output as Trump claims.

“The U.S. Department of Agriculture’s chief economist, Robert Johansson, projected that agricultural exports to China would reach roughly $14 billion in the year that ends Sept. 30, a $4 billion increase from one year ago. But that amount would still fall far short of what White House officials said would take place based on the recently announced ‘Phase One’ trade deal with Chinese leaders,” Laura Reiley reports. “White House officials have said agricultural exports to China would be between $40 billion and $50 billion in each of the next two years. Last year, when he was promising the trade deal would lead to a huge increase in purchases, Trump told farmers to buy ‘more land’ and ‘bigger tractors.’”

---

Social media speed read

After Trump attacked him again, former FBI director James Comey posted an image from Mariah Carey's music video for her song “Obsessed”:

Several of the 2020 candidates attacked Trump's response to the intelligence community's conclusion that Russia favors his reelection:

Obama's former political director celebrated Stone's sentence:

The New York Times has published an op-ed by the deputy leader of the Taliban: “What We, the Taliban, Want.” The paper's senior Afghanistan correspondent criticized his own publication for running the piece:

---

Videos of the day

James Corden wondered if Democrats are headed to an Iowa-repeat in Nevada:

Mike Bloomberg's campaign posted a highly misleading video from the debate:

Trump complained that the movie "Parasite" won the Academy Award for best picture, even though it's not an American movie:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Must Reads for a curated selection of our best journalism in your inbox every Saturday, plus a peek behind the scenes into how one story came together. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Bernie Sanders shows some Trumpian tendencies as he refuses to release promised medical records
Date: Friday, February 21, 2020 8:20:07 AM

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Partnership for America's Health Care Future

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
✉ Email

Bernie Sanders shows some Trumpian tendencies as he refuses to release promised medical records

He enjoys talking about his lead in the polls, the size of his crowds and his number of Twitter followers. He routinely criticizes the mainstream media and insists he cannot control his most zealous supporters online. Most people in his adopted party don't want him to be their nominee, but the establishment cannot agree on who is best to stop him.

Elizabeth Warren likened Mike Bloomberg to President Trump at the top of Wednesday night's debate, warning Democrats not to substitute one "arrogant billionaire" with a history of misogyny for another. But it was Bernie Sanders who displayed flashes of his Trumpian side during the two-hour clash. The most significant illustration of this came as the senator from Vermont sought to justify his refusal to release his full medical records.

Bernie Sanders delivers his victory speech after winning the New Hampshire primary last week. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

The 78-year-old would be the oldest president ever elected. Sanders suffered a heart attack in October just a few miles from the site of the debate, but his campaign refused to acknowledge the extent of what happened until three days later – late on a Friday. During the two weeks he spent recuperating at home, the senator told CNN's Sanjay Gupta that the American people have a right to "full disclosure" about the health of someone running for president. "And we will make, at the appropriate time, all of our medical records public for you or anybody else who wants to see them," he said.

On New Year's Eve, Sanders released summary letters from three

physicians that concluded he's healthy enough to be president. That's far from his full medical records. Now leading in the national polls, after winning the most votes in the first two states, Sanders says that will have to suffice for people worried about his physical fitness to be commander in chief.

NBC correspondent Hallie Jackson, one of the debate moderators, noted that Sanders has attacked Trump for refusing to release his tax returns. "What," she asked, "happened to your promise of full transparency?"

After thanking the doctors who took care of him, Sanders began his answer with the kind of whataboutism that we've grown to expect from Trump. "I think the one area maybe that Mayor Bloomberg and I share, you have two stents, as well," he said. The former New York mayor, who has never had a heart attack, replied that those were installed two decades ago. "Well, we both have two stents," Sanders replied. "It's a procedure that is done about a million times a year."

Then the septuagenarian claimed he's released "the full report" of "all of my history," which he has not. Sanders finished his answer by challenging anyone who doubts that he can deal with the stress of being president to "follow me around" on the campaign trail. "See how you're doing compared to me," he said.

When John McCain ran for president in 2008, the then-72-year-old allowed reporters to review 1,173 pages of his medical records. But Trump, too, would only release a letter in 2016 from his doctor that said he was "in excellent physical health." Like Sanders, he pointed to his stamina at rallies as evidence he was in good shape. He won anyway. The 73-year-old president raised a round of fresh questions about his medial status in November after making an unscheduled trip to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center and then insisting that he merely wanted to get an early start on his physical.

After kneecapping Bloomberg during Wednesday's debate,

Warren trained her fire toward Sanders on Thursday. Asked what differentiates her from Sanders, she told MSNBC last night: “I get stuff done. ... I don't want to be president just to yell at people. I want to be president to change things.” During a gaggle with reporters earlier in the day in Las Vegas, Warren attacked Sanders for not releasing his full medical records. “He had made a promise,” she said. “I don't think that's a question of opinion. Those aren't medical records.”

The 70-year-old senator from Massachusetts released a letter from her physician and five pages of supporting medical data last year. Former vice president Joe Biden, 77, released a three-page letter from his physician outlining his current condition and medical history. The youngest candidate in the race, 38-year-old Pete Buttigieg, noted that Barack Obama released his full medical records and details of annual physicals. “President Trump lowered that standard,” Buttigieg said during the debate. “He said just a letter from a doctor is enough. And a lot of folks on this stage are now saying that's enough. But I am certainly prepared to get a physical and put out the results. I think everybody here should be willing to do the same.”

When Sanders spokeswoman Briahna Joy Gray was pressed during a CNN appearance on Wednesday about why he hasn't put out more medical records, she called it a “smear.” She even likened requests for more health information from Sanders to demands that Obama release his birth certificate.

Bernie Sanders speaks on Oct. 19 in Queens. It was his first big rally after the heart attack, which allowed him to reset his campaign and helped secure the endorsement of New York Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez. (Jeenah Moon/Bloomberg)

Content from Partnership for America's Health Care Future

We Can't Afford Medicare for All

American families should not be forced to foot the bill for Medicare for All. And any new government insurance system would force them to pay more to wait longer for worse care.

To be sure, Trump and Sanders have vastly different agendas and stand on different sides of the ideological spectrum. It would be unfair to put too much emphasis on similarities. But one reason Sanders supporters like him, indisputably, is that he promises to fight Trump's fire with more fire. His Trumpian flashes this week foreshadow what the general election might look like if he won the nomination.

Sanders has been attacked for more than a week now after some of his supporters harassed Culinary Union officials on social media after they criticized his Medicare-for-all plan.

Asked about this during the debate, Sanders distanced himself. "We have over 10.6 million people on Twitter, and 99.9 percent of them are decent human beings," he said. "And if there are a few people who make ugly remarks, who attack trade union leaders, I disown those people. They are not part of our movement."

Then he deflected in a way that seemed reminiscent of how Trump has deflected in the face of similar attacks. Sanders said his own surrogates, especially women of color, face similarly vicious attacks online. "And let me say something else about this, not being too paranoid," he added. "All of us remember 2016, and what we remember is efforts by Russians and others to try to interfere in our election and divide us up. I'm not saying that's happening, but it would not shock me."

Experts say there's no evidence of Russians masquerading as Bernie Bros. "Absent direct evidence, researchers said Sanders's comments threaten to foment further doubt about a campaign that has been buffeted by confidence-shaking missteps, beginning with the technical glitches that marred the Iowa caucuses earlier this month," Isaac Stanley-Becker and Tony Romm report. "Facebook spokesman Andy Stone said Thursday it also had not seen evidence of Russian trolls masquerading as Sanders supporters. Twitter spokeswoman Katie Rosborough said the company would 'disclose' activity by Russia or other foreign actors if it had 'reasonable evidence of state-backed information operations.' ... Researchers have found some of the most divisive tweets and memes during the 2020 election originate with specific, verified Sanders supporters. That includes the viral #mayorcheat hashtag that attacked Buttigieg for ties between the former mayor's presidential campaign and Iowa caucus organizers, said Ben Nimmo, director of investigations at Graphika.”

“The problem we face is the impression of meddling can be as damaging to the legitimacy of an election as meddling itself,” said Jessica Brandt, the head of policy and research at the Alliance for Securing Democracy, an arm of the German Marshall Fund.

House minority whip Steve Scalise (R-La.) recalled Thursday that he was wounded by a Sanders supporter during baseball practice 2017:

Both Trump and Sanders didn’t adopt the parties they now lead until late in life. Sanders, who still hasn’t formally become a Democrat, reportedly considered a primary challenge against Obama from the left in 2011 more seriously than he’s acknowledged. In 1987, Sanders – as a mayor of Burlington, Vt., -- told the University of Vermont student newspaper that he was “physically nauseated” as a young man when he watched John F. Kennedy speak out against Fidel Castro’s revolution in Cuba. He said this was a factor in his decision to work outside the party system. That same year, Trump paid to run full-page ads in The Washington Post attacking Ronald Reagan’s foreign policy for lacking “backbone.”

Ironically, Trump now touts Reagan and Sanders is currently airing a television commercial that likens him to Kennedy. After playing the sound bite from the speech in which Kennedy said that “we choose to go to the moon ... not because it is easy but because it is hard,” Sanders narrates: “President Kennedy knew that settling for half-measures wasn't good enough. So when candidates say we can't guarantee health care for all, make college affordable for all, combat climate change, or create a world at peace, remember: America is best when we strive to do big things, even when it's hard.”

The debate again put in stark relief the collective action problem facing those who want to be the leading Sanders alternative, a dynamic I wrote about on the eve of the New Hampshire primary. Bloomberg's spotty performance will prevent him from consolidating support in that lane. Buttigieg and Amy Klobuchar went after each other because both are running close to even and competing for the same set of voters. It was the most-watched Democratic debate ever, with nearly 20 million people tuning into the telecast on NBC and MSNBC. The Sanders campaign said it raised $2.7 million from about 150,000 donors on Wednesday, his best haul of any of the nine debate days this cycle.

Of the six candidates onstage, Sanders was the only one who said the person with the most pledged delegates going into the convention this summer should definitely be the nominee. This represents a reversal from 2016 when he trailed Hillary Clinton among pledged delegates but thought he might persuade superdelegates that he'd be more electable. "What's clear out of [Wednesday] night is, it's hard to see what forces will stop Bernie from becoming the front-runner and just as hard to see how there will be any consolidation into a single candidate to oppose him," said Robby Mook, who was Clinton's campaign manager.

"The dawning realization for many in the party is that what Democrats had envisioned as a jubilant national convention in Milwaukee ... has the potential to turn into a pitched battle among multiple candidates and their supporters, each representing dueling ideological wings of the party and convinced that the other side would lose to Trump," Matt Viser, Dan Balz and Annie Linskey report. "Top campaigns have not only staffed up with delegate experts to guide them through the intricacies of the primaries, but they also have built legal teams preparing to challenge any results that don't go their way, according to interviews with 16 top party officials and strategists. And in preparation for a contested convention, some campaigns have started to reach out to superdelegates, in an attempt to secure support for a second ballot when they would come into play."

Powered by  LiveIntent

Former Senate majority leader Harry Reid said no candidate should be given the nomination without winning an outright majority of delegates. “I don’t think that anybody — Bernie Sanders or anyone else — should simply get the nomination because they have 30 percent of the delegates and no one else has that many,” the Nevada Democrat told Paul Kane during an interview in his office at the Bellagio hotel. “We have to let the system work its way out. I do not believe anyone should get the nomination unless they have 50-plus-one.” Reid added that moderates could align themselves in an attempt to combine their delegates and overtake Sanders.

A favorite parlor game for Washington elites right now is speculating about how badly Sanders might lose in a general election. Veterans Democratic operatives wonder whether Democrats would lose the House if he’s at the top of the ticket. Many of them privately fear a blowout more akin to Michael Dukakis’s in 1988 than George McGovern’s in 1972. These conversations sound similar to the ones Republican operatives had as Trump took over their party four years ago.

Republicans are increasingly using Sanders as a foil to target down-ballot Democrats. “Arizona Sen. Martha McSally launched a TV ad titled ‘Bernie Bro’ likening her Democratic opponent, retired astronaut Mark Kelly, to the Vermont senator,” Politico’s Alex Isenstadt notes.

“North Carolina Sen. Thom Tillis held a press conference last week linking his Democratic rivals to the Sanders-backed Green New Deal. In Michigan, a conservative group has aired a series of commercials that go after Democratic Sen. Gary Peters by invoking Sanders and his support for Medicare for All. And the Republican State Leadership Committee, which focuses on state legislative races, has been running digital ads asking whether down-ballot Democrats in more than a half-dozen states are ‘feeling burned yet’ — a take on the Sanders mantra, ‘Feel the Bern.’”

Sanders is dismissive of electability concerns. Asked during the debate about a poll that showed two-thirds of Americans uncomfortable with a socialist president, Sanders replied that the same poll showed him winning. “You might mention that,” he told NBC moderator Lester Holt. Indeed, the NBC-Wall Street Journal poll showed Sanders leading among Democratic primary voters, with 27 percent, followed by four candidates bunched together with support between 15 percent to 13 percent. It also found Sanders beating Trump 50 percent to 46 percent in a hypothetical head-to-head matchup, which was within the margin of error. The same survey discovered that 67 percent said they have “reservations” or are “very uncomfortable” with a socialist candidate, 57 percent said the same about someone who had a heart attack in the last year and 53 percent said the same about someone who's older than 75.

After Buttigieg accused Sanders of wanting “to burn this party down,” Holt asked Sanders whether he’s polarizing. “If speaking to the needs and the pain of a long-neglected working class is polarizing,” he said, “I think you got the wrong word.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

Check out my podcast.

Thank you to everyone who has sent feedback on the newsletter's redesign. It's immensely helpful for our team as we seek to optimize your reader experience. One of the changes has meant that the hyperlink to my Big Idea podcast is less pronounced than before. But it's still here: You can listen by clicking on the right side of the share bar immediately above this item. The audio briefing goes live around 7 a.m. Eastern each weekday and includes a preview of the key stories that I cover here in greater detail. You can also always download the podcast on this landing page. Thanks again. Have an awesome weekend.

The Trump presidency

A senior U.S. intelligence official said Russia wants to see Trump reelected.

“After learning of that analysis, which was provided to House lawmakers in a classified hearing, Trump grew angry at his acting director of national intelligence, Joseph Maguire, in the Oval Office, seeing Maguire and his staff as disloyal for speaking to Congress about Russia’s perceived preference,” Ellen Nakashima, Shane Harris, Josh Dawsey and Anne Gearan report. “The intelligence official’s analysis and Trump’s furious response ruined Maguire’s chances of becoming the permanent intelligence chief. ... It was not clear what specific steps, if any, U.S. intelligence officials think Russia may have taken to help Trump. ... Trump announced on Wednesday that he was replacing Maguire with a vocal loyalist, Richard Grenell. ... Maguire, a career official who is respected by the intelligence rank and file, was considered a leading candidate to be nominated to the post of DNI, White House aides had said. ...

“The official, Shelby Pierson, said several times during the briefing that Russia had ‘developed a preference’ for Trump. ... That conclusion was part of a broader discussion of election security that also touched on when the U.S. government should warn Democratic candidates if they are being targeted by foreign governments. ... Trump erroneously believed that Pierson had given the assessment exclusively to Rep. Adam B. Schiff (D-Calif.). ... Trump also believed that the information would be helpful to Democrats if it were released publicly. ... Trump learned about Pierson's remarks from Rep. Devin Nunes (Calif.). ...

"Trump became angry with Maguire and blamed him for Pierson's remarks when the two met the next day during a special briefing for Trump on election security attended by officials from other agencies, but not Pierson. ... He said that Maguire should not have let the Capitol Hill briefing happen. ... Trump told Maguire and other aides in the Oval Office that he did not believe Russia was interfering to help him or planning to do so, and that the intelligence community was getting 'played.' ... He said that the information would be used against him unfairly and that he could not believe that people were believing such a story again, reflecting his opinion that Russian interference in 2016 was a 'hoax' made up by officials with a political agenda. ... Maguire struck an apologetic tone ...

"White House officials said Trump's decision to make Grenell the acting director rather than nominate him for the permanent position reflected concerns that he might not win confirmation in the Senate, given his polarizing reputation. ... The president told reporters aboard Air Force One that Rep. Doug Collins (R-Ga.), a staunch Trump supporter who also is running for U.S. Senate, is under consideration for the permanent post. ...

"The shake-up at the top of the intelligence community is the latest move in a post-impeachment purge. ... The deputy national security adviser, Victoria Coates, has also been removed from her post after some colleagues, including trade adviser Peter Navarro, accused her of being the author of 'Anonymous.' ... Coates has strenuously denied the accusation. She was moved to an advisory position in the Energy Department." Meanwhile, a former NSC aide who tried to discredit the Russia probe has been promoted. Kash Patel is now a senior adviser for Grenell, per Politico. It's not clear what exact role Patel, who used to work for Nunes, will play.

Breaking this morning: The U.S. plans to sign a peace deal with the Taliban on Feb. 29.

The deal will pass as long as a week-long reduction in violence across the country holds, according to Secretary of State Mike Pompeo. Susannah George and John Hudson report: “The violence reduction, the decisive condition of the possible peace deal, is set to begin early Saturday — just after midnight, according to Afghanistan's National Security Council and a senior State Department official. ‘U.S. negotiators in Doha have come to an understanding with the Taliban on a significant and nationwide reduction in violence across Afghanistan,’ Pompeo said in a statement Friday, referring to U.S.-Taliban talks in the Qatari capital. ... The Taliban said ‘both parties will now create a suitable security situation in advance of agreement signing date, extend invitations to senior representatives of numerous countries and organizations to participate in the signing ceremony, make arrangements for the release of prisoners’ and prepare for intra-Afghan negotiations, according to the group's statement released to the media Friday. The U.S. military command in Kabul said it has nothing to announce at this time. ... The week-long reduction in violence will require the Taliban, the United States and Afghan government-aligned forces to largely cease all planned offensive operations nationwide.”

Roger Stone arrives for his sentencing on Thursday at the federal courthouse in Washington. (Marvin Joseph/The Washington Post)

Trump confidant and former adviser Roger Stone was sentenced to 40 months in prison.

“The penalty from U.S. District Judge Amy Berman Jackson comes after weeks of infighting over the politically charged case that threw the Justice Department into crisis, and it is likely not to be the final word. Even before the sentencing hearing began, Trump seemed to suggest on Twitter that he might pardon Stone,” Rachel Weiner, Matt Zapposky, Tom Jackman and Devlin Barrett report. “With the proceedings ongoing, Trump questioned whether his ally was being treated fairly. Afterward, he attacked the jury in the case and said he would ‘love to see Roger exonerated.’ ... In a lengthy speech before imposing the penalty, Jackson seemed to take aim at Trump, saying Stone ‘was not prosecuted for standing up for the president; he was prosecuted for covering up for the president.’ She also appeared to call out Attorney General William P. Barr, saying his intervention to reduce career prosecutors’ sentencing recommendation was ‘unprecedented.’ But she said the politics surrounding the case had not influenced her decision.”

“Stone did not speak in court and showed no visible emotion as

the sentence was read. Emerging from the courtroom in a wide-striped suit and polka-dot tie, he appeared calm. ‘I have nothing to say,’ Stone said. ... Stone, 67, was convicted by a federal jury on seven counts of lying to Congress and tampering with a witness about his efforts to learn about hacked Democratic emails related to Clinton. ... Stone, his wife and a large entourage exited the courthouse to a large crowd of photographers, supporters and antagonists. As he climbed into an SUV, protesters shouted ‘Lock him up!’ while supporters yelled ‘Pardon Roger Stone!’ ...

“Stone requested a new trial last week, after Trump suggested the forewoman in Stone’s case had ‘significant bias.’ Jackson, the judge, said previously that she would delay implementing his sentence until she resolves that request. A filing is due from Stone’s defense team Monday. In addition to prison, Jackson ordered Stone to pay a $20,000 fine and serve two years of supervised release. He remains out of prison on bond, and even if he loses his motion for a new trial, he will have at least two weeks to turn himself in — unless an appeal further delays things.”

The Justice Department breathed a sigh of relief as Stone’s sentence hit Barr’s target. “It was messier than we wanted, but we ended up in the same place,’ said one senior official,” Barrett and Zapotosky report. “Another Justice Department official called Stone’s sentence a ‘vindication’ of the attorney general’s decision last week to insert himself into the process, calling for a revised sentencing memorandum that undercut the line prosecutors’ prior recommendation of seven to nine years in prison. ... After a week of nervous tension atop the agency, anxiety levels have dropped, at least for the moment. ... Senior Justice Department officials are, however, increasingly resigned to the idea that Trump is likely to continue upbraiding the department and the FBI, and that it may be a staple of his reelection campaign rhetoric — the odd spectacle of an incumbent president bashing his own Justice Department.”

---

Quote of the day

“The truth still exists; the truth still matters,” Judge Jackson said. “Roger Stone’s insistence that it doesn’t, his belligerence, his pride in his own lies are a threat to our most fundamental institutions, to the foundations of our democracy. If it goes unpunished, it will not be a victory for one party or another. Everyone loses. ... The dismay and disgust at the defendant’s belligerence should transcend party.”

Former congressman Dana Rohrabacher confirmed that he offered a Trump pardon to Julian Assange.

“Rohrabacher (R-Calif.) said his goal during the meeting was to find proof for a widely debunked conspiracy theory: that WikiLeaks’ real source for the DNC emails was not Russian intelligence agents, as U.S. officials have since concluded, but former DNC staffer Seth Rich, who was murdered on the streets of Washington in July 2016 in what police believe was a botched robbery,” Yahoo News reports.

Rudy Giuliani’s work for a candidate in the Dominican Republic raised eyebrows amid the Ukraine swirl.

“The politics of this Caribbean island nation do not frequently capture the attention of the stewards of America’s foreign policy, but Secretary of State Mike Pompeo phoned down last summer with a clear message,” Joshua Partlow and Josh Dawsey report. “Dominican President Danilo Medina’s supporters were pushing to change the country’s constitution to allow him to run for an unprecedented third term. In a call with the president, Pompeo emphasized the importance of ‘adherence to rule of law and the constitution,’ according to a State Department readout. That message was echoed a week later in person by [Giuliani]. ... [But] Giuliani was not in the Dominican Republic as Trump’s representative. He was speaking as a paid consultant to an opposition presidential candidate.”

A man was charged with making death threats against the Ukraine whistleblower’s attorney.

A day after Trump lashed out against Mark Zaid during a 2019 rally, the

attorney received a disquieting email. “All traitors must die miserable deaths,” the message read. “Those that represent traitors shall meet the same fate. We will hunt you down and bleed you out like the pigs you are.” Federal prosecutors have indicted Brittan J. Atkinson and accused him of sending the message. (Reis Thebault)

Mick Mulvaney said the U.S. is “desperate” for more legal immigrants.

The acting White House chief of staff told a crowd at a gathering in England that the Trump administration “needs more immigration” for the U.S. economy to continue growing, according to audio of his remarks obtained by Nick Miroff and Josh Dawsey. “‘We are desperate — desperate — for more people,’ Mulvaney said. ‘We are running out of people to fuel the economic growth that we’ve had in our nation over the last four years. We need more immigrants.’ The Trump administration wants those immigrants to come in a ‘legal fashion,’ Mulvaney said. ... Mulvaney’s remarks appear in contrast to the public position of several top figures in Trump’s White House — especially that of senior policy adviser Stephen Miller. ... Mulvaney’s private remarks were more in line with conventional GOP views of immigration as a major engine for the U.S. economy. ... He praised the immigration systems in Canada and Australia and said the Trump administration wants the United States to embrace a model closer to those nations.”

Trump’s “Remain in Mexico” program is dwindling as more migrants are sent to Guatemala.

“Immigration attorneys and migrant advocates say the Trump administration is phasing out its year-old Migrant Protection Protocols policy, ... instead prioritizing newer, more restrictive programs that make qualifying for asylum in the United States extremely difficult,” Arelis R. Hernández and Kevin Sieff report. “‘MPP is dying,’ said Charlene D’Cruz, a lawyer who represents Central American asylum seekers and has advocated for dozens of vulnerable migrants to be removed from the program and allowed into the United States. ‘And something worse is taking its place. Everything is changing.’”

A Mexican man just became the seventh immigrant to die in ICE custody since October. BuzzFeed News reported that the preliminary cause appears to be suicide. He was 34.

The State Department delayed the visa of a renowned German professor and far-right extremism expert.

Academic Hajo Funke delivered documentation for a visa to the U.S. Consulate in Berlin in November 2019, Moriah Balingit reports. But when the consulate returned his passport, “it was accompanied not by a visa but by a letter that said a decision about his visa had been delayed for three to six months. The two classes he was set to teach — one on far-right populism and another on political memory in Germany — were in jeopardy.” The professor finally got his visa granted Thursday, but questions have been raised about what prompted the delay. Last year, Funke “wrote an article for the website of the American Institute for Contemporary German Studies at Johns Hopkins University linking violence in Charlottesville, where a white nationalist rally turned deadly in 2017, to [Trump’s election]. He has also visited Iran ... for an academic conference and to visit the family of his wife, who emigrated from Iran to Germany in the 1980s and is now a German citizen.”

---

More on 2020

Elizabeth Warren signs a cardboard cutout of herself at her campaign office in North Las Vegas on Thursday. (John Locher/AP)

Warren flip-flopped on outside money, refusing to disavow a new super PAC.

Warren refused to disavow a new super PAC created to support her candidacy after spending a year criticizing her Democratic rivals for not disavowing super PACs set up to help them. “We reached the point a few weeks ago, where all of the men who were still in this race, and on the debate stage, all had either super PACs or they were multi-billionaires, and could just rummage around in their sock drawers and find enough money to be able to fund a campaign,” the senator told reporters. “And the only people who didn't have them were the two women. And at that point, there are some women saying, you know, that's just not right.” CNN reports that Persist PAC will spend more than $1 million to air a biography-focused television ad that links Warren to Obama.

During Thursday night's CNN town hall, Warren said Bloomberg's refusal to release former employees from nondisclosure agreements is disqualifying. She showed up with her own version of a “release and covenant not to sue” document for him to sign and release his past employees from their NDAs. She even offered to text it to him. Warren said that if Bloomberg is ultimately the nominee, she'll support him, but added that “what we’ve got right now is a chance for the Nevada voters to make sure that Michael Bloomberg is not our nominee, and that’s what I’m asking.”

Warren desperately needed a post-debate cash infusion.

Warren’s campaign says her fiery performance Wednesday has turned February into her best fundraising month yet. “But January figures show the Massachusetts senator was in deep trouble before her sudden apparent reversal — so much so that her campaign took out a $3 million line of credit and tapped into $400,000 of it as a loan, as contingency cash before the Iowa caucuses. She spent more than double ($22.3 million) the amount she raised ($10.8 million) in January,” per Michelle Ye Hee Lee and Anu Narayanswamy.

Two Bloomborgs are running for president at the same time.

“One is the tough, get-it-done, rich guy who stars in $340 million worth of advertising, emotes in scripted speeches and is praised daily by his surrogate army,” write Michael Scherer, Josh Dawsey and Michael Kranish. “The other is the sometimes bumbling, frequently ineffective and often peevish politician who showed up Wednesday night, operating on the fly. ... Bloomberg’s advisers, well aware of his uneven public performance as New York mayor, have tried to reconcile the two identities. They have scripted a campaign message that focuses heavily on the sheer scale of his operation and power of his purse, not the campaign talents of the candidate. On the trail, he boasts of having ‘the record and the resources’ to challenge Trump, not the heart or the passion.”

“So, how was your night last night?” Bloomberg asked a crowd in Salt Lake City Thursday night. \(AP\)

Conservatives have learned to wield power inside Facebook.

“Trump and other party leaders have pressured Facebook by making unproven claims of bias against conservatives amid rising signs of government action on the issue, including investigations by Congress and the Justice Department. Republicans also have leveraged Facebook’s fears of alienating conservative Americans to win concessions from a company whose most widely shared news content typically includes stories from Fox News and other right-leaning sources,” Craig Timberg reports. “These sensitivities — in conjunction with the company’s long-standing resistance to acting as ‘an arbiter of truth’ — have affected Facebook’s responses to a range of major issues, from how to address fake news and Russian manipulation of American voters on the platform to, more recently, the advertising policies that have set the political ground rules for the 2020 election, say people privy to internal debates. ... Critics — both outside Facebook and within its ranks — see something more akin to corporate realpolitik, a willingness to accede to political demands in an era when Republicans control most levers of power in Washington.”

Twitter is testing new ways to fight misinformation.

“Twitter is experimenting with adding brightly colored labels directly beneath lies and misinformation posted by politicians and other public figures,” according to a demo sent to NBC News. “Twitter confirmed that the leaked demo, which was accessible on a publicly available site, is one possible iteration of a new policy to target misinformation. The company does not have a date to roll out any new misinformation features. In this version, disinformation or misleading information posted by public figures would be corrected directly beneath a tweet by fact-checkers and journalists who are verified on the platform and possibly by other users who would participate in a new ‘community reports’ feature, which the demo claims is ‘like Wikipedia.’”

Quinnipiac polling shows Trump running strong in the Rust Belt.

The president leads in head-to-head matchups against the top Democratic candidates in Wisconsin, loses or trails within the margin of error in Pennsylvania, and is locked in tight competitions in Michigan.

The coronavirus

Infected Americans were flown home from Japan against the CDC's advice.

“In the wee hours of a rainy Monday, more than a dozen buses sat on the tarmac at Tokyo’s Haneda Airport. Inside, 328 weary Americans wearing surgical masks and gloves waited anxiously to fly home after weeks in quarantine aboard the Diamond Princess, the luxury liner where the novel coronavirus had exploded into a shipwide epidemic,” Lena Sun, Lenny Bernstein, Shibani Mahtani and Joel Achenbach report. “But as the buses idled, U.S. officials wrestled with troubling news. New test results showed that 14 passengers were infected with the virus. The U.S. State Department had promised that no one with the infection would be allowed to board the planes. ... In Washington, where it was still Sunday afternoon, a fierce debate broke out: The State Department and a top Trump administration health official wanted to forge ahead. The infected passengers had no symptoms and could be segregated on the plane in a plastic-lined enclosure. But officials at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention disagreed, contending they could still spread the virus. The CDC believed the 14 should not be flown back with uninfected passengers.

... The State Department won the argument. But unhappy CDC officials demanded to be left out of the news release that explained that infected people were being flown back to the United States — a move that would nearly double the number of known coronavirus cases in this country.”

A coronavirus outbreak in Chinese prisons raised alarm.

“Chinese authorities on Friday reported hundreds of new coronavirus infections at prisons around the country,” Gerry Shih reports. “A handful of prisons reported nearly 500 new cases, a significant portion of the more than 1,100 new cases reported in mainland China on Friday — and a marked increase after several days of declines. Tests at a prison in eastern Shandong province showed 207 out of 2,077 inmates and staff were infected, and the provincial justice department’s Communist Party secretary was dismissed as a result. ... Another jail in Zhejiang province found 34 cases. Hubei province, at the center of the outbreak, said Friday it found 220 new cases inside penitentiaries. ...

“In South Korea, new cases skyrocketed, bringing the national total to 204, as worries mounted that the country is becoming a new hot spot. Many of the new cases have been traced to ... a regional branch of a fringe religious sect named Shincheonji Church of God in the southern city of Daegu, according to the KCDC. The church’s founder Lee Man-hee called the outbreak ‘the devil’s deed to curb the rapid growth of Shincheonji,’ in an internal message published by South Korea’s Yonhap News Agency on Friday. Daegu city and surrounding North Gyeongsang province have been designated ‘special care zones’ after a jump in cases in the area, Prime Minister Chung Sye Kyun said earlier Friday.”

Chinese researchers could submit a vaccine for clinical trials in late April.

“Animal models of mice and monkeys infected with the novel coronavirus have also been constructed, which will provide support for drug screening, vaccine development and research on viral transmission mechanism.

China set up a coronavirus scientific research group about one month ago, with 14 experts led by renowned pulmonologist Zhong Nanshan,” Liu Yang reports.

Confusion continues to grow over China’s counting methods, as infection numbers swing wildly.

“Early Friday, China’s National Health Commission reported new infections increased again to 889. There are now a cumulative total of 75,465 infections and 2,236 deaths, mostly in Hubei province, the agency said. Hubei authorities have changed their criteria for counting cases twice in the past week,” Shih and Miriam Berger report. “The latest inconsistency — under which one city appeared to have more cases than the total in the province — apparently arose because Hubei province deducted cases that have not been confirmed through genetic tests from a total reported case number, which includes all diagnoses made by physicians using other methods. At best, the constant changes have frustrated scholars. At worst, they have raised suspicions.”

The USDA estimates that China will not buy as much U.S. farm output as Trump claims.

“The U.S. Department of Agriculture’s chief economist, Robert Johansson, projected that agricultural exports to China would reach roughly $14 billion in the year that ends Sept. 30, a $4 billion increase from one year ago. But that amount would still fall far short of what White House officials said would take place based on the recently announced ‘Phase One’ trade deal with Chinese leaders,” Laura Reiley reports. “White House officials have said agricultural exports to China would be between $40 billion and $50 billion in each of the next two years. Last year, when he was promising the trade deal would lead to a huge increase in purchases, Trump told farmers to buy ‘more land’ and ‘bigger tractors.’”

---

Social media speed read

After Trump attacked him again, former FBI director James Comey posted an image from Mariah Carey's music video for her song "Obsessed":

Several of the 2020 candidates attacked Trump's response to the intelligence community's conclusion that Russia favors his reelection:

Obama's former political director celebrated Stone's sentence:

The New York Times has published an op-ed by the deputy leader of the Taliban: "What We, the Taliban, Want." The paper's senior Afghanistan correspondent criticized his own publication for running the piece:

Videos of the day

James Corden wondered if Democrats are headed to an Iowa-repeat in Nevada:

Mike Bloomberg's campaign posted a highly misleading video from the debate:

Trump complained that the movie "Parasite" won the Academy Award for best picture, even though it's not an American movie:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Must Reads for a curated selection of our best journalism in your inbox every Saturday, plus a peek behind the scenes into how one story came together. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Bernie Sanders shows some Trumpian tendencies as he refuses to release promised medical records
Date: Friday, February 21, 2020 8:20:34 AM

COMMITTED TO
AFFORDABLE CARE
FOR THE HEALTH OF AMERICA<sup>SM</sup>

BlueCross
BlueShield
Association

Powered by  LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Partnership for America's Health Care Future

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

Bernie Sanders shows some Trumpian tendencies as he refuses to release promised medical records

He enjoys talking about his lead in the polls, the size of his crowds and his number of Twitter followers. He routinely criticizes the mainstream media and insists he cannot control his most zealous supporters online. Most people in his adopted party don't want him to be their nominee, but the establishment cannot agree on who is best to stop him.

Elizabeth Warren likened Mike Bloomberg to President Trump at the top of Wednesday night's debate, warning Democrats not to substitute one "arrogant billionaire" with a history of misogyny for another. But it was Bernie Sanders who displayed flashes of his Trumpian side during the two-hour clash. The most significant illustration of this came as the senator from Vermont sought to justify his refusal to release his full medical records.

Bernie Sanders delivers his victory speech after winning the New Hampshire primary last week. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

The 78-year-old would be the oldest president ever elected. Sanders suffered a heart attack in October just a few miles from the site of the debate, but his campaign refused to acknowledge the extent of what happened until three days later – late on a Friday. During the two weeks he spent recuperating at home, the senator told CNN's Sanjay Gupta that the American people have a right to "full disclosure" about the health of someone running for president. "And we will make, at the appropriate time, all of our medical records public for you or anybody else who wants to see them," he said.

On New Year's Eve, Sanders released summary letters from three

physicians that concluded he's healthy enough to be president. That's far from his full medical records. Now leading in the national polls, after winning the most votes in the first two states, Sanders says that will have to suffice for people worried about his physical fitness to be commander in chief.

NBC correspondent Hallie Jackson, one of the debate moderators, noted that Sanders has attacked Trump for refusing to release his tax returns. "What," she asked, "happened to your promise of full transparency?"

After thanking the doctors who took care of him, Sanders began his answer with the kind of whataboutism that we've grown to expect from Trump. "I think the one area maybe that Mayor Bloomberg and I share, you have two stents, as well," he said. The former New York mayor, who has never had a heart attack, replied that those were installed two decades ago. "Well, we both have two stents," Sanders replied. "It's a procedure that is done about a million times a year."

Then the septuagenarian claimed he's released "the full report" of "all of my history," which he has not. Sanders finished his answer by challenging anyone who doubts that he can deal with the stress of being president to "follow me around" on the campaign trail. "See how you're doing compared to me," he said.

When John McCain ran for president in 2008, the then-72-year-old allowed reporters to review 1,173 pages of his medical records. But Trump, too, would only release a letter in 2016 from his doctor that said he was "in excellent physical health." Like Sanders, he pointed to his stamina at rallies as evidence he was in good shape. He won anyway. The 73-year-old president raised a round of fresh questions about his medial status in November after making an unscheduled trip to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center and then insisting that he merely wanted to get an early start on his physical.

After kneecapping Bloomberg during Wednesday's debate,

Warren trained her fire toward Sanders on Thursday. Asked what differentiates her from Sanders, she told MSNBC last night: “I get stuff done. ... I don't want to be president just to yell at people. I want to be president to change things.” During a gaggle with reporters earlier in the day in Las Vegas, Warren attacked Sanders for not releasing his full medical records. “He had made a promise,” she said. “I don't think that's a question of opinion. Those aren't medical records.”

The 70-year-old senator from Massachusetts released a letter from her physician and five pages of supporting medical data last year. Former vice president Joe Biden, 77, released a three-page letter from his physician outlining his current condition and medical history. The youngest candidate in the race, 38-year-old Pete Buttigieg, noted that Barack Obama released his full medical records and details of annual physicals. “President Trump lowered that standard,” Buttigieg said during the debate. “He said just a letter from a doctor is enough. And a lot of folks on this stage are now saying that's enough. But I am certainly prepared to get a physical and put out the results. I think everybody here should be willing to do the same.”

When Sanders spokeswoman Briahna Joy Gray was pressed during a CNN appearance on Wednesday about why he hasn't put out more medical records, she called it a “smear.” She even likened requests for more health information from Sanders to demands that Obama release his birth certificate.

Bernie Sanders speaks on Oct. 19 in Queens. It was his first big rally after the heart attack, which allowed him to reset his campaign and helped secure the endorsement of New York Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez. (Jeenah Moon/Bloomberg)

---

Content from Partnership for America's Health Care Future

We Can't Afford Medicare for All

American families should not be forced to foot the bill for Medicare for All. And any new government insurance system would force them to pay more to wait longer for worse care.

---

To be sure, Trump and Sanders have vastly different agendas and stand on different sides of the ideological spectrum. It would be unfair to put too much emphasis on similarities. But one reason Sanders supporters like him, indisputably, is that he promises to fight Trump's fire with more fire. His Trumpian flashes this week foreshadow what the general election might look like if he won the nomination.

Sanders has been attacked for more than a week now after some of his supporters harassed Culinary Union officials on social media after they criticized his Medicare-for-all plan.

Asked about this during the debate, Sanders distanced himself. "We have over 10.6 million people on Twitter, and 99.9 percent of them are decent human beings," he said. "And if there are a few people who make ugly remarks, who attack trade union leaders, I disown those people. They are not part of our movement."

Then he deflected in a way that seemed reminiscent of how Trump has deflected in the face of similar attacks. Sanders said his own surrogates, especially women of color, face similarly vicious attacks online. "And let me say something else about this, not being too paranoid," he added. "All of us remember 2016, and what we remember is efforts by Russians and others to try to interfere in our election and divide us up. I'm not saying that's happening, but it would not shock me."

Experts say there's no evidence of Russians masquerading as Bernie Bros. "Absent direct evidence, researchers said Sanders's comments threaten to foment further doubt about a campaign that has been buffeted by confidence-shaking missteps, beginning with the technical glitches that marred the Iowa caucuses earlier this month," Isaac Stanley-Becker and Tony Romm report. "Facebook spokesman Andy Stone said Thursday it also had not seen evidence of Russian trolls masquerading as Sanders supporters. Twitter spokeswoman Katie Rosborough said the company would 'disclose' activity by Russia or other foreign actors if it had 'reasonable evidence of state-backed information operations.' ... Researchers have found some of the most divisive tweets and memes during the 2020 election originate with specific, verified Sanders supporters. That includes the viral #mayorcheat hashtag that attacked Buttigieg for ties between the former mayor's presidential campaign and Iowa caucus organizers, said Ben Nimmo, director of investigations at Graphika.”

“The problem we face is the impression of meddling can be as damaging to the legitimacy of an election as meddling itself,” said Jessica Brandt, the head of policy and research at the Alliance for Securing Democracy, an arm of the German Marshall Fund.

House minority whip Steve Scalise (R-La.) recalled Thursday that he was wounded by a Sanders supporter during baseball practice 2017:

Both Trump and Sanders didn’t adopt the parties they now lead until late in life. Sanders, who still hasn’t formally become a Democrat, reportedly considered a primary challenge against Obama from the left in 2011 more seriously than he’s acknowledged. In 1987, Sanders – as a mayor of Burlington, Vt., -- told the University of Vermont student newspaper that he was “physically nauseated” as a young man when he watched John F. Kennedy speak out against Fidel Castro’s revolution in Cuba. He said this was a factor in his decision to work outside the party system. That same year, Trump paid to run full-page ads in The Washington Post attacking Ronald Reagan’s foreign policy for lacking “backbone.”

Ironically, Trump now touts Reagan and Sanders is currently airing a television commercial that likens him to Kennedy. After playing the sound bite from the speech in which Kennedy said that “we choose to go to the moon ... not because it is easy but because it is hard,” Sanders narrates: “President Kennedy knew that settling for half-measures wasn't good enough. So when candidates say we can't guarantee health care for all, make college affordable for all, combat climate change, or create a world at peace, remember: America is best when we strive to do big things, even when it's hard.”

The debate again put in stark relief the collective action problem facing those who want to be the leading Sanders alternative, a dynamic I wrote about on the eve of the New Hampshire primary. Bloomberg's spotty performance will prevent him from consolidating support in that lane. Buttigieg and Amy Klobuchar went after each other because both are running close to even and competing for the same set of voters. It was the most-watched Democratic debate ever, with nearly 20 million people tuning into the telecast on NBC and MSNBC. The Sanders campaign said it raised $2.7 million from about 150,000 donors on Wednesday, his best haul of any of the nine debate days this cycle.

Of the six candidates onstage, Sanders was the only one who said the person with the most pledged delegates going into the convention this summer should definitely be the nominee. This represents a reversal from 2016 when he trailed Hillary Clinton among pledged delegates but thought he might persuade superdelegates that he'd be more electable. "What's clear out of [Wednesday] night is, it's hard to see what forces will stop Bernie from becoming the front-runner and just as hard to see how there will be any consolidation into a single candidate to oppose him," said Robby Mook, who was Clinton's campaign manager.

"The dawning realization for many in the party is that what Democrats had envisioned as a jubilant national convention in Milwaukee ... has the potential to turn into a pitched battle among multiple candidates and their supporters, each representing dueling ideological wings of the party and convinced that the other side would lose to Trump," Matt Viser, Dan Balz and Annie Linskey report. "Top campaigns have not only staffed up with delegate experts to guide them through the intricacies of the primaries, but they also have built legal teams preparing to challenge any results that don't go their way, according to interviews with 16 top party officials and strategists. And in preparation for a contested convention, some campaigns have started to reach out to superdelegates, in an attempt to secure support for a second ballot when they would come into play."

Former Senate majority leader Harry Reid said no candidate should be given the nomination without winning an outright majority of delegates. “I don’t think that anybody — Bernie Sanders or anyone else — should simply get the nomination because they have 30 percent of the delegates and no one else has that many,” the Nevada Democrat told Paul Kane during an interview in his office at the Bellagio hotel. “We have to let the system work its way out. I do not believe anyone should get the nomination unless they have 50-plus-one.” Reid added that moderates could align themselves in an attempt to combine their delegates and overtake Sanders.

A favorite parlor game for Washington elites right now is speculating about how badly Sanders might lose in a general election. Veterans Democratic operatives wonder whether Democrats would lose the House if he’s at the top of the ticket. Many of them privately fear a blowout more akin to Michael Dukakis’s in 1988 than George McGovern’s in 1972. These conversations sound similar to the ones Republican operatives had as Trump took over their party four years ago.

Republicans are increasingly using Sanders as a foil to target down-ballot Democrats. “Arizona Sen. Martha McSally launched a TV ad titled ‘Bernie Bro’ likening her Democratic opponent, retired astronaut Mark Kelly, to the Vermont senator,” Politico’s Alex Isenstadt notes.

“North Carolina Sen. Thom Tillis held a press conference last week linking his Democratic rivals to the Sanders-backed Green New Deal. In Michigan, a conservative group has aired a series of commercials that go after Democratic Sen. Gary Peters by invoking Sanders and his support for Medicare for All. And the Republican State Leadership Committee, which focuses on state legislative races, has been running digital ads asking whether down-ballot Democrats in more than a half-dozen states are ‘feeling burned yet’ — a take on the Sanders mantra, ‘Feel the Bern.’”

Sanders is dismissive of electability concerns. Asked during the debate about a poll that showed two-thirds of Americans uncomfortable with a socialist president, Sanders replied that the same poll showed him winning. “You might mention that,” he told NBC moderator Lester Holt. Indeed, the NBC-Wall Street Journal poll showed Sanders leading among Democratic primary voters, with 27 percent, followed by four candidates bunched together with support between 15 percent to 13 percent. It also found Sanders beating Trump 50 percent to 46 percent in a hypothetical head-to-head matchup, which was within the margin of error. The same survey discovered that 67 percent said they have “reservations” or are “very uncomfortable” with a socialist candidate, 57 percent said the same about someone who had a heart attack in the last year and 53 percent said the same about someone who's older than 75.

After Buttigieg accused Sanders of wanting “to burn this party down,” Holt asked Sanders whether he’s polarizing. “If speaking to the needs and the pain of a long-neglected working class is polarizing,” he said, “I think you got the wrong word.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

Check out my podcast.

Thank you to everyone who has sent feedback on the newsletter's redesign. It's immensely helpful for our team as we seek to optimize your reader experience. One of the changes has meant that the hyperlink to my Big Idea podcast is less pronounced than before. But it's still here: You can listen by clicking on the right side of the share bar immediately above this item. The audio briefing goes live around 7 a.m. Eastern each weekday and includes a preview of the key stories that I cover here in greater detail. You can also always download the podcast on this landing page. Thanks again. Have an awesome weekend.

The Trump presidency

A senior U.S. intelligence official said Russia wants to see Trump reelected.

“After learning of that analysis, which was provided to House lawmakers in a classified hearing, Trump grew angry at his acting director of national intelligence, Joseph Maguire, in the Oval Office, seeing Maguire and his staff as disloyal for speaking to Congress about Russia’s perceived preference,” Ellen Nakashima, Shane Harris, Josh Dawsey and Anne Gearan report. “The intelligence official’s analysis and Trump’s furious response ruined Maguire’s chances of becoming the permanent intelligence chief. ... It was not clear what specific steps, if any, U.S. intelligence officials think Russia may have taken to help Trump. ... Trump announced on Wednesday that he was replacing Maguire with a vocal loyalist, Richard Grenell. ... Maguire, a career official who is respected by the intelligence rank and file, was considered a leading candidate to be nominated to the post of DNI, White House aides had said. ...

“The official, Shelby Pierson, said several times during the briefing that Russia had ‘developed a preference’ for Trump. ... That conclusion was part of a broader discussion of election security that also touched on when the U.S. government should warn Democratic candidates if they are being targeted by foreign governments. ... Trump erroneously believed that Pierson had given the assessment exclusively to Rep. Adam B. Schiff (D-Calif.). ... Trump also believed that the information would be helpful to Democrats if it were released publicly. ... Trump learned about Pierson's remarks from Rep. Devin Nunes (Calif.). ...

"Trump became angry with Maguire and blamed him for Pierson's remarks when the two met the next day during a special briefing for Trump on election security attended by officials from other agencies, but not Pierson. ... He said that Maguire should not have let the Capitol Hill briefing happen. ... Trump told Maguire and other aides in the Oval Office that he did not believe Russia was interfering to help him or planning to do so, and that the intelligence community was getting 'played.' ... He said that the information would be used against him unfairly and that he could not believe that people were believing such a story again, reflecting his opinion that Russian interference in 2016 was a 'hoax' made up by officials with a political agenda. ... Maguire struck an apologetic tone ...

"White House officials said Trump's decision to make Grenell the acting director rather than nominate him for the permanent position reflected concerns that he might not win confirmation in the Senate, given his polarizing reputation. ... The president told reporters aboard Air Force One that Rep. Doug Collins (R-Ga.), a staunch Trump supporter who also is running for U.S. Senate, is under consideration for the permanent post. ...

"The shake-up at the top of the intelligence community is the latest move in a post-impeachment purge. ... The deputy national security adviser, Victoria Coates, has also been removed from her post after some colleagues, including trade adviser Peter Navarro, accused her of being the author of 'Anonymous.' ... Coates has strenuously denied the accusation. She was moved to an advisory position in the Energy Department." Meanwhile, a former NSC aide who tried to discredit the Russia probe has been promoted. Kash Patel is now a senior adviser for Grenell, per Politico. It's not clear what exact role Patel, who used to work for Nunes, will play.

Breaking this morning: The U.S. plans to sign a peace deal with the Taliban on Feb. 29.

The deal will pass as long as a week-long reduction in violence across the country holds, according to Secretary of State Mike Pompeo. Susannah George and John Hudson report: “The violence reduction, the decisive condition of the possible peace deal, is set to begin early Saturday — just after midnight, according to Afghanistan's National Security Council and a senior State Department official. ‘U.S. negotiators in Doha have come to an understanding with the Taliban on a significant and nationwide reduction in violence across Afghanistan,’ Pompeo said in a statement Friday, referring to U.S.-Taliban talks in the Qatari capital. ... The Taliban said ‘both parties will now create a suitable security situation in advance of agreement signing date, extend invitations to senior representatives of numerous countries and organizations to participate in the signing ceremony, make arrangements for the release of prisoners’ and prepare for intra-Afghan negotiations, according to the group's statement released to the media Friday. The U.S. military command in Kabul said it has nothing to announce at this time. ... The week-long reduction in violence will require the Taliban, the United States and Afghan government-aligned forces to largely cease all planned offensive operations nationwide.”

Roger Stone arrives for his sentencing on Thursday at the federal courthouse in Washington. (Marvin Joseph/The Washington Post)

Trump confidant and former adviser Roger Stone was sentenced to 40 months in prison.

“The penalty from U.S. District Judge Amy Berman Jackson comes after weeks of infighting over the politically charged case that threw the Justice Department into crisis, and it is likely not to be the final word. Even before the sentencing hearing began, Trump seemed to suggest on Twitter that he might pardon Stone,” Rachel Weiner, Matt Zapposky, Tom Jackman and Devlin Barrett report. “With the proceedings ongoing, Trump questioned whether his ally was being treated fairly. Afterward, he attacked the jury in the case and said he would ‘love to see Roger exonerated.’ ... In a lengthy speech before imposing the penalty, Jackson seemed to take aim at Trump, saying Stone ‘was not prosecuted for standing up for the president; he was prosecuted for covering up for the president.’ She also appeared to call out Attorney General William P. Barr, saying his intervention to reduce career prosecutors’ sentencing recommendation was ‘unprecedented.’ But she said the politics surrounding the case had not influenced her decision.”

“Stone did not speak in court and showed no visible emotion as

the sentence was read. Emerging from the courtroom in a wide-striped suit and polka-dot tie, he appeared calm. ‘I have nothing to say,’ Stone said. ... Stone, 67, was convicted by a federal jury on seven counts of lying to Congress and tampering with a witness about his efforts to learn about hacked Democratic emails related to Clinton. ... Stone, his wife and a large entourage exited the courthouse to a large crowd of photographers, supporters and antagonists. As he climbed into an SUV, protesters shouted ‘Lock him up!’ while supporters yelled ‘Pardon Roger Stone!’ ...

“Stone requested a new trial last week, after Trump suggested the forewoman in Stone’s case had ‘significant bias.’ Jackson, the judge, said previously that she would delay implementing his sentence until she resolves that request. A filing is due from Stone’s defense team Monday. In addition to prison, Jackson ordered Stone to pay a $20,000 fine and serve two years of supervised release. He remains out of prison on bond, and even if he loses his motion for a new trial, he will have at least two weeks to turn himself in — unless an appeal further delays things.”

The Justice Department breathed a sigh of relief as Stone’s sentence hit Barr’s target. “It was messier than we wanted, but we ended up in the same place,’ said one senior official,” Barrett and Zapotosky report. “Another Justice Department official called Stone’s sentence a ‘vindication’ of the attorney general’s decision last week to insert himself into the process, calling for a revised sentencing memorandum that undercut the line prosecutors’ prior recommendation of seven to nine years in prison. ... After a week of nervous tension atop the agency, anxiety levels have dropped, at least for the moment. ... Senior Justice Department officials are, however, increasingly resigned to the idea that Trump is likely to continue upbraiding the department and the FBI, and that it may be a staple of his reelection campaign rhetoric — the odd spectacle of an incumbent president bashing his own Justice Department.”

---

Quote of the day

“The truth still exists; the truth still matters,” Judge Jackson said. “Roger Stone’s insistence that it doesn’t, his belligerence, his pride in his own lies are a threat to our most fundamental institutions, to the foundations of our democracy. If it goes unpunished, it will not be a victory for one party or another. Everyone loses. ... The dismay and disgust at the defendant’s belligerence should transcend party.”

Former congressman Dana Rohrabacher confirmed that he offered a Trump pardon to Julian Assange.

“Rohrabacher (R-Calif.) said his goal during the meeting was to find proof for a widely debunked conspiracy theory: that WikiLeaks’ real source for the DNC emails was not Russian intelligence agents, as U.S. officials have since concluded, but former DNC staffer Seth Rich, who was murdered on the streets of Washington in July 2016 in what police believe was a botched robbery,” Yahoo News reports.

Rudy Giuliani’s work for a candidate in the Dominican Republic raised eyebrows amid the Ukraine swirl.

“The politics of this Caribbean island nation do not frequently capture the attention of the stewards of America’s foreign policy, but Secretary of State Mike Pompeo phoned down last summer with a clear message,” Joshua Partlow and Josh Dawsey report. “Dominican President Danilo Medina’s supporters were pushing to change the country’s constitution to allow him to run for an unprecedented third term. In a call with the president, Pompeo emphasized the importance of ‘adherence to rule of law and the constitution,’ according to a State Department readout. That message was echoed a week later in person by [Giuliani]. ... [But] Giuliani was not in the Dominican Republic as Trump’s representative. He was speaking as a paid consultant to an opposition presidential candidate.”

A man was charged with making death threats against the Ukraine whistleblower’s attorney.

A day after Trump lashed out against Mark Zaid during a 2019 rally, the

attorney received a disquieting email. “All traitors must die miserable deaths,” the message read. “Those that represent traitors shall meet the same fate. We will hunt you down and bleed you out like the pigs you are.” Federal prosecutors have indicted Brittan J. Atkinson and accused him of sending the message. (Reis Thebault)

Mick Mulvaney said the U.S. is “desperate” for more legal immigrants.

The acting White House chief of staff told a crowd at a gathering in England that the Trump administration “needs more immigration” for the U.S. economy to continue growing, according to audio of his remarks obtained by Nick Miroff and Josh Dawsey. “‘We are desperate — desperate — for more people,’ Mulvaney said. ‘We are running out of people to fuel the economic growth that we’ve had in our nation over the last four years. We need more immigrants.’ The Trump administration wants those immigrants to come in a ‘legal fashion,’ Mulvaney said. ... Mulvaney’s remarks appear in contrast to the public position of several top figures in Trump’s White House — especially that of senior policy adviser Stephen Miller. ... Mulvaney’s private remarks were more in line with conventional GOP views of immigration as a major engine for the U.S. economy. ... He praised the immigration systems in Canada and Australia and said the Trump administration wants the United States to embrace a model closer to those nations.”

Trump’s “Remain in Mexico” program is dwindling as more migrants are sent to Guatemala.

“Immigration attorneys and migrant advocates say the Trump administration is phasing out its year-old Migrant Protection Protocols policy, ... instead prioritizing newer, more restrictive programs that make qualifying for asylum in the United States extremely difficult,” Arelis R. Hernández and Kevin Sieff report. “‘MPP is dying,’ said Charlene D’Cruz, a lawyer who represents Central American asylum seekers and has advocated for dozens of vulnerable migrants to be removed from the program and allowed into the United States. ‘And something worse is taking its place. Everything is changing.’”

A Mexican man just became the seventh immigrant to die in ICE custody since October. BuzzFeed News reported that the preliminary cause appears to be suicide. He was 34.

The State Department delayed the visa of a renowned German professor and far-right extremism expert.

Academic Hajo Funke delivered documentation for a visa to the U.S. Consulate in Berlin in November 2019, Moriah Balingit reports. But when the consulate returned his passport, “it was accompanied not by a visa but by a letter that said a decision about his visa had been delayed for three to six months. The two classes he was set to teach — one on far-right populism and another on political memory in Germany — were in jeopardy.” The professor finally got his visa granted Thursday, but questions have been raised about what prompted the delay. Last year, Funke “wrote an article for the website of the American Institute for Contemporary German Studies at Johns Hopkins University linking violence in Charlottesville, where a white nationalist rally turned deadly in 2017, to [Trump’s election]. He has also visited Iran ... for an academic conference and to visit the family of his wife, who emigrated from Iran to Germany in the 1980s and is now a German citizen.”

---

More on 2020

Elizabeth Warren signs a cardboard cutout of herself at her campaign office in North Las Vegas on Thursday. (John Locher/AP)

Warren flip-flopped on outside money, refusing to disavow a new super PAC.

Warren refused to disavow a new super PAC created to support her candidacy after spending a year criticizing her Democratic rivals for not disavowing super PACs set up to help them. “We reached the point a few weeks ago, where all of the men who were still in this race, and on the debate stage, all had either super PACs or they were multi-billionaires, and could just rummage around in their sock drawers and find enough money to be able to fund a campaign,” the senator told reporters. “And the only people who didn't have them were the two women. And at that point, there are some women saying, you know, that's just not right.” CNN reports that Persist PAC will spend more than $1 million to air a biography-focused television ad that links Warren to Obama.

During Thursday night's CNN town hall, Warren said Bloomberg's refusal to release former employees from nondisclosure agreements is disqualifying. She showed up with her own version of a “release and covenant not to sue” document for him to sign and release his past employees from their NDAs. She even offered to text it to him. Warren said that if Bloomberg is ultimately the nominee, she'll support him, but added that “what we’ve got right now is a chance for the Nevada voters to make sure that Michael Bloomberg is not our nominee, and that’s what I’m asking.”

Warren desperately needed a post-debate cash infusion.

Warren’s campaign says her fiery performance Wednesday has turned February into her best fundraising month yet. “But January figures show the Massachusetts senator was in deep trouble before her sudden apparent reversal — so much so that her campaign took out a $3 million line of credit and tapped into $400,000 of it as a loan, as contingency cash before the Iowa caucuses. She spent more than double ($22.3 million) the amount she raised ($10.8 million) in January,” per Michelle Ye Hee Lee and Anu Narayanswamy.

Two Bloomborgs are running for president at the same time.

“One is the tough, get-it-done, rich guy who stars in $340 million worth of advertising, emotes in scripted speeches and is praised daily by his surrogate army,” write Michael Scherer, Josh Dawsey and Michael Kranish. “The other is the sometimes bumbling, frequently ineffective and often peevish politician who showed up Wednesday night, operating on the fly. ... Bloomberg’s advisers, well aware of his uneven public performance as New York mayor, have tried to reconcile the two identities. They have scripted a campaign message that focuses heavily on the sheer scale of his operation and power of his purse, not the campaign talents of the candidate. On the trail, he boasts of having ‘the record and the resources’ to challenge Trump, not the heart or the passion.”

“So, how was your night last night?” Bloomberg asked a crowd in Salt Lake City Thursday night. \(AP\)

Conservatives have learned to wield power inside Facebook.

“Trump and other party leaders have pressured Facebook by making unproven claims of bias against conservatives amid rising signs of government action on the issue, including investigations by Congress and the Justice Department. Republicans also have leveraged Facebook’s fears of alienating conservative Americans to win concessions from a company whose most widely shared news content typically includes stories from Fox News and other right-leaning sources,” Craig Timberg reports. “These sensitivities — in conjunction with the company’s long-standing resistance to acting as ‘an arbiter of truth’ — have affected Facebook’s responses to a range of major issues, from how to address fake news and Russian manipulation of American voters on the platform to, more recently, the advertising policies that have set the political ground rules for the 2020 election, say people privy to internal debates. ... Critics — both outside Facebook and within its ranks — see something more akin to corporate realpolitik, a willingness to accede to political demands in an era when Republicans control most levers of power in Washington.”

Twitter is testing new ways to fight misinformation.

“Twitter is experimenting with adding brightly colored labels directly beneath lies and misinformation posted by politicians and other public figures,” according to a demo sent to NBC News. “Twitter confirmed that the leaked demo, which was accessible on a publicly available site, is one possible iteration of a new policy to target misinformation. The company does not have a date to roll out any new misinformation features. In this version, disinformation or misleading information posted by public figures would be corrected directly beneath a tweet by fact-checkers and journalists who are verified on the platform and possibly by other users who would participate in a new ‘community reports’ feature, which the demo claims is ‘like Wikipedia.’”

Quinnipiac polling shows Trump running strong in the Rust Belt.

The president leads in head-to-head matchups against the top Democratic candidates in Wisconsin, loses or trails within the margin of error in Pennsylvania, and is locked in tight competitions in Michigan.

The coronavirus

Infected Americans were flown home from Japan against the CDC's advice.

“In the wee hours of a rainy Monday, more than a dozen buses sat on the tarmac at Tokyo’s Haneda Airport. Inside, 328 weary Americans wearing surgical masks and gloves waited anxiously to fly home after weeks in quarantine aboard the Diamond Princess, the luxury liner where the novel coronavirus had exploded into a shipwide epidemic,” Lena Sun, Lenny Bernstein, Shibani Mahtani and Joel Achenbach report. “But as the buses idled, U.S. officials wrestled with troubling news. New test results showed that 14 passengers were infected with the virus. The U.S. State Department had promised that no one with the infection would be allowed to board the planes. ... In Washington, where it was still Sunday afternoon, a fierce debate broke out: The State Department and a top Trump administration health official wanted to forge ahead. The infected passengers had no symptoms and could be segregated on the plane in a plastic-lined enclosure. But officials at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention disagreed, contending they could still spread the virus. The CDC believed the 14 should not be flown back with uninfected passengers.

... The State Department won the argument. But unhappy CDC officials demanded to be left out of the news release that explained that infected people were being flown back to the United States — a move that would nearly double the number of known coronavirus cases in this country.”

A coronavirus outbreak in Chinese prisons raised alarm.

“Chinese authorities on Friday reported hundreds of new coronavirus infections at prisons around the country,” Gerry Shih reports. “A handful of prisons reported nearly 500 new cases, a significant portion of the more than 1,100 new cases reported in mainland China on Friday — and a marked increase after several days of declines. Tests at a prison in eastern Shandong province showed 207 out of 2,077 inmates and staff were infected, and the provincial justice department’s Communist Party secretary was dismissed as a result. ... Another jail in Zhejiang province found 34 cases. Hubei province, at the center of the outbreak, said Friday it found 220 new cases inside penitentiaries. ...

“In South Korea, new cases skyrocketed, bringing the national total to 204, as worries mounted that the country is becoming a new hot spot. Many of the new cases have been traced to ... a regional branch of a fringe religious sect named Shincheonji Church of God in the southern city of Daegu, according to the KCDC. The church’s founder Lee Man-hee called the outbreak ‘the devil’s deed to curb the rapid growth of Shincheonji,’ in an internal message published by South Korea’s Yonhap News Agency on Friday. Daegu city and surrounding North Gyeongsang province have been designated ‘special care zones’ after a jump in cases in the area, Prime Minister Chung Sye Kyun said earlier Friday.”

Chinese researchers could submit a vaccine for clinical trials in late April.

“Animal models of mice and monkeys infected with the novel coronavirus have also been constructed, which will provide support for drug screening, vaccine development and research on viral transmission mechanism. China set up a coronavirus scientific research group about one month ago, with 14 experts led by renowned pulmonologist Zhong Nanshan,” Liu Yang reports.

Confusion continues to grow over China’s counting methods, as infection numbers swing wildly.

“Early Friday, China’s National Health Commission reported new infections increased again to 889. There are now a cumulative total of 75,465 infections and 2,236 deaths, mostly in Hubei province, the agency said. Hubei authorities have changed their criteria for counting cases twice in the past week,” Shih and Miriam Berger report. “The latest inconsistency — under which one city appeared to have more cases than the total in the province — apparently arose because Hubei province deducted cases that have not been confirmed through genetic tests from a total reported case number, which includes all diagnoses made by physicians using other methods. At best, the constant changes have frustrated scholars. At worst, they have raised suspicions.”

The USDA estimates that China will not buy as much U.S. farm output as Trump claims.

“The U.S. Department of Agriculture’s chief economist, Robert Johansson, projected that agricultural exports to China would reach roughly $14 billion in the year that ends Sept. 30, a $4 billion increase from one year ago. But that amount would still fall far short of what White House officials said would take place based on the recently announced ‘Phase One’ trade deal with Chinese leaders,” Laura Reiley reports. “White House officials have said agricultural exports to China would be between $40 billion and $50 billion in each of the next two years. Last year, when he was promising the trade deal would lead to a huge increase in purchases, Trump told farmers to buy ‘more land’ and ‘bigger tractors.’”

---

Social media speed read

After Trump attacked him again, former FBI director James Comey posted an image from Mariah Carey's music video for her song “Obsessed”:

Several of the 2020 candidates attacked Trump's response to the intelligence community's conclusion that Russia favors his reelection:

Obama's former political director celebrated Stone's sentence:

The New York Times has published an op-ed by the deputy leader of the Taliban: “What We, the Taliban, Want.” The paper's senior Afghanistan correspondent criticized his own publication for running the piece:

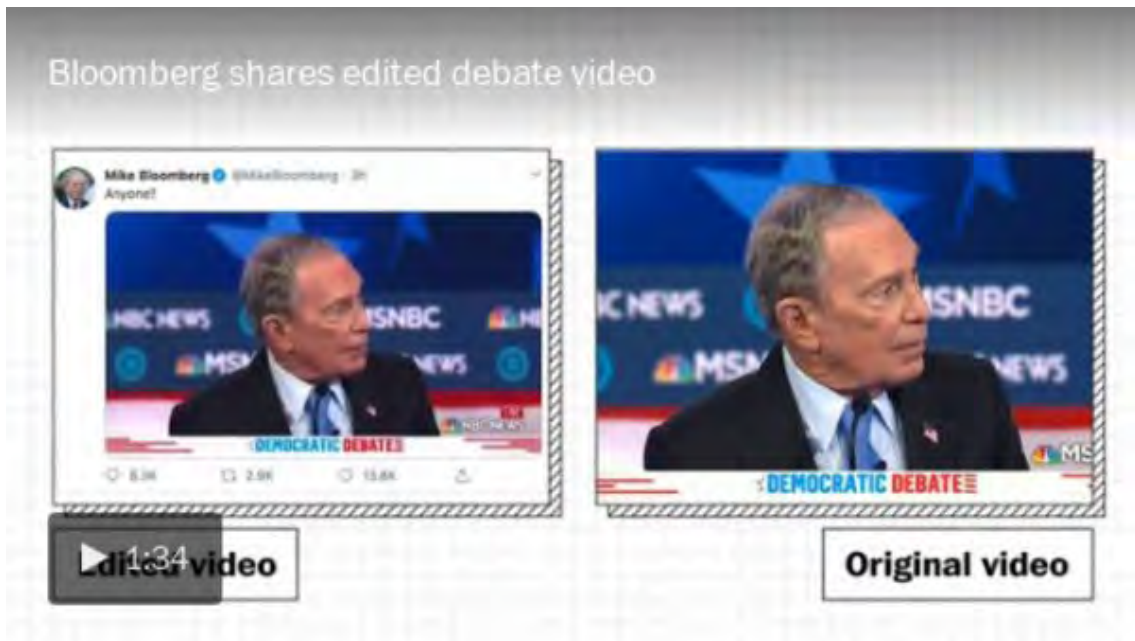

---

Videos of the day

James Corden wondered if Democrats are headed to an Iowa-repeat in Nevada:

Mike Bloomberg's campaign posted a highly misleading video from the debate:

Trump complained that the movie "Parasite" won the Academy Award for best picture, even though it's not an American movie:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Must Reads for a curated selection of our best journalism in your inbox every Saturday, plus a peek behind the scenes into how one story came together. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: E&E News
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] February 24 -- Energywire is ready
Date: Monday, February 24, 2020 5:35:58 AM

Read today's Energywire on the web

ENERGYWIRE

AN E&E NEWS PUBLICATION

ENERGYWIRE — Mon., February 24, 2020

 READ FULL EDITION

---

1. SUPREME COURT:

3 things to watch in the Appalachian Trail pipeline fight

A contentious battle over the Atlantic Coast pipeline's crossing beneath one of the nation's longest hiking trails arrives at the Supreme Court this morning. What will the justices do?

---

TOP STORIES

2. NATURAL GAS:

Developers kill Constitution pipeline project

3. TEXAS:

Fracking linked to increased sexually transmitted infections

4. ELECTRICITY:

Northeast keeps largest coal plant online

---

POLITICS

5. PIPELINES:

9 states weigh ALEC-backed plan targeting protesters

---

TECHNOLOGY

6. ELECTRIC VEHICLES:

Bill Gates backs mining company to support 'EVs at scale'

---

ELECTRICITY

7. RENEWABLE ENERGY:

Study: Offshore wind could power China's entire coast

8. ELECTRIC VEHICLES:

Tesla rival aims to banish 160-year-old lead tech from cars

9. COAL:

Tribes turn to other heat sources after Ariz. mine closure

---

FEDERAL AGENCIES

10. OIL AND GAS:

U.S. drops plan to sell energy leases near Utah bike trail

---

Get all of the stories in today's Energywire, plus an in-depth archive with thousands of articles on your issues, detailed Special Reports and much more at <https://www.energywire.com>.

Forgot your passcodes? Call us at 202-628-6500 now and we'll set you up instantly.

To send a press release, fax 202-737-5299 or email editorial@eenews.net.

ABOUT ENERGYWIRE – THE TRANSFORMATION OF THE ENERGY SECTOR

---

Energywire is written and produced by the staff of E&E News. Energywire is designed to bring readers deep, broad and insightful coverage of the transformation of the energy sector. Energywire focuses on the business, environmental and political issues surrounding the rapidly expanding unconventional energy industry and the numerous factors -- from expanding natural gas use to renewables and more -- that are altering the traditional electric utility industry. Energywire publishes daily at 9:00 a.m.

Unsubscribe | Our Privacy Policy

E&E News

122 C Street NW 7th Floor Washington, DC 20001

Phone: 202-628-6500 Fax: 202-737-5299

www.eenews.net

All content is copyrighted and may not be reproduced or retransmitted without the express consent of Environment & Energy Publishing, LLC.
Prefer plain text? Click here.

From: E&E News
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] February 24 -- Energywire is ready
Date: Monday, February 24, 2020 5:36:25 AM

Read today's Energywire on the web

ENERGYWIRE

AN E&E NEWS PUBLICATION

ENERGYWIRE — Mon., February 24, 2020

 READ FULL EDITION

1. SUPREME COURT:

3 things to watch in the Appalachian Trail pipeline fight

A contentious battle over the Atlantic Coast pipeline's crossing beneath one of the nation's longest hiking trails arrives at the Supreme Court this morning. What will the justices do?

TOP STORIES

2. NATURAL GAS:

Developers kill Constitution pipeline project

3. TEXAS:

Fracking linked to increased sexually transmitted infections

4. ELECTRICITY:

Northeast keeps largest coal plant online

POLITICS

5. PIPELINES:

9 states weigh ALEC-backed plan targeting protesters

TECHNOLOGY

6. ELECTRIC VEHICLES:

Bill Gates backs mining company to support 'EVs at scale'

ELECTRICITY

7. RENEWABLE ENERGY:

Study: Offshore wind could power China's entire coast

8. ELECTRIC VEHICLES:

Tesla rival aims to banish 160-year-old lead tech from cars

9. COAL:

Tribes turn to other heat sources after Ariz. mine closure

FEDERAL AGENCIES

10. OIL AND GAS:

U.S. drops plan to sell energy leases near Utah bike trail

---

Get all of the stories in today's Energywire, plus an in-depth archive with thousands of articles on your issues, detailed Special Reports and much more at <https://www.energywire.com>.

Forgot your passcodes? Call us at 202-628-6500 now and we'll set you up instantly.

To send a press release, fax 202-737-5299 or email editorial@eenews.net.

ABOUT ENERGYWIRE – THE TRANSFORMATION OF THE ENERGY SECTOR

---

Energywire is written and produced by the staff of E&E News. Energywire is designed to bring readers deep, broad and insightful coverage of the transformation of the energy sector. Energywire focuses on the business, environmental and political issues surrounding the rapidly expanding unconventional energy industry and the numerous factors -- from expanding natural gas use to renewables and more -- that are altering the traditional electric utility industry. Energywire publishes daily at 9:00 a.m.

Unsubscribe | Our Privacy Policy

E&E News

122 C Street NW 7th Floor Washington, DC 20001

Phone: 202-628-6500 Fax: 202-737-5299

www.eenews.net

All content is copyrighted and may not be reproduced or retransmitted without the express consent of Environment & Energy Publishing, LLC. Prefer plain text? Click here.

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Bernie Sanders built a diverse coalition to win Nevada. South Carolina offers a tougher test.
Date: Monday, February 24, 2020 10:41:11 AM

Powered by LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Uber

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

Bernie Sanders built a diverse coalition to win Nevada. South Carolina offers a tougher test.

COLUMBIA, S.C. – As Bernie Sanders cruised to a landslide victory in the Nevada caucuses on Saturday, Keith Ellison told volunteers here that a win in South Carolina’s primary would make the senator’s path to the Democratic presidential nomination essentially unstoppable. “We’re going to break it out,” he said, banging his hand on a table for emphasis.

Ellison, a former congressman who is now Minnesota’s attorney general after running unsuccessfully to be chairman of the Democratic National Committee in 2017, warmed up a crowd of 120 at a Sanders rally in the fellowship hall at First Calvary Baptist Church. Next up was Sanders surrogate scholar-activist Cornel West, who was downright triumphal.

“The corporate media is telling lies about my dear brother Bernie Sanders: They call him a Bolshevik. That’s what they said about my brother Martin Luther King Jr.,” West said to a chorus of amens. “Get ready to get lied on, rebuked, scorned, attacked, assaulted. ... In some ways, that’s a compliment. It means they’ve got to take us seriously now. It also means that we’ve got momentum. And once you let that genie out, there ain’t no putting it back in.”

A field organizer announced that Sanders volunteers had knocked on 11,000 doors in South Carolina that day, and there was a palpable feeling in the room that their movement is on the cusp of taking over the Democratic Party.

It was a totally different vibe than four years ago for the independent senator from Vermont. After Sanders won the New Hampshire primary by 22 points in 2016, he lost the Nevada caucuses to Hillary Clinton by 5 points and then got trounced in the South Carolina primary by 47 points. The Sanders effort dragged on for three more months, but the crushing defeat here – which showed that he couldn’t break Clinton’s firewall with African Americans – was the beginning of the end.

Cornel West speaks Saturday in Columbia. (James Hohmann/The Washington Post)

Ellison and West stumped together for Sanders in 2016. But what made this event feel quite different was the presence of several African American state legislators who didn't endorse him four years ago. State Rep. Leon Howard, who chairs a state House committee that oversees public hospitals, talked about how much Medicare-for-all might help his constituents. "We have a real opportunity to win this election," he said. "South Carolina is the slingshot that will propel Senator Sanders to the White House," added state Rep. Ivory Thigpen.

Sanders supporter April Jones, 36, a stay-at-home mom in Columbia, said a lot of people here who reflexively backed Clinton last time are giving Sanders a serious look. "It's like if you're dating somebody," she explained. "You come back around a second time and you're like, 'Oh, I'm going to give you some new eyes because I kind of know you from before.' ... We're in even more of a crisis economically, in terms of inequality being so much worse, and he talked about all these same issues last time. Four years ago, people said his ideas were too radical, but now they're all mainstream positions, so people kind of see him as a visionary.”

Sanders’s sweeping win in the Silver State was powered by large numbers of first-time caucus-goers. He won 51 percent of Hispanics, 29 percent of whites and 27 percent of African Americans, according to entrance polls of Democratic caucus-goers. Sanders got the support of 2 in 3 voters under 30 years old and carried every age group except those over 65, which went for Joe Biden. “In Nevada, we have just put together a multigenerational, multiracial coalition,” Sanders said during a rally in San Antonio after he was declared the winner. “It is going to sweep this country.”

First, though, all the candidates are sweeping into South Carolina. After trying to lower expectations for the better part of a year, Sanders is now playing to win in the Palmetto State and plans to invest heavily in hopes of knocking out Biden. After a televised debate in Charleston with all his rivals on Tuesday night, Sanders is scheduled to hold rallies in North Charleston and Myrtle Beach on Wednesday, Spartanburg on Thursday and Columbia on Friday, where he’ll speak on the steps of the state capitol. He is airing commercials in every media market.

More than half the Democratic electorate this Saturday will be African American. In 2016, exit polls show that Clinton won 86 percent of the black vote in South Carolina. Biden won 39 percent of black voters in Nevada on Saturday, 12 points better than Sanders. But that represented a major improvement for Sanders, who got only 22 percent of the black vote against Clinton in a two-way race there in 2016.

Biden remains the favorite to win this first-in-the-South primary on Saturday, but Sanders is nipping at the former vice president's heels. A CBS News-YouGov poll released Sunday puts Biden at 28 percent among likely voters, down 17 points from last month, with Sanders at 23 percent, up 8 points. Tom Steyer, the billionaire who didn't qualify for last week's debate but has spent more time and money in South Carolina than any other candidate, polled in third place, with 18 percent, followed by Sen. Elizabeth Warren (Mass.) at 12 percent, former South Bend, Ind., mayor Pete Buttigieg at 10 percent and Sen. Amy Klobuchar (Minn.) at 4 percent. The poll found that 46 percent of likely voters say they've definitely made up their minds, 45 percent said they've probably made up their minds and 7 percent said they'll probably end up changing their minds between now and the primary.

Biden is making what could be a last stand. He hopes that a win in South Carolina after his second-place finish in Nevada will give him momentum in the Southern states with large black populations that vote on March 3. "The African American community in South Carolina can make a judgment about who the next president of the United States is going to be," Biden told congregants on Sunday at the Royal Missionary Baptist Church in North Charleston. "Literally!"

I drove nearly 500 miles around South Carolina this weekend to take the pulse of the Democratic electorate, and the polling tracks with what I found anecdotally in more than two dozen interviews.

"Bernie Sanders obviously learned a lot from his loss here in 2016," said Trav Robertson Jr., the chairman of the South Carolina Democratic Party. "In 2016, they'd only come for groups that were 3,000 people or bigger. They transitioned into realizing that they've got to visit smaller communities of color. ... That's paying off for him, especially among younger African American voters."

We chatted Sunday night in Conway after a two-hour forum for candidate surrogates at the Mason Temple Church of God in Christ. Robertson, who is neutral, said Our Revolution, the outside group created to boost Sanders after 2016, has been organizing in this state nonstop since the last presidential election. He said that group, combined with the campaign's early investments in a field program, is an important part of the story for why Sanders has made "a hell of a lot of headway."

"Sanders, to a certain extent, has held true to his core values for 40 years, but he modified his campaign practices this time," Robertson said. "What we're going to find out in the next several days is whether or not Joe Biden's support is because of name ID and a positive feeling, especially among older African American voters. ... The other question you've got to ask is: How big a win does Biden need to have going into Super Tuesday? I don't know."

Jim Clyburn arrives for a meeting with other House Democrats at the Capitol last month. (J. Scott Applewhite/AP)

With momentum comes scrutiny.

House Majority Whip Jim Clyburn (S.C.), who is No. 3 in Democratic leadership and an ally of Speaker Nancy Pelosi, warned on the Sunday shows that Sanders and his brand of “socialism” could cost the party its House majority. “I think it would be a real burden for us in these states or congressional districts that we have to do well in,” Clyburn said on ABC’s “This Week.” “If you look at how well we did the last time [in 2018] and look at the congressional districts, these were not liberal or what you might call progressive districts. These were basically moderate and conservative districts that we did well in.” Clyburn announced that he will reveal his endorsement on Wednesday morning – after the debate. Politico reports that he plans to endorse Biden.

---

Quote of the day

“I don’t see a whole lot of 2016 in this election. I see a whole lot of 1972,” Clyburn told the Charleston Post & Courier, comparing Sanders to George McGovern.

Buttigieg, who finished third in Nevada, is running an attack ad in South Carolina against Sanders over Medicare-for-all. A narrator says Sanders would “eliminate private insurance” and kick “22 million seniors off of Medicare Advantage.” This is the first negative ad this election cycle that a Democrat has actually aired on television against a rival. “Senator Sanders’s revolution has the tenor of combat, division and polarization, a vision where whoever wins the day, nothing will change the toxic tone of our politics,” Buttigieg said Saturday night in Las Vegas.

While Mike Bloomberg bore the brunt of attacks last week in Las Vegas, Sanders will probably be the focus of the most attacks during Tuesday’s debate, which will air on CBS. But the collective action problem remains for the candidates who aspire to emerge as the main alternative to Sanders. Biden, Buttigieg, Warren, Klobuchar and Bloomberg, who does not appear on any ballots until Super Tuesday, all show no signs of backing down.

Biden's campaign stepped up attacks on Sunday against Sanders for flirting with a primary challenge against Barack Obama in 2012 and for not detailing how he'd pay for his ambitious plans. And Warren sharpened her criticisms of Sanders during a rally in Denver on Sunday night. "People ask about the difference between Bernie and me, because there are a lot of places where we agree about the things we want to fight for," she told a crowd of 4,000. "But here's a big [difference]: Bernie supports the filibuster. I'm going to get rid of the filibuster." During a gaggle with reporters afterward, though, Warren declined to call Sanders a "risky" choice for the nomination. Instead, she attacked Bloomberg.

Steyer is an X factor. He's qualified to appear onstage in Tuesday's debate and has made reparations for the descendants of slaves a centerpiece of his campaign.

Even though he doesn't actually lead in the statewide polls here, Sanders dominates the conversation among Democratic voters. He provokes strong passions, both positive and negative. Robyn Morgan, 41 of Pamplico, came to Warren's field office in Florence to go door-knocking with her 3-year-old daughter Hannah. She said she loves that "Warren has a plan for everything," especially universal childcare.

The student adviser at a small college complained that Sanders could never succeed with his temperament if he was a red-in-the-face female candidate. “Warren is so much less quote unquote ‘angry’ than Sanders, but people don’t see it that way because she’s a woman,” Morgan said. “In 2016, I didn’t think Sanders could ever survive the vetting process. But apparently that doesn’t seem to matter anymore. ... Everything he stands for fits on a hat, but what it takes to run our government doesn’t fit on a hat.”

Michael Rahenkemp, 62 of Florence, phone-banked for Warren at her Florence field office. The retired computer programmer said he strongly supports Medicare-for-all and Sanders is his second choice. “But I think she has a better set of policies,” he said. “He’s a democratic socialist whereas Warren is more of a capitalist, and I support capitalism.”

Rep. Ayanna Pressley (D-Mass.) is the only member of the self-described Squad of first-term women of color who didn’t endorse Sanders. She’s become one of Warren’s most visible surrogates and barnstormed Sunday across what’s known as the Pee Dee region in the northeast corner of South Carolina. Speaking to 18 canvassers as they prepared to knock on doors Sunday afternoon, Pressley emphasized that Warren is aspirational but has plans that are attainable – an apparent dig at Sanders. “People have broken hearts because of broken promise,” she said. “Elizabeth keeps her promises.” When I asked her whether liberals should rally behind Sanders to stop a more moderate candidate from securing the nomination – because Warren hasn’t won a delegate since Iowa – Pressley replied: “I believe she’s the most electable. ... We’re not riding the pollercoaster.”

Ayanna Pressley, right, greets volunteers at Elizabeth Warren's field office on Sunday afternoon in Florence, S.C. (James Hohmann/The Washington Post)

Only 35 percent of likely Democratic primary voters in the CBS poll of South Carolina said they're very confident that Democrats will nominate someone who can beat President Trump. Regardless of who they support, asked who has the best chance to beat Trump, Sanders still finished second, trailing Biden 33 percent to 23 percent. The poll found that 37 percent of likely South Carolina voters said Sanders's policy positions are too liberal to defeat Trump, compared to 49 percent who said his stances are about right for defeating Trump. Respondents were asked who has impressed them in the most recent debates and could pick multiple options. Sanders was first, impressing 43 percent, followed by Warren at 41 percent and Biden at 35 percent.

While his rivals focus on him, Sanders's stump speech has stayed as focused as ever on criticizing Trump. He opened a rally in Houston on Sunday afternoon by raising the electability question. "Some of the folks in the corporate media are getting a little bit nervous, and they say Bernie can't beat Trump," he told a crowd of more than 6,200. The front-runner then read the results of a few recent polls that showed him beating both Trump nationally and in states like Michigan, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin.

The audience of 120 people who came to see West and Ellison in Columbia on Saturday night was split almost evenly between white and black voters. “A lot of politicians don’t want to be seen as radical because they want to keep their positions, but Bernie has been doing this his way since before I was born,” said Eric Johnson, 34, a graphic designer in Columbia who is African American and has attended three Sanders rallies in the last eight months. “Now we hear the term ‘socialism’ thrown around. Nobody really knows what it is. There’s no set definition of democratic socialism. How is it that negative? It’s like the term ‘Bernie Bros’ and how that’s a term that’s been twisted to mean something negative.”

Janet Bates, 62, a Democratic middle school teacher in Columbia who is white and voted for George W. Bush two decades ago supports Sanders because she admires his ideological consistency. “I haven’t always believed in everything he’s stood for, but it’s probably 90 percent,” she said. “Even his detractors would agree he’s exactly the same person he was decades ago.”

South Carolina is not fertile ground for Buttigieg.

He's running into some of the same problems that Sanders did four years ago related to a dearth of black support. Last night's forum in Conway put this into stark relief. Rep. Anthony Brown (D-Md.), a national co-chair of his campaign, spent Sunday visiting black churches. After the emcee introduced him as a surrogate for "Boot-um-egg," Brown falsely claimed that Buttigieg was campaigning in a different part of the state (in fact, he was in Northern Virginia) and then made the case that Sanders, without naming him, would "jeopardize" down-ballot candidates.

"We're up against a president who is quite formidable," he said. "The candidates don't differ a lot on the issues. ... But Americans are yearning for a new face."

Robertson, the state party chairman, had emphasized how much more diverse South Carolina is than Iowa and New Hampshire during his introductory remarks. Noting Buttigieg's success in those two states, Brown pointed toward him and said: "Let's not discount Iowa and New Hampshire because they are Americans too!"

Then Brown spent two minutes complaining about distortions related to Buttigieg's relationship with the black community as mayor in South Bend, Ind. "If you're a young black man in South Bend, now listen close, because you've heard a lot of disinformation, the chances of you being convicted for marijuana possession are lower than anywhere else in Indiana and lower than the American average," he said.

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost's essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

More on 2020

Inside each campaign's Super Tuesday strategy

Sanders hopes to twist the knife by picking off either Massachusetts (Warren's home state) and/or Minnesota (Klobuchar's home state) a week from tomorrow, which would be paralyzing blows for either of them. He's expected to hold an event in both states between now and Super Tuesday. The biggest of the 14 prizes on March 3 are California and Texas. All told, approximately one-third of the nearly 4,000 pledged delegates to the convention will be awarded. "Sanders's money and organization have allowed him to spend weeks punctuating visits to early-voting states with trips to Super Tuesday states — most notably delegate-heavy California, where rival campaigns believe he will be difficult to beat," Chelsea Janes, Annie Linskey and Matt Viser report.

"The goal for Buttigieg's campaign on Super Tuesday is to accumulate enough delegates to stay within striking distance of Sanders. Campaign advisers say if he is close Super Tuesday, states voting March 10 and 17 — including Michigan, Ohio, Arizona and Illinois — are favorable enough to Buttigieg to allow him to make up ground. ... Last week, Buttigieg squeezed in a trip to Salt Lake City, where his campaign has made a major organizing push and earned endorsements from several local officials. His campaign also is counting on delegate-rich areas in some of the less high-profile Super Tuesday states — Little Rock, for one. He campaigned in Northern Virginia Sunday and has stops scheduled in Raleigh, N.C., and Oklahoma City before Super Tuesday. ...

"Warren is banking her candidacy on the idea that she can begin accumulating delegates on March 3 by doing well in liberal pockets like Denver, San Antonio and the Los Angeles area. Over the next few days, Warren will campaign in South Carolina, but she also plans a Thursday evening rally in San Antonio with Julián Castro, the former mayor of that city, and a stop in the Los Angeles area. Warren's campaign has bought TV ad time in Colorado and Maine. The campaign also will air ads starting Tuesday in Austin, San Antonio and Oklahoma City — all population-rich areas in Super Tuesday states. ...

“Klobuchar had to ramp up her national operation more hurriedly than her competitors ... She stopped by Colorado this week and headed to her home state to raise money Saturday — followed by a Sunday three-state tour via charter plane: Fargo to Oklahoma City to Little Rock. (North Dakota votes a week after Oklahoma and Arkansas, Super Tuesday states.) ... Several Super Tuesday states, including Virginia, Arkansas, Tennessee, North Carolina and Alabama, have substantial numbers of black voters. But Biden has not been advertising in those states and, while he is already well known, the lack of visibility could be problematic at a time when Bloomberg is flooding the airwaves.”

Internal polling and analytics completed last week by Bloomberg’s campaign projected that Sanders may be the only presidential candidate to win delegates in every state and district on March 3, delivering him a lead of 350 to 400 out of 1,357 delegates set to be awarded, unless race dynamics change, Mike DeBonis and Michael Scherer reported in the Sunday newspaper. “Because of Democratic rules that give no delegates to candidates who scores less than 15 percent of the vote in a state or congressional district, Sanders could build a delegate lead far greater than his advantage in the popular vote.”

New surveys show Sanders leading in three key Midwestern states that vote after Super Tuesday.

The University of Wisconsin at Madison-YouGov surveys of likely Democratic primary voters showed Sanders garnering 25 percent in Michigan, which holds its primary on March 10. His nearest competitor was Biden, with 16 percent. In Wisconsin, which votes on April 7, Sanders led with 30 percent. Biden and Bloomberg trailed with 13 percent. And in Pennsylvania, Sanders led with 25 percent, followed by Biden at 20 percent and Bloomberg at 19 percent. That primary is April 28. “Sanders is well positioned to pick up the lion’s share of delegates in these states unless another Democrat breaks away from the pack to challenge him,” said UW-Madison political science Barry Burden, who runs the Elections

Research Center.

Buttigieg's campaign alleged numerous errors in Nevada's vote counting.

But the state Democratic Party rebuffed a request from Buttigieg's campaign to hold off releasing final numbers, which showed him in third place behind Biden. (Isaac Stanley-Becker)

Harry Reid, the former Senate majority leader from Nevada, said in a statement last night that caucuses should no longer be used to nominate candidates. He repeated his call for Nevada to hold a primary before Iowa or New Hampshire vote, emphasizing the Silver State's diversity.

Bloomberg will postpone a CNN town hall to focus on debate prep.

"Bloomberg was scheduled to appear on CNN on Monday. But he'll now join the network for the live question-and-answer program on Wednesday," the Associated Press reports. "A spokeswoman for Bloomberg called the debate 'crucial' and said 'the country can't afford to let Bernie Sanders skate by another debate without a focus on his extreme record.'"

Trump will hold a campaign rally in North Charleston the night before the South Carolina Democratic primary, per the Post and Courier.

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

---

The Trump presidency

President Trump takes the stage with his wife and the Indian prime minister for a “Namaste Trump” rally at Sardar Patel Stadium in Ahmedabad, India. (Alex Brandon/AP)

Trump is visiting India for the first time as president.

The whirlwind 36-hour tour “includes a mega rally expected to draw more than 100,000 people, a visit to the Taj Mahal, and a day of ceremonies and meetings in Delhi. Trump was greeted by Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi, whom Trump recently described as ‘a friend of mine,’” Niha Masih, Joanna Slater, Seung Min Kim and Anne Gearan report. “The Modi government has encountered considerable international criticism — including from members of Congress — over its crackdown in Kashmir, India’s only Muslim-majority state, and the passage of a controversial religion-based citizenship bill that has led to protests throughout the country. In the run-up to the trip, a senior White House official said Trump would raise the issue of religious freedom with Modi in private. ...

“Thousands of people lined the streets of Ahmedabad, the largest city in the state of Gujarat, to welcome Trump. Trump had said earlier that as many as 10 million people would be there to greet him. Preparations included building a wall to hide a slum along his route.” Trump and Modi lavished praise on each other during a joint rally at the world's largest cricket stadium before an audience of 100,000. On stage, Trump announced that “the United States and India are poised to sign a new agreement to sell $3 billion worth of U.S. military helicopters to the Indian armed forces as he touted a ‘critical partnership’ between the two countries.”

“Upon arriving in Agra to visit the Taj Mahal, Trump met Yogi Adityanath, a radical Hindu monk known for his anti-Muslim rhetoric. The two shook hands and walked down the red carpet lined with performers. Adityanath is the chief minister of India's largest and most populous state, Uttar Pradesh, where Agra is located. Ahead of the meeting, critics decried the scheduled interaction, which they said could help legitimize Adityanath's divisive politics. The saffron-robed priest is a five-time parliamentarian who has more than a dozen criminal cases pending against him, including serious charges such as attempted murder and rioting. He has not been convicted of a crime. ... In 2014, Adityanath promised to cleanse India of other religions.”

Mick Mulvaney didn't go on the trip because of a cold, sources said. A person close to Mulvaney told CNN that White House doctors advised against having him travel in such close proximity to Trump.

Trump, a known steak-lover, is in for a beef-free menu in India. “I don't know what he's going to do in this case,” a former official told CNN. “They don't serve cheeseburgers.” A person close to the president said that, aside from a few salads here and there, they “have never seen him eat a vegetable.”

Trump's response to reports that Russia prefers him in 2020 has shaken the intelligence community.

“Current and former national security officials were appalled but not surprised by [Joe] Maguire's unceremonious dispatch,” Shane Harris, Ellen Nakashima and Josh Dawsey report. “Intelligence officers are used to working with presidents who don't enthusiastically embrace or always agree with their analysis. But Trump's tendency to shoot the messenger puts the people working for him in a precarious position. ‘The intelligence community at this point is having to walk a tightrope,’ [said Katrina Mulligan, a former National Security Council aide under the Obama administration]. ... Three other former senior intelligence officials said that Trump’s violent reactions could encourage his advisers to withhold unsettling information. There is talk of ‘trying to hide’ stuff, one of the former officials said ... Current and former intelligence officials see [Rick] Grenell’s appointment, which he has said will last only until a permanent director is confirmed by the Senate, as a signal that Trump intends to exert more political control over the intelligence community.”

National security adviser, Robert C. O’Brien, claimed he has not seen any intelligence that Russia wants to help Trump: “But O’Brien said reports that Russia is helping Sanders were ‘no surprise’ ... As intelligence officials struggle to draw attention to election interference, Trump is purging the ranks of advisers he believes won’t strongly defend him. Johnny McEntee, the new head of the White House Presidential Personnel Office, has asked agencies to tell him about appointees who are opposed to the president, according to a White House official.”

Trump threatened Adam Schiff.

The president claimed without evidence that the Democratic chairman of the House Intelligence Committee leaked details from Shelby Pierson’s briefing that led to Maguire’s ouster. “Someday he will be caught, & that will be a very unpleasant experience!” Trump tweeted. In another tweet, Trump jokingly suggested that former special counsel Bob Mueller should be dispatched to investigate the claims that Russia is seeking to help Sanders win the Democratic nomination. “Trump maintained in an exchange with reporters outside the White House earlier Sunday that he had not been briefed about any Russian interference efforts,” Felicia Sonmez reports. “He blamed Schiff and said there should be an investigation into the source of the leak.”

The White House wants to overhaul spy laws, partly due to Trump’s anger over the investigation of a former ## adviser.

“The effort seeks to take advantage of the looming expiration of some spying powers next month, including portions of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, a Watergate-era law that Mr. Trump believes was improperly used to target his campaign,” the Wall Street Journal reports. “Overhauling FISA has become a rallying cry for conservatives and allies of the president in the aftermath of a watchdog report detailing several errors made by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in its applications for surveillance of Mr. Trump’s campaign adviser, Carter Page. Some Republicans have called for upending FISA, prompting pushback from some in the administration, including Attorney General William Barr. The plan, which is being spearheaded by officials within the White House Domestic Policy Council, is in the early stages and could face resistance from other parts of the Trump administration, including the National Security Council, which has generally advocated maintaining or expanding surveillance powers during Mr. Trump’s presidency.”

Judge Amy Berman Jackson rejected Roger Stone’s effort to disqualify her.

“The federal judge who oversaw [his] trial and sentenced him last week to 40 months in prison dismissed his demand that she be taken off the case as a baseless smear,” Rachel Weiner reports. “Stone’s motion sought to disqualify Berman Jackson for referring during Thursday’s sentencing to ‘the jurors who served with integrity under difficult circumstances.’ He is still challenging one juror as biased. Berman Jackson rebutted any claim that she has not treated Stone fairly.”

Justice Clarence Thomas's wife has worked to identify “deep state” members who are “disloyal” to Trump.

“The Trump White House and its allies, over the past 18 months, assembled detailed lists of disloyal government officials to oust — and trusted pro-Trump people to replace them,” Axios reports. “Members of this network include [Ginni Thomas] and Republican Senate staffer Barbara Ledeen. ... Thomas has spent a significant amount of time and energy urging Trump administration officials to change the personnel inside his government. ... The presidential personnel office reviewed Thomas' memo and determined that some names she passed along for jobs were not appropriate candidates.” Leeden wrote a memo arguing why former D.C. U.S. attorney Jessie Liu should be disqualified for a nomination to a top Treasury job. Thomas, meanwhile, compiled names of potential nominees for different positions, many sourced from meetings with her conservative activist network Groundswell. Potential hires she offered to Trump include: Sheriff David Clarke for a senior DHS job, radio talk show host Chris Plante for press secretary, and Federalist contributor Ben Weingarten for the National Security Council.

Trump, eyeing Nevada, opposed a nuclear waste site at Yucca, reversing his own administration's policy.

“Why should you have nuclear waste in your backyard?’ Mr. Trump asked the crowd at a rally in Las Vegas on Friday, to applause, noting that his recently released budget proposal did not include funding to license the site, as previous ones had,” the Times reports. “In Mr. Trump’s decentralized administration, top aides and agency leaders have sometimes pursued their own agendas, at times creating politically perilous situations for him. ... The president made his latest move after a monthslong policy debate inside the White House over finally breaking with support for Yucca ... Nationally, Republicans have long favored the proposal ... But Nevada politicians of both parties have remained steadfastly opposed to the policy, which is deeply unpopular in the state.”

---

The new world order

A newlywed couple wear protective masks as they take wedding photos in Hong Kong. (Tyrone Siu/Reuters)

China postponed its most important political gathering of the year because of the coronavirus.

“China’s ruling Communist Party has postponed the biggest event in China’s political calendar, the National People’s Congress, as it concentrates on fighting the coronavirus,” Anna Fifield and Liu Yang report. “The annual legislative session, held together with a meeting of the party’s top political-advisory body, was due to begin on March 5. But the NPC’s Standing Committee decided at a meeting in Beijing on Monday that they would be delayed. It did not set a date for the meetings, known collectively as the ‘Two Sessions.’ It will be the first time since 1997 that the meetings have not started in the first week of March.”

President Xi Jinping said that the outbreak is a crisis that will test the Chinese economy. “No victory should be lightly announced until there is a complete win,” he said during a speech to Communist Party members in Beijing on Sunday, adding the situation remains grim and complex.

China backtracked on a decision to relax travel

restrictions on Wuhan.

“A notice by Wuhan’s epidemic prevention and control headquarters said Monday that it would ease some of the more draconian travel restrictions on the locked-down city at the heart of the epidemic, allowing for the return of some residents trapped outside Wuhan since late January and permitting visitors stuck in the city to leave. But hours later, Wuhan’s city government declared the earlier announcement invalid, saying it had been released without authorization,” Adam Taylor reports. “Official figures released Monday showed there had been 409 new cases of the novel coronavirus and 150 new deaths from the outbreak by the end of Sunday, bringing the total confirmed cases to 77,150 with a cumulative death toll of 2,592.”

A Chinese study suggests that the outbreak didn’t begin at a Wuhan market.

“Co-authored by researchers from three Chinese institutions including the Chinese Academy of Sciences and published on the academy’s website last Thursday, the study attempts to trace how the virus emerged and evolved. The authors analyzed the genomic data from 93 samples of the novel coronavirus and concluded that it was likely to have spread to the market from somewhere else,” Tiffany Liang reports. “It also pointed out that human-to-human transmission of the virus might have existed in Wuhan as early as late November. The market was closed on Jan. 1.”

South Korea temporarily shut down the messianic church linked to half of the country’s virus cases.

“More than half of South Korea’s covid-19 cases have been traced to a regional branch of the secretive Shincheonji Church of Jesus, formally known as the Temple of the Tabernacle of the Testimony. But authorities were having difficulty locating members, many of whom are probably in hiding,” Min Joo Kim reports. “The South Korean government on Sunday announced 169 new coronavirus cases and two more deaths, bringing the totals to 602 cases and six deaths. ... South Korean President Moon Jae-in said the country’s coronavirus crisis has entered a ‘totally different phase since the mass infection at Shincheonji.’ Hundreds of thousands signed a petition calling for the church to be dissolved. Moon called the temporary shutdown of Shincheonji churches across the country ‘a fair and inevitable step’ to protect the community. He said there was ‘no intention to limit religious freedom.’”

Fifty people reportedly died of coronavirus in the Iranian city of Qom.

The country’s health minister rejected the report from Iranian lawmaker Ahmad Amirabadi Farahani, who claimed that the government is covering up the full extent of the outbreak. (The Guardian)

The U.S. government backtracked on a plan to transfer quarantined patients to Alabama.

Hours after Anniston County's City Council voted on Sunday to pursue legal action against the federal government over its proposal to transfer patients from the Diamond Princess cruise ship to be held in the town's FEMA facility, Sen. Richard Shelby (R) and Gov. Kay Ivey (R) announced that plans had changed. Ivey said Trump called and assured her that the patients wouldn't be sent to Alabama, ABC News reports.

Hong Kong refugees traverse a legal twilight zone as they build their new lives in Taiwan.

“Che-lam Presbyterian Church is next door to Taiwan's legislature and a stone's throw from the presidential office in the island's capital. But while President Tsai Ing-wen's support for Hong Kong protesters powered her to reelection last month, the church is Taiwan's only institution to publicly provide material assistance to people who have fled the Asian financial hub's crackdown on demonstrators,” Nick Aspinwall reports. “Although Taiwan has temporarily barred entry to most Hong Kongers amid the coronavirus outbreak, many in Hong Kong view the island as a place to resettle should their political strife worsen. ... Taiwan, which is not a member of the United Nations, has not signed the U.N. Refugee Convention and has no formal asylum laws. Its government processes people from Hong Kong on a case-by-case basis but provides no public assurance of their long-term legal status, leading to concerns that the uncertainty creates gaps for protesters to be exploited.”

Israel’s fear of coronavirus contagion grows as election day approaches.

The concern comes after “reports that a group of South Koreans who had visited some of the country's most popular religious and tourist spots tested positive for the infection,” Steve Hendrix reports. “Israeli officials, who had expressed cautious optimism that Israel could avoid significant risk from the global epidemic, immediately increased restrictions on those entering the country. Non-Israeli travelers from South Korea and Japan have been barred from entering, according to local media reports, and Israelis arriving from any of several Asian countries face two weeks of mandatory quarantine.”

Israeli military jets targeted sites in Gaza and Syria linked to Palestinian Islamic Jihad.

The attacks came “hours after militants from the group fired more than 20 rockets into Israeli territory,” Ruth Eglash and Hazem Balousha report. “The exchange came after a Palestinian news agency posted graphic footage of an Israeli army bulldozer dragging the body of a Palestinian man who Israel said was part of a ‘terror squad,’ killed as he placed an explosive device along the border fence. ... The Israeli strikes injured four in Gaza, according to the Palestinian Ministry of Health.”

Malaysian Prime Minister Mahatir Mohamad, the world’s oldest national leader, resigned.

“Under Malaysia’s constitution, the entire cabinet must be dissolved if the prime minister resigns,” Shibani Mahtani and Jonathan Edward report. “As the prime minister’s office announced Mahathir’s intent to resign, his political party, the Malaysian United Indigenous Party, known as Bersatu, said it would be leaving Malaysia’s ruling coalition. About a dozen other prominent members of parliament also left to form an independent bloc in the Southeast Asian country’s legislature. The king, Sultan Abdullah of Pahang, has not commented publicly on the matter. The political drama on Monday appeared to thwart one of Southeast Asia's most celebrated democratic transitions, and returned Malaysia to a time of backdoor political plotting and palace intrigue. The move also appeared aimed at preventing [Anwar Ibrahim] from taking over as leader."

In Greece, migrants wait in bread lines while tourists dine on grilled octopus next door.

"At the Moria refugee camp on Lesbos, the largest of the island facilities, migrants wait in snaking lines for up to eight hours a day to get their meals," Chico Harlan reports. "They wait because this camp has mushroomed in size, growing seven times more crowded than its capacity, a shantytown on a vacation island never intended for such emergencies ... One migrant said the food was worse than at her former workplace, an Afghan prison. ... Yet beyond the camp, closer to the water, locals and tourists are eating well. Lesbos's tavernas serve octopus, grilled squid, feta, vegetables dressed with lemon and olive oil. That jarring juxtaposition is part of what makes the camp 'one of the worst places I've seen on earth,' said Marco Sandrone, the Lesbos field coordinator for Doctors Without Borders."

The U.K.'s new post-Brexit passports will be distributed next month.

What the the Home Office didn't say, however, was that the passports will be made by a Franco-Dutch company at a Polish factory under E.U. procurement rules, the Times reports.

Harry and Meghan won't be able to use the brand

"SussexRoyal" in any territories. The couple, which will become independent from the crown on March 31, appeared upset at the palace's ban on the use of the word "royal." (The Guardian)

Prague renamed the square in front of the Russian embassy after the slain Putin critic Boris Nemtsov. (CNN)

Prosecutors say a former DEA agent laundered millions for a Colombian cartel.

“Jose Irizarry was the model agent for his bosses at the Drug Enforcement Administration. Seen as a rising star in Miami for overseeing undercover investigations that led to dozens of drug arrests, Irizarry transferred to the Colombian city of Cartagena to continue to fight the violent cartel. ... But when the DEA special agent allegedly began to spend lavishly on homes, cars and jewelry, and hosted wild yacht parties with bikini-clad prostitutes, it raised some red flags within the agency,” Timothy Bella reports. “As it turns out, Irizarry allegedly laundered money for the very Colombian drug cartel he was fighting against. Irizarry, 46, was arrested Friday at his home near San Juan, Puerto Rico, on charges of conspiring to launder money, as well as honest services wire fraud, bank fraud, conspiracy to commit bank fraud, conspiracy to commit identity theft and aggravated identity theft. ... Irizarry, who resigned in early 2018 after the agency grew suspicious, is believed to have laundered more than $7 million.”

---

Social media speed read

Sanders’s partial defense of Fidel Castro on CBS's “60 Minutes” drew widespread criticism from conservatives in Florida:

Marco Rubio ✓

@marcorubio

Likely Dem nominee praised the supposed
“achievements” Castro regime

And he’s wrong about why people didn’t overthrow Castro. It’s not because “he educated their kids,gave them health care” it’s because his opponents were jailed,murdered or exiled cbsnews.com/news/bernie-sa...

Bernie Sanders on being the Democratic frontrunn...

Coming off his win in the Nevada caucuses, Bernie Sanders talks about Michael Bloomberg, Donald Trump, Democratic cbsnews.com

♥ 4,436 3:13 AM - Feb 24, 2020

💬 2,423 people are talking about this

Former presidential candidate Marianne Williamson endorsed Sanders:

Emma Kinery ✓
@EmmaKinery

“Surprise guest” and native Texan Marianne Williamson endorses Bernie Sanders for president at his rally in Austin, TX

♥ 12.2K 11:11 PM - Feb 23, 2020

💬 2.123 people are talking about this

And love led a Sanders supporter to a Warren rally:

Jess Bidgood

@jessbidgood

A happy couple at the @ewarren rally in Denver

♥ 22 11:30 PM - Feb 23, 2020

See Jess Bidgood's other Tweets

Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) responded playfully to a report in the New York Post that noted he's spent over $8,600 at Junior's Cheesecake over the past decade, mostly to buy gifts using campaign funds:

The Hill
@thehill

"Guilty as charged... it's my guilty pleasure."

WATCH: Sen. Chuck Schumer admits to spending thousands on cheesecake and serves cheesecake to members of the press in a lighthearted moment.

196 1:13 AM - Feb 24, 2020

81 people are talking about this

Videos of the day

John Oliver talked about India's Modi:

“The Daily Show” offered an interesting service to former presidential candidates:

And a California couple that went missing on Valentine's Day was found alive on Saturday by a search dog named Groot:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Carolyn Hax for Post columnist Carolyn Hax's latest advice column every day. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Bernie Sanders built a diverse coalition to win Nevada. South Carolina offers a tougher test.
Date: Monday, February 24, 2020 10:43:50 AM

Powered by LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Uber

By James Hohmann

with Mariana Alfaro

Email

Bernie Sanders built a diverse coalition to win Nevada. South Carolina offers a tougher test.

COLUMBIA, S.C. – As Bernie Sanders cruised to a landslide victory in the Nevada caucuses on Saturday, Keith Ellison told volunteers here that a win in South Carolina’s primary would make the senator’s path to the Democratic presidential nomination essentially unstoppable. “We’re going to break it out,” he said, banging his hand on a table for emphasis.

Ellison, a former congressman who is now Minnesota’s attorney general after running unsuccessfully to be chairman of the Democratic National Committee in 2017, warmed up a crowd of 120 at a Sanders rally in the fellowship hall at First Calvary Baptist Church. Next up was Sanders surrogate scholar-activist Cornel West, who was downright triumphal.

“The corporate media is telling lies about my dear brother Bernie Sanders: They call him a Bolshevik. That’s what they said about my brother Martin Luther King Jr.,” West said to a chorus of amens. “Get ready to get lied on, rebuked, scorned, attacked, assaulted. ... In some ways, that’s a compliment. It means they’ve got to take us seriously now. It also means that we’ve got momentum. And once you let that genie out, there ain’t no putting it back in.”

A field organizer announced that Sanders volunteers had knocked on 11,000 doors in South Carolina that day, and there was a palpable feeling in the room that their movement is on the cusp of taking over the Democratic Party.

It was a totally different vibe than four years ago for the independent senator from Vermont. After Sanders won the New Hampshire primary by 22 points in 2016, he lost the Nevada caucuses to Hillary Clinton by 5 points and then got trounced in the South Carolina primary by 47 points. The Sanders effort dragged on for three more months, but the crushing defeat here – which showed that he couldn’t break Clinton’s firewall with African Americans – was the beginning of the end.

Cornel West speaks Saturday in Columbia. (James Hohmann/The Washington Post)

Ellison and West stumped together for Sanders in 2016. But what made this event feel quite different was the presence of several African American state legislators who didn't endorse him four years ago. State Rep. Leon Howard, who chairs a state House committee that oversees public hospitals, talked about how much Medicare-for-all might help his constituents. "We have a real opportunity to win this election," he said. "South Carolina is the slingshot that will propel Senator Sanders to the White House," added state Rep. Ivory Thigpen.

Sanders supporter April Jones, 36, a stay-at-home mom in Columbia, said a lot of people here who reflexively backed Clinton last time are giving Sanders a serious look. "It's like if you're dating somebody," she explained. "You come back around a second time and you're like, 'Oh, I'm going to give you some new eyes because I kind of know you from before.' ... We're in even more of a crisis economically, in terms of inequality being so much worse, and he talked about all these same issues last time. Four years ago, people said his ideas were too radical, but now they're all mainstream positions, so people kind of see him as a visionary.”

Sanders’s sweeping win in the Silver State was powered by large numbers of first-time caucus-goers. He won 51 percent of Hispanics, 29 percent of whites and 27 percent of African Americans, according to entrance polls of Democratic caucus-goers. Sanders got the support of 2 in 3 voters under 30 years old and carried every age group except those over 65, which went for Joe Biden. “In Nevada, we have just put together a multigenerational, multiracial coalition,” Sanders said during a rally in San Antonio after he was declared the winner. “It is going to sweep this country.”

First, though, all the candidates are sweeping into South Carolina. After trying to lower expectations for the better part of a year, Sanders is now playing to win in the Palmetto State and plans to invest heavily in hopes of knocking out Biden. After a televised debate in Charleston with all his rivals on Tuesday night, Sanders is scheduled to hold rallies in North Charleston and Myrtle Beach on Wednesday, Spartanburg on Thursday and Columbia on Friday, where he’ll speak on the steps of the state capitol. He is airing commercials in every media market.

More than half the Democratic electorate this Saturday will be African American. In 2016, exit polls show that Clinton won 86 percent of the black vote in South Carolina. Biden won 39 percent of black voters in Nevada on Saturday, 12 points better than Sanders. But that represented a major improvement for Sanders, who got only 22 percent of the black vote against Clinton in a two-way race there in 2016.

Biden remains the favorite to win this first-in-the-South primary on Saturday, but Sanders is nipping at the former vice president's heels. A CBS News-YouGov poll released Sunday puts Biden at 28 percent among likely voters, down 17 points from last month, with Sanders at 23 percent, up 8 points. Tom Steyer, the billionaire who didn't qualify for last week's debate but has spent more time and money in South Carolina than any other candidate, polled in third place, with 18 percent, followed by Sen. Elizabeth Warren (Mass.) at 12 percent, former South Bend, Ind., mayor Pete Buttigieg at 10 percent and Sen. Amy Klobuchar (Minn.) at 4 percent. The poll found that 46 percent of likely voters say they've definitely made up their minds, 45 percent said they've probably made up their minds and 7 percent said they'll probably end up changing their minds between now and the primary.

Biden is making what could be a last stand. He hopes that a win in South Carolina after his second-place finish in Nevada will give him momentum in the Southern states with large black populations that vote on March 3. "The African American community in South Carolina can make a judgment about who the next president of the United States is going to be," Biden told congregants on Sunday at the Royal Missionary Baptist Church in North Charleston. "Literally!"

I drove nearly 500 miles around South Carolina this weekend to take the pulse of the Democratic electorate, and the polling tracks with what I found anecdotally in more than two dozen interviews.

"Bernie Sanders obviously learned a lot from his loss here in 2016," said Trav Robertson Jr., the chairman of the South Carolina Democratic Party. "In 2016, they'd only come for groups that were 3,000 people or bigger. They transitioned into realizing that they've got to visit smaller communities of color. ... That's paying off for him, especially among younger African American voters."

We chatted Sunday night in Conway after a two-hour forum for candidate surrogates at the Mason Temple Church of God in Christ. Robertson, who is neutral, said Our Revolution, the outside group created to boost Sanders after 2016, has been organizing in this state nonstop since the last presidential election. He said that group, combined with the campaign's early investments in a field program, is an important part of the story for why Sanders has made "a hell of a lot of headway."

"Sanders, to a certain extent, has held true to his core values for 40 years, but he modified his campaign practices this time," Robertson said. "What we're going to find out in the next several days is whether or not Joe Biden's support is because of name ID and a positive feeling, especially among older African American voters. ... The other question you've got to ask is: How big a win does Biden need to have going into Super Tuesday? I don't know."

Jim Clyburn arrives for a meeting with other House Democrats at the Capitol last month. (J. Scott Applewhite/AP)

With momentum comes scrutiny.

House Majority Whip Jim Clyburn (S.C.), who is No. 3 in Democratic leadership and an ally of Speaker Nancy Pelosi, warned on the Sunday shows that Sanders and his brand of “socialism” could cost the party its House majority. “I think it would be a real burden for us in these states or congressional districts that we have to do well in,” Clyburn said on ABC’s “This Week.” “If you look at how well we did the last time [in 2018] and look at the congressional districts, these were not liberal or what you might call progressive districts. These were basically moderate and conservative districts that we did well in.” Clyburn announced that he will reveal his endorsement on Wednesday morning – after the debate. Politico reports that he plans to endorse Biden.

---

Quote of the day

"I don't see a whole lot of 2016 in this election. I see a whole lot of 1972," Clyburn told the Charleston Post & Courier, comparing Sanders to George McGovern.

Buttigieg, who finished third in Nevada, is running an attack ad in South Carolina against Sanders over Medicare-for-all. A narrator says Sanders would “eliminate private insurance” and kick “22 million seniors off of Medicare Advantage.” This is the first negative ad this election cycle that a Democrat has actually aired on television against a rival. “Senator Sanders’s revolution has the tenor of combat, division and polarization, a vision where whoever wins the day, nothing will change the toxic tone of our politics,” Buttigieg said Saturday night in Las Vegas.

While Mike Bloomberg bore the brunt of attacks last week in Las Vegas, Sanders will probably be the focus of the most attacks during Tuesday’s debate, which will air on CBS. But the collective action problem remains for the candidates who aspire to emerge as the main alternative to Sanders. Biden, Buttigieg, Warren, Klobuchar and Bloomberg, who does not appear on any ballots until Super Tuesday, all show no signs of backing down.

Biden's campaign stepped up attacks on Sunday against Sanders for flirting with a primary challenge against Barack Obama in 2012 and for not detailing how he'd pay for his ambitious plans. And Warren sharpened her criticisms of Sanders during a rally in Denver on Sunday night. "People ask about the difference between Bernie and me, because there are a lot of places where we agree about the things we want to fight for," she told a crowd of 4,000. "But here's a big [difference]: Bernie supports the filibuster. I'm going to get rid of the filibuster." During a gaggle with reporters afterward, though, Warren declined to call Sanders a "risky" choice for the nomination. Instead, she attacked Bloomberg.

Steyer is an X factor. He's qualified to appear onstage in Tuesday's debate and has made reparations for the descendants of slaves a centerpiece of his campaign.

Even though he doesn't actually lead in the statewide polls here, Sanders dominates the conversation among Democratic voters. He provokes strong passions, both positive and negative. Robyn Morgan, 41 of Pamplico, came to Warren's field office in Florence to go door-knocking with her 3-year-old daughter Hannah. She said she loves that "Warren has a plan for everything," especially universal childcare.

The student adviser at a small college complained that Sanders could never succeed with his temperament if he was a red-in-the-face female candidate. “Warren is so much less quote unquote ‘angry’ than Sanders, but people don’t see it that way because she’s a woman,” Morgan said. “In 2016, I didn’t think Sanders could ever survive the vetting process. But apparently that doesn’t seem to matter anymore. ... Everything he stands for fits on a hat, but what it takes to run our government doesn’t fit on a hat.”

Michael Rahenkemp, 62 of Florence, phone-banked for Warren at her Florence field office. The retired computer programmer said he strongly supports Medicare-for-all and Sanders is his second choice. “But I think she has a better set of policies,” he said. “He’s a democratic socialist whereas Warren is more of a capitalist, and I support capitalism.”

Rep. Ayanna Pressley (D-Mass.) is the only member of the self-described Squad of first-term women of color who didn’t endorse Sanders. She’s become one of Warren’s most visible surrogates and barnstormed Sunday across what’s known as the Pee Dee region in the northeast corner of South Carolina. Speaking to 18 canvassers as they prepared to knock on doors Sunday afternoon, Pressley emphasized that Warren is aspirational but has plans that are attainable – an apparent dig at Sanders. “People have broken hearts because of broken promise,” she said. “Elizabeth keeps her promises.” When I asked her whether liberals should rally behind Sanders to stop a more moderate candidate from securing the nomination – because Warren hasn’t won a delegate since Iowa – Pressley replied: “I believe she’s the most electable. ... We’re not riding the pollercoaster.”

Ayanna Pressley, right, greets volunteers at Elizabeth Warren's field office on Sunday afternoon in Florence, S.C. (James Hohmann/The Washington Post)

Only 35 percent of likely Democratic primary voters in the CBS poll of South Carolina said they're very confident that Democrats will nominate someone who can beat President Trump. Regardless of who they support, asked who has the best chance to beat Trump, Sanders still finished second, trailing Biden 33 percent to 23 percent. The poll found that 37 percent of likely South Carolina voters said Sanders's policy positions are too liberal to defeat Trump, compared to 49 percent who said his stances are about right for defeating Trump. Respondents were asked who has impressed them in the most recent debates and could pick multiple options. Sanders was first, impressing 43 percent, followed by Warren at 41 percent and Biden at 35 percent.

While his rivals focus on him, Sanders's stump speech has stayed as focused as ever on criticizing Trump. He opened a rally in Houston on Sunday afternoon by raising the electability question. "Some of the folks in the corporate media are getting a little bit nervous, and they say Bernie can't beat Trump," he told a crowd of more than 6,200. The front-runner then read the results of a few recent polls that showed him beating both Trump nationally and in states like Michigan, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin.

The audience of 120 people who came to see West and Ellison in Columbia on Saturday night was split almost evenly between white and black voters. “A lot of politicians don’t want to be seen as radical because they want to keep their positions, but Bernie has been doing this his way since before I was born,” said Eric Johnson, 34, a graphic designer in Columbia who is African American and has attended three Sanders rallies in the last eight months. “Now we hear the term ‘socialism’ thrown around. Nobody really knows what it is. There’s no set definition of democratic socialism. How is it that negative? It’s like the term ‘Bernie Bros’ and how that’s a term that’s been twisted to mean something negative.”

Janet Bates, 62, a Democratic middle school teacher in Columbia who is white and voted for George W. Bush two decades ago supports Sanders because she admires his ideological consistency. “I haven’t always believed in everything he’s stood for, but it’s probably 90 percent,” she said. “Even his detractors would agree he’s exactly the same person he was decades ago.”

South Carolina is not fertile ground for Buttigieg.

He's running into some of the same problems that Sanders did four years ago related to a dearth of black support. Last night's forum in Conway put this into stark relief. Rep. Anthony Brown (D-Md.), a national co-chair of his campaign, spent Sunday visiting black churches. After the emcee introduced him as a surrogate for "Boot-um-egg," Brown falsely claimed that Buttigieg was campaigning in a different part of the state (in fact, he was in Northern Virginia) and then made the case that Sanders, without naming him, would "jeopardize" down-ballot candidates.

"We're up against a president who is quite formidable," he said. "The candidates don't differ a lot on the issues. ... But Americans are yearning for a new face."

Robertson, the state party chairman, had emphasized how much more diverse South Carolina is than Iowa and New Hampshire during his introductory remarks. Noting Buttigieg's success in those two states, Brown pointed toward him and said: "Let's not discount Iowa and New Hampshire because they are Americans too!"

Then Brown spent two minutes complaining about distortions related to Buttigieg's relationship with the black community as mayor in South Bend, Ind. "If you're a young black man in South Bend, now listen close, because you've heard a lot of disinformation, the chances of you being convicted for marijuana possession are lower than anywhere else in Indiana and lower than the American average," he said.

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost's essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

More on 2020

Inside each campaign's Super Tuesday strategy

Sanders hopes to twist the knife by picking off either Massachusetts (Warren's home state) and/or Minnesota (Klobuchar's home state) a week from tomorrow, which would be paralyzing blows for either of them. He's expected to hold an event in both states between now and Super Tuesday. The biggest of the 14 prizes on March 3 are California and Texas. All told, approximately one-third of the nearly 4,000 pledged delegates to the convention will be awarded. "Sanders's money and organization have allowed him to spend weeks punctuating visits to early-voting states with trips to Super Tuesday states — most notably delegate-heavy California, where rival campaigns believe he will be difficult to beat," Chelsea Janes, Annie Linskey and Matt Viser report.

"The goal for Buttigieg's campaign on Super Tuesday is to accumulate enough delegates to stay within striking distance of Sanders. Campaign advisers say if he is close Super Tuesday, states voting March 10 and 17 — including Michigan, Ohio, Arizona and Illinois — are favorable enough to Buttigieg to allow him to make up ground. ... Last week, Buttigieg squeezed in a trip to Salt Lake City, where his campaign has made a major organizing push and earned endorsements from several local officials. His campaign also is counting on delegate-rich areas in some of the less high-profile Super Tuesday states — Little Rock, for one. He campaigned in Northern Virginia Sunday and has stops scheduled in Raleigh, N.C., and Oklahoma City before Super Tuesday. ...

"Warren is banking her candidacy on the idea that she can begin accumulating delegates on March 3 by doing well in liberal pockets like Denver, San Antonio and the Los Angeles area. Over the next few days, Warren will campaign in South Carolina, but she also plans a Thursday evening rally in San Antonio with Julián Castro, the former mayor of that city, and a stop in the Los Angeles area. Warren's campaign has bought TV ad time in Colorado and Maine. The campaign also will air ads starting Tuesday in Austin, San Antonio and Oklahoma City — all population-rich areas in Super Tuesday states. ...

“Klobuchar had to ramp up her national operation more hurriedly than her competitors ... She stopped by Colorado this week and headed to her home state to raise money Saturday — followed by a Sunday three-state tour via charter plane: Fargo to Oklahoma City to Little Rock. (North Dakota votes a week after Oklahoma and Arkansas, Super Tuesday states.) ... Several Super Tuesday states, including Virginia, Arkansas, Tennessee, North Carolina and Alabama, have substantial numbers of black voters. But Biden has not been advertising in those states and, while he is already well known, the lack of visibility could be problematic at a time when Bloomberg is flooding the airwaves.”

Internal polling and analytics completed last week by Bloomberg’s campaign projected that Sanders may be the only presidential candidate to win delegates in every state and district on March 3, delivering him a lead of 350 to 400 out of 1,357 delegates set to be awarded, unless race dynamics change, Mike DeBonis and Michael Scherer reported in the Sunday newspaper. “Because of Democratic rules that give no delegates to candidates who scores less than 15 percent of the vote in a state or congressional district, Sanders could build a delegate lead far greater than his advantage in the popular vote.”

New surveys show Sanders leading in three key Midwestern states that vote after Super Tuesday.

The University of Wisconsin at Madison-YouGov surveys of likely Democratic primary voters showed Sanders garnering 25 percent in Michigan, which holds its primary on March 10. His nearest competitor was Biden, with 16 percent. In Wisconsin, which votes on April 7, Sanders led with 30 percent. Biden and Bloomberg trailed with 13 percent. And in Pennsylvania, Sanders led with 25 percent, followed by Biden at 20 percent and Bloomberg at 19 percent. That primary is April 28. “Sanders is well positioned to pick up the lion’s share of delegates in these states unless another Democrat breaks away from the pack to challenge him,” said UW-Madison political science Barry Burden, who runs the Elections

Research Center.

Buttigieg's campaign alleged numerous errors in Nevada's vote counting.

But the state Democratic Party rebuffed a request from Buttigieg's campaign to hold off releasing final numbers, which showed him in third place behind Biden. (Isaac Stanley-Becker)

Harry Reid, the former Senate majority leader from Nevada, said in a statement last night that caucuses should no longer be used to nominate candidates. He repeated his call for Nevada to hold a primary before Iowa or New Hampshire vote, emphasizing the Silver State's diversity.

Bloomberg will postpone a CNN town hall to focus on debate prep.

“Bloomberg was scheduled to appear on CNN on Monday. But he'll now join the network for the live question-and-answer program on Wednesday,” the Associated Press reports. “A spokeswoman for Bloomberg called the debate ‘crucial’ and said ‘the country can’t afford to let Bernie Sanders skate by another debate without a focus on his extreme record.’”

Trump will hold a campaign rally in North Charleston the night before the South Carolina Democratic primary, per the Post and Courier.

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

---

The Trump presidency

President Trump takes the stage with his wife and the Indian prime minister for a “Namaste Trump” rally at Sardar Patel Stadium in Ahmedabad, India. (Alex Brandon/AP)

Trump is visiting India for the first time as president.

The whirlwind 36-hour tour “includes a mega rally expected to draw more than 100,000 people, a visit to the Taj Mahal, and a day of ceremonies and meetings in Delhi. Trump was greeted by Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi, whom Trump recently described as ‘a friend of mine,’” Niha Masih, Joanna Slater, Seung Min Kim and Anne Gearan report. “The Modi government has encountered considerable international criticism — including from members of Congress — over its crackdown in Kashmir, India’s only Muslim-majority state, and the passage of a controversial religion-based citizenship bill that has led to protests throughout the country. In the run-up to the trip, a senior White House official said Trump would raise the issue of religious freedom with Modi in private. ...

“Thousands of people lined the streets of Ahmedabad, the largest city in the state of Gujarat, to welcome Trump. Trump had said earlier that as many as 10 million people would be there to greet him. Preparations included building a wall to hide a slum along his route.” Trump and Modi

lavished praise on each other during a joint rally at the world's largest cricket stadium before an audience of 100,000. On stage, Trump announced that “the United States and India are poised to sign a new agreement to sell $3 billion worth of U.S. military helicopters to the Indian armed forces as he touted a ‘critical partnership’ between the two countries.”

“Upon arriving in Agra to visit the Taj Mahal, Trump met Yogi Adityanath, a radical Hindu monk known for his anti-Muslim rhetoric. The two shook hands and walked down the red carpet lined with performers. Adityanath is the chief minister of India's largest and most populous state, Uttar Pradesh, where Agra is located. Ahead of the meeting, critics decried the scheduled interaction, which they said could help legitimize Adityanath's divisive politics. The saffron-robed priest is a five-time parliamentarian who has more than a dozen criminal cases pending against him, including serious charges such as attempted murder and rioting. He has not been convicted of a crime. ... In 2014, Adityanath promised to cleanse India of other religions.”

Mick Mulvaney didn't go on the trip because of a cold, sources said. A person close to Mulvaney told CNN that White House doctors advised against having him travel in such close proximity to Trump.

Trump, a known steak-lover, is in for a beef-free menu in India. “I don't know what he's going to do in this case,” a former official told CNN. “They don't serve cheeseburgers.” A person close to the president said that, aside from a few salads here and there, they “have never seen him eat a vegetable.”

Trump's response to reports that Russia prefers him in 2020 has shaken the intelligence community.

“Current and former national security officials were appalled but not surprised by [Joe] Maguire's unceremonious dispatch,” Shane Harris, Ellen Nakashima and Josh Dawsey report. “Intelligence officers are used to working with presidents who don't enthusiastically embrace or always agree with their analysis. But Trump's tendency to shoot the messenger puts the people working for him in a precarious position. ‘The intelligence community at this point is having to walk a tightrope,’ [said Katrina Mulligan, a former National Security Council aide under the Obama administration]. ... Three other former senior intelligence officials said that Trump’s violent reactions could encourage his advisers to withhold unsettling information. There is talk of ‘trying to hide’ stuff, one of the former officials said ... Current and former intelligence officials see [Rick] Grenell’s appointment, which he has said will last only until a permanent director is confirmed by the Senate, as a signal that Trump intends to exert more political control over the intelligence community.”

National security adviser, Robert C. O’Brien, claimed he has not seen any intelligence that Russia wants to help Trump: “But O’Brien said reports that Russia is helping Sanders were ‘no surprise’ ... As intelligence officials struggle to draw attention to election interference, Trump is purging the ranks of advisers he believes won’t strongly defend him. Johnny McEntee, the new head of the White House Presidential Personnel Office, has asked agencies to tell him about appointees who are opposed to the president, according to a White House official.”

Trump threatened Adam Schiff.

The president claimed without evidence that the Democratic chairman of the House Intelligence Committee leaked details from Shelby Pierson’s briefing that led to Maguire’s ouster. “Someday he will be caught, & that will be a very unpleasant experience!” Trump tweeted. In another tweet, Trump jokingly suggested that former special counsel Bob Mueller should be dispatched to investigate the claims that Russia is seeking to help Sanders win the Democratic nomination. “Trump maintained in an exchange with reporters outside the White House earlier Sunday that he had not been briefed about any Russian interference efforts,” Felicia Sonmez reports. “He blamed Schiff and said there should be an investigation into the source of the leak.”

The White House wants to overhaul spy laws, partly due to Trump’s anger over the investigation of a former ## adviser.

“The effort seeks to take advantage of the looming expiration of some spying powers next month, including portions of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, a Watergate-era law that Mr. Trump believes was improperly used to target his campaign,” the Wall Street Journal reports. “Overhauling FISA has become a rallying cry for conservatives and allies of the president in the aftermath of a watchdog report detailing several errors made by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in its applications for surveillance of Mr. Trump’s campaign adviser, Carter Page. Some Republicans have called for upending FISA, prompting pushback from some in the administration, including Attorney General William Barr. The plan, which is being spearheaded by officials within the White House Domestic Policy Council, is in the early stages and could face resistance from other parts of the Trump administration, including the National Security Council, which has generally advocated maintaining or expanding surveillance powers during Mr. Trump’s presidency.”

Judge Amy Berman Jackson rejected Roger Stone’s effort to disqualify her.

“The federal judge who oversaw [his] trial and sentenced him last week to 40 months in prison dismissed his demand that she be taken off the case as a baseless smear,” Rachel Weiner reports. “Stone’s motion sought to disqualify Berman Jackson for referring during Thursday’s sentencing to ‘the jurors who served with integrity under difficult circumstances.’ He is still challenging one juror as biased. Berman Jackson rebutted any claim that she has not treated Stone fairly.”

Justice Clarence Thomas's wife has worked to identify “deep state” members who are “disloyal” to Trump.

“The Trump White House and its allies, over the past 18 months, assembled detailed lists of disloyal government officials to oust — and trusted pro-Trump people to replace them,” Axios reports. “Members of this network include [Ginni Thomas] and Republican Senate staffer Barbara Ledeen. ... Thomas has spent a significant amount of time and energy urging Trump administration officials to change the personnel inside his government. ... The presidential personnel office reviewed Thomas' memo and determined that some names she passed along for jobs were not appropriate candidates.” Leeden wrote a memo arguing why former D.C. U.S. attorney Jessie Liu should be disqualified for a nomination to a top Treasury job. Thomas, meanwhile, compiled names of potential nominees for different positions, many sourced from meetings with her conservative activist network Groundswell. Potential hires she offered to Trump include: Sheriff David Clarke for a senior DHS job, radio talk show host Chris Plante for press secretary, and Federalist contributor Ben Weingarten for the National Security Council.

Trump, eyeing Nevada, opposed a nuclear waste site at Yucca, reversing his own administration's policy.

“Why should you have nuclear waste in your backyard?’ Mr. Trump asked the crowd at a rally in Las Vegas on Friday, to applause, noting that his recently released budget proposal did not include funding to license the site, as previous ones had,” the Times reports. “In Mr. Trump’s decentralized administration, top aides and agency leaders have sometimes pursued their own agendas, at times creating politically perilous situations for him. ... The president made his latest move after a monthslong policy debate inside the White House over finally breaking with support for Yucca ... Nationally, Republicans have long favored the proposal ... But Nevada politicians of both parties have remained steadfastly opposed to the policy, which is deeply unpopular in the state.”

---

The new world order

A newlywed couple wear protective masks as they take wedding photos in Hong Kong. (Tyrone Siu/Reuters)

China postponed its most important political gathering of the year because of the coronavirus.

“China’s ruling Communist Party has postponed the biggest event in China’s political calendar, the National People’s Congress, as it concentrates on fighting the coronavirus,” Anna Fifield and Liu Yang report. “The annual legislative session, held together with a meeting of the party’s top political-advisory body, was due to begin on March 5. But the NPC’s Standing Committee decided at a meeting in Beijing on Monday that they would be delayed. It did not set a date for the meetings, known collectively as the ‘Two Sessions.’ It will be the first time since 1997 that the meetings have not started in the first week of March.”

President Xi Jinping said that the outbreak is a crisis that will test the Chinese economy. “No victory should be lightly announced until there is a complete win,” he said during a speech to Communist Party members in Beijing on Sunday, adding the situation remains grim and complex.

China backtracked on a decision to relax travel

restrictions on Wuhan.

“A notice by Wuhan’s epidemic prevention and control headquarters said Monday that it would ease some of the more draconian travel restrictions on the locked-down city at the heart of the epidemic, allowing for the return of some residents trapped outside Wuhan since late January and permitting visitors stuck in the city to leave. But hours later, Wuhan’s city government declared the earlier announcement invalid, saying it had been released without authorization,” Adam Taylor reports. “Official figures released Monday showed there had been 409 new cases of the novel coronavirus and 150 new deaths from the outbreak by the end of Sunday, bringing the total confirmed cases to 77,150 with a cumulative death toll of 2,592.”

A Chinese study suggests that the outbreak didn’t begin at a Wuhan market.

“Co-authored by researchers from three Chinese institutions including the Chinese Academy of Sciences and published on the academy’s website last Thursday, the study attempts to trace how the virus emerged and evolved. The authors analyzed the genomic data from 93 samples of the novel coronavirus and concluded that it was likely to have spread to the market from somewhere else,” Tiffany Liang reports. “It also pointed out that human-to-human transmission of the virus might have existed in Wuhan as early as late November. The market was closed on Jan. 1.”

South Korea temporarily shut down the messianic church linked to half of the country’s virus cases.

“More than half of South Korea’s covid-19 cases have been traced to a regional branch of the secretive Shincheonji Church of Jesus, formally known as the Temple of the Tabernacle of the Testimony. But authorities were having difficulty locating members, many of whom are probably in hiding,” Min Joo Kim reports. “The South Korean government on Sunday announced 169 new coronavirus cases and two more deaths, bringing the totals to 602 cases and six deaths. ... South Korean President Moon Jae-in said the country’s coronavirus crisis has entered a ‘totally different phase since the mass infection at Shincheonji.’ Hundreds of thousands signed a petition calling for the church to be dissolved. Moon called the temporary shutdown of Shincheonji churches across the country ‘a fair and inevitable step’ to protect the community. He said there was ‘no intention to limit religious freedom.’”

Fifty people reportedly died of coronavirus in the Iranian city of Qom.

The country’s health minister rejected the report from Iranian lawmaker Ahmad Amirabadi Farahani, who claimed that the government is covering up the full extent of the outbreak. (The Guardian)

The U.S. government backtracked on a plan to transfer quarantined patients to Alabama.

Hours after Anniston County's City Council voted on Sunday to pursue legal action against the federal government over its proposal to transfer patients from the Diamond Princess cruise ship to be held in the town's FEMA facility, Sen. Richard Shelby (R) and Gov. Kay Ivey (R) announced that plans had changed. Ivey said Trump called and assured her that the patients wouldn't be sent to Alabama, ABC News reports.

Hong Kong refugees traverse a legal twilight zone as they build their new lives in Taiwan.

“Che-lam Presbyterian Church is next door to Taiwan's legislature and a stone's throw from the presidential office in the island's capital. But while President Tsai Ing-wen's support for Hong Kong protesters powered her to reelection last month, the church is Taiwan's only institution to publicly provide material assistance to people who have fled the Asian financial hub's crackdown on demonstrators,” Nick Aspinwall reports. “Although Taiwan has temporarily barred entry to most Hong Kongers amid the coronavirus outbreak, many in Hong Kong view the island as a place to resettle should their political strife worsen. ... Taiwan, which is not a member of the United Nations, has not signed the U.N. Refugee Convention and has no formal asylum laws. Its government processes people from Hong Kong on a case-by-case basis but provides no public assurance of their long-term legal status, leading to concerns that the uncertainty creates gaps for protesters to be exploited.”

Israel’s fear of coronavirus contagion grows as election day approaches.

The concern comes after “reports that a group of South Koreans who had visited some of the country's most popular religious and tourist spots tested positive for the infection,” Steve Hendrix reports. “Israeli officials, who had expressed cautious optimism that Israel could avoid significant risk from the global epidemic, immediately increased restrictions on those entering the country. Non-Israeli travelers from South Korea and Japan have been barred from entering, according to local media reports, and Israelis arriving from any of several Asian countries face two weeks of mandatory quarantine.”

Israeli military jets targeted sites in Gaza and Syria linked to Palestinian Islamic Jihad.

The attacks came “hours after militants from the group fired more than 20 rockets into Israeli territory,” Ruth Eglash and Hazem Balousha report. “The exchange came after a Palestinian news agency posted graphic footage of an Israeli army bulldozer dragging the body of a Palestinian man who Israel said was part of a ‘terror squad,’ killed as he placed an explosive device along the border fence. ... The Israeli strikes injured four in Gaza, according to the Palestinian Ministry of Health.”

Malaysian Prime Minister Mahatir Mohamad, the world’s oldest national leader, resigned.

“Under Malaysia’s constitution, the entire cabinet must be dissolved if the prime minister resigns,” Shibani Mahtani and Jonathan Edward report. “As the prime minister’s office announced Mahathir’s intent to resign, his political party, the Malaysian United Indigenous Party, known as Bersatu, said it would be leaving Malaysia’s ruling coalition. About a dozen other prominent members of parliament also left to form an independent bloc in the Southeast Asian country’s legislature. The king, Sultan Abdullah of Pahang, has not commented publicly on the matter. The political drama on Monday appeared to thwart one of Southeast Asia's most celebrated democratic transitions, and returned Malaysia to a time of backdoor political plotting and palace intrigue. The move also appeared aimed at preventing [Anwar Ibrahim] from taking over as leader."

In Greece, migrants wait in bread lines while tourists dine on grilled octopus next door.

"At the Moria refugee camp on Lesbos, the largest of the island facilities, migrants wait in snaking lines for up to eight hours a day to get their meals," Chico Harlan reports. "They wait because this camp has mushroomed in size, growing seven times more crowded than its capacity, a shantytown on a vacation island never intended for such emergencies ... One migrant said the food was worse than at her former workplace, an Afghan prison. ... Yet beyond the camp, closer to the water, locals and tourists are eating well. Lesbos's tavernas serve octopus, grilled squid, feta, vegetables dressed with lemon and olive oil. That jarring juxtaposition is part of what makes the camp 'one of the worst places I've seen on earth,' said Marco Sandrone, the Lesbos field coordinator for Doctors Without Borders."

The U.K.'s new post-Brexit passports will be distributed next month.

What the the Home Office didn't say, however, was that the passports will be made by a Franco-Dutch company at a Polish factory under E.U. procurement rules, the Times reports.

Harry and Meghan won't be able to use the brand

"SussexRoyal" in any territories. The couple, which will become independent from the crown on March 31, appeared upset at the palace's ban on the use of the word "royal." (The Guardian)

Prague renamed the square in front of the Russian embassy after the slain Putin critic Boris Nemtsov. (CNN)

Prosecutors say a former DEA agent laundered millions for a Colombian cartel.

“Jose Irizarry was the model agent for his bosses at the Drug Enforcement Administration. Seen as a rising star in Miami for overseeing undercover investigations that led to dozens of drug arrests, Irizarry transferred to the Colombian city of Cartagena to continue to fight the violent cartel. ... But when the DEA special agent allegedly began to spend lavishly on homes, cars and jewelry, and hosted wild yacht parties with bikini-clad prostitutes, it raised some red flags within the agency,” Timothy Bella reports. “As it turns out, Irizarry allegedly laundered money for the very Colombian drug cartel he was fighting against. Irizarry, 46, was arrested Friday at his home near San Juan, Puerto Rico, on charges of conspiring to launder money, as well as honest services wire fraud, bank fraud, conspiracy to commit bank fraud, conspiracy to commit identity theft and aggravated identity theft. ... Irizarry, who resigned in early 2018 after the agency grew suspicious, is believed to have laundered more than $7 million.”

---

Social media speed read

Sanders’s partial defense of Fidel Castro on CBS's “60 Minutes” drew widespread criticism from conservatives in Florida:

Marco Rubio ✓

@marcorubio

Likely Dem nominee praised the supposed
“achievements” Castro regime

And he’s wrong about why people didn’t overthrow Castro. It’s not because “he educated their kids,gave them health care” it’s because his opponents were jailed,murdered or exiled cbsnews.com/news/bernie-sa...

Bernie Sanders on being the Democratic frontrunn...

Coming off his win in the Nevada caucuses, Bernie Sanders
talks about Michael Bloomberg, Donald Trump, Democratic cbsnews.com

♥ 4,436 3:13 AM - Feb 24, 2020

💬 2,423 people are talking about this

Former presidential candidate Marianne Williamson endorsed Sanders:

Emma Kinery ✓
@EmmaKinery

“Surprise guest” and native Texan Marianne Williamson endorses Bernie Sanders for president at his rally in Austin, TX

♥ 12.2K 11:11 PM - Feb 23, 2020

💬 2.123 people are talking about this

And love led a Sanders supporter to a Warren rally:

Jess Bidgood

@jessbidgood

A happy couple at the @ewarren rally in Denver

♥ 22 11:30 PM - Feb 23, 2020

See Jess Bidgood's other Tweets

Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) responded playfully to a report in the New York Post that noted he's spent over $8,600 at Junior's Cheesecake over the past decade, mostly to buy gifts using campaign funds:

The Hill
@thehill

"Guilty as charged... it's my guilty pleasure."

WATCH: Sen. Chuck Schumer admits to spending thousands on cheesecake and serves cheesecake to members of the press in a lighthearted moment.

♥ 196 1:13 AM - Feb 24, 2020

💬 81 people are talking about this

Videos of the day

John Oliver talked about India's Modi:

“The Daily Show” offered an interesting service to former presidential candidates:

And a California couple that went missing on Valentine's Day was found alive on Saturday by a search dog named Groot:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Carolyn Hax for Post columnist Carolyn Hax's latest advice column every day. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Bernie Sanders built a diverse coalition to win Nevada. South Carolina offers a tougher test.
Date: Monday, February 24, 2020 10:46:05 AM

Powered by LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Uber

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

Bernie Sanders built a diverse coalition to win Nevada. South Carolina offers a tougher test.

COLUMBIA, S.C. – As Bernie Sanders cruised to a landslide victory in the Nevada caucuses on Saturday, Keith Ellison told volunteers here that a win in South Carolina’s primary would make the senator’s path to the Democratic presidential nomination essentially unstoppable. “We’re going to break it out,” he said, banging his hand on a table for emphasis.

Ellison, a former congressman who is now Minnesota’s attorney general after running unsuccessfully to be chairman of the Democratic National Committee in 2017, warmed up a crowd of 120 at a Sanders rally in the fellowship hall at First Calvary Baptist Church. Next up was Sanders surrogate scholar-activist Cornel West, who was downright triumphal.

“The corporate media is telling lies about my dear brother Bernie Sanders: They call him a Bolshevik. That’s what they said about my brother Martin Luther King Jr.,” West said to a chorus of amens. “Get ready to get lied on, rebuked, scorned, attacked, assaulted. ... In some ways, that’s a compliment. It means they’ve got to take us seriously now. It also means that we’ve got momentum. And once you let that genie out, there ain’t no putting it back in.”

A field organizer announced that Sanders volunteers had knocked on 11,000 doors in South Carolina that day, and there was a palpable feeling in the room that their movement is on the cusp of taking over the Democratic Party.

It was a totally different vibe than four years ago for the independent senator from Vermont. After Sanders won the New Hampshire primary by 22 points in 2016, he lost the Nevada caucuses to Hillary Clinton by 5 points and then got trounced in the South Carolina primary by 47 points. The Sanders effort dragged on for three more months, but the crushing defeat here – which showed that he couldn’t break Clinton’s firewall with African Americans – was the beginning of the end.

Cornel West speaks Saturday in Columbia. (James Hohmann/The Washington Post)

Ellison and West stumped together for Sanders in 2016. But what made this event feel quite different was the presence of several African American state legislators who didn't endorse him four years ago. State Rep. Leon Howard, who chairs a state House committee that oversees public hospitals, talked about how much Medicare-for-all might help his constituents. "We have a real opportunity to win this election," he said. "South Carolina is the slingshot that will propel Senator Sanders to the White House," added state Rep. Ivory Thigpen.

Sanders supporter April Jones, 36, a stay-at-home mom in Columbia, said a lot of people here who reflexively backed Clinton last time are giving Sanders a serious look. "It's like if you're dating somebody," she explained. "You come back around a second time and you're like, 'Oh, I'm going to give you some new eyes because I kind of know you from before.' ... We're in even more of a crisis economically, in terms of inequality being so much worse, and he talked about all these same issues last time. Four years ago, people said his ideas were too radical, but now they're all mainstream positions, so people kind of see him as a visionary.”

Sanders’s sweeping win in the Silver State was powered by large numbers of first-time caucus-goers. He won 51 percent of Hispanics, 29 percent of whites and 27 percent of African Americans, according to entrance polls of Democratic caucus-goers. Sanders got the support of 2 in 3 voters under 30 years old and carried every age group except those over 65, which went for Joe Biden. “In Nevada, we have just put together a multigenerational, multiracial coalition,” Sanders said during a rally in San Antonio after he was declared the winner. “It is going to sweep this country.”

First, though, all the candidates are sweeping into South Carolina. After trying to lower expectations for the better part of a year, Sanders is now playing to win in the Palmetto State and plans to invest heavily in hopes of knocking out Biden. After a televised debate in Charleston with all his rivals on Tuesday night, Sanders is scheduled to hold rallies in North Charleston and Myrtle Beach on Wednesday, Spartanburg on Thursday and Columbia on Friday, where he’ll speak on the steps of the state capitol. He is airing commercials in every media market.

More than half the Democratic electorate this Saturday will be African American. In 2016, exit polls show that Clinton won 86 percent of the black vote in South Carolina. Biden won 39 percent of black voters in Nevada on Saturday, 12 points better than Sanders. But that represented a major improvement for Sanders, who got only 22 percent of the black vote against Clinton in a two-way race there in 2016.

Biden remains the favorite to win this first-in-the-South primary on Saturday, but Sanders is nipping at the former vice president's heels. A CBS News-YouGov poll released Sunday puts Biden at 28 percent among likely voters, down 17 points from last month, with Sanders at 23 percent, up 8 points. Tom Steyer, the billionaire who didn't qualify for last week's debate but has spent more time and money in South Carolina than any other candidate, polled in third place, with 18 percent, followed by Sen. Elizabeth Warren (Mass.) at 12 percent, former South Bend, Ind., mayor Pete Buttigieg at 10 percent and Sen. Amy Klobuchar (Minn.) at 4 percent. The poll found that 46 percent of likely voters say they've definitely made up their minds, 45 percent said they've probably made up their minds and 7 percent said they'll probably end up changing their minds between now and the primary.

Biden is making what could be a last stand. He hopes that a win in South Carolina after his second-place finish in Nevada will give him momentum in the Southern states with large black populations that vote on March 3. "The African American community in South Carolina can make a judgment about who the next president of the United States is going to be," Biden told congregants on Sunday at the Royal Missionary Baptist Church in North Charleston. "Literally!"

I drove nearly 500 miles around South Carolina this weekend to take the pulse of the Democratic electorate, and the polling tracks with what I found anecdotally in more than two dozen interviews.

"Bernie Sanders obviously learned a lot from his loss here in 2016," said Trav Robertson Jr., the chairman of the South Carolina Democratic Party. "In 2016, they'd only come for groups that were 3,000 people or bigger. They transitioned into realizing that they've got to visit smaller communities of color. ... That's paying off for him, especially among younger African American voters."

We chatted Sunday night in Conway after a two-hour forum for candidate surrogates at the Mason Temple Church of God in Christ. Robertson, who is neutral, said Our Revolution, the outside group created to boost Sanders after 2016, has been organizing in this state nonstop since the last presidential election. He said that group, combined with the campaign's early investments in a field program, is an important part of the story for why Sanders has made "a hell of a lot of headway."

"Sanders, to a certain extent, has held true to his core values for 40 years, but he modified his campaign practices this time," Robertson said. "What we're going to find out in the next several days is whether or not Joe Biden's support is because of name ID and a positive feeling, especially among older African American voters. ... The other question you've got to ask is: How big a win does Biden need to have going into Super Tuesday? I don't know."

Jim Clyburn arrives for a meeting with other House Democrats at the Capitol last month. (J. Scott Applewhite/AP)

With momentum comes scrutiny.

House Majority Whip Jim Clyburn (S.C.), who is No. 3 in Democratic leadership and an ally of Speaker Nancy Pelosi, warned on the Sunday shows that Sanders and his brand of “socialism” could cost the party its House majority. “I think it would be a real burden for us in these states or congressional districts that we have to do well in,” Clyburn said on ABC’s “This Week.” “If you look at how well we did the last time [in 2018] and look at the congressional districts, these were not liberal or what you might call progressive districts. These were basically moderate and conservative districts that we did well in.” Clyburn announced that he will reveal his endorsement on Wednesday morning – after the debate. Politico reports that he plans to endorse Biden.

---

Quote of the day

“I don’t see a whole lot of 2016 in this election. I see a whole lot of 1972,” Clyburn told the Charleston Post & Courier, comparing Sanders to George McGovern.

Buttigieg, who finished third in Nevada, is running an attack ad in South Carolina against Sanders over Medicare-for-all. A narrator says Sanders would “eliminate private insurance” and kick “22 million seniors off of Medicare Advantage.” This is the first negative ad this election cycle that a Democrat has actually aired on television against a rival. “Senator Sanders’s revolution has the tenor of combat, division and polarization, a vision where whoever wins the day, nothing will change the toxic tone of our politics,” Buttigieg said Saturday night in Las Vegas.

While Mike Bloomberg bore the brunt of attacks last week in Las Vegas, Sanders will probably be the focus of the most attacks during Tuesday’s debate, which will air on CBS. But the collective action problem remains for the candidates who aspire to emerge as the main alternative to Sanders. Biden, Buttigieg, Warren, Klobuchar and Bloomberg, who does not appear on any ballots until Super Tuesday, all show no signs of backing down.

Biden's campaign stepped up attacks on Sunday against Sanders for flirting with a primary challenge against Barack Obama in 2012 and for not detailing how he'd pay for his ambitious plans. And Warren sharpened her criticisms of Sanders during a rally in Denver on Sunday night. "People ask about the difference between Bernie and me, because there are a lot of places where we agree about the things we want to fight for," she told a crowd of 4,000. "But here's a big [difference]: Bernie supports the filibuster. I'm going to get rid of the filibuster." During a gaggle with reporters afterward, though, Warren declined to call Sanders a "risky" choice for the nomination. Instead, she attacked Bloomberg.

Steyer is an X factor. He's qualified to appear onstage in Tuesday's debate and has made reparations for the descendants of slaves a centerpiece of his campaign.

Even though he doesn't actually lead in the statewide polls here, Sanders dominates the conversation among Democratic voters. He provokes strong passions, both positive and negative. Robyn Morgan, 41 of Pamplico, came to Warren's field office in Florence to go door-knocking with her 3-year-old daughter Hannah. She said she loves that "Warren has a plan for everything," especially universal childcare.

The student adviser at a small college complained that Sanders could never succeed with his temperament if he was a red-in-the-face female candidate. “Warren is so much less quote unquote ‘angry’ than Sanders, but people don’t see it that way because she’s a woman,” Morgan said. “In 2016, I didn’t think Sanders could ever survive the vetting process. But apparently that doesn’t seem to matter anymore. ... Everything he stands for fits on a hat, but what it takes to run our government doesn’t fit on a hat.”

Michael Rahenkemp, 62 of Florence, phone-banked for Warren at her Florence field office. The retired computer programmer said he strongly supports Medicare-for-all and Sanders is his second choice. “But I think she has a better set of policies,” he said. “He’s a democratic socialist whereas Warren is more of a capitalist, and I support capitalism.”

Rep. Ayanna Pressley (D-Mass.) is the only member of the self-described Squad of first-term women of color who didn’t endorse Sanders. She’s become one of Warren’s most visible surrogates and barnstormed Sunday across what’s known as the Pee Dee region in the northeast corner of South Carolina. Speaking to 18 canvassers as they prepared to knock on doors Sunday afternoon, Pressley emphasized that Warren is aspirational but has plans that are attainable – an apparent dig at Sanders. “People have broken hearts because of broken promise,” she said. “Elizabeth keeps her promises.” When I asked her whether liberals should rally behind Sanders to stop a more moderate candidate from securing the nomination – because Warren hasn’t won a delegate since Iowa – Pressley replied: “I believe she’s the most electable. ... We’re not riding the pollercoaster.”

Ayanna Pressley, right, greets volunteers at Elizabeth Warren's field office on Sunday afternoon in Florence, S.C. (James Hohmann/The Washington Post)

Only 35 percent of likely Democratic primary voters in the CBS poll of South Carolina said they're very confident that Democrats will nominate someone who can beat President Trump. Regardless of who they support, asked who has the best chance to beat Trump, Sanders still finished second, trailing Biden 33 percent to 23 percent. The poll found that 37 percent of likely South Carolina voters said Sanders's policy positions are too liberal to defeat Trump, compared to 49 percent who said his stances are about right for defeating Trump. Respondents were asked who has impressed them in the most recent debates and could pick multiple options. Sanders was first, impressing 43 percent, followed by Warren at 41 percent and Biden at 35 percent.

While his rivals focus on him, Sanders's stump speech has stayed as focused as ever on criticizing Trump. He opened a rally in Houston on Sunday afternoon by raising the electability question. "Some of the folks in the corporate media are getting a little bit nervous, and they say Bernie can't beat Trump," he told a crowd of more than 6,200. The front-runner then read the results of a few recent polls that showed him beating both Trump nationally and in states like Michigan, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin.

The audience of 120 people who came to see West and Ellison in Columbia on Saturday night was split almost evenly between white and black voters. “A lot of politicians don’t want to be seen as radical because they want to keep their positions, but Bernie has been doing this his way since before I was born,” said Eric Johnson, 34, a graphic designer in Columbia who is African American and has attended three Sanders rallies in the last eight months. “Now we hear the term ‘socialism’ thrown around. Nobody really knows what it is. There’s no set definition of democratic socialism. How is it that negative? It’s like the term ‘Bernie Bros’ and how that’s a term that’s been twisted to mean something negative.”

Janet Bates, 62, a Democratic middle school teacher in Columbia who is white and voted for George W. Bush two decades ago supports Sanders because she admires his ideological consistency. “I haven’t always believed in everything he’s stood for, but it’s probably 90 percent,” she said. “Even his detractors would agree he’s exactly the same person he was decades ago.”

South Carolina is not fertile ground for Buttigieg.

He's running into some of the same problems that Sanders did four years ago related to a dearth of black support. Last night's forum in Conway put this into stark relief. Rep. Anthony Brown (D-Md.), a national co-chair of his campaign, spent Sunday visiting black churches. After the emcee introduced him as a surrogate for "Boot-um-egg," Brown falsely claimed that Buttigieg was campaigning in a different part of the state (in fact, he was in Northern Virginia) and then made the case that Sanders, without naming him, would "jeopardize" down-ballot candidates.

"We're up against a president who is quite formidable," he said. "The candidates don't differ a lot on the issues. ... But Americans are yearning for a new face."

Robertson, the state party chairman, had emphasized how much more diverse South Carolina is than Iowa and New Hampshire during his introductory remarks. Noting Buttigieg's success in those two states, Brown pointed toward him and said: "Let's not discount Iowa and New Hampshire because they are Americans too!"

Then Brown spent two minutes complaining about distortions related to Buttigieg's relationship with the black community as mayor in South Bend, Ind. "If you're a young black man in South Bend, now listen close, because you've heard a lot of disinformation, the chances of you being convicted for marijuana possession are lower than anywhere else in Indiana and lower than the American average," he said.

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost's essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

More on 2020

Inside each campaign's Super Tuesday strategy

Sanders hopes to twist the knife by picking off either Massachusetts (Warren's home state) and/or Minnesota (Klobuchar's home state) a week from tomorrow, which would be paralyzing blows for either of them. He's expected to hold an event in both states between now and Super Tuesday. The biggest of the 14 prizes on March 3 are California and Texas. All told, approximately one-third of the nearly 4,000 pledged delegates to the convention will be awarded. "Sanders's money and organization have allowed him to spend weeks punctuating visits to early-voting states with trips to Super Tuesday states — most notably delegate-heavy California, where rival campaigns believe he will be difficult to beat," Chelsea Janes, Annie Linskey and Matt Viser report.

"The goal for Buttigieg's campaign on Super Tuesday is to accumulate enough delegates to stay within striking distance of Sanders. Campaign advisers say if he is close Super Tuesday, states voting March 10 and 17 — including Michigan, Ohio, Arizona and Illinois — are favorable enough to Buttigieg to allow him to make up ground. ... Last week, Buttigieg squeezed in a trip to Salt Lake City, where his campaign has made a major organizing push and earned endorsements from several local officials. His campaign also is counting on delegate-rich areas in some of the less high-profile Super Tuesday states — Little Rock, for one. He campaigned in Northern Virginia Sunday and has stops scheduled in Raleigh, N.C., and Oklahoma City before Super Tuesday. ...

"Warren is banking her candidacy on the idea that she can begin accumulating delegates on March 3 by doing well in liberal pockets like Denver, San Antonio and the Los Angeles area. Over the next few days, Warren will campaign in South Carolina, but she also plans a Thursday evening rally in San Antonio with Julián Castro, the former mayor of that city, and a stop in the Los Angeles area. Warren's campaign has bought TV ad time in Colorado and Maine. The campaign also will air ads starting Tuesday in Austin, San Antonio and Oklahoma City — all population-rich areas in Super Tuesday states. ...

“Klobuchar had to ramp up her national operation more hurriedly than her competitors ... She stopped by Colorado this week and headed to her home state to raise money Saturday — followed by a Sunday three-state tour via charter plane: Fargo to Oklahoma City to Little Rock. (North Dakota votes a week after Oklahoma and Arkansas, Super Tuesday states.) ... Several Super Tuesday states, including Virginia, Arkansas, Tennessee, North Carolina and Alabama, have substantial numbers of black voters. But Biden has not been advertising in those states and, while he is already well known, the lack of visibility could be problematic at a time when Bloomberg is flooding the airwaves.”

Internal polling and analytics completed last week by Bloomberg’s campaign projected that Sanders may be the only presidential candidate to win delegates in every state and district on March 3, delivering him a lead of 350 to 400 out of 1,357 delegates set to be awarded, unless race dynamics change, Mike DeBonis and Michael Scherer reported in the Sunday newspaper. “Because of Democratic rules that give no delegates to candidates who scores less than 15 percent of the vote in a state or congressional district, Sanders could build a delegate lead far greater than his advantage in the popular vote.”

New surveys show Sanders leading in three key Midwestern states that vote after Super Tuesday.

The University of Wisconsin at Madison-YouGov surveys of likely Democratic primary voters showed Sanders garnering 25 percent in Michigan, which holds its primary on March 10. His nearest competitor was Biden, with 16 percent. In Wisconsin, which votes on April 7, Sanders led with 30 percent. Biden and Bloomberg trailed with 13 percent. And in Pennsylvania, Sanders led with 25 percent, followed by Biden at 20 percent and Bloomberg at 19 percent. That primary is April 28. “Sanders is well positioned to pick up the lion’s share of delegates in these states unless another Democrat breaks away from the pack to challenge him,” said UW-Madison political science Barry Burden, who runs the Elections

Research Center.

Buttigieg's campaign alleged numerous errors in Nevada's vote counting.

But the state Democratic Party rebuffed a request from Buttigieg's campaign to hold off releasing final numbers, which showed him in third place behind Biden. (Isaac Stanley-Becker)

Harry Reid, the former Senate majority leader from Nevada, said in a statement last night that caucuses should no longer be used to nominate candidates. He repeated his call for Nevada to hold a primary before Iowa or New Hampshire vote, emphasizing the Silver State's diversity.

Bloomberg will postpone a CNN town hall to focus on debate prep.

“Bloomberg was scheduled to appear on CNN on Monday. But he'll now join the network for the live question-and-answer program on Wednesday,” the Associated Press reports. “A spokeswoman for Bloomberg called the debate ‘crucial’ and said ‘the country can’t afford to let Bernie Sanders skate by another debate without a focus on his extreme record.’”

Trump will hold a campaign rally in North Charleston the night before the South Carolina Democratic primary, per the Post and Courier.

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

---

The Trump presidency

President Trump takes the stage with his wife and the Indian prime minister for a “Namaste Trump” rally at Sardar Patel Stadium in Ahmedabad, India. (Alex Brandon/AP)

Trump is visiting India for the first time as president.

The whirlwind 36-hour tour “includes a mega rally expected to draw more than 100,000 people, a visit to the Taj Mahal, and a day of ceremonies and meetings in Delhi. Trump was greeted by Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi, whom Trump recently described as ‘a friend of mine,’” Niha Masih, Joanna Slater, Seung Min Kim and Anne Gearan report. “The Modi government has encountered considerable international criticism — including from members of Congress — over its crackdown in Kashmir, India’s only Muslim-majority state, and the passage of a controversial religion-based citizenship bill that has led to protests throughout the country. In the run-up to the trip, a senior White House official said Trump would raise the issue of religious freedom with Modi in private. ...

“Thousands of people lined the streets of Ahmedabad, the largest city in the state of Gujarat, to welcome Trump. Trump had said earlier that as many as 10 million people would be there to greet him. Preparations included building a wall to hide a slum along his route.” Trump and Modi

lavished praise on each other during a joint rally at the world's largest cricket stadium before an audience of 100,000. On stage, Trump announced that “the United States and India are poised to sign a new agreement to sell $3 billion worth of U.S. military helicopters to the Indian armed forces as he touted a ‘critical partnership’ between the two countries.”

“Upon arriving in Agra to visit the Taj Mahal, Trump met Yogi Adityanath, a radical Hindu monk known for his anti-Muslim rhetoric. The two shook hands and walked down the red carpet lined with performers. Adityanath is the chief minister of India's largest and most populous state, Uttar Pradesh, where Agra is located. Ahead of the meeting, critics decried the scheduled interaction, which they said could help legitimize Adityanath's divisive politics. The saffron-robed priest is a five-time parliamentarian who has more than a dozen criminal cases pending against him, including serious charges such as attempted murder and rioting. He has not been convicted of a crime. ... In 2014, Adityanath promised to cleanse India of other religions.”

Mick Mulvaney didn't go on the trip because of a cold, sources said. A person close to Mulvaney told CNN that White House doctors advised against having him travel in such close proximity to Trump.

Trump, a known steak-lover, is in for a beef-free menu in India. “I don't know what he's going to do in this case,” a former official told CNN. “They don't serve cheeseburgers.” A person close to the president said that, aside from a few salads here and there, they “have never seen him eat a vegetable.”

Trump's response to reports that Russia prefers him in 2020 has shaken the intelligence community.

“Current and former national security officials were appalled but not surprised by [Joe] Maguire's unceremonious dispatch,” Shane Harris, Ellen Nakashima and Josh Dawsey report. “Intelligence officers are used to working with presidents who don't enthusiastically embrace or always agree with their analysis. But Trump's tendency to shoot the messenger puts the people working for him in a precarious position. ‘The intelligence community at this point is having to walk a tightrope,’ [said Katrina Mulligan, a former National Security Council aide under the Obama administration]. ... Three other former senior intelligence officials said that Trump’s violent reactions could encourage his advisers to withhold unsettling information. There is talk of ‘trying to hide’ stuff, one of the former officials said ... Current and former intelligence officials see [Rick] Grenell’s appointment, which he has said will last only until a permanent director is confirmed by the Senate, as a signal that Trump intends to exert more political control over the intelligence community.”

National security adviser, Robert C. O’Brien, claimed he has not seen any intelligence that Russia wants to help Trump: “But O’Brien said reports that Russia is helping Sanders were ‘no surprise’ ... As intelligence officials struggle to draw attention to election interference, Trump is purging the ranks of advisers he believes won’t strongly defend him. Johnny McEntee, the new head of the White House Presidential Personnel Office, has asked agencies to tell him about appointees who are opposed to the president, according to a White House official.”

Trump threatened Adam Schiff.

The president claimed without evidence that the Democratic chairman of the House Intelligence Committee leaked details from Shelby Pierson’s briefing that led to Maguire’s ouster. “Someday he will be caught, & that will be a very unpleasant experience!” Trump tweeted. In another tweet, Trump jokingly suggested that former special counsel Bob Mueller should be dispatched to investigate the claims that Russia is seeking to help Sanders win the Democratic nomination. “Trump maintained in an exchange with reporters outside the White House earlier Sunday that he had not been briefed about any Russian interference efforts,” Felicia Sonmez reports. “He blamed Schiff and said there should be an investigation into the source of the leak.”

The White House wants to overhaul spy laws, partly due to Trump’s anger over the investigation of a former ## adviser.

“The effort seeks to take advantage of the looming expiration of some spying powers next month, including portions of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, a Watergate-era law that Mr. Trump believes was improperly used to target his campaign,” the Wall Street Journal reports. “Overhauling FISA has become a rallying cry for conservatives and allies of the president in the aftermath of a watchdog report detailing several errors made by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in its applications for surveillance of Mr. Trump’s campaign adviser, Carter Page. Some Republicans have called for upending FISA, prompting pushback from some in the administration, including Attorney General William Barr. The plan, which is being spearheaded by officials within the White House Domestic Policy Council, is in the early stages and could face resistance from other parts of the Trump administration, including the National Security Council, which has generally advocated maintaining or expanding surveillance powers during Mr. Trump’s presidency.”

Judge Amy Berman Jackson rejected Roger Stone’s effort to disqualify her.

“The federal judge who oversaw [his] trial and sentenced him last week to 40 months in prison dismissed his demand that she be taken off the case as a baseless smear,” Rachel Weiner reports. “Stone’s motion sought to disqualify Berman Jackson for referring during Thursday’s sentencing to ‘the jurors who served with integrity under difficult circumstances.’ He is still challenging one juror as biased. Berman Jackson rebutted any claim that she has not treated Stone fairly.”

Justice Clarence Thomas's wife has worked to identify “deep state” members who are “disloyal” to Trump.

“The Trump White House and its allies, over the past 18 months, assembled detailed lists of disloyal government officials to oust — and trusted pro-Trump people to replace them,” Axios reports. “Members of this network include [Ginni Thomas] and Republican Senate staffer Barbara Ledeen. ... Thomas has spent a significant amount of time and energy urging Trump administration officials to change the personnel inside his government. ... The presidential personnel office reviewed Thomas' memo and determined that some names she passed along for jobs were not appropriate candidates.” Leeden wrote a memo arguing why former D.C. U.S. attorney Jessie Liu should be disqualified for a nomination to a top Treasury job. Thomas, meanwhile, compiled names of potential nominees for different positions, many sourced from meetings with her conservative activist network Groundswell. Potential hires she offered to Trump include: Sheriff David Clarke for a senior DHS job, radio talk show host Chris Plante for press secretary, and Federalist contributor Ben Weingarten for the National Security Council.

Trump, eyeing Nevada, opposed a nuclear waste site at Yucca, reversing his own administration's policy.

“Why should you have nuclear waste in your backyard?’ Mr. Trump asked the crowd at a rally in Las Vegas on Friday, to applause, noting that his recently released budget proposal did not include funding to license the site, as previous ones had,” the Times reports. “In Mr. Trump’s decentralized administration, top aides and agency leaders have sometimes pursued their own agendas, at times creating politically perilous situations for him. ... The president made his latest move after a monthslong policy debate inside the White House over finally breaking with support for Yucca ... Nationally, Republicans have long favored the proposal ... But Nevada politicians of both parties have remained steadfastly opposed to the policy, which is deeply unpopular in the state.”

---

The new world order

A newlywed couple wear protective masks as they take wedding photos in Hong Kong. (Tyrone Siu/Reuters)

China postponed its most important political gathering of the year because of the coronavirus.

“China’s ruling Communist Party has postponed the biggest event in China’s political calendar, the National People’s Congress, as it concentrates on fighting the coronavirus,” Anna Fifield and Liu Yang report. “The annual legislative session, held together with a meeting of the party’s top political-advisory body, was due to begin on March 5. But the NPC’s Standing Committee decided at a meeting in Beijing on Monday that they would be delayed. It did not set a date for the meetings, known collectively as the ‘Two Sessions.’ It will be the first time since 1997 that the meetings have not started in the first week of March.”

President Xi Jinping said that the outbreak is a crisis that will test the Chinese economy. “No victory should be lightly announced until there is a complete win,” he said during a speech to Communist Party members in Beijing on Sunday, adding the situation remains grim and complex.

China backtracked on a decision to relax travel

restrictions on Wuhan.

“A notice by Wuhan’s epidemic prevention and control headquarters said Monday that it would ease some of the more draconian travel restrictions on the locked-down city at the heart of the epidemic, allowing for the return of some residents trapped outside Wuhan since late January and permitting visitors stuck in the city to leave. But hours later, Wuhan’s city government declared the earlier announcement invalid, saying it had been released without authorization,” Adam Taylor reports. “Official figures released Monday showed there had been 409 new cases of the novel coronavirus and 150 new deaths from the outbreak by the end of Sunday, bringing the total confirmed cases to 77,150 with a cumulative death toll of 2,592.”

A Chinese study suggests that the outbreak didn’t begin at a Wuhan market.

“Co-authored by researchers from three Chinese institutions including the Chinese Academy of Sciences and published on the academy’s website last Thursday, the study attempts to trace how the virus emerged and evolved. The authors analyzed the genomic data from 93 samples of the novel coronavirus and concluded that it was likely to have spread to the market from somewhere else,” Tiffany Liang reports. “It also pointed out that human-to-human transmission of the virus might have existed in Wuhan as early as late November. The market was closed on Jan. 1.”

South Korea temporarily shut down the messianic church linked to half of the country’s virus cases.

“More than half of South Korea’s covid-19 cases have been traced to a regional branch of the secretive Shincheonji Church of Jesus, formally known as the Temple of the Tabernacle of the Testimony. But authorities were having difficulty locating members, many of whom are probably in hiding,” Min Joo Kim reports. “The South Korean government on Sunday announced 169 new coronavirus cases and two more deaths, bringing the totals to 602 cases and six deaths. ... South Korean President Moon Jae-in said the country’s coronavirus crisis has entered a ‘totally different phase since the mass infection at Shincheonji.’ Hundreds of thousands signed a petition calling for the church to be dissolved. Moon called the temporary shutdown of Shincheonji churches across the country ‘a fair and inevitable step’ to protect the community. He said there was ‘no intention to limit religious freedom.’”

Fifty people reportedly died of coronavirus in the Iranian city of Qom.

The country’s health minister rejected the report from Iranian lawmaker Ahmad Amirabadi Farahani, who claimed that the government is covering up the full extent of the outbreak. (The Guardian)

The U.S. government backtracked on a plan to transfer quarantined patients to Alabama.

Hours after Anniston County's City Council voted on Sunday to pursue legal action against the federal government over its proposal to transfer patients from the Diamond Princess cruise ship to be held in the town's FEMA facility, Sen. Richard Shelby (R) and Gov. Kay Ivey (R) announced that plans had changed. Ivey said Trump called and assured her that the patients wouldn't be sent to Alabama, ABC News reports.

Hong Kong refugees traverse a legal twilight zone as they build their new lives in Taiwan.

“Che-lam Presbyterian Church is next door to Taiwan's legislature and a stone's throw from the presidential office in the island's capital. But while President Tsai Ing-wen's support for Hong Kong protesters powered her to reelection last month, the church is Taiwan's only institution to publicly provide material assistance to people who have fled the Asian financial hub's crackdown on demonstrators,” Nick Aspinwall reports. “Although Taiwan has temporarily barred entry to most Hong Kongers amid the coronavirus outbreak, many in Hong Kong view the island as a place to resettle should their political strife worsen. ... Taiwan, which is not a member of the United Nations, has not signed the U.N. Refugee Convention and has no formal asylum laws. Its government processes people from Hong Kong on a case-by-case basis but provides no public assurance of their long-term legal status, leading to concerns that the uncertainty creates gaps for protesters to be exploited.”

Israel’s fear of coronavirus contagion grows as election day approaches.

The concern comes after “reports that a group of South Koreans who had visited some of the country's most popular religious and tourist spots tested positive for the infection,” Steve Hendrix reports. “Israeli officials, who had expressed cautious optimism that Israel could avoid significant risk from the global epidemic, immediately increased restrictions on those entering the country. Non-Israeli travelers from South Korea and Japan have been barred from entering, according to local media reports, and Israelis arriving from any of several Asian countries face two weeks of mandatory quarantine.”

Israeli military jets targeted sites in Gaza and Syria linked to Palestinian Islamic Jihad.

The attacks came “hours after militants from the group fired more than 20 rockets into Israeli territory,” Ruth Eglash and Hazem Balousha report. “The exchange came after a Palestinian news agency posted graphic footage of an Israeli army bulldozer dragging the body of a Palestinian man who Israel said was part of a ‘terror squad,’ killed as he placed an explosive device along the border fence. ... The Israeli strikes injured four in Gaza, according to the Palestinian Ministry of Health.”

Malaysian Prime Minister Mahatir Mohamad, the world’s oldest national leader, resigned.

“Under Malaysia’s constitution, the entire cabinet must be dissolved if the prime minister resigns,” Shibani Mahtani and Jonathan Edward report. “As the prime minister’s office announced Mahathir’s intent to resign, his political party, the Malaysian United Indigenous Party, known as Bersatu, said it would be leaving Malaysia’s ruling coalition. About a dozen other prominent members of parliament also left to form an independent bloc in the Southeast Asian country’s legislature. The king, Sultan Abdullah of Pahang, has not commented publicly on the matter. The political drama on Monday appeared to thwart one of Southeast Asia's most celebrated democratic transitions, and returned Malaysia to a time of backdoor political plotting and palace intrigue. The move also appeared aimed at preventing [Anwar Ibrahim] from taking over as leader."

In Greece, migrants wait in bread lines while tourists dine on grilled octopus next door.

"At the Moria refugee camp on Lesbos, the largest of the island facilities, migrants wait in snaking lines for up to eight hours a day to get their meals," Chico Harlan reports. "They wait because this camp has mushroomed in size, growing seven times more crowded than its capacity, a shantytown on a vacation island never intended for such emergencies ... One migrant said the food was worse than at her former workplace, an Afghan prison. ... Yet beyond the camp, closer to the water, locals and tourists are eating well. Lesbos's tavernas serve octopus, grilled squid, feta, vegetables dressed with lemon and olive oil. That jarring juxtaposition is part of what makes the camp 'one of the worst places I've seen on earth,' said Marco Sandrone, the Lesbos field coordinator for Doctors Without Borders."

The U.K.'s new post-Brexit passports will be distributed next month.

What the the Home Office didn't say, however, was that the passports will be made by a Franco-Dutch company at a Polish factory under E.U. procurement rules, the Times reports.

Harry and Meghan won't be able to use the brand

"SussexRoyal" in any territories. The couple, which will become independent from the crown on March 31, appeared upset at the palace's ban on the use of the word "royal." (The Guardian)

Prague renamed the square in front of the Russian embassy after the slain Putin critic Boris Nemtsov. (CNN)

Prosecutors say a former DEA agent laundered millions for a Colombian cartel.

“Jose Irizarry was the model agent for his bosses at the Drug Enforcement Administration. Seen as a rising star in Miami for overseeing undercover investigations that led to dozens of drug arrests, Irizarry transferred to the Colombian city of Cartagena to continue to fight the violent cartel. ... But when the DEA special agent allegedly began to spend lavishly on homes, cars and jewelry, and hosted wild yacht parties with bikini-clad prostitutes, it raised some red flags within the agency,” Timothy Bella reports. “As it turns out, Irizarry allegedly laundered money for the very Colombian drug cartel he was fighting against. Irizarry, 46, was arrested Friday at his home near San Juan, Puerto Rico, on charges of conspiring to launder money, as well as honest services wire fraud, bank fraud, conspiracy to commit bank fraud, conspiracy to commit identity theft and aggravated identity theft. ... Irizarry, who resigned in early 2018 after the agency grew suspicious, is believed to have laundered more than $7 million.”

---

Social media speed read

Sanders’s partial defense of Fidel Castro on CBS's “60 Minutes” drew widespread criticism from conservatives in Florida:

Marco Rubio ✓

@marcorubio

Likely Dem nominee praised the supposed
“achievements” Castro regime

And he’s wrong about why people didn’t overthrow Castro. It’s not because “he educated their kids,gave them health care” it’s because his opponents were jailed,murdered or exiled cbsnews.com/news/bernie-sa...

Bernie Sanders on being the Democratic frontrunn...

Coming off his win in the Nevada caucuses, Bernie Sanders
talks about Michael Bloomberg, Donald Trump, Democratic cbsnews.com

♥ 4,436 3:13 AM - Feb 24, 2020

💬 2,423 people are talking about this

Former presidential candidate Marianne Williamson endorsed Sanders:

Emma Kinery ✓
@EmmaKinery

“Surprise guest” and native Texan Marianne Williamson endorses Bernie Sanders for president at his rally in Austin, TX

♥ 12.2K 11:11 PM - Feb 23, 2020

💬 2.123 people are talking about this

And love led a Sanders supporter to a Warren rally:

Jess Bidgood

@jessbidgood

A happy couple at the @ewarren rally in Denver

♥ 22 11:30 PM - Feb 23, 2020

See Jess Bidgood's other Tweets

Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) responded playfully to a report in the New York Post that noted he's spent over $8,600 at Junior's Cheesecake over the past decade, mostly to buy gifts using campaign funds:

The Hill
@thehill

"Guilty as charged... it's my guilty pleasure."

WATCH: Sen. Chuck Schumer admits to spending thousands on cheesecake and serves cheesecake to members of the press in a lighthearted moment.

♥ 196 1:13 AM - Feb 24, 2020

💬 81 people are talking about this

Videos of the day

John Oliver talked about India's Modi:

“The Daily Show” offered an interesting service to former presidential candidates:

And a California couple that went missing on Valentine's Day was found alive on Saturday by a search dog named Groot:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Carolyn Hax for Post columnist Carolyn Hax's latest advice column every day. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Bernie Sanders built a diverse coalition to win Nevada. South Carolina offers a tougher test.
Date: Monday, February 24, 2020 10:48:00 AM

Powered by LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Uber

By James Hohmann

with Mariana Alfaro

Email

Bernie Sanders built a diverse coalition to win Nevada. South Carolina offers a tougher test.

COLUMBIA, S.C. – As Bernie Sanders cruised to a landslide victory in the Nevada caucuses on Saturday, Keith Ellison told volunteers here that a win in South Carolina’s primary would make the senator’s path to the Democratic presidential nomination essentially unstoppable. “We’re going to break it out,” he said, banging his hand on a table for emphasis.

Ellison, a former congressman who is now Minnesota’s attorney general after running unsuccessfully to be chairman of the Democratic National Committee in 2017, warmed up a crowd of 120 at a Sanders rally in the fellowship hall at First Calvary Baptist Church. Next up was Sanders surrogate scholar-activist Cornel West, who was downright triumphal.

“The corporate media is telling lies about my dear brother Bernie Sanders: They call him a Bolshevik. That’s what they said about my brother Martin Luther King Jr.,” West said to a chorus of amens. “Get ready to get lied on, rebuked, scorned, attacked, assaulted. ... In some ways, that’s a compliment. It means they’ve got to take us seriously now. It also means that we’ve got momentum. And once you let that genie out, there ain’t no putting it back in.”

A field organizer announced that Sanders volunteers had knocked on 11,000 doors in South Carolina that day, and there was a palpable feeling in the room that their movement is on the cusp of taking over the Democratic Party.

It was a totally different vibe than four years ago for the independent senator from Vermont. After Sanders won the New Hampshire primary by 22 points in 2016, he lost the Nevada caucuses to Hillary Clinton by 5 points and then got trounced in the South Carolina primary by 47 points. The Sanders effort dragged on for three more months, but the crushing defeat here – which showed that he couldn’t break Clinton’s firewall with African Americans – was the beginning of the end.

Cornel West speaks Saturday in Columbia. (James Hohmann/The Washington Post)

Ellison and West stumped together for Sanders in 2016. But what made this event feel quite different was the presence of several African American state legislators who didn't endorse him four years ago. State Rep. Leon Howard, who chairs a state House committee that oversees public hospitals, talked about how much Medicare-for-all might help his constituents. "We have a real opportunity to win this election," he said. "South Carolina is the slingshot that will propel Senator Sanders to the White House," added state Rep. Ivory Thigpen.

Sanders supporter April Jones, 36, a stay-at-home mom in Columbia, said a lot of people here who reflexively backed Clinton last time are giving Sanders a serious look. "It's like if you're dating somebody," she explained. "You come back around a second time and you're like, 'Oh, I'm going to give you some new eyes because I kind of know you from before.' ... We're in even more of a crisis economically, in terms of inequality being so much worse, and he talked about all these same issues last time. Four years ago, people said his ideas were too radical, but now they're all mainstream positions, so people kind of see him as a visionary.”

Sanders’s sweeping win in the Silver State was powered by large numbers of first-time caucus-goers. He won 51 percent of Hispanics, 29 percent of whites and 27 percent of African Americans, according to entrance polls of Democratic caucus-goers. Sanders got the support of 2 in 3 voters under 30 years old and carried every age group except those over 65, which went for Joe Biden. “In Nevada, we have just put together a multigenerational, multiracial coalition,” Sanders said during a rally in San Antonio after he was declared the winner. “It is going to sweep this country.”

First, though, all the candidates are sweeping into South Carolina. After trying to lower expectations for the better part of a year, Sanders is now playing to win in the Palmetto State and plans to invest heavily in hopes of knocking out Biden. After a televised debate in Charleston with all his rivals on Tuesday night, Sanders is scheduled to hold rallies in North Charleston and Myrtle Beach on Wednesday, Spartanburg on Thursday and Columbia on Friday, where he’ll speak on the steps of the state capitol. He is airing commercials in every media market.

More than half the Democratic electorate this Saturday will be African American. In 2016, exit polls show that Clinton won 86 percent of the black vote in South Carolina. Biden won 39 percent of black voters in Nevada on Saturday, 12 points better than Sanders. But that represented a major improvement for Sanders, who got only 22 percent of the black vote against Clinton in a two-way race there in 2016.

Biden remains the favorite to win this first-in-the-South primary on Saturday, but Sanders is nipping at the former vice president's heels. A CBS News-YouGov poll released Sunday puts Biden at 28 percent among likely voters, down 17 points from last month, with Sanders at 23 percent, up 8 points. Tom Steyer, the billionaire who didn't qualify for last week's debate but has spent more time and money in South Carolina than any other candidate, polled in third place, with 18 percent, followed by Sen. Elizabeth Warren (Mass.) at 12 percent, former South Bend, Ind., mayor Pete Buttigieg at 10 percent and Sen. Amy Klobuchar (Minn.) at 4 percent. The poll found that 46 percent of likely voters say they've definitely made up their minds, 45 percent said they've probably made up their minds and 7 percent said they'll probably end up changing their minds between now and the primary.

Biden is making what could be a last stand. He hopes that a win in South Carolina after his second-place finish in Nevada will give him momentum in the Southern states with large black populations that vote on March 3. "The African American community in South Carolina can make a judgment about who the next president of the United States is going to be," Biden told congregants on Sunday at the Royal Missionary Baptist Church in North Charleston. "Literally!"

I drove nearly 500 miles around South Carolina this weekend to take the pulse of the Democratic electorate, and the polling tracks with what I found anecdotally in more than two dozen interviews.

"Bernie Sanders obviously learned a lot from his loss here in 2016," said Trav Robertson Jr., the chairman of the South Carolina Democratic Party. "In 2016, they'd only come for groups that were 3,000 people or bigger. They transitioned into realizing that they've got to visit smaller communities of color. ... That's paying off for him, especially among younger African American voters."

We chatted Sunday night in Conway after a two-hour forum for candidate surrogates at the Mason Temple Church of God in Christ. Robertson, who is neutral, said Our Revolution, the outside group created to boost Sanders after 2016, has been organizing in this state nonstop since the last presidential election. He said that group, combined with the campaign's early investments in a field program, is an important part of the story for why Sanders has made "a hell of a lot of headway."

"Sanders, to a certain extent, has held true to his core values for 40 years, but he modified his campaign practices this time," Robertson said. "What we're going to find out in the next several days is whether or not Joe Biden's support is because of name ID and a positive feeling, especially among older African American voters. ... The other question you've got to ask is: How big a win does Biden need to have going into Super Tuesday? I don't know."

Jim Clyburn arrives for a meeting with other House Democrats at the Capitol last month. (J. Scott Applewhite/AP)

With momentum comes scrutiny.

House Majority Whip Jim Clyburn (S.C.), who is No. 3 in Democratic leadership and an ally of Speaker Nancy Pelosi, warned on the Sunday shows that Sanders and his brand of “socialism” could cost the party its House majority. “I think it would be a real burden for us in these states or congressional districts that we have to do well in,” Clyburn said on ABC’s “This Week.” “If you look at how well we did the last time [in 2018] and look at the congressional districts, these were not liberal or what you might call progressive districts. These were basically moderate and conservative districts that we did well in.” Clyburn announced that he will reveal his endorsement on Wednesday morning – after the debate. Politico reports that he plans to endorse Biden.

---

Quote of the day

"I don't see a whole lot of 2016 in this election. I see a whole lot of 1972," Clyburn told the Charleston Post & Courier, comparing Sanders to George McGovern.

Buttigieg, who finished third in Nevada, is running an attack ad in South Carolina against Sanders over Medicare-for-all. A narrator says Sanders would “eliminate private insurance” and kick “22 million seniors off of Medicare Advantage.” This is the first negative ad this election cycle that a Democrat has actually aired on television against a rival. “Senator Sanders’s revolution has the tenor of combat, division and polarization, a vision where whoever wins the day, nothing will change the toxic tone of our politics,” Buttigieg said Saturday night in Las Vegas.

While Mike Bloomberg bore the brunt of attacks last week in Las Vegas, Sanders will probably be the focus of the most attacks during Tuesday’s debate, which will air on CBS. But the collective action problem remains for the candidates who aspire to emerge as the main alternative to Sanders. Biden, Buttigieg, Warren, Klobuchar and Bloomberg, who does not appear on any ballots until Super Tuesday, all show no signs of backing down.

Biden's campaign stepped up attacks on Sunday against Sanders for flirting with a primary challenge against Barack Obama in 2012 and for not detailing how he'd pay for his ambitious plans. And Warren sharpened her criticisms of Sanders during a rally in Denver on Sunday night. "People ask about the difference between Bernie and me, because there are a lot of places where we agree about the things we want to fight for," she told a crowd of 4,000. "But here's a big [difference]: Bernie supports the filibuster. I'm going to get rid of the filibuster." During a gaggle with reporters afterward, though, Warren declined to call Sanders a "risky" choice for the nomination. Instead, she attacked Bloomberg.

Steyer is an X factor. He's qualified to appear onstage in Tuesday's debate and has made reparations for the descendants of slaves a centerpiece of his campaign.

Even though he doesn't actually lead in the statewide polls here, Sanders dominates the conversation among Democratic voters. He provokes strong passions, both positive and negative. Robyn Morgan, 41 of Pamplico, came to Warren's field office in Florence to go door-knocking with her 3-year-old daughter Hannah. She said she loves that "Warren has a plan for everything," especially universal childcare.

The student adviser at a small college complained that Sanders could never succeed with his temperament if he was a red-in-the-face female candidate. “Warren is so much less quote unquote ‘angry’ than Sanders, but people don’t see it that way because she’s a woman,” Morgan said. “In 2016, I didn’t think Sanders could ever survive the vetting process. But apparently that doesn’t seem to matter anymore. ... Everything he stands for fits on a hat, but what it takes to run our government doesn’t fit on a hat.”

Michael Rahenkemp, 62 of Florence, phone-banked for Warren at her Florence field office. The retired computer programmer said he strongly supports Medicare-for-all and Sanders is his second choice. “But I think she has a better set of policies,” he said. “He’s a democratic socialist whereas Warren is more of a capitalist, and I support capitalism.”

Rep. Ayanna Pressley (D-Mass.) is the only member of the self-described Squad of first-term women of color who didn’t endorse Sanders. She’s become one of Warren’s most visible surrogates and barnstormed Sunday across what’s known as the Pee Dee region in the northeast corner of South Carolina. Speaking to 18 canvassers as they prepared to knock on doors Sunday afternoon, Pressley emphasized that Warren is aspirational but has plans that are attainable – an apparent dig at Sanders. “People have broken hearts because of broken promise,” she said. “Elizabeth keeps her promises.” When I asked her whether liberals should rally behind Sanders to stop a more moderate candidate from securing the nomination – because Warren hasn’t won a delegate since Iowa – Pressley replied: “I believe she’s the most electable. ... We’re not riding the pollercoaster.”

Ayanna Pressley, right, greets volunteers at Elizabeth Warren's field office on Sunday afternoon in Florence, S.C. (James Hohmann/The Washington Post)

Only 35 percent of likely Democratic primary voters in the CBS poll of South Carolina said they're very confident that Democrats will nominate someone who can beat President Trump. Regardless of who they support, asked who has the best chance to beat Trump, Sanders still finished second, trailing Biden 33 percent to 23 percent. The poll found that 37 percent of likely South Carolina voters said Sanders's policy positions are too liberal to defeat Trump, compared to 49 percent who said his stances are about right for defeating Trump. Respondents were asked who has impressed them in the most recent debates and could pick multiple options. Sanders was first, impressing 43 percent, followed by Warren at 41 percent and Biden at 35 percent.

While his rivals focus on him, Sanders's stump speech has stayed as focused as ever on criticizing Trump. He opened a rally in Houston on Sunday afternoon by raising the electability question. "Some of the folks in the corporate media are getting a little bit nervous, and they say Bernie can't beat Trump," he told a crowd of more than 6,200. The front-runner then read the results of a few recent polls that showed him beating both Trump nationally and in states like Michigan, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin.

The audience of 120 people who came to see West and Ellison in Columbia on Saturday night was split almost evenly between white and black voters. “A lot of politicians don’t want to be seen as radical because they want to keep their positions, but Bernie has been doing this his way since before I was born,” said Eric Johnson, 34, a graphic designer in Columbia who is African American and has attended three Sanders rallies in the last eight months. “Now we hear the term ‘socialism’ thrown around. Nobody really knows what it is. There’s no set definition of democratic socialism. How is it that negative? It’s like the term ‘Bernie Bros’ and how that’s a term that’s been twisted to mean something negative.”

Janet Bates, 62, a Democratic middle school teacher in Columbia who is white and voted for George W. Bush two decades ago supports Sanders because she admires his ideological consistency. “I haven’t always believed in everything he’s stood for, but it’s probably 90 percent,” she said. “Even his detractors would agree he’s exactly the same person he was decades ago.”

South Carolina is not fertile ground for Buttigieg.

He's running into some of the same problems that Sanders did four years ago related to a dearth of black support. Last night's forum in Conway put this into stark relief. Rep. Anthony Brown (D-Md.), a national co-chair of his campaign, spent Sunday visiting black churches. After the emcee introduced him as a surrogate for "Boot-um-egg," Brown falsely claimed that Buttigieg was campaigning in a different part of the state (in fact, he was in Northern Virginia) and then made the case that Sanders, without naming him, would "jeopardize" down-ballot candidates.

"We're up against a president who is quite formidable," he said. "The candidates don't differ a lot on the issues. ... But Americans are yearning for a new face."

Robertson, the state party chairman, had emphasized how much more diverse South Carolina is than Iowa and New Hampshire during his introductory remarks. Noting Buttigieg's success in those two states, Brown pointed toward him and said: "Let's not discount Iowa and New Hampshire because they are Americans too!"

Then Brown spent two minutes complaining about distortions related to Buttigieg's relationship with the black community as mayor in South Bend, Ind. "If you're a young black man in South Bend, now listen close, because you've heard a lot of disinformation, the chances of you being convicted for marijuana possession are lower than anywhere else in Indiana and lower than the American average," he said.

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost's essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

More on 2020

Inside each campaign's Super Tuesday strategy

Sanders hopes to twist the knife by picking off either Massachusetts (Warren's home state) and/or Minnesota (Klobuchar's home state) a week from tomorrow, which would be paralyzing blows for either of them. He's expected to hold an event in both states between now and Super Tuesday. The biggest of the 14 prizes on March 3 are California and Texas. All told, approximately one-third of the nearly 4,000 pledged delegates to the convention will be awarded. "Sanders's money and organization have allowed him to spend weeks punctuating visits to early-voting states with trips to Super Tuesday states — most notably delegate-heavy California, where rival campaigns believe he will be difficult to beat," Chelsea Janes, Annie Linskey and Matt Viser report.

"The goal for Buttigieg's campaign on Super Tuesday is to accumulate enough delegates to stay within striking distance of Sanders. Campaign advisers say if he is close Super Tuesday, states voting March 10 and 17 — including Michigan, Ohio, Arizona and Illinois — are favorable enough to Buttigieg to allow him to make up ground. ... Last week, Buttigieg squeezed in a trip to Salt Lake City, where his campaign has made a major organizing push and earned endorsements from several local officials. His campaign also is counting on delegate-rich areas in some of the less high-profile Super Tuesday states — Little Rock, for one. He campaigned in Northern Virginia Sunday and has stops scheduled in Raleigh, N.C., and Oklahoma City before Super Tuesday. ...

"Warren is banking her candidacy on the idea that she can begin accumulating delegates on March 3 by doing well in liberal pockets like Denver, San Antonio and the Los Angeles area. Over the next few days, Warren will campaign in South Carolina, but she also plans a Thursday evening rally in San Antonio with Julián Castro, the former mayor of that city, and a stop in the Los Angeles area. Warren's campaign has bought TV ad time in Colorado and Maine. The campaign also will air ads starting Tuesday in Austin, San Antonio and Oklahoma City — all population-rich areas in Super Tuesday states. ...

“Klobuchar had to ramp up her national operation more hurriedly than her competitors ... She stopped by Colorado this week and headed to her home state to raise money Saturday — followed by a Sunday three-state tour via charter plane: Fargo to Oklahoma City to Little Rock. (North Dakota votes a week after Oklahoma and Arkansas, Super Tuesday states.) ... Several Super Tuesday states, including Virginia, Arkansas, Tennessee, North Carolina and Alabama, have substantial numbers of black voters. But Biden has not been advertising in those states and, while he is already well known, the lack of visibility could be problematic at a time when Bloomberg is flooding the airwaves.”

Internal polling and analytics completed last week by Bloomberg’s campaign projected that Sanders may be the only presidential candidate to win delegates in every state and district on March 3, delivering him a lead of 350 to 400 out of 1,357 delegates set to be awarded, unless race dynamics change, Mike DeBonis and Michael Scherer reported in the Sunday newspaper. “Because of Democratic rules that give no delegates to candidates who scores less than 15 percent of the vote in a state or congressional district, Sanders could build a delegate lead far greater than his advantage in the popular vote.”

New surveys show Sanders leading in three key Midwestern states that vote after Super Tuesday.

The University of Wisconsin at Madison-YouGov surveys of likely Democratic primary voters showed Sanders garnering 25 percent in Michigan, which holds its primary on March 10. His nearest competitor was Biden, with 16 percent. In Wisconsin, which votes on April 7, Sanders led with 30 percent. Biden and Bloomberg trailed with 13 percent. And in Pennsylvania, Sanders led with 25 percent, followed by Biden at 20 percent and Bloomberg at 19 percent. That primary is April 28. “Sanders is well positioned to pick up the lion’s share of delegates in these states unless another Democrat breaks away from the pack to challenge him,” said UW-Madison political science Barry Burden, who runs the Elections

Research Center.

Buttigieg's campaign alleged numerous errors in Nevada's vote counting.

But the state Democratic Party rebuffed a request from Buttigieg's campaign to hold off releasing final numbers, which showed him in third place behind Biden. (Isaac Stanley-Becker)

Harry Reid, the former Senate majority leader from Nevada, said in a statement last night that caucuses should no longer be used to nominate candidates. He repeated his call for Nevada to hold a primary before Iowa or New Hampshire vote, emphasizing the Silver State's diversity.

Bloomberg will postpone a CNN town hall to focus on debate prep.

"Bloomberg was scheduled to appear on CNN on Monday. But he'll now join the network for the live question-and-answer program on Wednesday," the Associated Press reports. "A spokeswoman for Bloomberg called the debate 'crucial' and said 'the country can't afford to let Bernie Sanders skate by another debate without a focus on his extreme record.'"

Trump will hold a campaign rally in North Charleston the night before the South Carolina Democratic primary, per the Post and Courier.

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

---

The Trump presidency

President Trump takes the stage with his wife and the Indian prime minister for a “Namaste Trump” rally at Sardar Patel Stadium in Ahmedabad, India. (Alex Brandon/AP)

Trump is visiting India for the first time as president.

The whirlwind 36-hour tour “includes a mega rally expected to draw more than 100,000 people, a visit to the Taj Mahal, and a day of ceremonies and meetings in Delhi. Trump was greeted by Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi, whom Trump recently described as ‘a friend of mine,’” Niha Masih, Joanna Slater, Seung Min Kim and Anne Gearan report. “The Modi government has encountered considerable international criticism — including from members of Congress — over its crackdown in Kashmir, India’s only Muslim-majority state, and the passage of a controversial religion-based citizenship bill that has led to protests throughout the country. In the run-up to the trip, a senior White House official said Trump would raise the issue of religious freedom with Modi in private. ...

“Thousands of people lined the streets of Ahmedabad, the largest city in the state of Gujarat, to welcome Trump. Trump had said earlier that as many as 10 million people would be there to greet him. Preparations included building a wall to hide a slum along his route.” Trump and Modi

lavished praise on each other during a joint rally at the world's largest cricket stadium before an audience of 100,000. On stage, Trump announced that “the United States and India are poised to sign a new agreement to sell $3 billion worth of U.S. military helicopters to the Indian armed forces as he touted a ‘critical partnership’ between the two countries.”

“Upon arriving in Agra to visit the Taj Mahal, Trump met Yogi Adityanath, a radical Hindu monk known for his anti-Muslim rhetoric. The two shook hands and walked down the red carpet lined with performers. Adityanath is the chief minister of India's largest and most populous state, Uttar Pradesh, where Agra is located. Ahead of the meeting, critics decried the scheduled interaction, which they said could help legitimize Adityanath's divisive politics. The saffron-robed priest is a five-time parliamentarian who has more than a dozen criminal cases pending against him, including serious charges such as attempted murder and rioting. He has not been convicted of a crime. ... In 2014, Adityanath promised to cleanse India of other religions.”

Mick Mulvaney didn't go on the trip because of a cold, sources said. A person close to Mulvaney told CNN that White House doctors advised against having him travel in such close proximity to Trump.

Trump, a known steak-lover, is in for a beef-free menu in India. “I don't know what he's going to do in this case,” a former official told CNN. “They don't serve cheeseburgers.” A person close to the president said that, aside from a few salads here and there, they “have never seen him eat a vegetable.”

Trump's response to reports that Russia prefers him in 2020 has shaken the intelligence community.

“Current and former national security officials were appalled but not surprised by [Joe] Maguire's unceremonious dispatch,” Shane Harris, Ellen Nakashima and Josh Dawsey report. “Intelligence officers are used to working with presidents who don't enthusiastically embrace or always agree with their analysis. But Trump's tendency to shoot the messenger puts the people working for him in a precarious position. ‘The intelligence community at this point is having to walk a tightrope,’ [said Katrina Mulligan, a former National Security Council aide under the Obama administration]. ... Three other former senior intelligence officials said that Trump’s violent reactions could encourage his advisers to withhold unsettling information. There is talk of ‘trying to hide’ stuff, one of the former officials said ... Current and former intelligence officials see [Rick] Grenell’s appointment, which he has said will last only until a permanent director is confirmed by the Senate, as a signal that Trump intends to exert more political control over the intelligence community.”

National security adviser, Robert C. O’Brien, claimed he has not seen any intelligence that Russia wants to help Trump: “But O’Brien said reports that Russia is helping Sanders were ‘no surprise’ ... As intelligence officials struggle to draw attention to election interference, Trump is purging the ranks of advisers he believes won’t strongly defend him. Johnny McEntee, the new head of the White House Presidential Personnel Office, has asked agencies to tell him about appointees who are opposed to the president, according to a White House official.”

Trump threatened Adam Schiff.

The president claimed without evidence that the Democratic chairman of the House Intelligence Committee leaked details from Shelby Pierson’s briefing that led to Maguire’s ouster. “Someday he will be caught, & that will be a very unpleasant experience!” Trump tweeted. In another tweet, Trump jokingly suggested that former special counsel Bob Mueller should be dispatched to investigate the claims that Russia is seeking to help Sanders win the Democratic nomination. “Trump maintained in an exchange with reporters outside the White House earlier Sunday that he had not been briefed about any Russian interference efforts,” Felicia Sonmez reports. “He blamed Schiff and said there should be an investigation into the source of the leak.”

The White House wants to overhaul spy laws, partly due to Trump’s anger over the investigation of a former ## adviser.

“The effort seeks to take advantage of the looming expiration of some spying powers next month, including portions of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, a Watergate-era law that Mr. Trump believes was improperly used to target his campaign,” the Wall Street Journal reports. “Overhauling FISA has become a rallying cry for conservatives and allies of the president in the aftermath of a watchdog report detailing several errors made by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in its applications for surveillance of Mr. Trump’s campaign adviser, Carter Page. Some Republicans have called for upending FISA, prompting pushback from some in the administration, including Attorney General William Barr. The plan, which is being spearheaded by officials within the White House Domestic Policy Council, is in the early stages and could face resistance from other parts of the Trump administration, including the National Security Council, which has generally advocated maintaining or expanding surveillance powers during Mr. Trump’s presidency.”

Judge Amy Berman Jackson rejected Roger Stone’s effort to disqualify her.

“The federal judge who oversaw [his] trial and sentenced him last week to 40 months in prison dismissed his demand that she be taken off the case as a baseless smear,” Rachel Weiner reports. “Stone’s motion sought to disqualify Berman Jackson for referring during Thursday’s sentencing to ‘the jurors who served with integrity under difficult circumstances.’ He is still challenging one juror as biased. Berman Jackson rebutted any claim that she has not treated Stone fairly.”

Justice Clarence Thomas's wife has worked to identify “deep state” members who are “disloyal” to Trump.

“The Trump White House and its allies, over the past 18 months, assembled detailed lists of disloyal government officials to oust — and trusted pro-Trump people to replace them,” Axios reports. “Members of this network include [Ginni Thomas] and Republican Senate staffer Barbara Ledeen. ... Thomas has spent a significant amount of time and energy urging Trump administration officials to change the personnel inside his government. ... The presidential personnel office reviewed Thomas' memo and determined that some names she passed along for jobs were not appropriate candidates.” Leeden wrote a memo arguing why former D.C. U.S. attorney Jessie Liu should be disqualified for a nomination to a top Treasury job. Thomas, meanwhile, compiled names of potential nominees for different positions, many sourced from meetings with her conservative activist network Groundswell. Potential hires she offered to Trump include: Sheriff David Clarke for a senior DHS job, radio talk show host Chris Plante for press secretary, and Federalist contributor Ben Weingarten for the National Security Council.

Trump, eyeing Nevada, opposed a nuclear waste site at Yucca, reversing his own administration's policy.

“Why should you have nuclear waste in your backyard?’ Mr. Trump asked the crowd at a rally in Las Vegas on Friday, to applause, noting that his recently released budget proposal did not include funding to license the site, as previous ones had,” the Times reports. “In Mr. Trump’s decentralized administration, top aides and agency leaders have sometimes pursued their own agendas, at times creating politically perilous situations for him. ... The president made his latest move after a monthslong policy debate inside the White House over finally breaking with support for Yucca ... Nationally, Republicans have long favored the proposal ... But Nevada politicians of both parties have remained steadfastly opposed to the policy, which is deeply unpopular in the state.”

---

The new world order

A newlywed couple wear protective masks as they take wedding photos in Hong Kong. (Tyrone Siu/Reuters)

China postponed its most important political gathering of the year because of the coronavirus.

“China’s ruling Communist Party has postponed the biggest event in China’s political calendar, the National People’s Congress, as it concentrates on fighting the coronavirus,” Anna Fifield and Liu Yang report. “The annual legislative session, held together with a meeting of the party’s top political-advisory body, was due to begin on March 5. But the NPC’s Standing Committee decided at a meeting in Beijing on Monday that they would be delayed. It did not set a date for the meetings, known collectively as the ‘Two Sessions.’ It will be the first time since 1997 that the meetings have not started in the first week of March.”

President Xi Jinping said that the outbreak is a crisis that will test the Chinese economy. “No victory should be lightly announced until there is a complete win,” he said during a speech to Communist Party members in Beijing on Sunday, adding the situation remains grim and complex.

China backtracked on a decision to relax travel

restrictions on Wuhan.

“A notice by Wuhan’s epidemic prevention and control headquarters said Monday that it would ease some of the more draconian travel restrictions on the locked-down city at the heart of the epidemic, allowing for the return of some residents trapped outside Wuhan since late January and permitting visitors stuck in the city to leave. But hours later, Wuhan’s city government declared the earlier announcement invalid, saying it had been released without authorization,” Adam Taylor reports. “Official figures released Monday showed there had been 409 new cases of the novel coronavirus and 150 new deaths from the outbreak by the end of Sunday, bringing the total confirmed cases to 77,150 with a cumulative death toll of 2,592.”

A Chinese study suggests that the outbreak didn’t begin at a Wuhan market.

“Co-authored by researchers from three Chinese institutions including the Chinese Academy of Sciences and published on the academy’s website last Thursday, the study attempts to trace how the virus emerged and evolved. The authors analyzed the genomic data from 93 samples of the novel coronavirus and concluded that it was likely to have spread to the market from somewhere else,” Tiffany Liang reports. “It also pointed out that human-to-human transmission of the virus might have existed in Wuhan as early as late November. The market was closed on Jan. 1.”

South Korea temporarily shut down the messianic church linked to half of the country’s virus cases.

“More than half of South Korea’s covid-19 cases have been traced to a regional branch of the secretive Shincheonji Church of Jesus, formally known as the Temple of the Tabernacle of the Testimony. But authorities were having difficulty locating members, many of whom are probably in hiding,” Min Joo Kim reports. “The South Korean government on Sunday announced 169 new coronavirus cases and two more deaths, bringing the totals to 602 cases and six deaths. ... South Korean President Moon Jae-in said the country’s coronavirus crisis has entered a ‘totally different phase since the mass infection at Shincheonji.’ Hundreds of thousands signed a petition calling for the church to be dissolved. Moon called the temporary shutdown of Shincheonji churches across the country ‘a fair and inevitable step’ to protect the community. He said there was ‘no intention to limit religious freedom.’”

Fifty people reportedly died of coronavirus in the Iranian city of Qom.

The country’s health minister rejected the report from Iranian lawmaker Ahmad Amirabadi Farahani, who claimed that the government is covering up the full extent of the outbreak. (The Guardian)

The U.S. government backtracked on a plan to transfer quarantined patients to Alabama.

Hours after Anniston County's City Council voted on Sunday to pursue legal action against the federal government over its proposal to transfer patients from the Diamond Princess cruise ship to be held in the town's FEMA facility, Sen. Richard Shelby (R) and Gov. Kay Ivey (R) announced that plans had changed. Ivey said Trump called and assured her that the patients wouldn't be sent to Alabama, ABC News reports.

Hong Kong refugees traverse a legal twilight zone as they build their new lives in Taiwan.

“Che-lam Presbyterian Church is next door to Taiwan's legislature and a stone's throw from the presidential office in the island's capital. But while President Tsai Ing-wen's support for Hong Kong protesters powered her to reelection last month, the church is Taiwan's only institution to publicly provide material assistance to people who have fled the Asian financial hub's crackdown on demonstrators,” Nick Aspinwall reports. “Although Taiwan has temporarily barred entry to most Hong Kongers amid the coronavirus outbreak, many in Hong Kong view the island as a place to resettle should their political strife worsen. ... Taiwan, which is not a member of the United Nations, has not signed the U.N. Refugee Convention and has no formal asylum laws. Its government processes people from Hong Kong on a case-by-case basis but provides no public assurance of their long-term legal status, leading to concerns that the uncertainty creates gaps for protesters to be exploited.”

Israel’s fear of coronavirus contagion grows as election day approaches.

The concern comes after “reports that a group of South Koreans who had visited some of the country's most popular religious and tourist spots tested positive for the infection,” Steve Hendrix reports. “Israeli officials, who had expressed cautious optimism that Israel could avoid significant risk from the global epidemic, immediately increased restrictions on those entering the country. Non-Israeli travelers from South Korea and Japan have been barred from entering, according to local media reports, and Israelis arriving from any of several Asian countries face two weeks of mandatory quarantine.”

Israeli military jets targeted sites in Gaza and Syria linked to Palestinian Islamic Jihad.

The attacks came “hours after militants from the group fired more than 20 rockets into Israeli territory,” Ruth Eglash and Hazem Balousha report. “The exchange came after a Palestinian news agency posted graphic footage of an Israeli army bulldozer dragging the body of a Palestinian man who Israel said was part of a ‘terror squad,’ killed as he placed an explosive device along the border fence. ... The Israeli strikes injured four in Gaza, according to the Palestinian Ministry of Health.”

Malaysian Prime Minister Mahatir Mohamad, the world’s oldest national leader, resigned.

“Under Malaysia’s constitution, the entire cabinet must be dissolved if the prime minister resigns,” Shibani Mahtani and Jonathan Edward report. “As the prime minister’s office announced Mahathir’s intent to resign, his political party, the Malaysian United Indigenous Party, known as Bersatu, said it would be leaving Malaysia’s ruling coalition. About a dozen other prominent members of parliament also left to form an independent bloc in the Southeast Asian country’s legislature. The king, Sultan Abdullah of Pahang, has not commented publicly on the matter. The political drama on Monday appeared to thwart one of Southeast Asia's most celebrated democratic transitions, and returned Malaysia to a time of backdoor political plotting and palace intrigue. The move also appeared aimed at preventing [Anwar Ibrahim] from taking over as leader."

In Greece, migrants wait in bread lines while tourists dine on grilled octopus next door.

"At the Moria refugee camp on Lesbos, the largest of the island facilities, migrants wait in snaking lines for up to eight hours a day to get their meals," Chico Harlan reports. "They wait because this camp has mushroomed in size, growing seven times more crowded than its capacity, a shantytown on a vacation island never intended for such emergencies ... One migrant said the food was worse than at her former workplace, an Afghan prison. ... Yet beyond the camp, closer to the water, locals and tourists are eating well. Lesbos's tavernas serve octopus, grilled squid, feta, vegetables dressed with lemon and olive oil. That jarring juxtaposition is part of what makes the camp 'one of the worst places I've seen on earth,' said Marco Sandrone, the Lesbos field coordinator for Doctors Without Borders."

The U.K.'s new post-Brexit passports will be distributed next month.

What the the Home Office didn't say, however, was that the passports will be made by a Franco-Dutch company at a Polish factory under E.U. procurement rules, the Times reports.

Harry and Meghan won't be able to use the brand

"SussexRoyal" in any territories. The couple, which will become independent from the crown on March 31, appeared upset at the palace's ban on the use of the word "royal." (The Guardian)

Prague renamed the square in front of the Russian embassy after the slain Putin critic Boris Nemtsov. (CNN)

Prosecutors say a former DEA agent laundered millions for a Colombian cartel.

“Jose Irizarry was the model agent for his bosses at the Drug Enforcement Administration. Seen as a rising star in Miami for overseeing undercover investigations that led to dozens of drug arrests, Irizarry transferred to the Colombian city of Cartagena to continue to fight the violent cartel. ... But when the DEA special agent allegedly began to spend lavishly on homes, cars and jewelry, and hosted wild yacht parties with bikini-clad prostitutes, it raised some red flags within the agency,” Timothy Bella reports. “As it turns out, Irizarry allegedly laundered money for the very Colombian drug cartel he was fighting against. Irizarry, 46, was arrested Friday at his home near San Juan, Puerto Rico, on charges of conspiring to launder money, as well as honest services wire fraud, bank fraud, conspiracy to commit bank fraud, conspiracy to commit identity theft and aggravated identity theft. ... Irizarry, who resigned in early 2018 after the agency grew suspicious, is believed to have laundered more than $7 million.”

---

Social media speed read

Sanders’s partial defense of Fidel Castro on CBS's “60 Minutes” drew widespread criticism from conservatives in Florida:

Marco Rubio ✓

@marcorubio

Likely Dem nominee praised the supposed
“achievements” Castro regime

And he’s wrong about why people didn’t overthrow Castro. It’s not because “he educated their kids,gave them health care” it’s because his opponents were jailed,murdered or exiled cbsnews.com/news/bernie-sa...

Bernie Sanders on being the Democratic frontrunn...

Coming off his win in the Nevada caucuses, Bernie Sanders
talks about Michael Bloomberg, Donald Trump, Democratic cbsnews.com

♥ 4,436 3:13 AM - Feb 24, 2020

💬 2,423 people are talking about this

Former presidential candidate Marianne Williamson endorsed Sanders:

Emma Kinery ✓
@EmmaKinery

“Surprise guest” and native Texan Marianne Williamson endorses Bernie Sanders for president at his rally in Austin, TX

♥ 12.2K 11:11 PM - Feb 23, 2020

💬 2.123 people are talking about this

And love led a Sanders supporter to a Warren rally:

Jess Bidgood

@jessbidgood

A happy couple at the @ewarren rally in Denver

♥ 22 11:30 PM - Feb 23, 2020

See Jess Bidgood's other Tweets

Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) responded playfully to a report in the New York Post that noted he's spent over $8,600 at Junior's Cheesecake over the past decade, mostly to buy gifts using campaign funds:

The Hill
@thehill

"Guilty as charged... it's my guilty pleasure."

WATCH: Sen. Chuck Schumer admits to spending thousands on cheesecake and serves cheesecake to members of the press in a lighthearted moment.

♥ 196 1:13 AM - Feb 24, 2020

💬 81 people are talking about this

Videos of the day

John Oliver talked about India's Modi:

“The Daily Show” offered an interesting service to former presidential candidates:

And a California couple that went missing on Valentine's Day was found alive on Saturday by a search dog named Groot:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Carolyn Hax for Post columnist Carolyn Hax's latest advice column every day. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Biden uses Obama as a shield – and cudgel – in bid to thwart Sanders in South Carolina
Date: Tuesday, February 25, 2020 10:24:37 AM

Powered by LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Uber

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

Biden uses Obama as a shield – and cudgel – in bid to thwart Sanders in South Carolina

CHARLESTON, S.C. – Joe Biden spoke frantically – faster and louder than normal – as he touted his relationship with Barack Obama during a rally here on Monday night. No longer content to merely cite the former president as validation, Biden now invokes his old boss to attack his opponents – specifically Bernie Sanders and Tom Steyer, who are nipping at his heels in South Carolina by making inroads with African American voters.

Biden exudes a new sense of urgency as he makes what could be his last stand ahead of Saturday's primary, in which the majority of voters will be black. "When we were president – when Barack was president, and I was vice president – we went to HBCUs," Biden said, referring to historically black colleges and universities.

He said stricter gun laws would have prevented the massacre of nine African American parishioners during a Bible study in 2015 at the Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church a few blocks away. "I went there with Barack," he said, referring to the memorial service when Obama sang "Amazing Grace." "We met with all the families."

Biden's extended bear hug of his former running mate came a few hours after his campaign launched a new attack ad against Sanders for mulling a primary challenge in 2012 against "our first African American president."

The 60-second digital spot features audio from a 2011 radio interview in which the independent senator from Vermont said, "I think it would be a good idea if President Obama faced some primary opposition." The spot ends with a narrator saying: "When it comes to building on President Obama's legacy, Bernie Sanders just can't be trusted." The campaign said this is part of a $600,000 digital buy in South Carolina that will play on YouTube, Facebook and Instagram.

Obama has not endorsed anyone, and he's kept his head down as the primary has heated up. Some allies of the former president speculate privately that he wants to maintain credibility with all the factions of the party if there's a contested convention so that he could help mediate. He's previously signaled unease with Sanders's style of radical politics, but Obama's shown no inclination to forcefully or publicly articulate such concerns.

Responding to Biden's attack, Sanders categorically denied that he ever considered a primary challenge against Obama. The Atlantic reported last week that the president's 2012 reelection campaign was panicked about the possibility after being tipped off by Sen. Pat Leahy (D-Vt.) that Sanders was seriously considering it, and they took it seriously enough that then-Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) was enlisted to dissuade Sanders from running.

"Not true at all," Sanders said during a town hall in Charleston that aired on CNN last night. "I'm the senator from a small state, and I did not give any consideration to running for president of the United States until 2015." He added that he was "very busy running for reelection" in 2012. "In fact, I ended up campaigning for Obama, and I'm a strong supporter of all that Barack Obama has accomplished," he said. "Joe is a friend of mine. I've known him for many years. But you know what happens in campaigns? At the end of the season, it's called silly season. People say things they should not say."

The former vice president has leaned on his eight years of service in what he likes to call "the Obama-Biden administration" since announcing his candidacy for the Democratic nomination last spring, but he's becoming as explicit about it as ever. Biden's staff set up teleprompters last night next to a podium in a gymnasium at the College of Charleston, but he ignored those accoutrements and paced with a wireless microphone. He claimed the 2009 stimulus package wouldn't have passed without him. "The president asked me to handle it," he said, referring to Obama. "The president said ... 'Sheriff Joe will do it.'" Biden also touted the Affordable Care Act. "Five Democratic presidents tried to get Obamacare or something like it passed," he said. "We got it passed."

Biden has started going after Sanders directly almost every chance he gets. "We've just had significant disagreements with Bernie, but the way he talks about it, you'd think he and Barack were close buddies," he said Sunday night on MSNBC. "I know they were not."

A fresh NBC News-Marist University poll helps explain why: Biden leads Sanders 27 percent to 23 percent among likely Democratic primary voters, with a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percent. Steyer places third with 15 percent. No one else breaks into double digits, but 27 percent of likely voters say they remain persuadable.

Joe Biden speaks Monday night at the College of Charleston. (Elizabeth Frantz/Reuters)

Biden is laser focused on the Palmetto State because he recognizes that failing here would functionally end his campaign. He hopes to ride momentum from a victory on Saturday to success in the other Southern states with large African American populations that vote one week from today on Super Tuesday. Reflecting his limited financial resources, Biden is not airing television ads in any of the states that vote next week.

In fact, Biden came to his Charleston rally from a fundraiser in Mount Pleasant at the home of a prominent local lawyer on the banks of Hobcaw Creek. State Sen. Marlon Kimpson (D), who is black, led the donors in a reprise of the “Fired up, ready to go” chant that was common during Obama rallies. “On the most fundamental decision that President Barack Obama had to make, and that is choosing a vice president, he chose Joe Biden and he has said, the president has said, that’s the best damn decision he has ever made,” Kimpson said at the fundraiser. “Don’t be confused by the fantasyland nirvana proposals. It ain’t going nowhere. Senator Sanders has spent more than 30 years up on Capitol Hill talking about the same thing, and nothing has passed. Let’s not get it confused.”

Biden then ripped into Sanders for supporting a bill to limit liability for gun manufacturers. “Bernie’s a good guy,” said Biden. “He talks about how we all make mistakes. Well, he didn’t tell you he voted five times against the Brady Bill and the waiting period. He voted against allowing us to go up and sue the companies that created this havoc.”

The odds seem good that Sanders's purported flirtation with primarying Obama will come up during tonight's debate, which begins at 8 p.m. Eastern and will air on CBS. The six other candidates onstage have each realized, to varying degrees, that Sanders could build an insurmountable lead in the hunt for delegates next Tuesday if nothing is done to bludgeon his momentum. The collective action problem complicates efforts to stop Sanders: Everyone wants to promote their own candidacy more than they want to stop Sanders. Going too negative could generate backlash and ill will from party activists. On the other hand, with the field still so fragmented, there are new incentives to try to emerge as Sanders's chief detractor. That's certainly the role that Mike Bloomberg wants to play. Bloomberg, who spent Monday cloistered at the Four Seasons in Orlando for debate prep, reportedly plans to go after Sanders for his gun-related votes.

Bernie Sanders speaks on Monday night at the South Carolina Democratic Party's "First in the South" dinner at the Charleston Marriott. He threw out his prepared remarks. (Drew Angerer/Getty Images)

For his part, Sanders is telegraphing a more conciliatory approach. Before his town hall on CNN, Sanders spoke last night at a dinner hosted by the South Carolina Democratic Party. Biden, Sen. Amy Klobuchar (Minn.), Elizabeth Warren (Mass.), Pete Buttigieg and Steyer also delivered remarks at the Charleston Marriott. The Sanders campaign distributed the prepared text of his speech in advance. The senator was slated to criticize “the political establishment and some of my opponents.” But Sanders tossed these comments and instead emphasized his own electability. “I know you’re hearing a lot on TV, ‘Bernie can’t win,’” Sanders said. “Don’t believe everything you hear on TV.”

All of the voters I spoke with at Biden’s rally said his background as Obama’s wingman is an important asset weighing in his favor. Since Iowa, though, you hear much less from attendees at his events about electability and much more about likeability. Allison Pryor, 57, a retired probation and parole officer who lives in Charleston and is African American, said she’ll vote for Biden because he seems so relatable. She appreciated his perseverance after his wife died in a car crash and his son died of brain cancer. “He rode the train, and he’s always been like a cup of coffee: Regular Old Joe,” said Pryor. “Yes, it’s good to know he’d be a continuation of the Obama administration. But I think he can also stand on his own merits.”

A national poll conducted by Fox News in August found that 60 percent of Americans held a favorable impression of Obama, including 95 percent of both Democrats and African Americans, as well as 56 percent of independents. Among Democrats, 78 percent felt “strongly favorable” toward the former president and 17 percent were “somewhat favorable.”

But several voters I’ve interviewed around South Carolina have wondered why Obama’s not endorsing Biden if they’re so close. Biden claimed last April, dubiously, that he asked Obama “not to endorse” him so that the president could stay neutral. Others said they’ve seen ads online from Bloomberg highlighting how close he was with Obama as New York’s mayor.

“This is going to be Biden’s last stand because he thinks that black people are going to support him just because of Barack Obama,” said Connie Breeden, an attorney in Columbia who is African American. “He’s tooting that horn all the way to the bank. But people are savvier than that. He hasn’t done anything. What has he actually done for us? Nothing. Nothing. Nothing. I’m leaning toward Steyer because he’s really put his money where his mouth is.”

Tom Steyer greets supporters after a speech on Sunday afternoon in Yemassee, S.C. (Elizabeth Frantz/Reuters)

Biden has also been invoking Obama as he steps up his attacks on Steyer, the X factor in this primary. The former V.P. blasted the billionaire from San Francisco over the weekend for investing in private prisons while he and Obama were in the White House trying to get rid of private prisons.

Steyer defended himself during his own CNN town hall last night. “I thought it was the right thing, I decided it was the wrong thing and, 15 years ago, I sold it for moral reasons,” he said. “I came to the conclusion that everyone has come to conclude now, that this isn't a place to make money.” Steyer added that he’s sought to atone for his past investment by funding initiatives in California to get rid of private prisons. “When I make a mistake, I correct it,” he said.

Many black voters draw a clear distinction between Obama and Biden. Steven Lykes, 44, a full-time caretaker, is torn between Sanders and Steyer. He backed Hillary Clinton in the primary four years ago, and his favorite candidate had been Elizabeth Warren for much of the past year. Lykes thinks the senator from Massachusetts is an amazing debater and loves her plans, but Warren’s lackluster finishes in the first three states gave him pause.

“Biden has run three different times,” Lykes said in Columbia. “I’m always scared because Donald Trump is a savvy campaigner. You’ve got to have someone who is on their tippy toes and ready to fight back. I don’t think Biden can do that. He has too many gaffes. You can see it in the debates. He’s having a hard enough time just against the candidates we have. But Bernie can stand up to Trump like nobody’s business.”

Obama’s shadow looms large in the minds of black voters in other ways that don’t necessarily help Biden. David Swinton, the former president of Benedict College in Columbia, a historically black liberal arts college, said he and his wife already cast their ballots early for Sanders. “We cannot be concerned about all the pundits who say he can’t win,” said Swinton. “Let’s not worry about that. Let’s vote for what we feel in our heart, rather than who might win. Remember, nobody thought Barack Obama could win. And he did.”

South Carolina does not have partisan voter registration, which means people can vote in whatever primary they want. An open primary means that there will be many moderate voters who may not like Trump but don’t necessarily swoon for Obama. There’s also buzz on the right, for example, that Republicans should vote for Sanders here to elevate his candidacy on the theory that he’d be much easier for Trump to defeat in the fall. This could be a factor in a close race.

Attitudes toward Obama are more complicated among white Democrats. Lifelong Democrat Doug Brafford, a retired lawyer who lives in Mount Pleasant, plans to support Buttigieg after backing Sanders in the primary four years ago. “One of the things that upsets me about Joe Biden is that, as vice president, he repeatedly denigrated Southerners,” said Brafford, 77. “When Obama said that people cling to their guns and religion, Biden didn’t speak out. He picked up where Obama left off. I love Obama with all my heart, but I think he’s divisive – and that matters to me.”

Brafford dislikes Trump, but he worries that his party’s nonstop attacks on the president hurt politically. That’s why he finds Buttigieg’s calls for civility so compelling. “We have been uncivil in this party,” said Brafford. “It may drive some middle-of-the-roaders to stay at home. It has turned some people off.”

Barack Obama, then a presidential hopeful, shares a laugh with Edith Childs in Aiken, S.C. Childs has endorsed Steyer's bid this year. (Brett Flashnick/AP)

It's about more than personalities, too. Democrats are divided about the best approach to governing. The CBS-YouGov poll published on Sunday, which had Biden up 5 points over Sanders, found that 54 percent of likely Democratic voters in South Carolina think the party should nominate someone who is trying to “return the country to the way it was before Donald Trump took office,” and 46 percent said Democrats should instead “advance a more progressive agenda than the country had under Barack Obama.”

Obama himself left little doubt as to which way he'd answer that CBS poll question during a speech in November in which he urged Democrats running for the White House not to lurch too far left to win the nomination. “This is still a country that is less revolutionary than it is interested in improvement,” the former president said during a meeting of the Democracy Alliance, the powerful network of liberal megadonors, in what was covered at the time as a subtle rebuke of Sandersism. “They like seeing things improved. But the average American doesn't think that we have to completely tear down the system and remake it. And I think it's important for us not to lose sight of that.”

To be sure, African American voters in South Carolina revere Obama. Dorothy Hollis, 77, retired nine years ago after 40 years of teaching high school. Now she teaches Sunday school and sings in the choir at First Calvary Baptist Church in Columbia. As Saturday looms, she’s undecided and praying for guidance. “I want President Obama to run again, to be honest,” she said. “He was an outstanding president. Like Abraham Lincoln, those don’t come but every so often. So we have to take the next best thing and accept a flawed person and just go with it. But who is that?”

Hollis thought four years ago that Clinton would be a wonderful president, but she said none of the candidates in 2020 particularly excite her. “Sometimes it takes a devil to catch the Devil. It takes a thief to catch a thief. Sometimes it takes that. And I’m not sure we have that on the platform right now,” she said.

Her faith comforts her in what she sees as a perilous moment for the country. Hollis said she was “just so tickled” when heavy winds blew down a section of Trump’s border wall a few weeks ago before the cement hardened. To her, it was a sign. “God is good,” Hollis said. “To me, that was a warning. Those little things, those are warnings. You can’t fight against the powers that be. That wall is going to come down one way or another. Just ask Joshua.”

In the Book of Joshua, the walls of Jericho fall after the Israelites blow their trumpets. “If we don’t get anybody genuine to deal with this world, we’re going to all just perish,” she said. “The one will come.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

More on 2020

Sanders's Cold War travels face fresh scrutiny.

Buttigieg and Bloomberg attacked the senator for his comments about Fidel Castro's Cuba in a "60 Minutes" interview that aired Sunday night. Sanders said Castro deserved praise where it was due, including for a "massive literacy program." "During the dying days of the Cold War, Sanders indulged a fascination with far more disruptive and divisive strains of a socialist ideology he has embraced throughout his adult life," Griff Witte reports. "Returning home from visits to some of the United States' most avowed enemies, Sanders offered some criticism but also plenty of praise in Vermont community television recordings. ... Now, Sanders's comments are coming back to life as opponents say his warm feelings toward his hosts decades ago make him vulnerable to attack and reveal a soft spot for left-wing despots."

Sanders defended his Castro comments during last night's CNN town hall. "You know what? I think teaching people to read and write is a good thing,” he said. “I have been extremely consistent and critical of all authoritarian regimes all over the world — including Cuba, including Nicaragua, including Saudi Arabia, including China, including Russia. I happen to believe in democracy, not authoritarianism. ... But can anyone deny — I mean, the facts are clear — that [China has] taken more people out of extreme poverty than any country in history?” When pressed on Castro’s legacy, he responded, “Truth is truth. All right?”

Democrats fret this could cost them Florida in the general.

Terrie Rizzo, the chair of the Florida Democratic Party, didn’t mention Sanders by name but released a statement saying Democrats in her state “stand in solidarity with the thousands of people who have fled violent dictatorships in Cuba, Venezuela and Nicaragua.” Two Democratic congresswomen from Florida — Debbie Mucarsel-Powell and Donna Shalala — took issue with the comments as well, with Shalala saying she hopes that Sanders “will take time to speak to some of my constituents before he decides to sing the praises of a murderous tyrant like Fidel Castro.” Sen. Robert Menendez (N.J.), the only Cuban American Democratic senator, also denounced Sanders’s comments.

Sen. Michael Bennet (D-Colo.) paused for 17 seconds last night when Paul Kane asked him if Sanders can win the general election.

“I’m not sure I’m the right person to ask about winning a Democratic primary, but I think winning a primary election and winning a general election are two different things,” said Bennet, who dropped out of the presidential race after garnering less than 1 percent of the vote in New Hampshire. Bennet expressed concern that Sanders could make it harder for John Hickenlooper, the former governor of his state, to defeat Sen. Cory Gardner (R-Colo.). Bennet, the former chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said he believes Democrats “need to nominate somebody in this process who is going to be able to win purple states like Colorado and lead us to a 55-senator majority in the Senate. That could be challenging.”

Biden claimed he was arrested trying to see Nelson Mandela. There’s no evidence of that.

“Biden, as a senator, was active in the anti-apartheid movement, helping pass sanctions on companies doing business in South Africa over President Ronald Reagan’s veto. But there is no evidence that Biden was ever arrested trying to see the imprisoned future president of a democratic South Africa,” fact checker Glenn Kessler writes. “As far as we can tell, Biden never mentioned this arrest before; neither can we locate any news accounts of him being arrested.”

A Sanders staffer was fired for mocking Warren’s looks and Buttigieg’s sexuality on Twitter.

“Using the account @perma_ben, Ben Mora, a regional field director for Sanders’ campaign based in Michigan, has attacked other Democrats in the field—as well as their family members, surrogates, journalists, and politically active celebrities—in deeply personal terms, mocking their physical appearance, gender, and sexuality, among other things,” the Daily Beast reports. “Mora, the Sanders campaign confirmed, has been fired.”

Sanders and his campaign have stepped up criticism of MSNBC.

“Sanders reportedly confronted MSNBC president Phil Griffin and another network executive last week before the NBC-sponsored Democratic debate in Las Vegas to complain about its coverage, including disparaging comments made by Chris Matthews and ‘Meet the Press’ host Chuck Todd. MSNBC has not confirmed the encounters took place, though it hasn’t disputed the report either,” Paul Farhi and Jenna Johnson report. “Sanders’ campaign manager, Faiz Shakir, told Vanity Fair last week that MSNBC ‘is constantly undermining the Bernie Sanders campaign.’ He has even said Fox News has been ‘more fair than MSNBC’ ...

“The campaign’s ire was raised further by Matthews’s commentary as Sanders swept to an early lead in Nevada on Saturday. Matthews compared Sanders’s performance to Nazi Germany’s shattering military victory over France in the early months of World War II, suggesting Sanders’s path to the Democratic nomination was unstoppable. ‘It’s over,’ said Matthews, referring to a French prime minister's assessment of the battle and possibly the war. The comparison was flawed in several respects (France was eventually liberated and Germany was crushed by allied forces), but Sanders's representatives expressed outrage that Matthews had compared Sanders to Hitler's soldiers, given that Sanders, a Jew, lost family members during the Holocaust. ... Matthews apologized to Sanders on his program, 'Hardball,' on Monday night. 'As I watched the one-sided results of Saturday's Democratic caucus in Nevada, I reached for an historical analogy and used a bad one..., he said."

---

Quote of the day

"We're going to spend Trump out of office," Bloomberg campaign manager Kevin Sheekey told Vanity Fair.

In a historically old presidential field, candidates are still refusing to release their health records.

Klobuchar, 59, released four pages of medical documentation last night with recent lab results and a doctor's letter that said she's in "very good health." Buttigieg, 38, has yet to release any medical records despite arguing last week that the candidates should undergo physical exams and disclose the results. Bloomberg, 78, released a single page from his doctor that said he's in "great physical shape" and that he "plays golf avidly." Biden, 77, released a three-page letter describing him as "healthy [and] vigorous." Sanders, 78, released letters from three doctors – including a cardiologist who said he has "the mental and physical stamina" to be president. Warren, 70, released five pages of documents revealing a thyroid condition and a doctor's letter declaring her in "excellent health." (Matt Viser and Lenny Bernstein)

A Minneapolis inmate blamed Klobuchar for what he claims was a wrongful conviction.

"She recharged me with first degree murder, never looked into the facts of the case. Never looked into the misconduct that had taken place," Myon

Burrell told ABC News. He was convicted for the 2002 first-degree murder of 11-year-old Tyesha Edwards. Recently, an AP investigation has cast doubt over the murder investigation and the police tactics used.

Klobuchar, Burrell said, “never even addressed the misconduct that had taken place and still put the same detective, the same police on my case to go and get more bogus evidence.” In a statement to ABC, Klobuchar once again called for a review of the case.

Presidential candidates are rebranding Rep. Jim Clyburn’s anti-poverty program as reparations.

“Clyburn (D-S.C.), whose district encompasses eight of the state’s poorest counties, has long opposed cash payments to African Americans whose ancestors were enslaved. He believes it would be too difficult to determine who deserves to be compensated. But a race-neutral anti-poverty program he conceived a decade ago is now catching fire among candidates for the Democratic nomination as a way to provide practical restitution for slavery,” Tracy Jan reports. “Several presidential hopefuls, including [Sanders and Klobuchar], have sought to rebrand Clyburn’s program as a vehicle for reparations, which remain politically contentious. Clyburn’s idea, with strong bipartisan support, was originally adopted in 2009 by just one federal agency. But framing the program, which targets federal spending on certain high-poverty areas, as reparations has drawn criticism from African Americans living in poor urban neighborhoods — some in Clyburn’s own district — that do not qualify for the funding, as well as longtime advocates for reparations. The critique underlines the difficulty of finding a solution that would satisfy those demanding redress and also be politically viable.”

The State newspaper in Columbia endorses Buttigieg in today’s edition.

“During the last half-century, the Democratic Party has only won the presidency when it has resisted the temptation to pick status-quo nominees and shown the courage to choose centrist outsiders with fresh, optimistic messages,” the editorial explains. “Jimmy Carter, Bill Clinton and Barack Obama prevailed in part because they understood the values of real-world America. All three successfully connected with voters by tapping into the sensibilities of average Americans. Buttigieg has gained that needed perspective during his eight years leading South Bend, a Midwestern city that had to reinvent itself and cast aside a Rust Belt image.”

Silicon Valley asked Warren for help with a fundraiser. Her campaign considered it.

“Warren’s team in recent weeks explored ways to raise money from Silicon Valley donors without violating her ironclad fundraising pledge to not ‘sell access to my time,’” Recode reports. “The Democratic presidential campaign considered an inbound request to have a campaign representative — such as an endorser, a staff member, or a high-level volunteer leader — attend a now-canceled high-dollar event in the Bay Area, according to several people familiar with the discussions.”

Trump’s former doctor thought he had a ticket to Congress. It might not be that easy.

Ronny Jackson is one of 15 candidates in a crowded Republican primary in Texas, and the White House hasn’t gone out of its way to help, the New York Times reports. “Jackson left the West Wing in December after rising from Trump’s physician to his unlikely pick to lead the Department of Veterans Affairs to Trump administration roadkill when he was forced to withdraw his name from consideration amid allegations related to his professional conduct. Now he’s running for Congress in Texas’ 13th District, one of the most conservative in the country, and his argument is simple... Jackson is betting his personal connection with the president is enough to win the Republican nomination tantamount to election. ... But it is not clear if that connection, combined with his background as a Navy rear admiral, will be enough to help Dr. Jackson overcome some rookie mistakes as a candidate.”

---

The new world order

Trump and Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi hug after giving a joint statement in New Delhi. (Manish Swarup/AP)

Trump said the U.S.-India relationship has “never been as good” as it is now.

The president and “Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi hailed the growing defense ties between the world’s two largest democracies even as they acknowledged that a trade deal between them remains distant. During his second day in India, Trump is holding formal meetings with the Indian leadership, making a visit to the U.S. Embassy and attending a state banquet in New Delhi,” Joanna Slater reports. “Trump began Tuesday by participating in a grand ceremonial welcome and visiting a memorial to Mohandas Gandhi ... There will be no huge crowds or tourism for the president today.

“On Monday, as Trump arrived in India, violence broke out in Delhi between supporters and opponents of [Modi’s] controversial new citizenship law. Critics say the law is unconstitutional and discriminates against Muslims. ... [Violence continued today], police told local media that the death toll from Monday’s violence had climbed to seven, including one police officer. More than 100 people were injured, according to media reports. Heavy police presence in the affected areas failed to stem the violence. ... Home Minister Amit Shah, Modi’s second-in-command, chaired a meeting with top officials and the Delhi state leadership. The government ruled out calling the army for assistance and said there were adequate security forces on the ground. ...

“First lady Melania Trump visited a public school in New Delhi to attend a ‘happiness class,’ part of a special curriculum introduced across India’s capital in 2018 to emphasize well-being alongside academic achievement. ... [Meanwhile], Trump and Modi claimed progress Tuesday toward a comprehensive trade deal, but a chummy atmosphere between the two leaders during Trump’s state visit could not mask frustration that the long-delayed pact is still in limbo. Trump predicted that a successful deal is in the offing but gave no deadline. The United States had once hoped to have the agreement ready in September, when Modi visited the United States.”

Trump’s acting director of national intelligence worked for a nonprofit group funded mostly by Hungary.

“[Richard] Grenell’s public relations firm was paid to do work for a U.S. nonprofit funded almost entirely by the Hungarian government led by far-right Prime Minister Viktor Orban,” Emma Brown, Beth Reinhard and Dalton Bennett report. Individuals who have served as acting directors of national intelligence “typically have been nonpartisan national security professionals whose experience has included leading intelligence agencies or service in the military. Now that promotion is drawing fresh scrutiny to Grenell’s past, including his foreign affairs commentary and consulting work after he served as U.S. spokesman at the United Nations during the George W. Bush administration. His work for the Hungarian-funded nonprofit is the type of activity that, in other cases, has drawn the attention of Justice Department investigators tasked with enforcing the Foreign Agents Registration Act (FARA).”

The White House asked Congress for an emergency $1.8 billion to bolster the response.

“The request includes $1.25 billion in new funding for the Department of Health and Human Services, as well as the ability to transfer an additional $535 million set aside to fight Ebola and use it for the coronavirus response instead,” Erica Werner, Jeff Stein and Lena Sun report. “The request reflects the fast-evolving nature of the crisis confronting the administration, which until recently had insisted that no additional funds were necessary. But Democrats immediately slammed the request as too small, with House Appropriations Committee Chairwoman Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.) calling it ‘woefully insufficient to protect Americans’ and criticizing the administration for trying to ‘raid’ money from other public health accounts.”

The market plunge yesterday underscored the coronavirus’s political risk to Trump.

“The Trump administration’s disjointed handling of the outbreak has faced mounting criticism as the president’s allies have scrambled to take preventive steps while seeking to reassure the public, at times struggling to explain their decisions and offer a consistent message,” Toluse Olorunnipa and Costa report. “For a president who has governed ‘by tweet and circus,’ a potential global health crisis that blunts economic growth could expose one of Trump’s main weaknesses as he prepares to face voters in November, said Russell Riley, a presidential historian at the University of Virginia’s Miller Center.”

New virus cases in China and North Korea raised concerns about how long it could take to go back to normal.

“The Chinese government said Tuesday that there had been 508 new confirmed cases by the end of the previous day, along with 74 deaths, bringing the total number of accumulated infections nationwide to 77,658, with 2,663 deaths,” Adam Taylor and Wang Yuan report. “A Chinese official suggested Monday evening that the country needs at least 28 days without new cases to show the virus is not spreading. ... The remarks drew thousands of comments on Weibo, China’s Twitter-like service, where many wondered how long they would have to wait before normal life resumed. ‘Two months will have 60% of enterprises killed!’ one user wrote.”

A California judge delayed a decision on moving coronavirus-exposed Americans.

“A federal judge on Monday directed federal and state officials to answer the questions of Costa Mesa, Calif., residents about their plans to bring Americans who have tested positive for the coronavirus but show no signs of illness to a closed mental-health facility in the city,” Jeff Rowe and Yasmeen Abutaleb report. “District Judge Josephine Staton cautioned that the city — and Orange County if it joins the effort — does not have veto power over state and federal quarantine decisions and faces an uphill battle trying to block the transfer of people from Travis Air Force Base in Northern California.”

Hosni Mubarak, Egypt’s autocratic ruler whose power came to an end during the Arab Spring uprisings, died at 91. (Will Englund and T. Rees Shapiro)

---

Domestic developments that shouldn't be overlooked

Harvey Weinstein was found guilty on two charges of sexual assault.

“The jury determined that Weinstein forced oral sex on former production assistant Mimi Haley at his apartment in July 2006 and raped former aspiring actress Jessica Mann at a hotel in 2013,” Shayna Jacobs reports. “He was found not guilty of the most severe charges, of predatory sexual assault, which would have acknowledged a pattern that included forcing sex on actress Annabella Sciorra in 1993 or 1994. Weinstein, 67, faces at least five years and up to 25 on the count of first-degree criminal sex act for his assault on Haley, and up to four years on a third-degree rape count for the Mann encounter. The judge can consider running the sentences consecutively, for a maximum of 29 years. Sentencing is scheduled for March 11. After the verdict announcement, Weinstein was handcuffed and taken to jail, and his bail was revoked.

“Weinstein’s lawyers are expected to appeal the conviction on the basis of several concerns, including the amount of media attention on the case and the fact that the three supporting accusers were permitted to testify even though charges were not brought on their behalf. The appeal must be filed after sentencing. ... Weinstein lawyer Donna Rotunno told reporters, ‘He took it like a man. He knows this is not over.’”

Advocates hailed the Weinstein conviction as a breakthrough.

“‘This is one of those days when the whole world changes,’ said Jane Manning, a former sex-crimes prosecutor in New York and director of the Women’s Equal Justice Project. ‘A sexual predator who was so powerful that he thought he could never be touched has just been held accountable,’” Caitlin Gibson and Elahe Izadi report. ”Deborah Tuerkheimer, a professor of law at Northwestern University, noted that most sexual assault cases that enter the legal system are more likely to fit the stereotypical ‘stranger rape’ paradigm — involving a woman who is assaulted by someone she doesn’t know, resulting in apparent physical injury and, potentially, DNA evidence. The Weinstein case, in contrast, presented a far more complicated portrait of sexual violence — and the fact that New York prosecutors even filed charges against him is ‘extraordinary,’ she said.”

Mitch McConnell, after months of legislative inactivity, will now force votes on abortion.

“McConnell is about to plunge the Senate into the nation’s culture wars with votes on bills to sharply restrict access to late-term abortions and threaten some doctors who perform them with criminal penalties, signaling that Republicans plan to make curbing a woman’s right to terminate a pregnancy a central theme of their re-election campaigns this year,” the Times reports. “After months of shunning legislative activity in favor of confirming [Trump’s] judicial nominees — and a brief detour for the president’s impeachment trial — [McConnell] is expected to bring the bills up for votes on Tuesday. Both lack the necessary 60-vote supermajority to advance, and the Senate has voted previously to reject them. But by putting them on the floor again, Mr. McConnell hopes to energize the social conservatives who helped elect Mr. Trump.”

An appeals court upheld the Trump move to withdraw Title X funding for abortions.

“The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals -- long regarded as a liberal body, though Trump appointees have started to tilt the balance -- lifted preliminary injunctions against the rules issued by lower courts in cases from three different states,” Fox News reports. “Xavier Becerra, attorney general of California, one of the states that sued over the regulations, said the Ninth Circuit’s ruling was ‘troubling.’”

Justice Clarence Thomas cited himself in arguing to overturn a decision he authored.

“Although I authored Brand X, ‘it is never too late to ‘surrende[r] former views to a better considered position,’ Thomas wrote in his Monday dissent, quoting himself from a 2018 opinion in South Dakota v. Wayfair, Inc.,” Fox reports. “Thomas has recently been quite vocal in advocating for the court to overturn a variety of precedents, saying in one opinion last year that when ‘faced with a demonstrably erroneous precedent, my rule is simple: We should not follow it.’”

Oregon lawmakers were supposed to vote on a climate change bill. Once again, Republicans walked out.

“For the second time in eight months, Oregon Republicans walked out of the capitol, denying the Democratic supermajority a chance to pass a bill that would limit greenhouse gas emissions. By absconding, the 11 GOP lawmakers prevented the quorum necessary to vote on the legislation and forced Democrats to adjourn for the day,” Reis Thebault reports. “It was the same tactic Republican lawmakers employed in June, when they fled to Idaho to avoid a vote on an earlier version of the same cap-and-trade bill, prompting Oregon’s governor to call in state troopers to track them down and return them to the statehouse.”

The TSA froze hiring and overtime pay as the spring travel season nears.

“Hydrick Thomas, the [TSA] union’s president, said agency officials told him last week that the freezes would be in place until April or May,” Ian Duncan reports. “That could leave security checkpoints short-staffed, he said. ‘You’re going to have long lines,’ Thomas said. ‘That’s just the way it works.’”

Vanessa Bryant sued the helicopter operator in the crash that killed her husband and daughter, and 7 others.

“The lawsuit alleges that the helicopter company, Island Express, was ‘vicariously liable’ for any and all actions of pilot Ara George Zobayan, including his ‘negligent and careless piloting,’” Lori Aratani reports.

The suit was filed the same day thousands gathered at the Staples Center to remember the victims. “[Bryant’s] public memorial Monday sparked a heartbreaking tribute from his wife, Vanessa; brought Michael Jordan to tears; and led former teammate Shaquille O’Neal to share behind-the-scenes anecdotes during a two-hour ceremony,” Ben Golliver and Cindy Boren report. “NBA Commissioner Adam Silver; Hall of Famers Bill Russell, Magic Johnson and Kareem Abdul-Jabbar; current stars Stephen Curry and Kyrie Irving; and dozens of other prominent athletes and entertainers [attended] the celebration of life."

---

Social media speed read

Trump shared a video recap of India's welcome:

Donald J. Trump
@realDonaldTrump

twitter.com/narendramodi/s...

Narendra Modi @narendramodi

During his speech at the #NamasteTrump programme, @POTUS @realDonaldTrump highlighted aspects of his vision for USA. He also spoke at length about India's greatness as well as the greatness of our culture, ethos, people and more. I thank him for his kind words.

84.4K 6:13 PM - Feb 24, 2020

29.6K people are talking about this

Ivanka Trump and Jared Kushner are on the trip, and they posted shots from the Taj Mahal:

Those images of the Trump's lavish visit clashed jarringly with pictures of protesters, speaking out against Modi's anti-Muslim policies, being viciously attacked by police:

A member of the president's coronavirus response team struggled to access a publicly available coronavirus map:

The Bloomberg campaign made a Twitter thread calling out vandalism on different campaign offices, including one in Flint, Mich. It backfired.

Consider this from the former secretary of labor:

 Robert Reich ✓
@RBReich

Cost of repairing Flint's water pipes: $55 million

Cost of Mike Bloomberg's ad spending: $505.8 million

America deserves better than an oligarch wasting his fortune trying to buy the presidency.
twitter.com/Mike2020/statu...

Team Bloomberg ✓ @Mike2020
Replying to @Mike2020
"Eat the Rich"
Our office in Flint, MI

America deserves better.

♥ 25.3K 8:55 PM - Feb 24, 2020 ⓘ

💬 9,416 people are talking about this. >

Videos of the day

Stephen Colbert reviewed Trump's performance in India:

Trevor Noah looked at some of the things India is doing to give Trump a memorable experience:

Seth Meyers made fun of the mainstream media's “meltdown” over Sanders's success in Nevada:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Fact Checker for a weekly review of what's true, false or in-between in politics, from The Post's famous fact-checking team. Count the pinocchios! Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Biden uses Obama as a shield – and cudgel – in bid to thwart Sanders in South Carolina
Date: Tuesday, February 25, 2020 10:24:56 AM

Powered by LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Uber

By James Hohmann

with Mariana Alfaro

Email

Biden uses Obama as a shield – and cudgel – in bid to thwart Sanders in South Carolina

CHARLESTON, S.C. – Joe Biden spoke frantically – faster and louder than normal – as he touted his relationship with Barack Obama during a rally here on Monday night. No longer content to merely cite the former president as validation, Biden now invokes his old boss to attack his opponents – specifically Bernie Sanders and Tom Steyer, who are nipping at his heels in South Carolina by making inroads with African American voters.

Biden exudes a new sense of urgency as he makes what could be his last stand ahead of Saturday's primary, in which the majority of voters will be black. "When we were president – when Barack was president, and I was vice president – we went to HBCUs," Biden said, referring to historically black colleges and universities.

He said stricter gun laws would have prevented the massacre of nine African American parishioners during a Bible study in 2015 at the Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church a few blocks away. "I went there with Barack," he said, referring to the memorial service when Obama sang "Amazing Grace." "We met with all the families."

Biden's extended bear hug of his former running mate came a few hours after his campaign launched a new attack ad against Sanders for mulling a primary challenge in 2012 against "our first African American president."

The 60-second digital spot features audio from a 2011 radio interview in which the independent senator from Vermont said, "I think it would be a good idea if President Obama faced some primary opposition." The spot ends with a narrator saying: "When it comes to building on President Obama's legacy, Bernie Sanders just can't be trusted." The campaign said this is part of a $600,000 digital buy in South Carolina that will play on YouTube, Facebook and Instagram.

Obama has not endorsed anyone, and he's kept his head down as the primary has heated up. Some allies of the former president speculate privately that he wants to maintain credibility with all the factions of the party if there's a contested convention so that he could help mediate. He's previously signaled unease with Sanders's style of radical politics, but Obama's shown no inclination to forcefully or publicly articulate such concerns.

Responding to Biden's attack, Sanders categorically denied that he ever considered a primary challenge against Obama. The Atlantic reported last week that the president's 2012 reelection campaign was panicked about the possibility after being tipped off by Sen. Pat Leahy (D-Vt.) that Sanders was seriously considering it, and they took it seriously enough that then-Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) was enlisted to dissuade Sanders from running.

"Not true at all," Sanders said during a town hall in Charleston that aired on CNN last night. "I'm the senator from a small state, and I did not give any consideration to running for president of the United States until 2015." He added that he was "very busy running for reelection" in 2012. "In fact, I ended up campaigning for Obama, and I'm a strong supporter of all that Barack Obama has accomplished," he said. "Joe is a friend of mine. I've known him for many years. But you know what happens in campaigns? At the end of the season, it's called silly season. People say things they should not say."

The former vice president has leaned on his eight years of service in what he likes to call "the Obama-Biden administration" since announcing his candidacy for the Democratic nomination last spring, but he's becoming as explicit about it as ever. Biden's staff set up teleprompters last night next to a podium in a gymnasium at the College of Charleston, but he ignored those accoutrements and paced with a wireless microphone. He claimed the 2009 stimulus package wouldn't have passed without him. "The president asked me to handle it," he said, referring to Obama. "The president said ... 'Sheriff Joe will do it.'" Biden also touted the Affordable Care Act. "Five Democratic presidents tried to get Obamacare or something like it passed," he said. "We got it passed."

Biden has started going after Sanders directly almost every chance he gets. "We've just had significant disagreements with Bernie, but the way he talks about it, you'd think he and Barack were close buddies," he said Sunday night on MSNBC. "I know they were not."

A fresh NBC News-Marist University poll helps explain why: Biden leads Sanders 27 percent to 23 percent among likely Democratic primary voters, with a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percent. Steyer places third with 15 percent. No one else breaks into double digits, but 27 percent of likely voters say they remain persuadable.

Joe Biden speaks Monday night at the College of Charleston. (Elizabeth Frantz/Reuters)

Biden is laser focused on the Palmetto State because he recognizes that failing here would functionally end his campaign. He hopes to ride momentum from a victory on Saturday to success in the other Southern states with large African American populations that vote one week from today on Super Tuesday. Reflecting his limited financial resources, Biden is not airing television ads in any of the states that vote next week.

In fact, Biden came to his Charleston rally from a fundraiser in Mount Pleasant at the home of a prominent local lawyer on the banks of Hobcaw Creek. State Sen. Marlon Kimpson (D), who is black, led the donors in a reprise of the “Fired up, ready to go” chant that was common during Obama rallies. “On the most fundamental decision that President Barack Obama had to make, and that is choosing a vice president, he chose Joe Biden and he has said, the president has said, that’s the best damn decision he has ever made,” Kimpson said at the fundraiser. “Don’t be confused by the fantasyland nirvana proposals. It ain’t going nowhere. Senator Sanders has spent more than 30 years up on Capitol Hill talking about the same thing, and nothing has passed. Let’s not get it confused.”

Biden then ripped into Sanders for supporting a bill to limit liability for gun manufacturers. “Bernie’s a good guy,” said Biden. “He talks about how we all make mistakes. Well, he didn’t tell you he voted five times against the Brady Bill and the waiting period. He voted against allowing us to go up and sue the companies that created this havoc.”

The odds seem good that Sanders's purported flirtation with primarying Obama will come up during tonight's debate, which begins at 8 p.m. Eastern and will air on CBS. The six other candidates onstage have each realized, to varying degrees, that Sanders could build an insurmountable lead in the hunt for delegates next Tuesday if nothing is done to bludgeon his momentum. The collective action problem complicates efforts to stop Sanders: Everyone wants to promote their own candidacy more than they want to stop Sanders. Going too negative could generate backlash and ill will from party activists. On the other hand, with the field still so fragmented, there are new incentives to try to emerge as Sanders's chief detractor. That's certainly the role that Mike Bloomberg wants to play. Bloomberg, who spent Monday cloistered at the Four Seasons in Orlando for debate prep, reportedly plans to go after Sanders for his gun-related votes.

Bernie Sanders speaks on Monday night at the South Carolina Democratic Party's "First in the South" dinner at the Charleston Marriott. He threw out his prepared remarks. (Drew Angerer/Getty Images)

For his part, Sanders is telegraphing a more conciliatory approach. Before his town hall on CNN, Sanders spoke last night at a dinner hosted by the South Carolina Democratic Party. Biden, Sen. Amy Klobuchar (Minn.), Elizabeth Warren (Mass.), Pete Buttigieg and Steyer also delivered remarks at the Charleston Marriott. The Sanders campaign distributed the prepared text of his speech in advance. The senator was slated to criticize “the political establishment and some of my opponents.” But Sanders tossed these comments and instead emphasized his own electability. “I know you’re hearing a lot on TV, ‘Bernie can’t win,’” Sanders said. “Don’t believe everything you hear on TV.”

All of the voters I spoke with at Biden’s rally said his background as Obama’s wingman is an important asset weighing in his favor. Since Iowa, though, you hear much less from attendees at his events about electability and much more about likeability. Allison Pryor, 57, a retired probation and parole officer who lives in Charleston and is African American, said she’ll vote for Biden because he seems so relatable. She appreciated his perseverance after his wife died in a car crash and his son died of brain cancer. “He rode the train, and he’s always been like a cup of coffee: Regular Old Joe,” said Pryor. “Yes, it’s good to know he’d be a continuation of the Obama administration. But I think he can also stand on his own merits.”

A national poll conducted by Fox News in August found that 60 percent of Americans held a favorable impression of Obama, including 95 percent of both Democrats and African Americans, as well as 56 percent of independents. Among Democrats, 78 percent felt “strongly favorable” toward the former president and 17 percent were “somewhat favorable.”

But several voters I’ve interviewed around South Carolina have wondered why Obama’s not endorsing Biden if they’re so close. Biden claimed last April, dubiously, that he asked Obama “not to endorse” him so that the president could stay neutral. Others said they’ve seen ads online from Bloomberg highlighting how close he was with Obama as New York’s mayor.

“This is going to be Biden’s last stand because he thinks that black people are going to support him just because of Barack Obama,” said Connie Breeden, an attorney in Columbia who is African American. “He’s tooting that horn all the way to the bank. But people are savvier than that. He hasn’t done anything. What has he actually done for us? Nothing. Nothing. Nothing. I’m leaning toward Steyer because he’s really put his money where his mouth is.”

Tom Steyer greets supporters after a speech on Sunday afternoon in Yemassee, S.C. (Elizabeth Frantz/Reuters)

Biden has also been invoking Obama as he steps up his attacks on Steyer, the X factor in this primary. The former V.P. blasted the billionaire from San Francisco over the weekend for investing in private prisons while he and Obama were in the White House trying to get rid of private prisons.

Steyer defended himself during his own CNN town hall last night. “I thought it was the right thing, I decided it was the wrong thing and, 15 years ago, I sold it for moral reasons,” he said. “I came to the conclusion that everyone has come to conclude now, that this isn't a place to make money.” Steyer added that he’s sought to atone for his past investment by funding initiatives in California to get rid of private prisons. “When I make a mistake, I correct it,” he said.

Many black voters draw a clear distinction between Obama and Biden. Steven Lykes, 44, a full-time caretaker, is torn between Sanders and Steyer. He backed Hillary Clinton in the primary four years ago, and his favorite candidate had been Elizabeth Warren for much of the past year. Lykes thinks the senator from Massachusetts is an amazing debater and loves her plans, but Warren’s lackluster finishes in the first three states gave him pause.

“Biden has run three different times,” Lykes said in Columbia. “I’m always scared because Donald Trump is a savvy campaigner. You’ve got to have someone who is on their tippy toes and ready to fight back. I don’t think Biden can do that. He has too many gaffes. You can see it in the debates. He’s having a hard enough time just against the candidates we have. But Bernie can stand up to Trump like nobody’s business.”

Obama’s shadow looms large in the minds of black voters in other ways that don’t necessarily help Biden. David Swinton, the former president of Benedict College in Columbia, a historically black liberal arts college, said he and his wife already cast their ballots early for Sanders. “We cannot be concerned about all the pundits who say he can’t win,” said Swinton. “Let’s not worry about that. Let’s vote for what we feel in our heart, rather than who might win. Remember, nobody thought Barack Obama could win. And he did.”

South Carolina does not have partisan voter registration, which means people can vote in whatever primary they want. An open primary means that there will be many moderate voters who may not like Trump but don’t necessarily swoon for Obama. There’s also buzz on the right, for example, that Republicans should vote for Sanders here to elevate his candidacy on the theory that he’d be much easier for Trump to defeat in the fall. This could be a factor in a close race.

Attitudes toward Obama are more complicated among white Democrats. Lifelong Democrat Doug Brafford, a retired lawyer who lives in Mount Pleasant, plans to support Buttigieg after backing Sanders in the primary four years ago. “One of the things that upsets me about Joe Biden is that, as vice president, he repeatedly denigrated Southerners,” said Brafford, 77. “When Obama said that people cling to their guns and religion, Biden didn’t speak out. He picked up where Obama left off. I love Obama with all my heart, but I think he’s divisive – and that matters to me.”

Brafford dislikes Trump, but he worries that his party’s nonstop attacks on the president hurt politically. That’s why he finds Buttigieg’s calls for civility so compelling. “We have been uncivil in this party,” said Brafford. “It may drive some middle-of-the-roaders to stay at home. It has turned some people off.”

Barack Obama, then a presidential hopeful, shares a laugh with Edith Childs in Aiken, S.C. Childs has endorsed Steyer's bid this year. (Brett Flashnick/AP)

It's about more than personalities, too. Democrats are divided about the best approach to governing. The CBS-YouGov poll published on Sunday, which had Biden up 5 points over Sanders, found that 54 percent of likely Democratic voters in South Carolina think the party should nominate someone who is trying to “return the country to the way it was before Donald Trump took office,” and 46 percent said Democrats should instead “advance a more progressive agenda than the country had under Barack Obama.”

Obama himself left little doubt as to which way he'd answer that CBS poll question during a speech in November in which he urged Democrats running for the White House not to lurch too far left to win the nomination. “This is still a country that is less revolutionary than it is interested in improvement,” the former president said during a meeting of the Democracy Alliance, the powerful network of liberal megadonors, in what was covered at the time as a subtle rebuke of Sandersism. “They like seeing things improved. But the average American doesn't think that we have to completely tear down the system and remake it. And I think it's important for us not to lose sight of that.”

To be sure, African American voters in South Carolina revere Obama. Dorothy Hollis, 77, retired nine years ago after 40 years of teaching high school. Now she teaches Sunday school and sings in the choir at First Calvary Baptist Church in Columbia. As Saturday looms, she’s undecided and praying for guidance. “I want President Obama to run again, to be honest,” she said. “He was an outstanding president. Like Abraham Lincoln, those don’t come but every so often. So we have to take the next best thing and accept a flawed person and just go with it. But who is that?”

Hollis thought four years ago that Clinton would be a wonderful president, but she said none of the candidates in 2020 particularly excite her. “Sometimes it takes a devil to catch the Devil. It takes a thief to catch a thief. Sometimes it takes that. And I’m not sure we have that on the platform right now,” she said.

Her faith comforts her in what she sees as a perilous moment for the country. Hollis said she was “just so tickled” when heavy winds blew down a section of Trump’s border wall a few weeks ago before the cement hardened. To her, it was a sign. “God is good,” Hollis said. “To me, that was a warning. Those little things, those are warnings. You can’t fight against the powers that be. That wall is going to come down one way or another. Just ask Joshua.”

In the Book of Joshua, the walls of Jericho fall after the Israelites blow their trumpets. “If we don’t get anybody genuine to deal with this world, we’re going to all just perish,” she said. “The one will come.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

More on 2020

Sanders's Cold War travels face fresh scrutiny.

Buttigieg and Bloomberg attacked the senator for his comments about Fidel Castro's Cuba in a "60 Minutes" interview that aired Sunday night. Sanders said Castro deserved praise where it was due, including for a "massive literacy program." "During the dying days of the Cold War, Sanders indulged a fascination with far more disruptive and divisive strains of a socialist ideology he has embraced throughout his adult life," Griff Witte reports. "Returning home from visits to some of the United States' most avowed enemies, Sanders offered some criticism but also plenty of praise in Vermont community television recordings. ... Now, Sanders's comments are coming back to life as opponents say his warm feelings toward his hosts decades ago make him vulnerable to attack and reveal a soft spot for left-wing despots."

Sanders defended his Castro comments during last night's CNN town hall. "You know what? I think teaching people to read and write is a good thing,” he said. “I have been extremely consistent and critical of all authoritarian regimes all over the world — including Cuba, including Nicaragua, including Saudi Arabia, including China, including Russia. I happen to believe in democracy, not authoritarianism. ... But can anyone deny — I mean, the facts are clear — that [China has] taken more people out of extreme poverty than any country in history?” When pressed on Castro’s legacy, he responded, “Truth is truth. All right?”

Democrats fret this could cost them Florida in the general.

Terrie Rizzo, the chair of the Florida Democratic Party, didn’t mention Sanders by name but released a statement saying Democrats in her state “stand in solidarity with the thousands of people who have fled violent dictatorships in Cuba, Venezuela and Nicaragua.” Two Democratic congresswomen from Florida — Debbie Mucarsel-Powell and Donna Shalala — took issue with the comments as well, with Shalala saying she hopes that Sanders “will take time to speak to some of my constituents before he decides to sing the praises of a murderous tyrant like Fidel Castro.” Sen. Robert Menendez (N.J.), the only Cuban American Democratic senator, also denounced Sanders’s comments.

Sen. Michael Bennet (D-Colo.) paused for 17 seconds last night when Paul Kane asked him if Sanders can win the general election.

“I’m not sure I’m the right person to ask about winning a Democratic primary, but I think winning a primary election and winning a general election are two different things,” said Bennet, who dropped out of the presidential race after garnering less than 1 percent of the vote in New Hampshire. Bennet expressed concern that Sanders could make it harder for John Hickenlooper, the former governor of his state, to defeat Sen. Cory Gardner (R-Colo.). Bennet, the former chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said he believes Democrats “need to nominate somebody in this process who is going to be able to win purple states like Colorado and lead us to a 55-senator majority in the Senate. That could be challenging.”

Biden claimed he was arrested trying to see Nelson Mandela. There’s no evidence of that.

“Biden, as a senator, was active in the anti-apartheid movement, helping pass sanctions on companies doing business in South Africa over President Ronald Reagan’s veto. But there is no evidence that Biden was ever arrested trying to see the imprisoned future president of a democratic South Africa,” fact checker Glenn Kessler writes. “As far as we can tell, Biden never mentioned this arrest before; neither can we locate any news accounts of him being arrested.”

A Sanders staffer was fired for mocking Warren’s looks and Buttigieg’s sexuality on Twitter.

“Using the account @perma_ben, Ben Mora, a regional field director for Sanders’ campaign based in Michigan, has attacked other Democrats in the field—as well as their family members, surrogates, journalists, and politically active celebrities—in deeply personal terms, mocking their physical appearance, gender, and sexuality, among other things,” the Daily Beast reports. “Mora, the Sanders campaign confirmed, has been fired.”

Sanders and his campaign have stepped up criticism of MSNBC.

“Sanders reportedly confronted MSNBC president Phil Griffin and another network executive last week before the NBC-sponsored Democratic debate in Las Vegas to complain about its coverage, including disparaging comments made by Chris Matthews and ‘Meet the Press’ host Chuck Todd. MSNBC has not confirmed the encounters took place, though it hasn’t disputed the report either,” Paul Farhi and Jenna Johnson report. “Sanders’ campaign manager, Faiz Shakir, told Vanity Fair last week that MSNBC ‘is constantly undermining the Bernie Sanders campaign.’ He has even said Fox News has been ‘more fair than MSNBC’ ...

“The campaign’s ire was raised further by Matthews’s commentary as Sanders swept to an early lead in Nevada on Saturday. Matthews compared Sanders’s performance to Nazi Germany’s shattering military victory over France in the early months of World War II, suggesting Sanders’s path to the Democratic nomination was unstoppable. ‘It’s over,’ said Matthews, referring to a French prime minister's assessment of the battle and possibly the war. The comparison was flawed in several respects (France was eventually liberated and Germany was crushed by allied forces), but Sanders's representatives expressed outrage that Matthews had compared Sanders to Hitler's soldiers, given that Sanders, a Jew, lost family members during the Holocaust. ... Matthews apologized to Sanders on his program, 'Hardball,' on Monday night. 'As I watched the one-sided results of Saturday's Democratic caucus in Nevada, I reached for an historical analogy and used a bad one..., he said."

---

Quote of the day

"We're going to spend Trump out of office," Bloomberg campaign manager Kevin Sheekey told Vanity Fair.

In a historically old presidential field, candidates are still refusing to release their health records.

Klobuchar, 59, released four pages of medical documentation last night with recent lab results and a doctor's letter that said she's in "very good health." Buttigieg, 38, has yet to release any medical records despite arguing last week that the candidates should undergo physical exams and disclose the results. Bloomberg, 78, released a single page from his doctor that said he's in "great physical shape" and that he "plays golf avidly." Biden, 77, released a three-page letter describing him as "healthy [and] vigorous." Sanders, 78, released letters from three doctors – including a cardiologist who said he has "the mental and physical stamina" to be president. Warren, 70, released five pages of documents revealing a thyroid condition and a doctor's letter declaring her in "excellent health." (Matt Viser and Lenny Bernstein)

A Minneapolis inmate blamed Klobuchar for what he claims was a wrongful conviction.

"She recharged me with first degree murder, never looked into the facts of the case. Never looked into the misconduct that had taken place," Myon

Burrell told ABC News. He was convicted for the 2002 first-degree murder of 11-year-old Tyesha Edwards. Recently, an AP investigation has cast doubt over the murder investigation and the police tactics used.

Klobuchar, Burrell said, “never even addressed the misconduct that had taken place and still put the same detective, the same police on my case to go and get more bogus evidence.” In a statement to ABC, Klobuchar once again called for a review of the case.

Presidential candidates are rebranding Rep. Jim Clyburn’s anti-poverty program as reparations.

“Clyburn (D-S.C.), whose district encompasses eight of the state’s poorest counties, has long opposed cash payments to African Americans whose ancestors were enslaved. He believes it would be too difficult to determine who deserves to be compensated. But a race-neutral anti-poverty program he conceived a decade ago is now catching fire among candidates for the Democratic nomination as a way to provide practical restitution for slavery,” Tracy Jan reports. “Several presidential hopefuls, including [Sanders and Klobuchar], have sought to rebrand Clyburn’s program as a vehicle for reparations, which remain politically contentious. Clyburn’s idea, with strong bipartisan support, was originally adopted in 2009 by just one federal agency. But framing the program, which targets federal spending on certain high-poverty areas, as reparations has drawn criticism from African Americans living in poor urban neighborhoods — some in Clyburn’s own district — that do not qualify for the funding, as well as longtime advocates for reparations. The critique underlines the difficulty of finding a solution that would satisfy those demanding redress and also be politically viable.”

The State newspaper in Columbia endorses Buttigieg in today’s edition.

“During the last half-century, the Democratic Party has only won the presidency when it has resisted the temptation to pick status-quo nominees and shown the courage to choose centrist outsiders with fresh, optimistic messages,” the editorial explains. “Jimmy Carter, Bill Clinton and Barack Obama prevailed in part because they understood the values of real-world America. All three successfully connected with voters by tapping into the sensibilities of average Americans. Buttigieg has gained that needed perspective during his eight years leading South Bend, a Midwestern city that had to reinvent itself and cast aside a Rust Belt image.”

Silicon Valley asked Warren for help with a fundraiser. Her campaign considered it.

“Warren’s team in recent weeks explored ways to raise money from Silicon Valley donors without violating her ironclad fundraising pledge to not ‘sell access to my time,’” Recode reports. “The Democratic presidential campaign considered an inbound request to have a campaign representative — such as an endorser, a staff member, or a high-level volunteer leader — attend a now-canceled high-dollar event in the Bay Area, according to several people familiar with the discussions.”

Trump’s former doctor thought he had a ticket to Congress. It might not be that easy.

Ronny Jackson is one of 15 candidates in a crowded Republican primary in Texas, and the White House hasn’t gone out of its way to help, the New York Times reports. “Jackson left the West Wing in December after rising from Trump’s physician to his unlikely pick to lead the Department of Veterans Affairs to Trump administration roadkill when he was forced to withdraw his name from consideration amid allegations related to his professional conduct. Now he’s running for Congress in Texas’ 13th District, one of the most conservative in the country, and his argument is simple... Jackson is betting his personal connection with the president is enough to win the Republican nomination tantamount to election. ... But it is not clear if that connection, combined with his background as a Navy rear admiral, will be enough to help Dr. Jackson overcome some rookie mistakes as a candidate.”

---

The new world order

Trump and Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi hug after giving a joint statement in New Delhi. (Manish Swarup/AP)

Trump said the U.S.-India relationship has “never been as good” as it is now.

The president and “Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi hailed the growing defense ties between the world’s two largest democracies even as they acknowledged that a trade deal between them remains distant.

During his second day in India, Trump is holding formal meetings with the Indian leadership, making a visit to the U.S. Embassy and attending a state banquet in New Delhi,” Joanna Slater reports. “Trump began Tuesday by participating in a grand ceremonial welcome and visiting a memorial to Mohandas Gandhi ... There will be no huge crowds or tourism for the president today.

“On Monday, as Trump arrived in India, violence broke out in Delhi between supporters and opponents of [Modi’s] controversial new citizenship law. Critics say the law is unconstitutional and discriminates against Muslims. ... [Violence continued today], police told local media that the death toll from Monday’s violence had climbed to seven, including one police officer. More than 100 people were injured, according to media reports. Heavy police presence in the affected areas failed to stem the violence. ... Home Minister Amit Shah, Modi’s second-in-command, chaired a meeting with top officials and the Delhi state leadership. The government ruled out calling the army for assistance and said there were adequate security forces on the ground. ...

“First lady Melania Trump visited a public school in New Delhi to attend a ‘happiness class,’ part of a special curriculum introduced across India’s capital in 2018 to emphasize well-being alongside academic achievement. ... [Meanwhile], Trump and Modi claimed progress Tuesday toward a comprehensive trade deal, but a chummy atmosphere between the two leaders during Trump’s state visit could not mask frustration that the long-delayed pact is still in limbo. Trump predicted that a successful deal is in the offing but gave no deadline. The United States had once hoped to have the agreement ready in September, when Modi visited the United States.”

Trump’s acting director of national intelligence worked for a nonprofit group funded mostly by Hungary.

“[Richard] Grenell’s public relations firm was paid to do work for a U.S. nonprofit funded almost entirely by the Hungarian government led by far-right Prime Minister Viktor Orban,” Emma Brown, Beth Reinhard and Dalton Bennett report. Individuals who have served as acting directors of national intelligence “typically have been nonpartisan national security professionals whose experience has included leading intelligence agencies or service in the military. Now that promotion is drawing fresh scrutiny to Grenell’s past, including his foreign affairs commentary and consulting work after he served as U.S. spokesman at the United Nations during the George W. Bush administration. His work for the Hungarian-funded nonprofit is the type of activity that, in other cases, has drawn the attention of Justice Department investigators tasked with enforcing the Foreign Agents Registration Act (FARA).”

The White House asked Congress for an emergency $1.8 billion to bolster the response.

“The request includes $1.25 billion in new funding for the Department of Health and Human Services, as well as the ability to transfer an additional $535 million set aside to fight Ebola and use it for the coronavirus response instead,” Erica Werner, Jeff Stein and Lena Sun report. “The request reflects the fast-evolving nature of the crisis confronting the administration, which until recently had insisted that no additional funds were necessary. But Democrats immediately slammed the request as too small, with House Appropriations Committee Chairwoman Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.) calling it ‘woefully insufficient to protect Americans’ and criticizing the administration for trying to ‘raid’ money from other public health accounts.”

The market plunge yesterday underscored the coronavirus’s political risk to Trump.

“The Trump administration’s disjointed handling of the outbreak has faced mounting criticism as the president’s allies have scrambled to take preventive steps while seeking to reassure the public, at times struggling to explain their decisions and offer a consistent message,” Toluse Olorunnipa and Costa report. “For a president who has governed ‘by tweet and circus,’ a potential global health crisis that blunts economic growth could expose one of Trump’s main weaknesses as he prepares to face voters in November, said Russell Riley, a presidential historian at the University of Virginia’s Miller Center.”

New virus cases in China and North Korea raised concerns about how long it could take to go back to normal.

“The Chinese government said Tuesday that there had been 508 new confirmed cases by the end of the previous day, along with 74 deaths, bringing the total number of accumulated infections nationwide to 77,658, with 2,663 deaths,” Adam Taylor and Wang Yuan report. “A Chinese official suggested Monday evening that the country needs at least 28 days without new cases to show the virus is not spreading. ... The remarks drew thousands of comments on Weibo, China’s Twitter-like service, where many wondered how long they would have to wait before normal life resumed. ‘Two months will have 60% of enterprises killed!’ one user wrote.”

A California judge delayed a decision on moving coronavirus-exposed Americans.

“A federal judge on Monday directed federal and state officials to answer the questions of Costa Mesa, Calif., residents about their plans to bring Americans who have tested positive for the coronavirus but show no signs of illness to a closed mental-health facility in the city,” Jeff Rowe and Yasmeen Abutaleb report. “District Judge Josephine Staton cautioned that the city — and Orange County if it joins the effort — does not have veto power over state and federal quarantine decisions and faces an uphill battle trying to block the transfer of people from Travis Air Force Base in Northern California.”

Hosni Mubarak, Egypt’s autocratic ruler whose power came to an end during the Arab Spring uprisings, died at 91. (Will Englund and T. Rees Shapiro)

---

Domestic developments that shouldn't be overlooked

Harvey Weinstein was found guilty on two charges of sexual assault.

“The jury determined that Weinstein forced oral sex on former production assistant Mimi Haley at his apartment in July 2006 and raped former aspiring actress Jessica Mann at a hotel in 2013,” Shayna Jacobs reports. “He was found not guilty of the most severe charges, of predatory sexual assault, which would have acknowledged a pattern that included forcing sex on actress Annabella Sciorra in 1993 or 1994. Weinstein, 67, faces at least five years and up to 25 on the count of first-degree criminal sex act for his assault on Haley, and up to four years on a third-degree rape count for the Mann encounter. The judge can consider running the sentences consecutively, for a maximum of 29 years. Sentencing is scheduled for March 11. After the verdict announcement, Weinstein was handcuffed and taken to jail, and his bail was revoked.

“Weinstein’s lawyers are expected to appeal the conviction on the basis of several concerns, including the amount of media attention on the case and the fact that the three supporting accusers were permitted to testify even though charges were not brought on their behalf. The appeal must be filed after sentencing. ... Weinstein lawyer Donna Rotunno told reporters, ‘He took it like a man. He knows this is not over.’”

Advocates hailed the Weinstein conviction as a breakthrough.

“‘This is one of those days when the whole world changes,’ said Jane Manning, a former sex-crimes prosecutor in New York and director of the Women’s Equal Justice Project. ‘A sexual predator who was so powerful that he thought he could never be touched has just been held accountable,’” Caitlin Gibson and Elahe Izadi report. ”Deborah Tuerkheimer, a professor of law at Northwestern University, noted that most sexual assault cases that enter the legal system are more likely to fit the stereotypical ‘stranger rape’ paradigm — involving a woman who is assaulted by someone she doesn’t know, resulting in apparent physical injury and, potentially, DNA evidence. The Weinstein case, in contrast, presented a far more complicated portrait of sexual violence — and the fact that New York prosecutors even filed charges against him is ‘extraordinary,’ she said.”

Mitch McConnell, after months of legislative inactivity, will now force votes on abortion.

“McConnell is about to plunge the Senate into the nation’s culture wars with votes on bills to sharply restrict access to late-term abortions and threaten some doctors who perform them with criminal penalties, signaling that Republicans plan to make curbing a woman’s right to terminate a pregnancy a central theme of their re-election campaigns this year,” the Times reports. “After months of shunning legislative activity in favor of confirming [Trump’s] judicial nominees — and a brief detour for the president’s impeachment trial — [McConnell] is expected to bring the bills up for votes on Tuesday. Both lack the necessary 60-vote supermajority to advance, and the Senate has voted previously to reject them. But by putting them on the floor again, Mr. McConnell hopes to energize the social conservatives who helped elect Mr. Trump.”

An appeals court upheld the Trump move to withdraw Title X funding for abortions.

“The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals -- long regarded as a liberal body, though Trump appointees have started to tilt the balance -- lifted preliminary injunctions against the rules issued by lower courts in cases from three different states,” Fox News reports. “Xavier Becerra, attorney general of California, one of the states that sued over the regulations, said the Ninth Circuit’s ruling was ‘troubling.’”

Justice Clarence Thomas cited himself in arguing to overturn a decision he authored.

“Although I authored Brand X, ‘it is never too late to ‘surrende[r] former views to a better considered position,’ Thomas wrote in his Monday dissent, quoting himself from a 2018 opinion in South Dakota v. Wayfair, Inc.,” Fox reports. “Thomas has recently been quite vocal in advocating for the court to overturn a variety of precedents, saying in one opinion last year that when ‘faced with a demonstrably erroneous precedent, my rule is simple: We should not follow it.’”

Oregon lawmakers were supposed to vote on a climate change bill. Once again, Republicans walked out.

“For the second time in eight months, Oregon Republicans walked out of the capitol, denying the Democratic supermajority a chance to pass a bill that would limit greenhouse gas emissions. By absconding, the 11 GOP lawmakers prevented the quorum necessary to vote on the legislation and forced Democrats to adjourn for the day,” Reis Thebault reports. “It was the same tactic Republican lawmakers employed in June, when they fled to Idaho to avoid a vote on an earlier version of the same cap-and-trade bill, prompting Oregon’s governor to call in state troopers to track them down and return them to the statehouse.”

The TSA froze hiring and overtime pay as the spring travel season nears.

“Hydrick Thomas, the [TSA] union’s president, said agency officials told him last week that the freezes would be in place until April or May,” Ian Duncan reports. “That could leave security checkpoints short-staffed, he said. ‘You’re going to have long lines,’ Thomas said. ‘That’s just the way it works.’”

Vanessa Bryant sued the helicopter operator in the crash that killed her husband and daughter, and 7 others.

“The lawsuit alleges that the helicopter company, Island Express, was ‘vicariously liable’ for any and all actions of pilot Ara George Zobayan, including his ‘negligent and careless piloting,’” Lori Aratani reports.

The suit was filed the same day thousands gathered at the Staples Center to remember the victims. “[Bryant's] public memorial Monday sparked a heartbreaking tribute from his wife, Vanessa; brought Michael Jordan to tears; and led former teammate Shaquille O’Neal to share behind-the-scenes anecdotes during a two-hour ceremony,” Ben Golliver and Cindy Boren report. “NBA Commissioner Adam Silver; Hall of Famers Bill Russell, Magic Johnson and Kareem Abdul-Jabbar; current stars Stephen Curry and Kyrie Irving; and dozens of other prominent athletes and entertainers [attended] the celebration of life."

---

Social media speed read

Trump shared a video recap of India's welcome:

Donald J. Trump
@realDonaldTrump

twitter.com/narendramodi/s...

Narendra Modi @narendramodi

During his speech at the #NamasteTrump programme, @POTUS @realDonaldTrump highlighted aspects of his vision for USA. He also spoke at length about India's greatness as well as the greatness of our culture, ethos, people and more. I thank him for his kind words.

84.4K 6:13 PM - Feb 24, 2020

29.6K people are talking about this

Ivanka Trump and Jared Kushner are on the trip, and they posted shots from the Taj Mahal:

Those images of the Trump's lavish visit clashed jarringly with pictures of protesters, speaking out against Modi's anti-Muslim policies, being viciously attacked by police:

A member of the president's coronavirus response team struggled to access a publicly available coronavirus map:

The Bloomberg campaign made a Twitter thread calling out vandalism on different campaign offices, including one in Flint, Mich. It backfired.

Consider this from the former secretary of labor:

Robert Reich @RBReich

Cost of repairing Flint's water pipes: $55 million

Cost of Mike Bloomberg's ad spending: $505.8 million

America deserves better than an oligarch wasting his fortune trying to buy the presidency.
twitter.com/Mike2020/statu...

Team Bloomberg @Mike2020
Replying to @Mike2020

"Eat the Rich"
Our office in Flint, MI

America deserves better.

25.3K 8:55 PM - Feb 24, 2020

9,416 people are talking about this.

Videos of the day

Stephen Colbert reviewed Trump's performance in India:

Trevor Noah looked at some of the things India is doing to give Trump a memorable experience:

Seth Meyers made fun of the mainstream media's "meltdown" over Sanders's success in Nevada:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Fact Checker for a weekly review of what's true, false or in-between in politics, from The Post's famous fact-checking team. Count the pinocchios!
Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Biden uses Obama as a shield – and cudgel – in bid to thwart Sanders in South Carolina
Date: Tuesday, February 25, 2020 10:25:35 AM

Powered by LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Uber

By James Hohmann

with Mariana Alfaro

Email

Biden uses Obama as a shield – and cudgel – in bid to thwart Sanders in South Carolina

CHARLESTON, S.C. – Joe Biden spoke frantically – faster and louder than normal – as he touted his relationship with Barack Obama during a rally here on Monday night. No longer content to merely cite the former president as validation, Biden now invokes his old boss to attack his opponents – specifically Bernie Sanders and Tom Steyer, who are nipping at his heels in South Carolina by making inroads with African American voters.

Biden exudes a new sense of urgency as he makes what could be his last stand ahead of Saturday's primary, in which the majority of voters will be black. "When we were president – when Barack was president, and I was vice president – we went to HBCUs," Biden said, referring to historically black colleges and universities.

He said stricter gun laws would have prevented the massacre of nine African American parishioners during a Bible study in 2015 at the Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church a few blocks away. "I went there with Barack," he said, referring to the memorial service when Obama sang "Amazing Grace." "We met with all the families."

Biden's extended bear hug of his former running mate came a few hours after his campaign launched a new attack ad against Sanders for mulling a primary challenge in 2012 against "our first African American president."

The 60-second digital spot features audio from a 2011 radio interview in which the independent senator from Vermont said, "I think it would be a good idea if President Obama faced some primary opposition." The spot ends with a narrator saying: "When it comes to building on President Obama's legacy, Bernie Sanders just can't be trusted." The campaign said this is part of a $600,000 digital buy in South Carolina that will play on YouTube, Facebook and Instagram.

Obama has not endorsed anyone, and he's kept his head down as the primary has heated up. Some allies of the former president speculate privately that he wants to maintain credibility with all the factions of the party if there's a contested convention so that he could help mediate. He's previously signaled unease with Sanders's style of radical politics, but Obama's shown no inclination to forcefully or publicly articulate such concerns.

Responding to Biden's attack, Sanders categorically denied that he ever considered a primary challenge against Obama. The Atlantic reported last week that the president's 2012 reelection campaign was panicked about the possibility after being tipped off by Sen. Pat Leahy (D-Vt.) that Sanders was seriously considering it, and they took it seriously enough that then-Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) was enlisted to dissuade Sanders from running.

"Not true at all," Sanders said during a town hall in Charleston that aired on CNN last night. "I'm the senator from a small state, and I did not give any consideration to running for president of the United States until 2015." He added that he was "very busy running for reelection" in 2012. "In fact, I ended up campaigning for Obama, and I'm a strong supporter of all that Barack Obama has accomplished," he said. "Joe is a friend of mine. I've known him for many years. But you know what happens in campaigns? At the end of the season, it's called silly season. People say things they should not say."

The former vice president has leaned on his eight years of service in what he likes to call "the Obama-Biden administration" since announcing his candidacy for the Democratic nomination last spring, but he's becoming as explicit about it as ever. Biden's staff set up teleprompters last night next to a podium in a gymnasium at the College of Charleston, but he ignored those accoutrements and paced with a wireless microphone. He claimed the 2009 stimulus package wouldn't have passed without him. "The president asked me to handle it," he said, referring to Obama. "The president said ... 'Sheriff Joe will do it.'" Biden also touted the Affordable Care Act. "Five Democratic presidents tried to get Obamacare or something like it passed," he said. "We got it passed."

Biden has started going after Sanders directly almost every chance he gets. "We've just had significant disagreements with Bernie, but the way he talks about it, you'd think he and Barack were close buddies," he said Sunday night on MSNBC. "I know they were not."

A fresh NBC News-Marist University poll helps explain why: Biden leads Sanders 27 percent to 23 percent among likely Democratic primary voters, with a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percent. Steyer places third with 15 percent. No one else breaks into double digits, but 27 percent of likely voters say they remain persuadable.

Joe Biden speaks Monday night at the College of Charleston. (Elizabeth Frantz/Reuters)

Biden is laser focused on the Palmetto State because he recognizes that failing here would functionally end his campaign. He hopes to ride momentum from a victory on Saturday to success in the other Southern states with large African American populations that vote one week from today on Super Tuesday. Reflecting his limited financial resources, Biden is not airing television ads in any of the states that vote next week.

In fact, Biden came to his Charleston rally from a fundraiser in Mount Pleasant at the home of a prominent local lawyer on the banks of Hobcaw Creek. State Sen. Marlon Kimpson (D), who is black, led the donors in a reprise of the “Fired up, ready to go” chant that was common during Obama rallies. “On the most fundamental decision that President Barack Obama had to make, and that is choosing a vice president, he chose Joe Biden and he has said, the president has said, that’s the best damn decision he has ever made,” Kimpson said at the fundraiser. “Don’t be confused by the fantasyland nirvana proposals. It ain’t going nowhere. Senator Sanders has spent more than 30 years up on Capitol Hill talking about the same thing, and nothing has passed. Let’s not get it confused.”

Biden then ripped into Sanders for supporting a bill to limit liability for gun manufacturers. “Bernie’s a good guy,” said Biden. “He talks about how we all make mistakes. Well, he didn’t tell you he voted five times against the Brady Bill and the waiting period. He voted against allowing us to go up and sue the companies that created this havoc.”

The odds seem good that Sanders's purported flirtation with primarying Obama will come up during tonight's debate, which begins at 8 p.m. Eastern and will air on CBS. The six other candidates onstage have each realized, to varying degrees, that Sanders could build an insurmountable lead in the hunt for delegates next Tuesday if nothing is done to bludgeon his momentum. The collective action problem complicates efforts to stop Sanders: Everyone wants to promote their own candidacy more than they want to stop Sanders. Going too negative could generate backlash and ill will from party activists. On the other hand, with the field still so fragmented, there are new incentives to try to emerge as Sanders's chief detractor. That's certainly the role that Mike Bloomberg wants to play. Bloomberg, who spent Monday cloistered at the Four Seasons in Orlando for debate prep, reportedly plans to go after Sanders for his gun-related votes.

Bernie Sanders speaks on Monday night at the South Carolina Democratic Party's "First in the South" dinner at the Charleston Marriott. He threw out his prepared remarks. (Drew Angerer/Getty Images)

For his part, Sanders is telegraphing a more conciliatory approach. Before his town hall on CNN, Sanders spoke last night at a dinner hosted by the South Carolina Democratic Party. Biden, Sen. Amy Klobuchar (Minn.), Elizabeth Warren (Mass.), Pete Buttigieg and Steyer also delivered remarks at the Charleston Marriott. The Sanders campaign distributed the prepared text of his speech in advance. The senator was slated to criticize “the political establishment and some of my opponents.” But Sanders tossed these comments and instead emphasized his own electability. “I know you’re hearing a lot on TV, ‘Bernie can’t win,’” Sanders said. “Don’t believe everything you hear on TV.”

All of the voters I spoke with at Biden’s rally said his background as Obama’s wingman is an important asset weighing in his favor. Since Iowa, though, you hear much less from attendees at his events about electability and much more about likeability. Allison Pryor, 57, a retired probation and parole officer who lives in Charleston and is African American, said she’ll vote for Biden because he seems so relatable. She appreciated his perseverance after his wife died in a car crash and his son died of brain cancer. “He rode the train, and he’s always been like a cup of coffee: Regular Old Joe,” said Pryor. “Yes, it’s good to know he’d be a continuation of the Obama administration. But I think he can also stand on his own merits.”

A national poll conducted by Fox News in August found that 60 percent of Americans held a favorable impression of Obama, including 95 percent of both Democrats and African Americans, as well as 56 percent of independents. Among Democrats, 78 percent felt “strongly favorable” toward the former president and 17 percent were “somewhat favorable.”

But several voters I’ve interviewed around South Carolina have wondered why Obama’s not endorsing Biden if they’re so close. Biden claimed last April, dubiously, that he asked Obama “not to endorse” him so that the president could stay neutral. Others said they’ve seen ads online from Bloomberg highlighting how close he was with Obama as New York’s mayor.

“This is going to be Biden’s last stand because he thinks that black people are going to support him just because of Barack Obama,” said Connie Breeden, an attorney in Columbia who is African American. “He’s tooting that horn all the way to the bank. But people are savvier than that. He hasn’t done anything. What has he actually done for us? Nothing. Nothing. Nothing. I’m leaning toward Steyer because he’s really put his money where his mouth is.”

Tom Steyer greets supporters after a speech on Sunday afternoon in Yemassee, S.C. (Elizabeth Frantz/Reuters)

Biden has also been invoking Obama as he steps up his attacks on Steyer, the X factor in this primary. The former V.P. blasted the billionaire from San Francisco over the weekend for investing in private prisons while he and Obama were in the White House trying to get rid of private prisons.

Steyer defended himself during his own CNN town hall last night. “I thought it was the right thing, I decided it was the wrong thing and, 15 years ago, I sold it for moral reasons,” he said. “I came to the conclusion that everyone has come to conclude now, that this isn't a place to make money.” Steyer added that he’s sought to atone for his past investment by funding initiatives in California to get rid of private prisons. “When I make a mistake, I correct it,” he said.

Many black voters draw a clear distinction between Obama and Biden. Steven Lykes, 44, a full-time caretaker, is torn between Sanders and Steyer. He backed Hillary Clinton in the primary four years ago, and his favorite candidate had been Elizabeth Warren for much of the past year. Lykes thinks the senator from Massachusetts is an amazing debater and loves her plans, but Warren’s lackluster finishes in the first three states gave him pause.

“Biden has run three different times,” Lykes said in Columbia. “I’m always scared because Donald Trump is a savvy campaigner. You’ve got to have someone who is on their tippy toes and ready to fight back. I don’t think Biden can do that. He has too many gaffes. You can see it in the debates. He’s having a hard enough time just against the candidates we have. But Bernie can stand up to Trump like nobody’s business.”

Obama’s shadow looms large in the minds of black voters in other ways that don’t necessarily help Biden. David Swinton, the former president of Benedict College in Columbia, a historically black liberal arts college, said he and his wife already cast their ballots early for Sanders. “We cannot be concerned about all the pundits who say he can’t win,” said Swinton. “Let’s not worry about that. Let’s vote for what we feel in our heart, rather than who might win. Remember, nobody thought Barack Obama could win. And he did.”

South Carolina does not have partisan voter registration, which means people can vote in whatever primary they want. An open primary means that there will be many moderate voters who may not like Trump but don’t necessarily swoon for Obama. There’s also buzz on the right, for example, that Republicans should vote for Sanders here to elevate his candidacy on the theory that he’d be much easier for Trump to defeat in the fall. This could be a factor in a close race.

Attitudes toward Obama are more complicated among white Democrats. Lifelong Democrat Doug Brafford, a retired lawyer who lives in Mount Pleasant, plans to support Buttigieg after backing Sanders in the primary four years ago. “One of the things that upsets me about Joe Biden is that, as vice president, he repeatedly denigrated Southerners,” said Brafford, 77. “When Obama said that people cling to their guns and religion, Biden didn’t speak out. He picked up where Obama left off. I love Obama with all my heart, but I think he’s divisive – and that matters to me.”

Brafford dislikes Trump, but he worries that his party’s nonstop attacks on the president hurt politically. That’s why he finds Buttigieg’s calls for civility so compelling. “We have been uncivil in this party,” said Brafford. “It may drive some middle-of-the-roaders to stay at home. It has turned some people off.”

Barack Obama, then a presidential hopeful, shares a laugh with Edith Childs in Aiken, S.C. Childs has endorsed Steyer's bid this year. (Brett Flashnick/AP)

It's about more than personalities, too. Democrats are divided about the best approach to governing. The CBS-YouGov poll published on Sunday, which had Biden up 5 points over Sanders, found that 54 percent of likely Democratic voters in South Carolina think the party should nominate someone who is trying to “return the country to the way it was before Donald Trump took office,” and 46 percent said Democrats should instead “advance a more progressive agenda than the country had under Barack Obama.”

Obama himself left little doubt as to which way he'd answer that CBS poll question during a speech in November in which he urged Democrats running for the White House not to lurch too far left to win the nomination. “This is still a country that is less revolutionary than it is interested in improvement,” the former president said during a meeting of the Democracy Alliance, the powerful network of liberal megadonors, in what was covered at the time as a subtle rebuke of Sandersism. “They like seeing things improved. But the average American doesn't think that we have to completely tear down the system and remake it. And I think it's important for us not to lose sight of that.”

To be sure, African American voters in South Carolina revere Obama. Dorothy Hollis, 77, retired nine years ago after 40 years of teaching high school. Now she teaches Sunday school and sings in the choir at First Calvary Baptist Church in Columbia. As Saturday looms, she’s undecided and praying for guidance. “I want President Obama to run again, to be honest,” she said. “He was an outstanding president. Like Abraham Lincoln, those don’t come but every so often. So we have to take the next best thing and accept a flawed person and just go with it. But who is that?”

Hollis thought four years ago that Clinton would be a wonderful president, but she said none of the candidates in 2020 particularly excite her. “Sometimes it takes a devil to catch the Devil. It takes a thief to catch a thief. Sometimes it takes that. And I’m not sure we have that on the platform right now,” she said.

Her faith comforts her in what she sees as a perilous moment for the country. Hollis said she was “just so tickled” when heavy winds blew down a section of Trump’s border wall a few weeks ago before the cement hardened. To her, it was a sign. “God is good,” Hollis said. “To me, that was a warning. Those little things, those are warnings. You can’t fight against the powers that be. That wall is going to come down one way or another. Just ask Joshua.”

In the Book of Joshua, the walls of Jericho fall after the Israelites blow their trumpets. “If we don’t get anybody genuine to deal with this world, we’re going to all just perish,” she said. “The one will come.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

More on 2020

Sanders's Cold War travels face fresh scrutiny.

Buttigieg and Bloomberg attacked the senator for his comments about Fidel Castro's Cuba in a "60 Minutes" interview that aired Sunday night. Sanders said Castro deserved praise where it was due, including for a "massive literacy program." "During the dying days of the Cold War, Sanders indulged a fascination with far more disruptive and divisive strains of a socialist ideology he has embraced throughout his adult life," Griff Witte reports. "Returning home from visits to some of the United States' most avowed enemies, Sanders offered some criticism but also plenty of praise in Vermont community television recordings. ... Now, Sanders's comments are coming back to life as opponents say his warm feelings toward his hosts decades ago make him vulnerable to attack and reveal a soft spot for left-wing despots."

Sanders defended his Castro comments during last night's CNN town hall. "You know what? I think teaching people to read and write is a good thing,” he said. “I have been extremely consistent and critical of all authoritarian regimes all over the world — including Cuba, including Nicaragua, including Saudi Arabia, including China, including Russia. I happen to believe in democracy, not authoritarianism. ... But can anyone deny — I mean, the facts are clear — that [China has] taken more people out of extreme poverty than any country in history?” When pressed on Castro’s legacy, he responded, “Truth is truth. All right?”

Democrats fret this could cost them Florida in the general.

Terrie Rizzo, the chair of the Florida Democratic Party, didn’t mention Sanders by name but released a statement saying Democrats in her state “stand in solidarity with the thousands of people who have fled violent dictatorships in Cuba, Venezuela and Nicaragua.” Two Democratic congresswomen from Florida — Debbie Mucarsel-Powell and Donna Shalala — took issue with the comments as well, with Shalala saying she hopes that Sanders “will take time to speak to some of my constituents before he decides to sing the praises of a murderous tyrant like Fidel Castro.” Sen. Robert Menendez (N.J.), the only Cuban American Democratic senator, also denounced Sanders’s comments.

Sen. Michael Bennet (D-Colo.) paused for 17 seconds last night when Paul Kane asked him if Sanders can win the general election.

“I’m not sure I’m the right person to ask about winning a Democratic primary, but I think winning a primary election and winning a general election are two different things,” said Bennet, who dropped out of the presidential race after garnering less than 1 percent of the vote in New Hampshire. Bennet expressed concern that Sanders could make it harder for John Hickenlooper, the former governor of his state, to defeat Sen. Cory Gardner (R-Colo.). Bennet, the former chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said he believes Democrats “need to nominate somebody in this process who is going to be able to win purple states like Colorado and lead us to a 55-senator majority in the Senate. That could be challenging.”

Biden claimed he was arrested trying to see Nelson Mandela. There’s no evidence of that.

“Biden, as a senator, was active in the anti-apartheid movement, helping pass sanctions on companies doing business in South Africa over President Ronald Reagan’s veto. But there is no evidence that Biden was ever arrested trying to see the imprisoned future president of a democratic South Africa,” fact checker Glenn Kessler writes. “As far as we can tell, Biden never mentioned this arrest before; neither can we locate any news accounts of him being arrested.”

A Sanders staffer was fired for mocking Warren’s looks and Buttigieg’s sexuality on Twitter.

“Using the account @perma_ben, Ben Mora, a regional field director for Sanders’ campaign based in Michigan, has attacked other Democrats in the field—as well as their family members, surrogates, journalists, and politically active celebrities—in deeply personal terms, mocking their physical appearance, gender, and sexuality, among other things,” the Daily Beast reports. “Mora, the Sanders campaign confirmed, has been fired.”

Sanders and his campaign have stepped up criticism of MSNBC.

“Sanders reportedly confronted MSNBC president Phil Griffin and another network executive last week before the NBC-sponsored Democratic debate in Las Vegas to complain about its coverage, including disparaging comments made by Chris Matthews and ‘Meet the Press’ host Chuck Todd. MSNBC has not confirmed the encounters took place, though it hasn’t disputed the report either,” Paul Farhi and Jenna Johnson report. “Sanders’ campaign manager, Faiz Shakir, told Vanity Fair last week that MSNBC ‘is constantly undermining the Bernie Sanders campaign.’ He has even said Fox News has been ‘more fair than MSNBC’ ...

“The campaign’s ire was raised further by Matthews’s commentary as Sanders swept to an early lead in Nevada on Saturday. Matthews compared Sanders’s performance to Nazi Germany’s shattering military victory over France in the early months of World War II, suggesting Sanders’s path to the Democratic nomination was unstoppable. ‘It’s over,’ said Matthews, referring to a French prime minister's assessment of the battle and possibly the war. The comparison was flawed in several respects (France was eventually liberated and Germany was crushed by allied forces), but Sanders's representatives expressed outrage that Matthews had compared Sanders to Hitler's soldiers, given that Sanders, a Jew, lost family members during the Holocaust. ... Matthews apologized to Sanders on his program, 'Hardball,' on Monday night. 'As I watched the one-sided results of Saturday's Democratic caucus in Nevada, I reached for an historical analogy and used a bad one..., he said."

---

Quote of the day

"We're going to spend Trump out of office," Bloomberg campaign manager Kevin Sheekey told Vanity Fair.

In a historically old presidential field, candidates are still refusing to release their health records.

Klobuchar, 59, released four pages of medical documentation last night with recent lab results and a doctor's letter that said she's in "very good health." Buttigieg, 38, has yet to release any medical records despite arguing last week that the candidates should undergo physical exams and disclose the results. Bloomberg, 78, released a single page from his doctor that said he's in "great physical shape" and that he "plays golf avidly." Biden, 77, released a three-page letter describing him as "healthy [and] vigorous." Sanders, 78, released letters from three doctors – including a cardiologist who said he has "the mental and physical stamina" to be president. Warren, 70, released five pages of documents revealing a thyroid condition and a doctor's letter declaring her in "excellent health." (Matt Viser and Lenny Bernstein)

A Minneapolis inmate blamed Klobuchar for what he claims was a wrongful conviction.

"She recharged me with first degree murder, never looked into the facts of the case. Never looked into the misconduct that had taken place," Myon

Burrell told ABC News. He was convicted for the 2002 first-degree murder of 11-year-old Tyesha Edwards. Recently, an AP investigation has cast doubt over the murder investigation and the police tactics used.

Klobuchar, Burrell said, “never even addressed the misconduct that had taken place and still put the same detective, the same police on my case to go and get more bogus evidence.” In a statement to ABC, Klobuchar once again called for a review of the case.

Presidential candidates are rebranding Rep. Jim Clyburn’s anti-poverty program as reparations.

“Clyburn (D-S.C.), whose district encompasses eight of the state’s poorest counties, has long opposed cash payments to African Americans whose ancestors were enslaved. He believes it would be too difficult to determine who deserves to be compensated. But a race-neutral anti-poverty program he conceived a decade ago is now catching fire among candidates for the Democratic nomination as a way to provide practical restitution for slavery,” Tracy Jan reports. “Several presidential hopefuls, including [Sanders and Klobuchar], have sought to rebrand Clyburn’s program as a vehicle for reparations, which remain politically contentious. Clyburn’s idea, with strong bipartisan support, was originally adopted in 2009 by just one federal agency. But framing the program, which targets federal spending on certain high-poverty areas, as reparations has drawn criticism from African Americans living in poor urban neighborhoods — some in Clyburn’s own district — that do not qualify for the funding, as well as longtime advocates for reparations. The critique underlines the difficulty of finding a solution that would satisfy those demanding redress and also be politically viable.”

The State newspaper in Columbia endorses Buttigieg in today’s edition.

“During the last half-century, the Democratic Party has only won the presidency when it has resisted the temptation to pick status-quo nominees and shown the courage to choose centrist outsiders with fresh, optimistic messages,” the editorial explains. “Jimmy Carter, Bill Clinton and Barack Obama prevailed in part because they understood the values of real-world America. All three successfully connected with voters by tapping into the sensibilities of average Americans. Buttigieg has gained that needed perspective during his eight years leading South Bend, a Midwestern city that had to reinvent itself and cast aside a Rust Belt image.”

Silicon Valley asked Warren for help with a fundraiser. Her campaign considered it.

“Warren’s team in recent weeks explored ways to raise money from Silicon Valley donors without violating her ironclad fundraising pledge to not ‘sell access to my time,’” Recode reports. “The Democratic presidential campaign considered an inbound request to have a campaign representative — such as an endorser, a staff member, or a high-level volunteer leader — attend a now-canceled high-dollar event in the Bay Area, according to several people familiar with the discussions.”

Trump’s former doctor thought he had a ticket to Congress. It might not be that easy.

Ronny Jackson is one of 15 candidates in a crowded Republican primary in Texas, and the White House hasn’t gone out of its way to help, the New York Times reports. “Jackson left the West Wing in December after rising from Trump’s physician to his unlikely pick to lead the Department of Veterans Affairs to Trump administration roadkill when he was forced to withdraw his name from consideration amid allegations related to his professional conduct. Now he’s running for Congress in Texas’ 13th District, one of the most conservative in the country, and his argument is simple... Jackson is betting his personal connection with the president is enough to win the Republican nomination tantamount to election. ... But it is not clear if that connection, combined with his background as a Navy rear admiral, will be enough to help Dr. Jackson overcome some rookie mistakes as a candidate.”

---

The new world order

Trump and Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi hug after giving a joint statement in New Delhi. (Manish Swarup/AP)

Trump said the U.S.-India relationship has “never been as good” as it is now.

The president and “Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi hailed the growing defense ties between the world’s two largest democracies even as they acknowledged that a trade deal between them remains distant.

During his second day in India, Trump is holding formal meetings with the Indian leadership, making a visit to the U.S. Embassy and attending a state banquet in New Delhi,” Joanna Slater reports. “Trump began Tuesday by participating in a grand ceremonial welcome and visiting a memorial to Mohandas Gandhi ... There will be no huge crowds or tourism for the president today.

“On Monday, as Trump arrived in India, violence broke out in Delhi between supporters and opponents of [Modi’s] controversial new citizenship law. Critics say the law is unconstitutional and discriminates against Muslims. ... [Violence continued today], police told local media that the death toll from Monday’s violence had climbed to seven, including one police officer. More than 100 people were injured, according to media reports. Heavy police presence in the affected areas failed to stem the violence. ... Home Minister Amit Shah, Modi’s second-in-command, chaired a meeting with top officials and the Delhi state leadership. The government ruled out calling the army for assistance and said there were adequate security forces on the ground. ...

“First lady Melania Trump visited a public school in New Delhi to attend a ‘happiness class,’ part of a special curriculum introduced across India’s capital in 2018 to emphasize well-being alongside academic achievement. ... [Meanwhile], Trump and Modi claimed progress Tuesday toward a comprehensive trade deal, but a chummy atmosphere between the two leaders during Trump’s state visit could not mask frustration that the long-delayed pact is still in limbo. Trump predicted that a successful deal is in the offing but gave no deadline. The United States had once hoped to have the agreement ready in September, when Modi visited the United States.”

Trump’s acting director of national intelligence worked for a nonprofit group funded mostly by Hungary.

“[Richard] Grenell’s public relations firm was paid to do work for a U.S. nonprofit funded almost entirely by the Hungarian government led by far-right Prime Minister Viktor Orban,” Emma Brown, Beth Reinhard and Dalton Bennett report. Individuals who have served as acting directors of national intelligence “typically have been nonpartisan national security professionals whose experience has included leading intelligence agencies or service in the military. Now that promotion is drawing fresh scrutiny to Grenell’s past, including his foreign affairs commentary and consulting work after he served as U.S. spokesman at the United Nations during the George W. Bush administration. His work for the Hungarian-funded nonprofit is the type of activity that, in other cases, has drawn the attention of Justice Department investigators tasked with enforcing the Foreign Agents Registration Act (FARA).”

The White House asked Congress for an emergency $1.8 billion to bolster the response.

“The request includes $1.25 billion in new funding for the Department of Health and Human Services, as well as the ability to transfer an additional $535 million set aside to fight Ebola and use it for the coronavirus response instead,” Erica Werner, Jeff Stein and Lena Sun report. “The request reflects the fast-evolving nature of the crisis confronting the administration, which until recently had insisted that no additional funds were necessary. But Democrats immediately slammed the request as too small, with House Appropriations Committee Chairwoman Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.) calling it ‘woefully insufficient to protect Americans’ and criticizing the administration for trying to ‘raid’ money from other public health accounts.”

The market plunge yesterday underscored the coronavirus’s political risk to Trump.

“The Trump administration’s disjointed handling of the outbreak has faced mounting criticism as the president’s allies have scrambled to take preventive steps while seeking to reassure the public, at times struggling to explain their decisions and offer a consistent message,” Toluse Olorunnipa and Costa report. “For a president who has governed ‘by tweet and circus,’ a potential global health crisis that blunts economic growth could expose one of Trump’s main weaknesses as he prepares to face voters in November, said Russell Riley, a presidential historian at the University of Virginia’s Miller Center.”

New virus cases in China and North Korea raised concerns about how long it could take to go back to normal.

“The Chinese government said Tuesday that there had been 508 new confirmed cases by the end of the previous day, along with 74 deaths, bringing the total number of accumulated infections nationwide to 77,658, with 2,663 deaths,” Adam Taylor and Wang Yuan report. “A Chinese official suggested Monday evening that the country needs at least 28 days without new cases to show the virus is not spreading. ... The remarks drew thousands of comments on Weibo, China’s Twitter-like service, where many wondered how long they would have to wait before normal life resumed. ‘Two months will have 60% of enterprises killed!’ one user wrote.”

A California judge delayed a decision on moving coronavirus-exposed Americans.

“A federal judge on Monday directed federal and state officials to answer the questions of Costa Mesa, Calif., residents about their plans to bring Americans who have tested positive for the coronavirus but show no signs of illness to a closed mental-health facility in the city,” Jeff Rowe and Yasmeen Abutaleb report. “District Judge Josephine Staton cautioned that the city — and Orange County if it joins the effort — does not have veto power over state and federal quarantine decisions and faces an uphill battle trying to block the transfer of people from Travis Air Force Base in Northern California.”

Hosni Mubarak, Egypt’s autocratic ruler whose power came to an end during the Arab Spring uprisings, died at 91. (Will Englund and T. Rees Shapiro)

---

Domestic developments that shouldn't be overlooked

Harvey Weinstein was found guilty on two charges of sexual assault.

“The jury determined that Weinstein forced oral sex on former production assistant Mimi Haley at his apartment in July 2006 and raped former aspiring actress Jessica Mann at a hotel in 2013,” Shayna Jacobs reports. “He was found not guilty of the most severe charges, of predatory sexual assault, which would have acknowledged a pattern that included forcing sex on actress Annabella Sciorra in 1993 or 1994. Weinstein, 67, faces at least five years and up to 25 on the count of first-degree criminal sex act for his assault on Haley, and up to four years on a third-degree rape count for the Mann encounter. The judge can consider running the sentences consecutively, for a maximum of 29 years. Sentencing is scheduled for March 11. After the verdict announcement, Weinstein was handcuffed and taken to jail, and his bail was revoked.

“Weinstein’s lawyers are expected to appeal the conviction on the basis of several concerns, including the amount of media attention on the case and the fact that the three supporting accusers were permitted to testify even though charges were not brought on their behalf. The appeal must be filed after sentencing. ... Weinstein lawyer Donna Rotunno told reporters, ‘He took it like a man. He knows this is not over.’”

Advocates hailed the Weinstein conviction as a breakthrough.

“‘This is one of those days when the whole world changes,’ said Jane Manning, a former sex-crimes prosecutor in New York and director of the Women’s Equal Justice Project. ‘A sexual predator who was so powerful that he thought he could never be touched has just been held accountable,’” Caitlin Gibson and Elahe Izadi report. ”Deborah Tuerkheimer, a professor of law at Northwestern University, noted that most sexual assault cases that enter the legal system are more likely to fit the stereotypical ‘stranger rape’ paradigm — involving a woman who is assaulted by someone she doesn’t know, resulting in apparent physical injury and, potentially, DNA evidence. The Weinstein case, in contrast, presented a far more complicated portrait of sexual violence — and the fact that New York prosecutors even filed charges against him is ‘extraordinary,’ she said.”

Mitch McConnell, after months of legislative inactivity, will now force votes on abortion.

“McConnell is about to plunge the Senate into the nation’s culture wars with votes on bills to sharply restrict access to late-term abortions and threaten some doctors who perform them with criminal penalties, signaling that Republicans plan to make curbing a woman’s right to terminate a pregnancy a central theme of their re-election campaigns this year,” the Times reports. “After months of shunning legislative activity in favor of confirming [Trump’s] judicial nominees — and a brief detour for the president’s impeachment trial — [McConnell] is expected to bring the bills up for votes on Tuesday. Both lack the necessary 60-vote supermajority to advance, and the Senate has voted previously to reject them. But by putting them on the floor again, Mr. McConnell hopes to energize the social conservatives who helped elect Mr. Trump.”

An appeals court upheld the Trump move to withdraw Title X funding for abortions.

“The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals -- long regarded as a liberal body, though Trump appointees have started to tilt the balance -- lifted preliminary injunctions against the rules issued by lower courts in cases from three different states,” Fox News reports. “Xavier Becerra, attorney general of California, one of the states that sued over the regulations, said the Ninth Circuit’s ruling was ‘troubling.’”

Justice Clarence Thomas cited himself in arguing to overturn a decision he authored.

“Although I authored Brand X, ‘it is never too late to ‘surrende[r] former views to a better considered position,’ Thomas wrote in his Monday dissent, quoting himself from a 2018 opinion in South Dakota v. Wayfair, Inc.,” Fox reports. “Thomas has recently been quite vocal in advocating for the court to overturn a variety of precedents, saying in one opinion last year that when ‘faced with a demonstrably erroneous precedent, my rule is simple: We should not follow it.’”

Oregon lawmakers were supposed to vote on a climate change bill. Once again, Republicans walked out.

“For the second time in eight months, Oregon Republicans walked out of the capitol, denying the Democratic supermajority a chance to pass a bill that would limit greenhouse gas emissions. By absconding, the 11 GOP lawmakers prevented the quorum necessary to vote on the legislation and forced Democrats to adjourn for the day,” Reis Thebault reports. “It was the same tactic Republican lawmakers employed in June, when they fled to Idaho to avoid a vote on an earlier version of the same cap-and-trade bill, prompting Oregon’s governor to call in state troopers to track them down and return them to the statehouse.”

The TSA froze hiring and overtime pay as the spring travel season nears.

“Hydrick Thomas, the [TSA] union’s president, said agency officials told him last week that the freezes would be in place until April or May,” Ian Duncan reports. “That could leave security checkpoints short-staffed, he said. ‘You’re going to have long lines,’ Thomas said. ‘That’s just the way it works.’”

Vanessa Bryant sued the helicopter operator in the crash that killed her husband and daughter, and 7 others.

“The lawsuit alleges that the helicopter company, Island Express, was ‘vicariously liable’ for any and all actions of pilot Ara George Zobayan, including his ‘negligent and careless piloting,’” Lori Aratani reports.

The suit was filed the same day thousands gathered at the Staples Center to remember the victims. “[Bryant’s] public memorial Monday sparked a heartbreaking tribute from his wife, Vanessa; brought Michael Jordan to tears; and led former teammate Shaquille O’Neal to share behind-the-scenes anecdotes during a two-hour ceremony,” Ben Golliver and Cindy Boren report. “NBA Commissioner Adam Silver; Hall of Famers Bill Russell, Magic Johnson and Kareem Abdul-Jabbar; current stars Stephen Curry and Kyrie Irving; and dozens of other prominent athletes and entertainers [attended] the celebration of life."

---

Social media speed read

Trump shared a video recap of India's welcome:

Donald J. Trump
@realDonaldTrump

twitter.com/narendramodi/s...

Narendra Modi @narendramodi

During his speech at the #NamasteTrump programme, @POTUS @realDonaldTrump highlighted aspects of his vision for USA. He also spoke at length about India's greatness as well as the greatness of our culture, ethos, people and more. I thank him for his kind words.

84.4K 6:13 PM - Feb 24, 2020

29.6K people are talking about this

Ivanka Trump and Jared Kushner are on the trip, and they posted shots from the Taj Mahal:

Those images of the Trump's lavish visit clashed jarringly with pictures of protesters, speaking out against Modi's anti-Muslim policies, being viciously attacked by police:

A member of the president's coronavirus response team struggled to access a publicly available coronavirus map:

The Bloomberg campaign made a Twitter thread calling out vandalism on different campaign offices, including one in Flint, Mich. It backfired.

Consider this from the former secretary of labor:

 Robert Reich ✓
@RBReich

Cost of repairing Flint's water pipes: $55 million

Cost of Mike Bloomberg's ad spending: $505.8 million

America deserves better than an oligarch wasting his fortune trying to buy the presidency.
twitter.com/Mike2020/statu...

Team Bloomberg ✓ @Mike2020
Replying to @Mike2020

"Eat the Rich"
Our office in Flint, MI

America deserves better.

♥ 25.3K 8:55 PM - Feb 24, 2020 ⓘ

💬 9,416 people are talking about this >

Videos of the day

Stephen Colbert reviewed Trump's performance in India:

Trevor Noah looked at some of the things India is doing to give Trump a memorable experience:

Seth Meyers made fun of the mainstream media's "meltdown" over Sanders's success in Nevada:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Fact Checker for a weekly review of what's true, false or in-between in politics, from The Post's famous fact-checking team. Count the pinocchios!
Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Bernie Sanders refuses to get bogged down – or pinned down – on specifics during Democratic debate
Date: Wednesday, February 26, 2020 9:24:28 AM

COMMITTED TO
AFFORDABLE CARE
FOR THE HEALTH OF AMERICA<sup>SM</sup>

BlueCross
BlueShield
Association

Powered by  LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by  Uber

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

Bernie Sanders refuses to get bogged down – or pinned down – on specifics during Democratic debate

CHARLESTON, S.C. – Pete Buttigieg ripped into Bernie Sanders during Tuesday night’s presidential debate for declining to endorse the abolition of the Senate filibuster. “How are we going to deliver a revolution if you won’t even support a rule change?” the former mayor asked the front-runner for the Democratic nomination. “We are in the state where Strom Thurmond used the filibuster to block civil rights legislation repeatedly.”

Elizabeth Warren also took a shot, warning that Republicans will use the filibuster to block the next president from passing gun control legislation, tackling climate change and overhauling the immigration system. “I’ve seen gun safety legislation introduced, get a majority and then it doesn’t pass because of the filibuster,” said the senator from Massachusetts. “Understand this: The filibuster is giving a veto to the gun industry.”

Sanders chose not to directly respond to these attacks during the 10th Democratic debate, the first time he found himself standing behind the podium at center stage, on account of his lead in national polls. The independent senator from Vermont didn’t let himself get mired in a process debate about legislative procedure with two rivals, as he did during the September debate in Houston. Instead, Sanders emphasized his support for stricter gun laws. “At the end of the day, we need to rally the American people,” he said. “I am proud I have a D-minus voting record from the NRA. If elected president, it will get worse than that.”

Sanders weathered the heavily anticipated, two-hour barrage of attacks from his six opponents by sticking relentlessly to the populist message that got him here. At several key moments, he offered a master class in deflection. On one hand, this can be viewed as impressive message discipline from a candidate who has successfully claimed the mantle of an insurgent outsider. On the other, it could be described as sloganeering and the oversimplifying of complex issues by someone who has served in Congress since 1991. Either way, the debate served as a reminder that Sanders, despite his unconventional candidacy, is more pragmatic than popularly understood.

He clearly relished the attention, if not always the scrutiny. “I’m hearing my name mentioned a little bit tonight,” he said. “I wonder why?”

Like President Trump, Sanders is loath to admit mistakes. But he acknowledged one last night. When Joe Biden attacked him for supporting the legislation that exempted gun manufacturers from being sued, Sanders initially responded with an attack on the former vice president. “Joe has voted for terrible trade agreements,” he said. “Joe voted for the war in Iraq.” The crowd booed. “My point was,” he continued, “I have cast thousands of votes, including bad votes. That was a bad vote.”

Sanders, also like Trump, is a counterpuncher. He had several other moments that might best be summarized as: I know you are, but what am I? Former New York mayor Mike Bloomberg expressed concern about the trillion-dollar deficit and the national debt approaching $21 trillion. “We just cannot afford some of this stuff people talk about,” he said. Asked to respond, Sanders said: “Mayor Bloomberg has a solid and strong and enthusiastic base of support. The problem is they're all billionaires.”

When Bloomberg noted that the intelligence community believes Russian President Vladimir Putin is trying to boost Sanders, Sanders ripped Bloomberg for doing business in Beijing. “I’m not a good friend of President Xi [Jinping] of China,” he said. “I think President Xi is an authoritarian leader.” Sanders then added he won’t tolerate Russian interference.

Amy Klobuchar claimed Sanders’s plans would cumulatively cost $60 trillion, or three times the size of the U.S. economy. “I think that we can get all those bold progressive things done without having someone that is so alienating that we're going to turn off the voters that we need to bring with us,” the senator from Minnesota continued. Sanders did not quibble with her $60 trillion figure. Instead, like Trump did so often during the primaries in 2016, Sanders responded to this critique by pointing to polls. “Hey, Amy,” he said, “my favorability nationally I believe are the highest up here, as a matter of fact.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

Sanders brushed aside a chorus of attacks related to the price tag, and therefore feasibility, of his proposed revolution. Moderator Norah O’Donnell said that his Medicare-for-all plan would cost $30 trillion over 10 years, but he’s only outlined how he’d pay for half of it. She asked: “Can you do the math for the rest of us?”

Sanders replied: “How many hours do you have?” Biden interjected: “That’s the problem.”

Sanders noted that he’s “laid out options all over the place,” including a seven-and-a-half percent payroll tax on employers. He then cited a new study, which he didn’t mention was co-written by one of his own former advisers, that claims his Medicare-for-all plan would reduce overall costs for consumers. Our fact-checkers note that the study has come under fire for a number of its assumptions, such as a single-payer plan paying current Medicare reimbursement rates to doctors, hospitals and other providers.

Trying to position herself as a liberal who is more effective than Sanders, Warren criticized Sanders for not offering as many details on paying for universal health care as she does in her plan. “I did the work and then Bernie’s team trashed me for it,” she said. “We need a president who is going to dig in, do the hard work and actually get it done. Progressives have got one shot, and we need to spend it with a leader who will get something done.”

Buttigieg piled on. “Senator Sanders at one point said it was going to be $40 trillion,” he said. “Then it was $30 trillion. Then it was $17 trillion. That’s an incredible shrinking price tag. At some point, he said it is unknowable what the price tag would be. Now there are new numbers. I’ll tell you exactly what it adds up to: It adds to four more years of Donald Trump.”

His Democratic rivals seemed more interested in delivering zingers like this, in a bid to elevate themselves as the best alternative to Sanders one week out from Super Tuesday, than pushing the democratic socialist to actually answer underlying questions about positions that are outside the Democratic mainstream. It's the latest manifestation of the collective action problem that continues to work to Sanders's advantage.

Red in the face, Sanders sometimes struggled to get a word in as everyone else tried to dunk on him. Klobuchar cited a Vanderbilt University study that she said showed she was the most effective senator across 15 metrics and noted that the same research showed Sanders and Warren were much less effective than her. Neither was given a chance to respond.

The CBS moderators lost control of the contentious debate early and never got it back. Sanders was asked three times to give a "quick" response to something, which allowed him to skirt specifics. The moderators also failed to ask Warren about her flip-flop to welcome the help of a super PAC or Biden's recent false claims that he once got arrested during a trip to South Africa.

Sanders also avoided particulars on foreign policy. When he was asked specifically whether he would move the U.S. Embassy from Jerusalem back to Tel Aviv, he gave this non-answer: “The answer is it’s something we would take into consideration.”

The democratic socialist defended his praise for Fidel Castro’s literacy programs in Cuba. “Occasionally it might be a good idea to be honest about American foreign policy, and that includes the fact that America has overthrown governments all over the world in Chile, in Guatemala and in Iran,” said Sanders. “And when dictatorships, whether it is the Chinese or the Cubans, do something good, you acknowledge that. But you don't have to trade love letters with them.”

Buttigieg, who seemed more determined to attack Sanders than anyone else, ridiculed this. “I am not looking forward to a scenario where it comes down to Donald Trump, with his nostalgia for the social order of the 1950s, and Bernie Sanders, with a nostalgia for the revolutionary politics of the 1960s,” he said. “This is not about what coups were happening in the 1970s or '80s. ... This is about 2020. We are not going to survive or succeed, and we're certainly not going to win by reliving the Cold War. And we're not going to win these critical House and Senate races if people in those races have to explain why the nominee of the Democratic Party is telling people to look at the bright side of the Castro regime.”

“Let us be clear,” Sanders replied, “do we think health care for all, Pete, is some kind of radical communist idea?”

“What is a radical idea is completely eliminating all private insurance,” Buttigieg replied later. “And part of how you know it is, is that no industrialized country has gone that far. He and I both like to talk about Denmark, for example. But even in Denmark, they have not abolished the possibility of private insurance. So this is an idea that goes further than what is acceptable in Denmark the country, let alone imagining how that's going to fly in Denmark, South Carolina.”

Sanders circled back to the theme of radicalism in his final answer. When all the candidates were asked to share what they see as the biggest misconception about them, Sanders said it's that people see his ideas as radical. "In one form or another, they exist in countries all over the world," he said. "The saying that moves me the most is from Nelson Mandela. Mandela said everything is impossible until it happens."

More team coverage

"The tone of the debate ultimately became a metaphor for the Democratic race itself, as it was marred repeatedly by candidates interrupting one another, talking over each other and constantly ignoring the moderators' efforts to bring some order to the unruly evening," writes Dan Balz. "What the evening highlighted was the degree to which Sanders stands apart from the field, with the other candidates divided and sparring with one another as much as with [him]. Sanders has his base, and it has served him well enough so far. The others are trying to find theirs. None of Sanders's rivals rose significantly above the others. For Sanders, that was probably a satisfactory outcome."

"While falling short of the glossy image that appeared during the commercial breaks, Bloomberg succeeded in doing what he had failed to do a week earlier in Las Vegas," adds Michael Scherer. "He delivered his messages — about his experience, his policy goals and his political focus — without a script in front of him, albeit with less polish, more stiffness and a far more stilted style of delivering a joke than his ads suggest. ... Still, Bloomberg spent significant time responding to attacks — on his treatment of women, his comments about banks’ redlining policies, his yet-unreleased tax returns and his praise of the Chinese leadership. He appeared agitated when [Warren] cited a woman’s account that he told her to ‘kill’ her baby when she got pregnant, responding: ‘I never said it. Period, end of story.’ It was far from clear whether his performance was enough to save his hopes for the nomination.”

---

Quote of the day

“All of the new Democrats that came in, put Nancy Pelosi in charge, and gave the Congress the ability to control this president — I bought,” said Bloomberg, referring to $100 million he spent to help House candidates in the 2018 midterms. He quickly corrected himself: “I — I got them.”
(Matt Viser, Annie Linskey, Sean Sullivan and Cleve Wootson)

Buttigieg’s campaign canceled a four-stop swing through South Florida scheduled for today. “Multiple aides to Buttigieg said he is sick and needed a day to rest,” Chelsea Janes reports. “Buttigieg looked sweatier than usual during the debate and appeared to have a cough drop in his mouth at various moments. He has maintained one of the more rigorous schedules of any of the candidates and will still appear at a breakfast in Charleston on Wednesday morning. Three of the events scheduled in South Florida were fundraisers, meaning the cancellation could be a costly one for Buttigieg. His campaign has been pushing to raise $13 million by Super Tuesday, and it sent a several-page memo to supporters outlining where and why it needs money for ad buys.”

The next debate will take place in Phoenix on March 15. The Sunday night battle will come before primaries that Tuesday in Arizona, Florida, Illinois and Ohio. By then, 47 percent of the delegates will have been pledged. The DNC still hasn’t announced the eligibility requirements for the debate, which will air on CNN and Univision. How much will the field have winnowed by then? Who will have emerged with the strongest chance of stopping Sanders?

Notable commentary

Politico’s John Harris argues that Democrats needed a good debate but got a bad one instead: “The evening offered limited opportunities—were these possibly enough?—for six Democrats not named Sanders to revive their candidacies with last-stand moments to emerge as the main alternative to the self-described democratic socialist.”

The Times’s Frank Bruni says the debate “felt like a genuine freakout”: Sanders’s competitors “seemed to be in the grip of some larger existential crisis, their understanding of their party’s dynamics challenged, their sense of its destiny upended and their dread of blowing an immeasurably consequential election profound.” Post columnist Dana Milbank says Sanders stirred up “a sickening sense of déjà vu” to the Republican debate in South Carolina four years ago, when the other candidates piled on Trump, but it was too little and too late to stop him from winning the nomination. “The winner of Tuesday night’s debate was Trump,” he concludes.

- The Fix’s Aaron Blake declares Warren and Biden the winners and Sanders and Bloomberg the losers.

- Post columnist Jen Rubin: “Biden needed the debate of his life. He delivered.”
- CNN’s Chris Cillizza says Buttigieg, Biden, Klobuchar, Sanders and Trump won, while Bloomberg and Warren lost.
- Vox’s team says Sanders won and Klobuchar lost.
- The Guardian’s Jessa Crispin says Warren dominated the mic but Sanders held his ground.
- FiveThirtyEight’s Nate Silver thinks Biden “pulled out his best debate with his back to the wall.”
- Democratic operative Mary Anne Marsh, writing for Fox News, calls Sanders, Warren and Biden winners, but she thinks the other four candidates onstage lost.
- The New Republic’s Walter Shapiro thinks Biden, Buttigieg and Klobuchar fared well, but Sanders and Bloomberg lost ground.
- Bloomberg Opinion’s Ramesh Ponnuru said Biden and Bloomberg performed better than they did at last week’s debate, but he argues that Sanders emerged victorious.
- Mother Jones’s Edwin Rios and Nathalie Baptiste said the debate was pretty much a pandering fest to South Carolina’s black voters.

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

---

The coronavirus

A man wearing a protective face mask watches the Nikkei index tank outside a brokerage house in Tokyo. (Athit Perawongmetha/Reuters)

The CDC warned the virus's spread in the United States is “inevitable.”

“The warnings from officials with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the National Institutes of Health and other agencies, contrasted sharply with assessments from President Trump and other White House officials, who have largely dismissed concerns about the virus,” Erica Werner, Yasmeen Abutaleb, Lena Sun and Lenny Bernstein report. “The mixed messages continued Tuesday as dire warnings issued to senators and reporters early in the day gave way to a more positive assessment, after the Dow Jones industrial average plunged 3.4 percent, bringing the two-day loss to more than 1,900 points — the worst in two years.”

- “We believe the immediate risk here in the United States remains low, and we’re working hard to keep that risk low,” Anne Schuchat, the CDC’s principal deputy director, said during a hastily convened afternoon news briefing.
- “Ultimately, we expect we will see community spread in the United States. It's not a question of if this will happen, but when this will happen, and how many people in this country will have severe illnesses," Nancy Messonnier, the director of the National Center for Immunization and Respiratory Diseases at the CDC, said during the morning briefing.

"The confused messaging threatened to obscure urgent public health advice coming from the CDC ... Businesses need to consider replacing in-person meetings with telework, Messonnier said. School authorities should consider ways to limit face-to-face contact, such as dividing students into smaller groups, using Internet-based learning or even closing schools. Local officials should consider modifying, postponing or canceling large gatherings. Hospitals should consider ways to triage patients who do not need urgent care and recommend that patients delay surgery that isn't absolutely necessary."

The White House seems mainly focused on reducing public alarm.

"Trump is highly concerned about the market and has encouraged aides not to give predictions that might cause further tremors," Jeff Stein and Josh Dawsey report. "Privately, Trump has become furious about the stock market's slide, according to two people familiar with the president's thinking ... Some White House officials have been unhappy with how Health and Human Services Secretary Alex Azar has handled the situation ... White House officials often face a tricky balance of trying to assure the public while also not dismissing threats that could become calamities. The Dow is still up markedly from 2017, when Trump took office, but it closed Tuesday at its lowest level since October." Global financial markets continued losing ground overnight.

The acting head of DHS was grilled by a GOP senator over the response.

"Appearing in front of a Senate appropriations subcommittee, [Chad] Wolf was on the receiving end of a brutal line of questioning from Sen. John Neely Kennedy (R-La.). Throughout the exchange, Wolf struggled to produce basic facts and projections about the disease,” Aaron Blake reports.

No major lockdown is planned in a South Korean region stricken with the virus.

“When a spokesman for South Korea's ruling party suggested Tuesday that the government would be rolling out a ‘maximum lockdown’ on the coronavirus-hit southern city of Daegu, the backlash was immediate and the political retreat swift,” Min Joo Kim and Simon Denyer report. “Hong Ihk-pyo soon clarified that he didn’t mean a ‘Wuhan-style lockdown’ or a blockade on travel into and out of the city — along the lines that China’s Communist Party has imposed on Wuhan and surrounding areas at the center of the covid-19 outbreak. President Moon Jae-in soon chimed in. There would be no regional blockade, he said, only a full-scale effort to contain the spread of the virus.” Infection numbers soared in South Korea to over 1,200.

France and Iran reported new deaths this morning.

“France reported the first death of a French citizen from the epidemic as cases spread rapidly across Europe, with Spain confirming eight new cases in the past 24 hours and new infections reported in France, Croatia, Austria and Switzerland,” according to our live blog. “Nineteen people have died in Iran from the novel coronavirus outbreak, Iranian Health Ministry spokesman Kianush Jahanpur told state television on Wednesday.”

The virus hits seniors the hardest. Italy’s elderly population is on the front line.

“That has set off a race in countries with significant older populations — like Italy — to figure out whether there are ways to protect their most vulnerable: those in hospitals, in nursing homes, and seniors in sealed-off hot-spot towns who are watching television and fearing the worst,” Chico Harlan and Stefano Pitrelli report. “But even as Italy works to contain what is the first major coronavirus outbreak in Europe, there is growing concern that the virus is outracing the health measures. New cases on Tuesday popped up farther from the original cluster, including in the southern island of Sicily and the tourist-heavy Tuscan capital, Florence. Italy has at least 322 confirmed cases and 11 deaths, all people who were elderly or already sick.”

The U.S. government can quarantine you. There’s almost nothing you can do about it.

“Regulations set forth by the [CDC] give health officials broad authority to quarantine or isolate anyone ‘reasonably believed’ to have been exposed to a range of highly infectious diseases. The list includes cholera, infectious tuberculosis and flus that can cause a pandemic,” Derek Hawkins reports. “The government’s powers to sequester people in the name of public health are rooted in the Constitution’s Commerce Clause, which allows Congress to regulate foreign and interstate commerce.”

---

The Trump presidency

President Trump and first lady Melania Trump attend a wreath-laying ceremony at Mohandas Gandhi's memorial in New Delhi on Tuesday. (Alexander Drago/Reuters)

Trump praised Modi's record on religious tolerance, as violence erupted over discrimination against Muslims.

“Trump avoided any public criticism of his host — whose political biography is also built partly on religious and cultural divisions — along with any comparison of [Prime Minister Narendra] Modi's policies with his own treatment of Muslim immigrants,” Anne Gearan, Joanna Slatter, Seung Min Kim and Niha Masih report. “We did talk about religious freedom, and I will say that the prime minister was incredible in what he told me. He wants people to have religious freedom and very strongly,” Trump said during a news conference that capped the public portion of his largely ceremonial visit. Modi, who leads the Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party, has insisted that the citizenship law aims to help persecuted religious minorities in three nearby countries. ... At least 17 people were killed, including a police officer, in clashes in the capital city during Trump's visit. The violence began when supporters of the citizenship law confronted opponents of the measure. ...

“The citizenship law, along with India's other actions, has drawn bipartisan criticism in Congress, but Trump tread lightly. The president said he had 'asked that question' during a closed-door meeting Tuesday, but he was vague about whether he criticized Modi for his decision. 'I don't want to discuss that,' he said when asked for his opinion of the law. 'I want to leave that to India, and hopefully they're going to make the right decision for the people.' ... Trump and Modi issued joint statements praising the growing defense cooperation between the two countries, but they did not field questions together. ... Although they spent much of the day together, including at a state banquet of salmon and grilled goat, Modi is known for not having held a news conference in his six years as prime minister."

There's a new senior leader at the White House personnel office. He's a college senior.

Politico reports that James Bacon, 23, is acting as one of the right-hand men to new director of presidential personnel John McEntee, who is 29: "Bacon, a senior at George Washington University pursuing a bachelor's degree, comes from the Department of Transportation, where he briefly worked in the policy shop. Bacon will be PPO's director of operations overseeing paperwork and will assist on vetting. The role was previously filled by Katja Bullock, who is in her late 70s and was a veteran of the office in both Bush administrations, as well as the Reagan administration."

A Trump judicial nominee once called for abolishing Social Security.

Stephen Schwartz, nominated to the U.S. Court of Federal Claims, argued 15 years ago "that several federal agencies should be eliminated and that Social Security should be abolished because economic disparity 'is a natural aspect of the human condition,'" Robert O'Harrow Jr. reports. "Schwartz wrote that the departments of Transportation, Agriculture and Education lack a 'constitutional basis,' and that Social Security benefits were intended to prevent 'outright starvation' but had become a 'standard component of most retirement programs.'"

Trump escalated his attacks on the judicial branch.

“In tweets and comments at a news conference in India — and just a month before the Supreme Court is to consider congressional and prosecutors’ requests for the president’s closely guarded financial records — Trump targeted Justices Sonia Sotomayor and Ruth Bader Ginsburg,” Robert Barnes and Ashley Parker report. “Trump interpreted as biased a dissent from Sotomayor about his administration’s tendency to seek emergency interventions from the Supreme Court. ... The president’s broadside breached what normally is an arm’s-length distance between the White House and the high court, and cast the disagreements into starkly personal terms. ... A court spokeswoman on Tuesday said that [John] Roberts, Sotomayor and Ginsburg had no comment ... Writing only for herself, Sotomayor complained that the federal government has been too quick to ask the Supreme Court for emergency relief from lower-court decisions that had not gone through the usual legal process. ... Neither opinion — the one written by Sotomayor or [the other by \[Justices Neil Gorsuch and \[Clarence\] Thomas](#) — specifically mentioned Trump or the administration.”

Trump also attacked a juror who voted to convict his confidant Roger Stone.

Trump “injected new political drama into the legal debate over whether [Stone] deserves a new trial, tweeting during a hearing in the matter that the jury forewoman who voted to convict his longtime friend and confidant was ‘totally biased’ and seeming to suggest the judge was, as well,” Spencer S. Hsu and Matt Zapposky report. “Trump’s comments came just as U.S. District Judge Amy Berman Jackson had rebuked him and others over their attacks on the juror, and they seemed to put the president at odds with his own Justice Department, which argued against Stone’s bid for new legal proceedings. Jackson ultimately ended the hearing without a decision after taking testimony from three jurors on the panel — including the forewoman. The judge is expected to issue a ruling soon.”

Senate Republicans backed Bill Barr after his clash with

Trump.

“GOP lawmakers gave [the attorney general] a solid show of support in a private lunch meeting,” Mike DeBonis reports “Every sentence began with, ‘Keep up the good work,’” said Sen. Kevin Cramer (R-N.D.), recalling senators’ remarks at the lunch, which began with a round of applause for Barr. ... [Mitch] McConnell told reporters afterward that Barr ‘enjoys overwhelming support’ in the Republican ranks: ‘We all think he’s doing an outstanding job.’ ... ‘He didn’t give any indication he’s going anywhere,’ said Senate Majority Whip John Thune (R-S.D.). ...

“Barr also finds himself in the middle of a thorny issue that has split Republican lawmakers — the pending expiration of key federal surveillance authorities. ... Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), among others, is pushing to take any future surveillance of political campaigns out of the secret foreign intelligence court entirely, among other changes to the existing law. ... But Barr, according to multiple senators, said he was not pressing for any specific statutory change to address the alleged Trump-related warrant abuses, which were detailed in a December report from Michael E. Horowitz, the Justice Department inspector general. Instead, he indicated that he would pursue administrative changes to remake how secret warrants are obtained and supervised.”

The NSA’s phone program cost $100 million but produced just two unique leads.

“A National Security Agency system that analyzed logs of Americans’ domestic phone calls and text messages cost $100 million from 2015 to 2019, but yielded only a single significant investigation, according to a newly declassified study,” the New York Times reports. “Moreover, only twice during that four-year period did the program generate unique information that the F.B.I. did not already possess, said the study, which was produced by the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board and briefed to Congress ... The report did not reveal the subject matter of the one significant F.B.I. investigation that was spurred by the Freedom Act program, and it did not divulge its outcome.”

Seventy former senators signed onto an op-ed saying the Senate isn't performing its constitutional duties.

In an open letter, a bipartisan group of former lawmakers said Congress isn't functioning as the Framers intended. "The Senate's abdication of its legislative and oversight responsibilities erodes the checks and balances of the separate powers that are designed to protect the liberties on which our democracy depends," they write.

Two antiabortion bills failed to advance in the Senate.

"All Republicans except Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) voted for a bill banning abortion after 20 weeks, while Democratic Sens. Bob Casey (D-Pa.) and Joe Manchin (D-W.V.) supported the measure," Politico reports. "All four lawmakers, meanwhile, voted for a bill requiring doctors to provide care to survivors of failed abortions. Sen. Doug Jones of Alabama, the most vulnerable Democrat facing reelection, opposed the 20-week ban but voted for the second measure."

The Supreme Court ruled that the family of a Mexican teen killed by the Border Patrol can't sue in U.S. courts.

"The court's conservatives prevailed in the 5 to 4 ruling, in which the court for the second time considered whether relatives of foreign victims injured on foreign soil can go to court without express authorization from Congress," Barnes reports. "The case began with the death of 15-year-old Sergio Adrián Hernández Güereca, who was fatally shot by a federal agent in 2010 on the Mexican side of the wide concrete culvert that separates El Paso from Juarez, Mexico. Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. wrote for his conservative colleagues, saying a respect for the separation of powers means that courts should be reluctant to allow lawsuits filed by foreign victims in U.S. courts without express congressional authorization."

---

More on 2020

A Sanders nomination would complicate the reelection campaigns of three Virginia congresswomen.

GOP candidates and groups are already targeting the once deep-red Virginia districts held by Democratic Reps. Elaine Luria, Abigail Spanberger and Jennifer Wexton, trying to link the freshman lawmakers to Sanders. Jenna Portnoy reports that Luria, who backs Biden, wasted no time in denouncing Sanders this week after he said he would skip the annual conference of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee: “Her swift reaction was an example of the tactics she and other centrist Democrats may use to try to steer clear of [Sanders] if he wins their party’s presidential nomination. ... Spanberger and Wexton have not made endorsements in the presidential contest and have no plans to at the moment. Spanberger, a former CIA officer, said she has already cast her absentee ballot; she declined to reveal her choice or rule anyone out. Rob Jones, one of several Republicans vying to challenge Wexton in November, suggested last week that because Wexton often votes the same way as Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-N.Y.), a top Sanders surrogate, Wexton must support Sanders. Wexton balked at that logic, and said: ‘I will not be supporting Bernie Sanders in this primary.’”

The Democratic establishment in Texas is freaking out about Sanders's rise.

“Rep. Marc Veasey is about as restrained as Texans come, but in recent days he has unloaded ... to practically any reporter he could find,” the Texas Tribune reports. “His message? [Sanders’s] march to the party’s nomination will jeopardize Texas Democrats’ efforts to capture the state House of Representatives and a slew of U.S. House seats across the state. ... While Sanders supporters proclaim a growing movement that will bring out new voters needed to flip the state, nearly two dozen Texas Democratic officeholders, candidates, activists and donors interviewed for this story expressed concern — sometimes bordering on despair — that a Sanders Democratic nomination is the difference between being on offense or in retreat in Texas this cycle.”

Mitch McConnell said Sanders may be more competitive than pundits think.

“I’m reminded of when the Democrats back in 1980 were all pulling for Ronald Reagan to be the nominee because they thought he’d be the easiest to beat,” McConnell told reporters, per Politico. “I think it’s going to be a contested general election with a lot of energy on both sides, and for myself I’ll leave it up to the Democrats to pick who they’d like to be their candidate.”

The Boston Globe endorsed Warren for president, a year after calling for her not to run.

This is significant because Sanders is making a play to win Massachusetts on Super Tuesday, scheduling rallies for later this week in Boston and Springfield. “In December 2018, this editorial board expressed doubt that Elizabeth Warren should run for president. She has proved us wrong and has shaped the course of the race for the better. The electorate, at least in recent polls and in the early states, is signaling its preference for the profound change that underpins Warren’s agenda. Sanders has been the main beneficiary, but is less likely to deliver; he has shown no ability over the course of his career to build broad legislative coalitions. Warren is uniquely poised to accomplish serious reform without sacrificing what’s working in our economy and innovation ecosystem. She would get under the hood to fix the engine — not drive off a cliff, but also not just kick the tires.”

9/11 was a turning point in Bloomberg's quest to become New York mayor.

“Bloomberg awoke early on that crisp and cloudless Tuesday and walked from his East Side mansion to his neighborhood polling place, where he saw his name on an election ballot for the first time, as a Republican candidate for mayor. It was Sept. 11, 2001, primary day, and Bloomberg was in the thick of trying to reinvent himself as the face of America’s largest city,” Paul Schwartzmann reports in the latest version of our Pursuits series. “Then someone told him that an airplane had slammed into the World Trade Center. ... What Bloomberg did not know in that moment — what no one could have known — is that the [attack] would fuel his unlikely rise as New York’s mayor and become a foundation for his race for the White House. ... ‘We began to write a comeback story,’ Bloomberg tells audiences, recalling that he took over a city ‘in tatters’ after winning an election that ‘almost no one’ — not even his mother, he often notes — ‘thought I had a chance.’ Bloomberg’s 12 years at City Hall lifted him to newfound prominence and spanned the rebirth of Lower Manhattan, the rise of the new World Trade Center and the opening of the 9/11 Memorial. Yet, in 2001, as he aspired to succeed Republican Mayor Rudy Giuliani, he was largely unknown beyond Wall Street and the exclusive dinner parties and charity galas he frequented.”

Hard work saved the Nevada caucuses, but it may not have been enough.

“[Harry] Reid, who helped move Nevada’s caucuses up in the calendar in 2008, establishing his state as the first in the West, said on Sunday that it was ‘time for the Democratic Party to move to primaries everywhere.’ That affirmation was echoed on Monday by the state party’s chairman, William McCurdy II, who said it was ‘time for our state party and elected leaders to look at shifting to a primary process moving forward.’ And it was reiterated on Tuesday by the Democratic governor, Steve Sisolak, who said he would help ‘review how we could switch to an early presidential primary,’” Isaac Stanley-Becker reports. “Similar sentiment has been voiced in Iowa, where the quadrennial institution had defined the political culture of the state since it inaugurated the modern caucuses in 1972, part of an effort to make the nominating process more inclusive.”

Democrats are desperately trying to recruit Steve Bullock to run for Senate.

“Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer met with [the former presidential candidate] in Montana last weekend as Democrats make a last-ditch effort to woo him to run for the Senate this year,” Politico reports. “Bullock, the two-term governor and former presidential candidate, has repeatedly said he has no plans to challenge Republican Sen. Steve Daines this year. But the state’s filing deadline is just over two weeks away, and Democrats have continued to pitch Bullock on seeking the Senate seat before the window closes.”

A veteran running for Congress in Arizona suspended his campaign after a heroin overdose.

“Chris Taylor, a 33-year-old Army veteran and city councilman in Safford, Ariz., told The Post that he was sober for ‘many solid years’ before the relapse. He was found unresponsive Wednesday night in his home, where paramedics revived him with naloxone,” Meryl Kornfield reports. The Republican said he’s “not going to hide from this.” He said he has battled with an opioid addiction since high school. He was seeking the GOP nomination to challenge Rep. Tom O’Halloran (D).

ABC News suspended veteran correspondent David Wright after a Project Veritas sting.

Network officials suspended Wright after reviewing footage gathered by the conservative group that records “undercover” footage of mainstream journalists to bolster its accusations of media bias, Paul Farhi reports. It isn’t clear yet what specifically prompted the network to take action against the reporter.

---

Social media speed read

Sanders dominated the Twitter conversation during last night's debate:

 #DemDebate

Tenth Debate: February 25, 2020

Jill Biden wished her husband luck on the debate stage:

Dr. Jill Biden ✓

@DrBiden

Tonight, ahead of the #DemDebate, I slipped this note into @JoeBiden's jacket pocket without him knowing. ❤️
Jill

♥️ 3,667 12:06 AM - Feb 26, 2020

🗨️ 679 people are talking about this

Klobuchar got caught in the middle of a Biden vs. Steyer shouting match:

A lot of pundits, including this former South Carolina state legislator, praised Biden's performance:

Bloomberg's one-liners were widely mocked:

A Post reporter had this interaction with a flack:

And two inspiring young activists hung out:

Videos of the day

Stephen Colbert went live after his hometown's debate and joked that it would be great if Sanders and Trump are the nominees because those are the only two impressions he can do:

Trevor Noah joked about Sanders not being in any rush to see moderates drop out of the race:

Seth Meyers called out Bloomberg and his campaign for tweeting fake quotes they attributed to Sanders:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out The Trailer for news and insight on political campaigns around the country, from David Weigel. 435 districts. 50 states. Tuesday, Thursday and Sunday evenings. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Bernie Sanders refuses to get bogged down – or pinned down – on specifics during Democratic debate
Date: Wednesday, February 26, 2020 9:24:47 AM

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Uber

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
✉ Email

Bernie Sanders refuses to get bogged down – or pinned down – on specifics during Democratic debate

CHARLESTON, S.C. – Pete Buttigieg ripped into Bernie Sanders during Tuesday night’s presidential debate for declining to endorse the abolition of the Senate filibuster. “How are we going to deliver a revolution if you won’t even support a rule change?” the former mayor asked the front-runner for the Democratic nomination. “We are in the state where Strom Thurmond used the filibuster to block civil rights legislation repeatedly.”

Elizabeth Warren also took a shot, warning that Republicans will use the filibuster to block the next president from passing gun control legislation, tackling climate change and overhauling the immigration system. “I’ve seen gun safety legislation introduced, get a majority and then it doesn’t pass because of the filibuster,” said the senator from Massachusetts. “Understand this: The filibuster is giving a veto to the gun industry.”

Sanders chose not to directly respond to these attacks during the 10th Democratic debate, the first time he found himself standing behind the podium at center stage, on account of his lead in national polls. The independent senator from Vermont didn’t let himself get mired in a process debate about legislative procedure with two rivals, as he did during the September debate in Houston. Instead, Sanders emphasized his support for stricter gun laws. “At the end of the day, we need to rally the American people,” he said. “I am proud I have a D-minus voting record from the NRA. If elected president, it will get worse than that.”

Sanders weathered the heavily anticipated, two-hour barrage of attacks from his six opponents by sticking relentlessly to the populist message that got him here. At several key moments, he offered a master class in deflection. On one hand, this can be viewed as impressive message discipline from a candidate who has successfully claimed the mantle of an insurgent outsider. On the other, it could be described as sloganeering and the oversimplifying of complex issues by someone who has served in Congress since 1991. Either way, the debate served as a reminder that Sanders, despite his unconventional candidacy, is more pragmatic than popularly understood.

He clearly relished the attention, if not always the scrutiny. “I’m hearing my name mentioned a little bit tonight,” he said. “I wonder why?”

Like President Trump, Sanders is loath to admit mistakes. But he acknowledged one last night. When Joe Biden attacked him for supporting the legislation that exempted gun manufacturers from being sued, Sanders initially responded with an attack on the former vice president. “Joe has voted for terrible trade agreements,” he said. “Joe voted for the war in Iraq.” The crowd booed. “My point was,” he continued, “I have cast thousands of votes, including bad votes. That was a bad vote.”

Sanders, also like Trump, is a counterpuncher. He had several other moments that might best be summarized as: I know you are, but what am I? Former New York mayor Mike Bloomberg expressed concern about the trillion-dollar deficit and the national debt approaching $21 trillion. “We just cannot afford some of this stuff people talk about,” he said. Asked to respond, Sanders said: “Mayor Bloomberg has a solid and strong and enthusiastic base of support. The problem is they’re all billionaires.”

When Bloomberg noted that the intelligence community believes Russian President Vladimir Putin is trying to boost Sanders, Sanders ripped Bloomberg for doing business in Beijing. “I’m not a good friend of President Xi [Jinping] of China,” he said. “I think President Xi is an authoritarian leader.” Sanders then added he won’t tolerate Russian interference.

Amy Klobuchar claimed Sanders’s plans would cumulatively cost $60 trillion, or three times the size of the U.S. economy. “I think that we can get all those bold progressive things done without having someone that is so alienating that we're going to turn off the voters that we need to bring with us,” the senator from Minnesota continued. Sanders did not quibble with her $60 trillion figure. Instead, like Trump did so often during the primaries in 2016, Sanders responded to this critique by pointing to polls. “Hey, Amy,” he said, “my favorability nationally I believe are the highest up here, as a matter of fact.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

Sanders brushed aside a chorus of attacks related to the price tag, and therefore feasibility, of his proposed revolution. Moderator Norah O’Donnell said that his Medicare-for-all plan would cost $30 trillion over 10 years, but he’s only outlined how he’d pay for half of it. She asked: “Can you do the math for the rest of us?”

Sanders replied: “How many hours do you have?” Biden interjected: “That’s the problem.”

Sanders noted that he’s “laid out options all over the place,” including a seven-and-a-half percent payroll tax on employers. He then cited a new study, which he didn’t mention was co-written by one of his own former advisers, that claims his Medicare-for-all plan would reduce overall costs for consumers. Our fact-checkers note that the study has come under fire for a number of its assumptions, such as a single-payer plan paying current Medicare reimbursement rates to doctors, hospitals and other providers.

Trying to position herself as a liberal who is more effective than Sanders, Warren criticized Sanders for not offering as many details on paying for universal health care as she does in her plan. “I did the work and then Bernie’s team trashed me for it,” she said. “We need a president who is going to dig in, do the hard work and actually get it done. Progressives have got one shot, and we need to spend it with a leader who will get something done.”

Buttigieg piled on. “Senator Sanders at one point said it was going to be $40 trillion,” he said. “Then it was $30 trillion. Then it was $17 trillion. That’s an incredible shrinking price tag. At some point, he said it is unknowable what the price tag would be. Now there are new numbers. I’ll tell you exactly what it adds up to: It adds to four more years of Donald Trump.”

His Democratic rivals seemed more interested in delivering zingers like this, in a bid to elevate themselves as the best alternative to Sanders one week out from Super Tuesday, than pushing the democratic socialist to actually answer underlying questions about positions that are outside the Democratic mainstream. It's the latest manifestation of the collective action problem that continues to work to Sanders's advantage.

Red in the face, Sanders sometimes struggled to get a word in as everyone else tried to dunk on him. Klobuchar cited a Vanderbilt University study that she said showed she was the most effective senator across 15 metrics and noted that the same research showed Sanders and Warren were much less effective than her. Neither was given a chance to respond.

The CBS moderators lost control of the contentious debate early and never got it back. Sanders was asked three times to give a "quick" response to something, which allowed him to skirt specifics. The moderators also failed to ask Warren about her flip-flop to welcome the help of a super PAC or Biden's recent false claims that he once got arrested during a trip to South Africa.

Sanders also avoided particulars on foreign policy. When he was asked specifically whether he would move the U.S. Embassy from Jerusalem back to Tel Aviv, he gave this non-answer: “The answer is it’s something we would take into consideration.”

The democratic socialist defended his praise for Fidel Castro’s literacy programs in Cuba. “Occasionally it might be a good idea to be honest about American foreign policy, and that includes the fact that America has overthrown governments all over the world in Chile, in Guatemala and in Iran,” said Sanders. “And when dictatorships, whether it is the Chinese or the Cubans, do something good, you acknowledge that. But you don't have to trade love letters with them.”

Buttigieg, who seemed more determined to attack Sanders than anyone else, ridiculed this. “I am not looking forward to a scenario where it comes down to Donald Trump, with his nostalgia for the social order of the 1950s, and Bernie Sanders, with a nostalgia for the revolutionary politics of the 1960s,” he said. “This is not about what coups were happening in the 1970s or '80s. ... This is about 2020. We are not going to survive or succeed, and we're certainly not going to win by reliving the Cold War. And we're not going to win these critical House and Senate races if people in those races have to explain why the nominee of the Democratic Party is telling people to look at the bright side of the Castro regime.”

“Let us be clear,” Sanders replied, “do we think health care for all, Pete, is some kind of radical communist idea?”

“What is a radical idea is completely eliminating all private insurance,” Buttigieg replied later. “And part of how you know it is, is that no industrialized country has gone that far. He and I both like to talk about Denmark, for example. But even in Denmark, they have not abolished the possibility of private insurance. So this is an idea that goes further than what is acceptable in Denmark the country, let alone imagining how that's going to fly in Denmark, South Carolina.”

Sanders circled back to the theme of radicalism in his final answer. When all the candidates were asked to share what they see as the biggest misconception about them, Sanders said it's that people see his ideas as radical. "In one form or another, they exist in countries all over the world," he said. "The saying that moves me the most is from Nelson Mandela. Mandela said everything is impossible until it happens."

More team coverage

"The tone of the debate ultimately became a metaphor for the Democratic race itself, as it was marred repeatedly by candidates interrupting one another, talking over each other and constantly ignoring the moderators' efforts to bring some order to the unruly evening," writes Dan Balz. "What the evening highlighted was the degree to which Sanders stands apart from the field, with the other candidates divided and sparring with one another as much as with [him]. Sanders has his base, and it has served him well enough so far. The others are trying to find theirs. None of Sanders's rivals rose significantly above the others. For Sanders, that was probably a satisfactory outcome."

"While falling short of the glossy image that appeared during the commercial breaks, Bloomberg succeeded in doing what he had failed to do a week earlier in Las Vegas," adds Michael Scherer. "He delivered his messages — about his experience, his policy goals and his political focus — without a script in front of him, albeit with less polish, more stiffness and a far more stilted style of delivering a joke than his ads suggest. ... Still, Bloomberg spent significant time responding to attacks — on his treatment of women, his comments about banks’ redlining policies, his yet-unreleased tax returns and his praise of the Chinese leadership. He appeared agitated when [Warren] cited a woman’s account that he told her to ‘kill’ her baby when she got pregnant, responding: ‘I never said it. Period, end of story.’ It was far from clear whether his performance was enough to save his hopes for the nomination.”

---

Quote of the day

“All of the new Democrats that came in, put Nancy Pelosi in charge, and gave the Congress the ability to control this president — I bought,” said Bloomberg, referring to $100 million he spent to help House candidates in the 2018 midterms. He quickly corrected himself: “I — I got them.”
(Matt Viser, Annie Linskey, Sean Sullivan and Cleve Wootson)

Buttigieg’s campaign canceled a four-stop swing through South Florida scheduled for today. “Multiple aides to Buttigieg said he is sick and needed a day to rest,” Chelsea Janes reports. “Buttigieg looked sweatier than usual during the debate and appeared to have a cough drop in his mouth at various moments. He has maintained one of the more rigorous schedules of any of the candidates and will still appear at a breakfast in Charleston on Wednesday morning. Three of the events scheduled in South Florida were fundraisers, meaning the cancellation could be a costly one for Buttigieg. His campaign has been pushing to raise $13 million by Super Tuesday, and it sent a several-page memo to supporters outlining where and why it needs money for ad buys.”

The next debate will take place in Phoenix on March 15. The Sunday night battle will come before primaries that Tuesday in Arizona, Florida, Illinois and Ohio. By then, 47 percent of the delegates will have been pledged. The DNC still hasn’t announced the eligibility requirements for the debate, which will air on CNN and Univision. How much will the field have winnowed by then? Who will have emerged with the strongest chance of stopping Sanders?

Notable commentary

Politico’s John Harris argues that Democrats needed a good debate but got a bad one instead: “The evening offered limited opportunities—were these possibly enough?—for six Democrats not named Sanders to revive their candidacies with last-stand moments to emerge as the main alternative to the self-described democratic socialist.”

The Times’s Frank Bruni says the debate “felt like a genuine freakout”: Sanders’s competitors “seemed to be in the grip of some larger existential crisis, their understanding of their party’s dynamics challenged, their sense of its destiny upended and their dread of blowing an immeasurably consequential election profound.” Post columnist Dana Milbank says Sanders stirred up “a sickening sense of déjà vu” to the Republican debate in South Carolina four years ago, when the other candidates piled on Trump, but it was too little and too late to stop him from winning the nomination. “The winner of Tuesday night’s debate was Trump,” he concludes.

- The Fix’s Aaron Blake declares Warren and Biden the winners and Sanders and Bloomberg the losers.

- Post columnist Jen Rubin: “Biden needed the debate of his life. He delivered.”
- CNN’s Chris Cillizza says Buttigieg, Biden, Klobuchar, Sanders and Trump won, while Bloomberg and Warren lost.
- Vox’s team says Sanders won and Klobuchar lost.
- The Guardian’s Jessa Crispin says Warren dominated the mic but Sanders held his ground.
- FiveThirtyEight’s Nate Silver thinks Biden “pulled out his best debate with his back to the wall.”
- Democratic operative Mary Anne Marsh, writing for Fox News, calls Sanders, Warren and Biden winners, but she thinks the other four candidates onstage lost.
- The New Republic’s Walter Shapiro thinks Biden, Buttigieg and Klobuchar fared well, but Sanders and Bloomberg lost ground.
- Bloomberg Opinion’s Ramesh Ponnuru said Biden and Bloomberg performed better than they did at last week’s debate, but he argues that Sanders emerged victorious.
- Mother Jones’s Edwin Rios and Nathalie Baptiste said the debate was pretty much a pandering fest to South Carolina’s black voters.

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

---

The coronavirus

A man wearing a protective face mask watches the Nikkei index tank outside a brokerage house in Tokyo. (Athit Perawongmetha/Reuters)

The CDC warned the virus's spread in the United States is “inevitable.”

“The warnings from officials with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the National Institutes of Health and other agencies, contrasted sharply with assessments from President Trump and other White House officials, who have largely dismissed concerns about the virus,” Erica Werner, Yasmeen Abutaleb, Lena Sun and Lenny Bernstein report. “The mixed messages continued Tuesday as dire warnings issued to senators and reporters early in the day gave way to a more positive assessment, after the Dow Jones industrial average plunged 3.4 percent, bringing the two-day loss to more than 1,900 points — the worst in two years.”

- “We believe the immediate risk here in the United States remains low, and we’re working hard to keep that risk low,” Anne Schuchat, the CDC’s principal deputy director, said during a hastily convened afternoon news briefing.
- “Ultimately, we expect we will see community spread in the United States. It's not a question of if this will happen, but when this will happen, and how many people in this country will have severe illnesses," Nancy Messonnier, the director of the National Center for Immunization and Respiratory Diseases at the CDC, said during the morning briefing.

"The confused messaging threatened to obscure urgent public health advice coming from the CDC ... Businesses need to consider replacing in-person meetings with telework, Messonnier said. School authorities should consider ways to limit face-to-face contact, such as dividing students into smaller groups, using Internet-based learning or even closing schools. Local officials should consider modifying, postponing or canceling large gatherings. Hospitals should consider ways to triage patients who do not need urgent care and recommend that patients delay surgery that isn't absolutely necessary."

The White House seems mainly focused on reducing public alarm.

"Trump is highly concerned about the market and has encouraged aides not to give predictions that might cause further tremors," Jeff Stein and Josh Dawsey report. "Privately, Trump has become furious about the stock market's slide, according to two people familiar with the president's thinking ... Some White House officials have been unhappy with how Health and Human Services Secretary Alex Azar has handled the situation ... White House officials often face a tricky balance of trying to assure the public while also not dismissing threats that could become calamities. The Dow is still up markedly from 2017, when Trump took office, but it closed Tuesday at its lowest level since October." Global financial markets continued losing ground overnight.

The acting head of DHS was grilled by a GOP senator over the response.

"Appearing in front of a Senate appropriations subcommittee, [Chad] Wolf was on the receiving end of a brutal line of questioning from Sen. John Neely Kennedy (R-La.). Throughout the exchange, Wolf struggled to produce basic facts and projections about the disease,” Aaron Blake reports.

No major lockdown is planned in a South Korean region stricken with the virus.

“When a spokesman for South Korea's ruling party suggested Tuesday that the government would be rolling out a ‘maximum lockdown’ on the coronavirus-hit southern city of Daegu, the backlash was immediate and the political retreat swift,” Min Joo Kim and Simon Denyer report. “Hong Ihk-pyo soon clarified that he didn’t mean a ‘Wuhan-style lockdown’ or a blockade on travel into and out of the city — along the lines that China’s Communist Party has imposed on Wuhan and surrounding areas at the center of the covid-19 outbreak. President Moon Jae-in soon chimed in. There would be no regional blockade, he said, only a full-scale effort to contain the spread of the virus.” Infection numbers soared in South Korea to over 1,200.

France and Iran reported new deaths this morning.

“France reported the first death of a French citizen from the epidemic as cases spread rapidly across Europe, with Spain confirming eight new cases in the past 24 hours and new infections reported in France, Croatia, Austria and Switzerland,” according to our live blog. “Nineteen people have died in Iran from the novel coronavirus outbreak, Iranian Health Ministry spokesman Kianush Jahanpur told state television on Wednesday.”

The virus hits seniors the hardest. Italy’s elderly population is on the front line.

“That has set off a race in countries with significant older populations — like Italy — to figure out whether there are ways to protect their most vulnerable: those in hospitals, in nursing homes, and seniors in sealed-off hot-spot towns who are watching television and fearing the worst,” Chico Harlan and Stefano Pitrelli report. “But even as Italy works to contain what is the first major coronavirus outbreak in Europe, there is growing concern that the virus is outracing the health measures. New cases on Tuesday popped up farther from the original cluster, including in the southern island of Sicily and the tourist-heavy Tuscan capital, Florence. Italy has at least 322 confirmed cases and 11 deaths, all people who were elderly or already sick.”

The U.S. government can quarantine you. There’s almost nothing you can do about it.

“Regulations set forth by the [CDC] give health officials broad authority to quarantine or isolate anyone ‘reasonably believed’ to have been exposed to a range of highly infectious diseases. The list includes cholera, infectious tuberculosis and flus that can cause a pandemic,” Derek Hawkins reports. “The government’s powers to sequester people in the name of public health are rooted in the Constitution’s Commerce Clause, which allows Congress to regulate foreign and interstate commerce.”

---

The Trump presidency

President Trump and first lady Melania Trump attend a wreath-laying ceremony at Mohandas Gandhi's memorial in New Delhi on Tuesday. (Alexander Drago/Reuters)

Trump praised Modi's record on religious tolerance, as violence erupted over discrimination against Muslims.

“Trump avoided any public criticism of his host — whose political biography is also built partly on religious and cultural divisions — along with any comparison of [Prime Minister Narendra] Modi's policies with his own treatment of Muslim immigrants,” Anne Gearan, Joanna Slatter, Seung Min Kim and Niha Masih report. “We did talk about religious freedom, and I will say that the prime minister was incredible in what he told me. He wants people to have religious freedom and very strongly,” Trump said during a news conference that capped the public portion of his largely ceremonial visit. Modi, who leads the Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party, has insisted that the citizenship law aims to help persecuted religious minorities in three nearby countries. ... At least 17 people were killed, including a police officer, in clashes in the capital city during Trump's visit. The violence began when supporters of the citizenship law confronted opponents of the measure. ...

“The citizenship law, along with India's other actions, has drawn bipartisan criticism in Congress, but Trump tread lightly. The president said he had 'asked that question' during a closed-door meeting Tuesday, but he was vague about whether he criticized Modi for his decision. 'I don't want to discuss that,' he said when asked for his opinion of the law. 'I want to leave that to India, and hopefully they're going to make the right decision for the people.' ... Trump and Modi issued joint statements praising the growing defense cooperation between the two countries, but they did not field questions together. ... Although they spent much of the day together, including at a state banquet of salmon and grilled goat, Modi is known for not having held a news conference in his six years as prime minister."

There's a new senior leader at the White House personnel office. He's a college senior.

Politico reports that James Bacon, 23, is acting as one of the right-hand men to new director of presidential personnel John McEntee, who is 29: "Bacon, a senior at George Washington University pursuing a bachelor's degree, comes from the Department of Transportation, where he briefly worked in the policy shop. Bacon will be PPO's director of operations overseeing paperwork and will assist on vetting. The role was previously filled by Katja Bullock, who is in her late 70s and was a veteran of the office in both Bush administrations, as well as the Reagan administration."

A Trump judicial nominee once called for abolishing Social Security.

Stephen Schwartz, nominated to the U.S. Court of Federal Claims, argued 15 years ago "that several federal agencies should be eliminated and that Social Security should be abolished because economic disparity 'is a natural aspect of the human condition,'" Robert O'Harrow Jr. reports. "Schwartz wrote that the departments of Transportation, Agriculture and Education lack a 'constitutional basis,' and that Social Security benefits were intended to prevent 'outright starvation' but had become a 'standard component of most retirement programs.'"

Trump escalated his attacks on the judicial branch.

“In tweets and comments at a news conference in India — and just a month before the Supreme Court is to consider congressional and prosecutors’ requests for the president’s closely guarded financial records — Trump targeted Justices Sonia Sotomayor and Ruth Bader Ginsburg,” Robert Barnes and Ashley Parker report. “Trump interpreted as biased a dissent from Sotomayor about his administration’s tendency to seek emergency interventions from the Supreme Court. ... The president’s broadside breached what normally is an arm’s-length distance between the White House and the high court, and cast the disagreements into starkly personal terms. ... A court spokeswoman on Tuesday said that [John] Roberts, Sotomayor and Ginsburg had no comment ... Writing only for herself, Sotomayor complained that the federal government has been too quick to ask the Supreme Court for emergency relief from lower-court decisions that had not gone through the usual legal process. ... Neither opinion — the one written by Sotomayor or [the other by \[Justices Neil Gorsuch and \[Clarence\] Thomas](#) — specifically mentioned Trump or the administration.”

Trump also attacked a juror who voted to convict his confidant Roger Stone.

Trump “injected new political drama into the legal debate over whether [Stone] deserves a new trial, tweeting during a hearing in the matter that the jury forewoman who voted to convict his longtime friend and confidant was ‘totally biased’ and seeming to suggest the judge was, as well,” Spencer S. Hsu and Matt Zapotosky report. “Trump’s comments came just as U.S. District Judge Amy Berman Jackson had rebuked him and others over their attacks on the juror, and they seemed to put the president at odds with his own Justice Department, which argued against Stone’s bid for new legal proceedings. Jackson ultimately ended the hearing without a decision after taking testimony from three jurors on the panel — including the forewoman. The judge is expected to issue a ruling soon.”

Senate Republicans backed Bill Barr after his clash with

Trump.

“GOP lawmakers gave [the attorney general] a solid show of support in a private lunch meeting,” Mike DeBonis reports “Every sentence began with, “Keep up the good work,” said Sen. Kevin Cramer (R-N.D.), recalling senators’ remarks at the lunch, which began with a round of applause for Barr. ... [Mitch] McConnell told reporters afterward that Barr ‘enjoys overwhelming support’ in the Republican ranks: ‘We all think he’s doing an outstanding job.’ ... ‘He didn’t give any indication he’s going anywhere,’ said Senate Majority Whip John Thune (R-S.D.). ...

“Barr also finds himself in the middle of a thorny issue that has split Republican lawmakers — the pending expiration of key federal surveillance authorities. ... Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), among others, is pushing to take any future surveillance of political campaigns out of the secret foreign intelligence court entirely, among other changes to the existing law. ... But Barr, according to multiple senators, said he was not pressing for any specific statutory change to address the alleged Trump-related warrant abuses, which were detailed in a December report from Michael E. Horowitz, the Justice Department inspector general. Instead, he indicated that he would pursue administrative changes to remake how secret warrants are obtained and supervised.”

The NSA’s phone program cost $100 million but produced just two unique leads.

“A National Security Agency system that analyzed logs of Americans’ domestic phone calls and text messages cost $100 million from 2015 to 2019, but yielded only a single significant investigation, according to a newly declassified study,” the New York Times reports. “Moreover, only twice during that four-year period did the program generate unique information that the F.B.I. did not already possess, said the study, which was produced by the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board and briefed to Congress ... The report did not reveal the subject matter of the one significant F.B.I. investigation that was spurred by the Freedom Act program, and it did not divulge its outcome.”

Seventy former senators signed onto an op-ed saying the Senate isn't performing its constitutional duties.

In an open letter, a bipartisan group of former lawmakers said Congress isn't functioning as the Framers intended. "The Senate's abdication of its legislative and oversight responsibilities erodes the checks and balances of the separate powers that are designed to protect the liberties on which our democracy depends," they write.

Two antiabortion bills failed to advance in the Senate.

"All Republicans except Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) voted for a bill banning abortion after 20 weeks, while Democratic Sens. Bob Casey (D-Pa.) and Joe Manchin (D-W.V.) supported the measure," Politico reports. "All four lawmakers, meanwhile, voted for a bill requiring doctors to provide care to survivors of failed abortions. Sen. Doug Jones of Alabama, the most vulnerable Democrat facing reelection, opposed the 20-week ban but voted for the second measure."

The Supreme Court ruled that the family of a Mexican teen killed by the Border Patrol can't sue in U.S. courts.

"The court's conservatives prevailed in the 5 to 4 ruling, in which the court for the second time considered whether relatives of foreign victims injured on foreign soil can go to court without express authorization from Congress," Barnes reports. "The case began with the death of 15-year-old Sergio Adrián Hernández Güereca, who was fatally shot by a federal agent in 2010 on the Mexican side of the wide concrete culvert that separates El Paso from Juarez, Mexico. Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. wrote for his conservative colleagues, saying a respect for the separation of powers means that courts should be reluctant to allow lawsuits filed by foreign victims in U.S. courts without express congressional authorization."

---

More on 2020

A Sanders nomination would complicate the reelection campaigns of three Virginia congresswomen.

GOP candidates and groups are already targeting the once deep-red Virginia districts held by Democratic Reps. Elaine Luria, Abigail Spanberger and Jennifer Wexton, trying to link the freshman lawmakers to Sanders. Jenna Portnoy reports that Luria, who backs Biden, wasted no time in denouncing Sanders this week after he said he would skip the annual conference of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee: “Her swift reaction was an example of the tactics she and other centrist Democrats may use to try to steer clear of [Sanders] if he wins their party’s presidential nomination. ... Spanberger and Wexton have not made endorsements in the presidential contest and have no plans to at the moment. Spanberger, a former CIA officer, said she has already cast her absentee ballot; she declined to reveal her choice or rule anyone out. Rob Jones, one of several Republicans vying to challenge Wexton in November, suggested last week that because Wexton often votes the same way as Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-N.Y.), a top Sanders surrogate, Wexton must support Sanders. Wexton balked at that logic, and said: ‘I will not be supporting Bernie Sanders in this primary.’”

The Democratic establishment in Texas is freaking out about Sanders's rise.

“Rep. Marc Veasey is about as restrained as Texans come, but in recent days he has unloaded ... to practically any reporter he could find,” the Texas Tribune reports. “His message? [Sanders’s] march to the party’s nomination will jeopardize Texas Democrats’ efforts to capture the state House of Representatives and a slew of U.S. House seats across the state. ... While Sanders supporters proclaim a growing movement that will bring out new voters needed to flip the state, nearly two dozen Texas Democratic officeholders, candidates, activists and donors interviewed for this story expressed concern — sometimes bordering on despair — that a Sanders Democratic nomination is the difference between being on offense or in retreat in Texas this cycle.”

Mitch McConnell said Sanders may be more competitive than pundits think.

“I’m reminded of when the Democrats back in 1980 were all pulling for Ronald Reagan to be the nominee because they thought he’d be the easiest to beat,” McConnell told reporters, per Politico. “I think it’s going to be a contested general election with a lot of energy on both sides, and for myself I’ll leave it up to the Democrats to pick who they’d like to be their candidate.”

The Boston Globe endorsed Warren for president, a year after calling for her not to run.

This is significant because Sanders is making a play to win Massachusetts on Super Tuesday, scheduling rallies for later this week in Boston and Springfield. “In December 2018, this editorial board expressed doubt that Elizabeth Warren should run for president. She has proved us wrong and has shaped the course of the race for the better. The electorate, at least in recent polls and in the early states, is signaling its preference for the profound change that underpins Warren’s agenda. Sanders has been the main beneficiary, but is less likely to deliver; he has shown no ability over the course of his career to build broad legislative coalitions. Warren is uniquely poised to accomplish serious reform without sacrificing what’s working in our economy and innovation ecosystem. She would get under the hood to fix the engine — not drive off a cliff, but also not just kick the tires.”

9/11 was a turning point in Bloomberg's quest to become New York mayor.

“Bloomberg awoke early on that crisp and cloudless Tuesday and walked from his East Side mansion to his neighborhood polling place, where he saw his name on an election ballot for the first time, as a Republican candidate for mayor. It was Sept. 11, 2001, primary day, and Bloomberg was in the thick of trying to reinvent himself as the face of America’s largest city,” Paul Schwartzmann reports in the latest version of our Pursuits series. “Then someone told him that an airplane had slammed into the World Trade Center. ... What Bloomberg did not know in that moment — what no one could have known — is that the [attack] would fuel his unlikely rise as New York’s mayor and become a foundation for his race for the White House. ... ‘We began to write a comeback story,’ Bloomberg tells audiences, recalling that he took over a city ‘in tatters’ after winning an election that ‘almost no one’ — not even his mother, he often notes — ‘thought I had a chance.’ Bloomberg’s 12 years at City Hall lifted him to newfound prominence and spanned the rebirth of Lower Manhattan, the rise of the new World Trade Center and the opening of the 9/11 Memorial. Yet, in 2001, as he aspired to succeed Republican Mayor Rudy Giuliani, he was largely unknown beyond Wall Street and the exclusive dinner parties and charity galas he frequented.”

Hard work saved the Nevada caucuses, but it may not have been enough.

“[Harry] Reid, who helped move Nevada’s caucuses up in the calendar in 2008, establishing his state as the first in the West, said on Sunday that it was ‘time for the Democratic Party to move to primaries everywhere.’ That affirmation was echoed on Monday by the state party’s chairman, William McCurdy II, who said it was ‘time for our state party and elected leaders to look at shifting to a primary process moving forward.’ And it was reiterated on Tuesday by the Democratic governor, Steve Sisolak, who said he would help ‘review how we could switch to an early presidential primary,’” Isaac Stanley-Becker reports. “Similar sentiment has been voiced in Iowa, where the quadrennial institution had defined the political culture of the state since it inaugurated the modern caucuses in 1972, part of an effort to make the nominating process more inclusive.”

Democrats are desperately trying to recruit Steve Bullock to run for Senate.

“Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer met with [the former presidential candidate] in Montana last weekend as Democrats make a last-ditch effort to woo him to run for the Senate this year,” Politico reports. “Bullock, the two-term governor and former presidential candidate, has repeatedly said he has no plans to challenge Republican Sen. Steve Daines this year. But the state’s filing deadline is just over two weeks away, and Democrats have continued to pitch Bullock on seeking the Senate seat before the window closes.”

A veteran running for Congress in Arizona suspended his campaign after a heroin overdose.

“Chris Taylor, a 33-year-old Army veteran and city councilman in Safford, Ariz., told The Post that he was sober for ‘many solid years’ before the relapse. He was found unresponsive Wednesday night in his home, where paramedics revived him with naloxone,” Meryl Kornfield reports. The Republican said he’s “not going to hide from this.” He said he has battled with an opioid addiction since high school. He was seeking the GOP nomination to challenge Rep. Tom O’Halloran (D).

ABC News suspended veteran correspondent David Wright after a Project Veritas sting.

Network officials suspended Wright after reviewing footage gathered by the conservative group that records “undercover” footage of mainstream journalists to bolster its accusations of media bias, Paul Farhi reports. It isn’t clear yet what specifically prompted the network to take action against the reporter.

---

Social media speed read

Sanders dominated the Twitter conversation during last night's debate:

 #DemDebate

Tenth Debate: February 25, 2020

Jill Biden wished her husband luck on the debate stage:

Dr. Jill Biden ✓

@DrBiden

Tonight, ahead of the #DemDebate, I slipped this note into @JoeBiden's jacket pocket without him knowing. ❤️
Jill

♥️ 3,667 12:06 AM - Feb 26, 2020

🗨️ 679 people are talking about this

Klobuchar got caught in the middle of a Biden vs. Steyer shouting match:

A lot of pundits, including this former South Carolina state legislator, praised Biden's performance:

Bloomberg's one-liners were widely mocked:

A Post reporter had this interaction with a flack:

And two inspiring young activists hung out:

Videos of the day

Stephen Colbert went live after his hometown's debate and joked that it would be great if Sanders and Trump are the nominees because those are the only two impressions he can do:

Trevor Noah joked about Sanders not being in any rush to see moderates drop out of the race:

Seth Meyers called out Bloomberg and his campaign for tweeting fake quotes they attributed to Sanders:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out The Trailer for news and insight on political campaigns around the country, from David Weigel. 435 districts. 50 states. Tuesday, Thursday and Sunday evenings. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Bernie Sanders refuses to get bogged down – or pinned down – on specifics during Democratic debate
Date: Wednesday, February 26, 2020 9:24:57 AM

COMMITTED TO
AFFORDABLE CARE
FOR THE HEALTH OF AMERICA<sup>SM</sup>

BlueCross
BlueShield
Association

Powered by  LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

Bernie Sanders refuses to get bogged down – or pinned down – on specifics during Democratic debate

CHARLESTON, S.C. – Pete Buttigieg ripped into Bernie Sanders during Tuesday night’s presidential debate for declining to endorse the abolition of the Senate filibuster. “How are we going to deliver a revolution if you won’t even support a rule change?” the former mayor asked the front-runner for the Democratic nomination. “We are in the state where Strom Thurmond used the filibuster to block civil rights legislation repeatedly.”

Elizabeth Warren also took a shot, warning that Republicans will use the filibuster to block the next president from passing gun control legislation, tackling climate change and overhauling the immigration system. “I’ve seen gun safety legislation introduced, get a majority and then it doesn’t pass because of the filibuster,” said the senator from Massachusetts. “Understand this: The filibuster is giving a veto to the gun industry.”

Sanders chose not to directly respond to these attacks during the 10th Democratic debate, the first time he found himself standing behind the podium at center stage, on account of his lead in national polls. The independent senator from Vermont didn’t let himself get mired in a process debate about legislative procedure with two rivals, as he did during the September debate in Houston. Instead, Sanders emphasized his support for stricter gun laws. “At the end of the day, we need to rally the American people,” he said. “I am proud I have a D-minus voting record from the NRA. If elected president, it will get worse than that.”

Sanders weathered the heavily anticipated, two-hour barrage of attacks from his six opponents by sticking relentlessly to the populist message that got him here. At several key moments, he offered a master class in deflection. On one hand, this can be viewed as impressive message discipline from a candidate who has successfully claimed the mantle of an insurgent outsider. On the other, it could be described as sloganeering and the oversimplifying of complex issues by someone who has served in Congress since 1991. Either way, the debate served as a reminder that Sanders, despite his unconventional candidacy, is more pragmatic than popularly understood.

He clearly relished the attention, if not always the scrutiny. “I’m hearing my name mentioned a little bit tonight,” he said. “I wonder why?”

Like President Trump, Sanders is loath to admit mistakes. But he acknowledged one last night. When Joe Biden attacked him for supporting the legislation that exempted gun manufacturers from being sued, Sanders initially responded with an attack on the former vice president. “Joe has voted for terrible trade agreements,” he said. “Joe voted for the war in Iraq.” The crowd booed. “My point was,” he continued, “I have cast thousands of votes, including bad votes. That was a bad vote.”

Sanders, also like Trump, is a counterpuncher. He had several other moments that might best be summarized as: I know you are, but what am I? Former New York mayor Mike Bloomberg expressed concern about the trillion-dollar deficit and the national debt approaching $21 trillion. “We just cannot afford some of this stuff people talk about,” he said. Asked to respond, Sanders said: “Mayor Bloomberg has a solid and strong and enthusiastic base of support. The problem is they’re all billionaires.”

When Bloomberg noted that the intelligence community believes Russian President Vladimir Putin is trying to boost Sanders, Sanders ripped Bloomberg for doing business in Beijing. “I’m not a good friend of President Xi [Jinping] of China,” he said. “I think President Xi is an authoritarian leader.” Sanders then added he won’t tolerate Russian interference.

Amy Klobuchar claimed Sanders’s plans would cumulatively cost $60 trillion, or three times the size of the U.S. economy. “I think that we can get all those bold progressive things done without having someone that is so alienating that we’re going to turn off the voters that we need to bring with us,” the senator from Minnesota continued. Sanders did not quibble with her $60 trillion figure. Instead, like Trump did so often during the primaries in 2016, Sanders responded to this critique by pointing to polls. “Hey, Amy,” he said, “my favorability nationally I believe are the highest up here, as a matter of fact.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

Sanders brushed aside a chorus of attacks related to the price tag, and therefore feasibility, of his proposed revolution.

Moderator Norah O’Donnell said that his Medicare-for-all plan would cost $30 trillion over 10 years, but he’s only outlined how he’d pay for half of it. She asked: “Can you do the math for the rest of us?” Sanders replied:

“How many hours do you have?” Biden interjected: “That’s the problem.”

Sanders noted that he’s “laid out options all over the place,” including a seven-and-a-half percent payroll tax on employers. He then cited a new study, which he didn’t mention was co-written by one of his own former advisers, that claims his Medicare-for-all plan would reduce overall costs for consumers. Our fact-checkers note that the study has come under fire for a number of its assumptions, such as a single-payer plan paying current Medicare reimbursement rates to doctors, hospitals and other providers.

Trying to position herself as a liberal who is more effective than Sanders, Warren criticized Sanders for not offering as many details on paying for universal health care as she does in her plan. “I did the work and then Bernie’s team trashed me for it,” she said. “We need a president who is going to dig in, do the hard work and actually get it done. Progressives have got one shot, and we need to spend it with a leader who will get something done.”

Buttigieg piled on. “Senator Sanders at one point said it was going to be $40 trillion,” he said. “Then it was $30 trillion. Then it was $17 trillion. That’s an incredible shrinking price tag. At some point, he said it is unknowable what the price tag would be. Now there are new numbers. I’ll tell you exactly what it adds up to: It adds to four more years of Donald Trump.”

His Democratic rivals seemed more interested in delivering zingers like this, in a bid to elevate themselves as the best alternative to Sanders one week out from Super Tuesday, than pushing the democratic socialist to actually answer underlying questions about positions that are outside the Democratic mainstream. It's the latest manifestation of the collective action problem that continues to work to Sanders's advantage.

Red in the face, Sanders sometimes struggled to get a word in as everyone else tried to dunk on him. Klobuchar cited a Vanderbilt University study that she said showed she was the most effective senator across 15 metrics and noted that the same research showed Sanders and Warren were much less effective than her. Neither was given a chance to respond.

The CBS moderators lost control of the contentious debate early and never got it back. Sanders was asked three times to give a "quick" response to something, which allowed him to skirt specifics. The moderators also failed to ask Warren about her flip-flop to welcome the help of a super PAC or Biden's recent false claims that he once got arrested during a trip to South Africa.

Sanders also avoided particulars on foreign policy. When he was asked specifically whether he would move the U.S. Embassy from Jerusalem back to Tel Aviv, he gave this non-answer: “The answer is it’s something we would take into consideration.”

The democratic socialist defended his praise for Fidel Castro’s literacy programs in Cuba. “Occasionally it might be a good idea to be honest about American foreign policy, and that includes the fact that America has overthrown governments all over the world in Chile, in Guatemala and in Iran,” said Sanders. “And when dictatorships, whether it is the Chinese or the Cubans, do something good, you acknowledge that. But you don't have to trade love letters with them.”

Buttigieg, who seemed more determined to attack Sanders than anyone else, ridiculed this. “I am not looking forward to a scenario where it comes down to Donald Trump, with his nostalgia for the social order of the 1950s, and Bernie Sanders, with a nostalgia for the revolutionary politics of the 1960s,” he said. “This is not about what coups were happening in the 1970s or '80s. ... This is about 2020. We are not going to survive or succeed, and we're certainly not going to win by reliving the Cold War. And we're not going to win these critical House and Senate races if people in those races have to explain why the nominee of the Democratic Party is telling people to look at the bright side of the Castro regime.”

“Let us be clear,” Sanders replied, “do we think health care for all, Pete, is some kind of radical communist idea?”

“What is a radical idea is completely eliminating all private insurance,” Buttigieg replied later. “And part of how you know it is, is that no industrialized country has gone that far. He and I both like to talk about Denmark, for example. But even in Denmark, they have not abolished the possibility of private insurance. So this is an idea that goes further than what is acceptable in Denmark the country, let alone imagining how that's going to fly in Denmark, South Carolina.”

Sanders circled back to the theme of radicalism in his final answer. When all the candidates were asked to share what they see as the biggest misconception about them, Sanders said it's that people see his ideas as radical. "In one form or another, they exist in countries all over the world," he said. "The saying that moves me the most is from Nelson Mandela. Mandela said everything is impossible until it happens."

More team coverage

"The tone of the debate ultimately became a metaphor for the Democratic race itself, as it was marred repeatedly by candidates interrupting one another, talking over each other and constantly ignoring the moderators' efforts to bring some order to the unruly evening," writes Dan Balz. "What the evening highlighted was the degree to which Sanders stands apart from the field, with the other candidates divided and sparring with one another as much as with [him]. Sanders has his base, and it has served him well enough so far. The others are trying to find theirs. None of Sanders's rivals rose significantly above the others. For Sanders, that was probably a satisfactory outcome."

"While falling short of the glossy image that appeared during the commercial breaks, Bloomberg succeeded in doing what he had failed to do a week earlier in Las Vegas," adds Michael Scherer. "He delivered his messages — about his experience, his policy goals and his political focus — without a script in front of him, albeit with less polish, more stiffness and a far more stilted style of delivering a joke than his ads suggest. ... Still, Bloomberg spent significant time responding to attacks — on his treatment of women, his comments about banks’ redlining policies, his yet-unreleased tax returns and his praise of the Chinese leadership. He appeared agitated when [Warren] cited a woman’s account that he told her to ‘kill’ her baby when she got pregnant, responding: ‘I never said it. Period, end of story.’ It was far from clear whether his performance was enough to save his hopes for the nomination.”

---

Quote of the day

“All of the new Democrats that came in, put Nancy Pelosi in charge, and gave the Congress the ability to control this president — I bought,” said Bloomberg, referring to $100 million he spent to help House candidates in the 2018 midterms. He quickly corrected himself: “I — I got them.”
(Matt Viser, Annie Linskey, Sean Sullivan and Cleve Wootson)

Buttigieg’s campaign canceled a four-stop swing through South Florida scheduled for today. “Multiple aides to Buttigieg said he is sick and needed a day to rest,” Chelsea Janes reports. “Buttigieg looked sweatier than usual during the debate and appeared to have a cough drop in his mouth at various moments. He has maintained one of the more rigorous schedules of any of the candidates and will still appear at a breakfast in Charleston on Wednesday morning. Three of the events scheduled in South Florida were fundraisers, meaning the cancellation could be a costly one for Buttigieg. His campaign has been pushing to raise $13 million by Super Tuesday, and it sent a several-page memo to supporters outlining where and why it needs money for ad buys.”

The next debate will take place in Phoenix on March 15. The Sunday night battle will come before primaries that Tuesday in Arizona, Florida, Illinois and Ohio. By then, 47 percent of the delegates will have been pledged. The DNC still hasn’t announced the eligibility requirements for the debate, which will air on CNN and Univision. How much will the field have winnowed by then? Who will have emerged with the strongest chance of stopping Sanders?

Notable commentary

Politico’s John Harris argues that Democrats needed a good debate but got a bad one instead: “The evening offered limited opportunities—were these possibly enough?—for six Democrats not named Sanders to revive their candidacies with last-stand moments to emerge as the main alternative to the self-described democratic socialist.”

The Times’s Frank Bruni says the debate “felt like a genuine freakout”: Sanders’s competitors “seemed to be in the grip of some larger existential crisis, their understanding of their party’s dynamics challenged, their sense of its destiny upended and their dread of blowing an immeasurably consequential election profound.” Post columnist Dana Milbank says Sanders stirred up “a sickening sense of déjà vu” to the Republican debate in South Carolina four years ago, when the other candidates piled on Trump, but it was too little and too late to stop him from winning the nomination. “The winner of Tuesday night’s debate was Trump,” he concludes.

- The Fix’s Aaron Blake declares Warren and Biden the winners and Sanders and Bloomberg the losers.

- Post columnist Jen Rubin: “Biden needed the debate of his life. He delivered.”
- CNN’s Chris Cillizza says Buttigieg, Biden, Klobuchar, Sanders and Trump won, while Bloomberg and Warren lost.
- Vox’s team says Sanders won and Klobuchar lost.
- The Guardian’s Jessa Crispin says Warren dominated the mic but Sanders held his ground.
- FiveThirtyEight’s Nate Silver thinks Biden “pulled out his best debate with his back to the wall.”
- Democratic operative Mary Anne Marsh, writing for Fox News, calls Sanders, Warren and Biden winners, but she thinks the other four candidates onstage lost.
- The New Republic’s Walter Shapiro thinks Biden, Buttigieg and Klobuchar fared well, but Sanders and Bloomberg lost ground.
- Bloomberg Opinion’s Ramesh Ponnuru said Biden and Bloomberg performed better than they did at last week’s debate, but he argues that Sanders emerged victorious.
- Mother Jones’s Edwin Rios and Nathalie Baptiste said the debate was pretty much a pandering fest to South Carolina’s black voters.

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

---

The coronavirus

A man wearing a protective face mask watches the Nikkei index tank outside a brokerage house in Tokyo. (Athit Perawongmetha/Reuters)

The CDC warned the virus's spread in the United States is “inevitable.”

“The warnings from officials with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the National Institutes of Health and other agencies, contrasted sharply with assessments from President Trump and other White House officials, who have largely dismissed concerns about the virus,” Erica Werner, Yasmeen Abutaleb, Lena Sun and Lenny Bernstein report. “The mixed messages continued Tuesday as dire warnings issued to senators and reporters early in the day gave way to a more positive assessment, after the Dow Jones industrial average plunged 3.4 percent, bringing the two-day loss to more than 1,900 points — the worst in two years.”

- “We believe the immediate risk here in the United States remains low, and we’re working hard to keep that risk low,” Anne Schuchat, the CDC’s principal deputy director, said during a hastily convened afternoon news briefing.
- “Ultimately, we expect we will see community spread in the United States. It's not a question of if this will happen, but when this will happen, and how many people in this country will have severe illnesses," Nancy Messonnier, the director of the National Center for Immunization and Respiratory Diseases at the CDC, said during the morning briefing.

"The confused messaging threatened to obscure urgent public health advice coming from the CDC ... Businesses need to consider replacing in-person meetings with telework, Messonnier said. School authorities should consider ways to limit face-to-face contact, such as dividing students into smaller groups, using Internet-based learning or even closing schools. Local officials should consider modifying, postponing or canceling large gatherings. Hospitals should consider ways to triage patients who do not need urgent care and recommend that patients delay surgery that isn't absolutely necessary."

The White House seems mainly focused on reducing public alarm.

"Trump is highly concerned about the market and has encouraged aides not to give predictions that might cause further tremors," Jeff Stein and Josh Dawsey report. "Privately, Trump has become furious about the stock market's slide, according to two people familiar with the president's thinking ... Some White House officials have been unhappy with how Health and Human Services Secretary Alex Azar has handled the situation ... White House officials often face a tricky balance of trying to assure the public while also not dismissing threats that could become calamities. The Dow is still up markedly from 2017, when Trump took office, but it closed Tuesday at its lowest level since October." Global financial markets continued losing ground overnight.

The acting head of DHS was grilled by a GOP senator over the response.

"Appearing in front of a Senate appropriations subcommittee, [Chad] Wolf was on the receiving end of a brutal line of questioning from Sen. John Neely Kennedy (R-La.). Throughout the exchange, Wolf struggled to produce basic facts and projections about the disease,” Aaron Blake reports.

No major lockdown is planned in a South Korean region stricken with the virus.

“When a spokesman for South Korea's ruling party suggested Tuesday that the government would be rolling out a ‘maximum lockdown’ on the coronavirus-hit southern city of Daegu, the backlash was immediate and the political retreat swift,” Min Joo Kim and Simon Denyer report. “Hong Ihk-pyo soon clarified that he didn’t mean a ‘Wuhan-style lockdown’ or a blockade on travel into and out of the city — along the lines that China’s Communist Party has imposed on Wuhan and surrounding areas at the center of the covid-19 outbreak. President Moon Jae-in soon chimed in. There would be no regional blockade, he said, only a full-scale effort to contain the spread of the virus.” Infection numbers soared in South Korea to over 1,200.

France and Iran reported new deaths this morning.

“France reported the first death of a French citizen from the epidemic as cases spread rapidly across Europe, with Spain confirming eight new cases in the past 24 hours and new infections reported in France, Croatia, Austria and Switzerland,” according to our live blog. “Nineteen people have died in Iran from the novel coronavirus outbreak, Iranian Health Ministry spokesman Kianush Jahanpur told state television on Wednesday.”

The virus hits seniors the hardest. Italy’s elderly population is on the front line.

“That has set off a race in countries with significant older populations — like Italy — to figure out whether there are ways to protect their most vulnerable: those in hospitals, in nursing homes, and seniors in sealed-off hot-spot towns who are watching television and fearing the worst,” Chico Harlan and Stefano Pitrelli report. “But even as Italy works to contain what is the first major coronavirus outbreak in Europe, there is growing concern that the virus is outracing the health measures. New cases on Tuesday popped up farther from the original cluster, including in the southern island of Sicily and the tourist-heavy Tuscan capital, Florence. Italy has at least 322 confirmed cases and 11 deaths, all people who were elderly or already sick.”

The U.S. government can quarantine you. There’s almost nothing you can do about it.

“Regulations set forth by the [CDC] give health officials broad authority to quarantine or isolate anyone ‘reasonably believed’ to have been exposed to a range of highly infectious diseases. The list includes cholera, infectious tuberculosis and flus that can cause a pandemic,” Derek Hawkins reports. “The government’s powers to sequester people in the name of public health are rooted in the Constitution’s Commerce Clause, which allows Congress to regulate foreign and interstate commerce.”

---

The Trump presidency

President Trump and first lady Melania Trump attend a wreath-laying ceremony at Mohandas Gandhi's memorial in New Delhi on Tuesday. (Alexander Drago/Reuters)

Trump praised Modi's record on religious tolerance, as violence erupted over discrimination against Muslims.

“Trump avoided any public criticism of his host — whose political biography is also built partly on religious and cultural divisions — along with any comparison of [Prime Minister Narendra] Modi's policies with his own treatment of Muslim immigrants,” Anne Gearan, Joanna Slatter, Seung Min Kim and Niha Masih report. “We did talk about religious freedom, and I will say that the prime minister was incredible in what he told me. He wants people to have religious freedom and very strongly,” Trump said during a news conference that capped the public portion of his largely ceremonial visit. Modi, who leads the Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party, has insisted that the citizenship law aims to help persecuted religious minorities in three nearby countries. ... At least 17 people were killed, including a police officer, in clashes in the capital city during Trump's visit. The violence began when supporters of the citizenship law confronted opponents of the measure. ...

“The citizenship law, along with India's other actions, has drawn bipartisan criticism in Congress, but Trump tread lightly. The president said he had 'asked that question' during a closed-door meeting Tuesday, but he was vague about whether he criticized Modi for his decision. 'I don't want to discuss that,' he said when asked for his opinion of the law. 'I want to leave that to India, and hopefully they're going to make the right decision for the people.' ... Trump and Modi issued joint statements praising the growing defense cooperation between the two countries, but they did not field questions together. ... Although they spent much of the day together, including at a state banquet of salmon and grilled goat, Modi is known for not having held a news conference in his six years as prime minister.”

There's a new senior leader at the White House personnel office. He's a college senior.

Politico reports that James Bacon, 23, is acting as one of the right-hand men to new director of presidential personnel John McEntee, who is 29: "Bacon, a senior at George Washington University pursuing a bachelor's degree, comes from the Department of Transportation, where he briefly worked in the policy shop. Bacon will be PPO's director of operations overseeing paperwork and will assist on vetting. The role was previously filled by Katja Bullock, who is in her late 70s and was a veteran of the office in both Bush administrations, as well as the Reagan administration.”

A Trump judicial nominee once called for abolishing Social Security.

Stephen Schwartz, nominated to the U.S. Court of Federal Claims, argued 15 years ago “that several federal agencies should be eliminated and that Social Security should be abolished because economic disparity ‘is a natural aspect of the human condition,’” Robert O’Harrow Jr. reports. “Schwartz wrote that the departments of Transportation, Agriculture and Education lack a ‘constitutional basis,’ and that Social Security benefits were intended to prevent ‘outright starvation’ but had become a ‘standard component of most retirement programs.’”

Trump escalated his attacks on the judicial branch.

“In tweets and comments at a news conference in India — and just a month before the Supreme Court is to consider congressional and prosecutors’ requests for the president’s closely guarded financial records — Trump targeted Justices Sonia Sotomayor and Ruth Bader Ginsburg,” Robert Barnes and Ashley Parker report. “Trump interpreted as biased a dissent from Sotomayor about his administration’s tendency to seek emergency interventions from the Supreme Court. ... The president’s broadside breached what normally is an arm’s-length distance between the White House and the high court, and cast the disagreements into starkly personal terms. ... A court spokeswoman on Tuesday said that [John] Roberts, Sotomayor and Ginsburg had no comment ... Writing only for herself, Sotomayor complained that the federal government has been too quick to ask the Supreme Court for emergency relief from lower-court decisions that had not gone through the usual legal process. ... Neither opinion — the one written by Sotomayor or [the other by \[Justices Neil Gorsuch and \[Clarence\] Thomas](#) — specifically mentioned Trump or the administration.”

Trump also attacked a juror who voted to convict his confidant Roger Stone.

Trump “injected new political drama into the legal debate over whether [Stone] deserves a new trial, tweeting during a hearing in the matter that the jury forewoman who voted to convict his longtime friend and confidant was ‘totally biased’ and seeming to suggest the judge was, as well,” Spencer S. Hsu and Matt Zapposky report. “Trump’s comments came just as U.S. District Judge Amy Berman Jackson had rebuked him and others over their attacks on the juror, and they seemed to put the president at odds with his own Justice Department, which argued against Stone’s bid for new legal proceedings. Jackson ultimately ended the hearing without a decision after taking testimony from three jurors on the panel — including the forewoman. The judge is expected to issue a ruling soon.”

Senate Republicans backed Bill Barr after his clash with

Trump.

“GOP lawmakers gave [the attorney general] a solid show of support in a private lunch meeting,” Mike DeBonis reports “Every sentence began with, ‘Keep up the good work,’” said Sen. Kevin Cramer (R-N.D.), recalling senators’ remarks at the lunch, which began with a round of applause for Barr. ... [Mitch] McConnell told reporters afterward that Barr ‘enjoys overwhelming support’ in the Republican ranks: ‘We all think he’s doing an outstanding job.’ ... ‘He didn’t give any indication he’s going anywhere,’ said Senate Majority Whip John Thune (R-S.D.). ...

“Barr also finds himself in the middle of a thorny issue that has split Republican lawmakers — the pending expiration of key federal surveillance authorities. ... Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), among others, is pushing to take any future surveillance of political campaigns out of the secret foreign intelligence court entirely, among other changes to the existing law. ... But Barr, according to multiple senators, said he was not pressing for any specific statutory change to address the alleged Trump-related warrant abuses, which were detailed in a December report from Michael E. Horowitz, the Justice Department inspector general. Instead, he indicated that he would pursue administrative changes to remake how secret warrants are obtained and supervised.”

The NSA’s phone program cost $100 million but produced just two unique leads.

“A National Security Agency system that analyzed logs of Americans’ domestic phone calls and text messages cost $100 million from 2015 to 2019, but yielded only a single significant investigation, according to a newly declassified study,” the New York Times reports. “Moreover, only twice during that four-year period did the program generate unique information that the F.B.I. did not already possess, said the study, which was produced by the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board and briefed to Congress ... The report did not reveal the subject matter of the one significant F.B.I. investigation that was spurred by the Freedom Act program, and it did not divulge its outcome.”

Seventy former senators signed onto an op-ed saying the Senate isn't performing its constitutional duties.

In an open letter, a bipartisan group of former lawmakers said Congress isn't functioning as the Framers intended. "The Senate's abdication of its legislative and oversight responsibilities erodes the checks and balances of the separate powers that are designed to protect the liberties on which our democracy depends," they write.

Two antiabortion bills failed to advance in the Senate.

"All Republicans except Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) voted for a bill banning abortion after 20 weeks, while Democratic Sens. Bob Casey (D-Pa.) and Joe Manchin (D-W.V.) supported the measure," Politico reports. "All four lawmakers, meanwhile, voted for a bill requiring doctors to provide care to survivors of failed abortions. Sen. Doug Jones of Alabama, the most vulnerable Democrat facing reelection, opposed the 20-week ban but voted for the second measure."

The Supreme Court ruled that the family of a Mexican teen killed by the Border Patrol can't sue in U.S. courts.

"The court's conservatives prevailed in the 5 to 4 ruling, in which the court for the second time considered whether relatives of foreign victims injured on foreign soil can go to court without express authorization from Congress," Barnes reports. "The case began with the death of 15-year-old Sergio Adrián Hernández Güereca, who was fatally shot by a federal agent in 2010 on the Mexican side of the wide concrete culvert that separates El Paso from Juarez, Mexico. Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. wrote for his conservative colleagues, saying a respect for the separation of powers means that courts should be reluctant to allow lawsuits filed by foreign victims in U.S. courts without express congressional authorization."

---

More on 2020

A Sanders nomination would complicate the reelection campaigns of three Virginia congresswomen.

GOP candidates and groups are already targeting the once deep-red Virginia districts held by Democratic Reps. Elaine Luria, Abigail Spanberger and Jennifer Wexton, trying to link the freshman lawmakers to Sanders. Jenna Portnoy reports that Luria, who backs Biden, wasted no time in denouncing Sanders this week after he said he would skip the annual conference of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee: “Her swift reaction was an example of the tactics she and other centrist Democrats may use to try to steer clear of [Sanders] if he wins their party’s presidential nomination. ... Spanberger and Wexton have not made endorsements in the presidential contest and have no plans to at the moment. Spanberger, a former CIA officer, said she has already cast her absentee ballot; she declined to reveal her choice or rule anyone out. Rob Jones, one of several Republicans vying to challenge Wexton in November, suggested last week that because Wexton often votes the same way as Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-N.Y.), a top Sanders surrogate, Wexton must support Sanders. Wexton balked at that logic, and said: ‘I will not be supporting Bernie Sanders in this primary.’”

The Democratic establishment in Texas is freaking out about Sanders's rise.

“Rep. Marc Veasey is about as restrained as Texans come, but in recent days he has unloaded ... to practically any reporter he could find,” the Texas Tribune reports. “His message? [Sanders’s] march to the party’s nomination will jeopardize Texas Democrats’ efforts to capture the state House of Representatives and a slew of U.S. House seats across the state. ... While Sanders supporters proclaim a growing movement that will bring out new voters needed to flip the state, nearly two dozen Texas Democratic officeholders, candidates, activists and donors interviewed for this story expressed concern — sometimes bordering on despair — that a Sanders Democratic nomination is the difference between being on offense or in retreat in Texas this cycle.”

Mitch McConnell said Sanders may be more competitive than pundits think.

“I’m reminded of when the Democrats back in 1980 were all pulling for Ronald Reagan to be the nominee because they thought he’d be the easiest to beat,” McConnell told reporters, per Politico. “I think it’s going to be a contested general election with a lot of energy on both sides, and for myself I’ll leave it up to the Democrats to pick who they’d like to be their candidate.”

The Boston Globe endorsed Warren for president, a year after calling for her not to run.

This is significant because Sanders is making a play to win Massachusetts on Super Tuesday, scheduling rallies for later this week in Boston and Springfield. “In December 2018, this editorial board expressed doubt that Elizabeth Warren should run for president. She has proved us wrong and has shaped the course of the race for the better. The electorate, at least in recent polls and in the early states, is signaling its preference for the profound change that underpins Warren’s agenda. Sanders has been the main beneficiary, but is less likely to deliver; he has shown no ability over the course of his career to build broad legislative coalitions. Warren is uniquely poised to accomplish serious reform without sacrificing what’s working in our economy and innovation ecosystem. She would get under the hood to fix the engine — not drive off a cliff, but also not just kick the tires.”

9/11 was a turning point in Bloomberg's quest to become New York mayor.

“Bloomberg awoke early on that crisp and cloudless Tuesday and walked from his East Side mansion to his neighborhood polling place, where he saw his name on an election ballot for the first time, as a Republican candidate for mayor. It was Sept. 11, 2001, primary day, and Bloomberg was in the thick of trying to reinvent himself as the face of America’s largest city,” Paul Schwartzmann reports in the latest version of our Pursuits series. “Then someone told him that an airplane had slammed into the World Trade Center. ... What Bloomberg did not know in that moment — what no one could have known — is that the [attack] would fuel his unlikely rise as New York’s mayor and become a foundation for his race for the White House. ... ‘We began to write a comeback story,’ Bloomberg tells audiences, recalling that he took over a city ‘in tatters’ after winning an election that ‘almost no one’ — not even his mother, he often notes — ‘thought I had a chance.’ Bloomberg’s 12 years at City Hall lifted him to newfound prominence and spanned the rebirth of Lower Manhattan, the rise of the new World Trade Center and the opening of the 9/11 Memorial. Yet, in 2001, as he aspired to succeed Republican Mayor Rudy Giuliani, he was largely unknown beyond Wall Street and the exclusive dinner parties and charity galas he frequented.”

Hard work saved the Nevada caucuses, but it may not have been enough.

“[Harry] Reid, who helped move Nevada’s caucuses up in the calendar in 2008, establishing his state as the first in the West, said on Sunday that it was ‘time for the Democratic Party to move to primaries everywhere.’ That affirmation was echoed on Monday by the state party’s chairman, William McCurdy II, who said it was ‘time for our state party and elected leaders to look at shifting to a primary process moving forward.’ And it was reiterated on Tuesday by the Democratic governor, Steve Sisolak, who said he would help ‘review how we could switch to an early presidential primary,’” Isaac Stanley-Becker reports. “Similar sentiment has been voiced in Iowa, where the quadrennial institution had defined the political culture of the state since it inaugurated the modern caucuses in 1972, part of an effort to make the nominating process more inclusive.”

Democrats are desperately trying to recruit Steve Bullock to run for Senate.

“Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer met with [the former presidential candidate] in Montana last weekend as Democrats make a last-ditch effort to woo him to run for the Senate this year,” Politico reports. “Bullock, the two-term governor and former presidential candidate, has repeatedly said he has no plans to challenge Republican Sen. Steve Daines this year. But the state’s filing deadline is just over two weeks away, and Democrats have continued to pitch Bullock on seeking the Senate seat before the window closes.”

A veteran running for Congress in Arizona suspended his campaign after a heroin overdose.

“Chris Taylor, a 33-year-old Army veteran and city councilman in Safford, Ariz., told The Post that he was sober for ‘many solid years’ before the relapse. He was found unresponsive Wednesday night in his home, where paramedics revived him with naloxone,” Meryl Kornfield reports. The Republican said he’s “not going to hide from this.” He said he has battled with an opioid addiction since high school. He was seeking the GOP nomination to challenge Rep. Tom O’Halloran (D).

ABC News suspended veteran correspondent David Wright after a Project Veritas sting.

Network officials suspended Wright after reviewing footage gathered by the conservative group that records “undercover” footage of mainstream journalists to bolster its accusations of media bias, Paul Farhi reports. It isn’t clear yet what specifically prompted the network to take action against the reporter.

---

Social media speed read

Sanders dominated the Twitter conversation during last night's debate:

 #DemDebate

Tenth Debate: February 25, 2020

Jill Biden wished her husband luck on the debate stage:

Dr. Jill Biden ✓

@DrBiden

Tonight, ahead of the #DemDebate, I slipped this note into @JoeBiden's jacket pocket without him knowing. ❤️
Jill

♥️ 3,667 12:06 AM - Feb 26, 2020

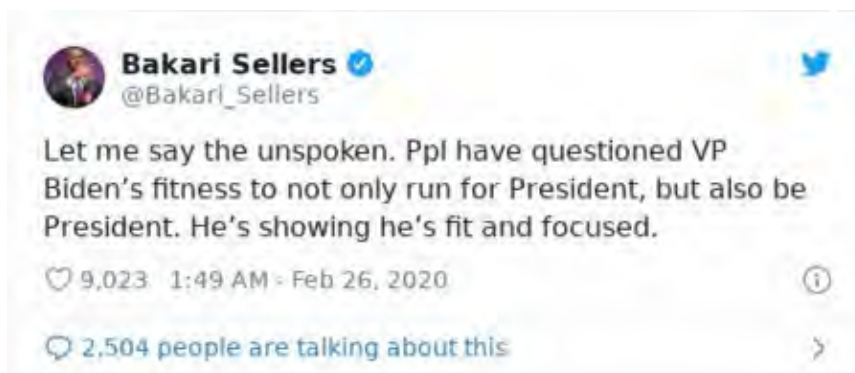

🗨️ 679 people are talking about this

Klobuchar got caught in the middle of a Biden vs. Steyer shouting match:

A lot of pundits, including this former South Carolina state legislator, praised Biden's performance:

Bloomberg's one-liners were widely mocked:

A Post reporter had this interaction with a flack:

And two inspiring young activists hung out:

Malala ✓
@Malala

She's the only friend I'd skip school for.

♥ 555K 4:46 PM - Feb 25, 2020

💬 65.8K people are talking about this

Videos of the day

Stephen Colbert went live after his hometown's debate and joked that it would be great if Sanders and Trump are the nominees because those are the only two impressions he can do:

Trevor Noah joked about Sanders not being in any rush to see moderates drop out of the race:

Seth Meyers called out Bloomberg and his campaign for tweeting fake quotes they attributed to Sanders:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out The Trailer for news and insight on political campaigns around the country, from David Weigel. 435 districts. 50 states. Tuesday, Thursday and Sunday evenings. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Bernie Sanders refuses to get bogged down – or pinned down – on specifics during Democratic debate
Date: Wednesday, February 26, 2020 9:25:15 AM

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Uber

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
✉ Email

Bernie Sanders refuses to get bogged down – or pinned down – on specifics during Democratic debate

CHARLESTON, S.C. – Pete Buttigieg ripped into Bernie Sanders during Tuesday night’s presidential debate for declining to endorse the abolition of the Senate filibuster. “How are we going to deliver a revolution if you won’t even support a rule change?” the former mayor asked the front-runner for the Democratic nomination. “We are in the state where Strom Thurmond used the filibuster to block civil rights legislation repeatedly.”

Elizabeth Warren also took a shot, warning that Republicans will use the filibuster to block the next president from passing gun control legislation, tackling climate change and overhauling the immigration system. “I’ve seen gun safety legislation introduced, get a majority and then it doesn’t pass because of the filibuster,” said the senator from Massachusetts. “Understand this: The filibuster is giving a veto to the gun industry.”

Sanders chose not to directly respond to these attacks during the 10th Democratic debate, the first time he found himself standing behind the podium at center stage, on account of his lead in national polls. The independent senator from Vermont didn’t let himself get mired in a process debate about legislative procedure with two rivals, as he did during the September debate in Houston. Instead, Sanders emphasized his support for stricter gun laws. “At the end of the day, we need to rally the American people,” he said. “I am proud I have a D-minus voting record from the NRA. If elected president, it will get worse than that.”

Sanders weathered the heavily anticipated, two-hour barrage of attacks from his six opponents by sticking relentlessly to the populist message that got him here. At several key moments, he offered a master class in deflection. On one hand, this can be viewed as impressive message discipline from a candidate who has successfully claimed the mantle of an insurgent outsider. On the other, it could be described as sloganeering and the oversimplifying of complex issues by someone who has served in Congress since 1991. Either way, the debate served as a reminder that Sanders, despite his unconventional candidacy, is more pragmatic than popularly understood.

He clearly relished the attention, if not always the scrutiny. “I’m hearing my name mentioned a little bit tonight,” he said. “I wonder why?”

Like President Trump, Sanders is loath to admit mistakes. But he acknowledged one last night. When Joe Biden attacked him for supporting the legislation that exempted gun manufacturers from being sued, Sanders initially responded with an attack on the former vice president. “Joe has voted for terrible trade agreements,” he said. “Joe voted for the war in Iraq.” The crowd booed. “My point was,” he continued, “I have cast thousands of votes, including bad votes. That was a bad vote.”

Sanders, also like Trump, is a counterpuncher. He had several other moments that might best be summarized as: I know you are, but what am I? Former New York mayor Mike Bloomberg expressed concern about the trillion-dollar deficit and the national debt approaching $21 trillion. “We just cannot afford some of this stuff people talk about,” he said. Asked to respond, Sanders said: “Mayor Bloomberg has a solid and strong and enthusiastic base of support. The problem is they’re all billionaires.”

When Bloomberg noted that the intelligence community believes Russian President Vladimir Putin is trying to boost Sanders, Sanders ripped Bloomberg for doing business in Beijing. “I’m not a good friend of President Xi [Jinping] of China,” he said. “I think President Xi is an authoritarian leader.” Sanders then added he won’t tolerate Russian interference.

Amy Klobuchar claimed Sanders’s plans would cumulatively cost $60 trillion, or three times the size of the U.S. economy. “I think that we can get all those bold progressive things done without having someone that is so alienating that we’re going to turn off the voters that we need to bring with us,” the senator from Minnesota continued. Sanders did not quibble with her $60 trillion figure. Instead, like Trump did so often during the primaries in 2016, Sanders responded to this critique by pointing to polls. “Hey, Amy,” he said, “my favorability nationally I believe are the highest up here, as a matter of fact.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

Sanders brushed aside a chorus of attacks related to the price tag, and therefore feasibility, of his proposed revolution.

Moderator Norah O’Donnell said that his Medicare-for-all plan would cost $30 trillion over 10 years, but he’s only outlined how he’d pay for half of it. She asked: “Can you do the math for the rest of us?” Sanders replied:

“How many hours do you have?” Biden interjected: “That’s the problem.”

Sanders noted that he’s “laid out options all over the place,” including a seven-and-a-half percent payroll tax on employers. He then cited a new study, which he didn’t mention was co-written by one of his own former advisers, that claims his Medicare-for-all plan would reduce overall costs for consumers. Our fact-checkers note that the study has come under fire for a number of its assumptions, such as a single-payer plan paying current Medicare reimbursement rates to doctors, hospitals and other providers.

Trying to position herself as a liberal who is more effective than Sanders, Warren criticized Sanders for not offering as many details on paying for universal health care as she does in her plan. “I did the work and then Bernie’s team trashed me for it,” she said. “We need a president who is going to dig in, do the hard work and actually get it done. Progressives have got one shot, and we need to spend it with a leader who will get something done.”

Buttigieg piled on. “Senator Sanders at one point said it was going to be $40 trillion,” he said. “Then it was $30 trillion. Then it was $17 trillion. That’s an incredible shrinking price tag. At some point, he said it is unknowable what the price tag would be. Now there are new numbers. I’ll tell you exactly what it adds up to: It adds to four more years of Donald Trump.”

His Democratic rivals seemed more interested in delivering zingers like this, in a bid to elevate themselves as the best alternative to Sanders one week out from Super Tuesday, than pushing the democratic socialist to actually answer underlying questions about positions that are outside the Democratic mainstream. It's the latest manifestation of the collective action problem that continues to work to Sanders's advantage.

Red in the face, Sanders sometimes struggled to get a word in as everyone else tried to dunk on him. Klobuchar cited a Vanderbilt University study that she said showed she was the most effective senator across 15 metrics and noted that the same research showed Sanders and Warren were much less effective than her. Neither was given a chance to respond.

The CBS moderators lost control of the contentious debate early and never got it back. Sanders was asked three times to give a "quick" response to something, which allowed him to skirt specifics. The moderators also failed to ask Warren about her flip-flop to welcome the help of a super PAC or Biden's recent false claims that he once got arrested during a trip to South Africa.

Sanders also avoided particulars on foreign policy. When he was asked specifically whether he would move the U.S. Embassy from Jerusalem back to Tel Aviv, he gave this non-answer: “The answer is it’s something we would take into consideration.”

The democratic socialist defended his praise for Fidel Castro’s literacy programs in Cuba. “Occasionally it might be a good idea to be honest about American foreign policy, and that includes the fact that America has overthrown governments all over the world in Chile, in Guatemala and in Iran,” said Sanders. “And when dictatorships, whether it is the Chinese or the Cubans, do something good, you acknowledge that. But you don't have to trade love letters with them.”

Buttigieg, who seemed more determined to attack Sanders than anyone else, ridiculed this. “I am not looking forward to a scenario where it comes down to Donald Trump, with his nostalgia for the social order of the 1950s, and Bernie Sanders, with a nostalgia for the revolutionary politics of the 1960s,” he said. “This is not about what coups were happening in the 1970s or '80s. ... This is about 2020. We are not going to survive or succeed, and we're certainly not going to win by reliving the Cold War. And we're not going to win these critical House and Senate races if people in those races have to explain why the nominee of the Democratic Party is telling people to look at the bright side of the Castro regime.”

“Let us be clear,” Sanders replied, “do we think health care for all, Pete, is some kind of radical communist idea?”

“What is a radical idea is completely eliminating all private insurance,” Buttigieg replied later. “And part of how you know it is, is that no industrialized country has gone that far. He and I both like to talk about Denmark, for example. But even in Denmark, they have not abolished the possibility of private insurance. So this is an idea that goes further than what is acceptable in Denmark the country, let alone imagining how that's going to fly in Denmark, South Carolina.”

Sanders circled back to the theme of radicalism in his final answer. When all the candidates were asked to share what they see as the biggest misconception about them, Sanders said it's that people see his ideas as radical. "In one form or another, they exist in countries all over the world," he said. "The saying that moves me the most is from Nelson Mandela. Mandela said everything is impossible until it happens."

More team coverage

"The tone of the debate ultimately became a metaphor for the Democratic race itself, as it was marred repeatedly by candidates interrupting one another, talking over each other and constantly ignoring the moderators' efforts to bring some order to the unruly evening," writes Dan Balz. "What the evening highlighted was the degree to which Sanders stands apart from the field, with the other candidates divided and sparring with one another as much as with [him]. Sanders has his base, and it has served him well enough so far. The others are trying to find theirs. None of Sanders's rivals rose significantly above the others. For Sanders, that was probably a satisfactory outcome."

"While falling short of the glossy image that appeared during the commercial breaks, Bloomberg succeeded in doing what he had failed to do a week earlier in Las Vegas," adds Michael Scherer. "He delivered his messages — about his experience, his policy goals and his political focus — without a script in front of him, albeit with less polish, more stiffness and a far more stilted style of delivering a joke than his ads suggest. ... Still, Bloomberg spent significant time responding to attacks — on his treatment of women, his comments about banks’ redlining policies, his yet-unreleased tax returns and his praise of the Chinese leadership. He appeared agitated when [Warren] cited a woman’s account that he told her to ‘kill’ her baby when she got pregnant, responding: ‘I never said it. Period, end of story.’ It was far from clear whether his performance was enough to save his hopes for the nomination.”

---

Quote of the day

“All of the new Democrats that came in, put Nancy Pelosi in charge, and gave the Congress the ability to control this president — I bought,” said Bloomberg, referring to $100 million he spent to help House candidates in the 2018 midterms. He quickly corrected himself: “I — I got them.”
(Matt Viser, Annie Linskey, Sean Sullivan and Cleve Wootson)

Buttigieg’s campaign canceled a four-stop swing through South Florida scheduled for today. “Multiple aides to Buttigieg said he is sick and needed a day to rest,” Chelsea Janes reports. “Buttigieg looked sweatier than usual during the debate and appeared to have a cough drop in his mouth at various moments. He has maintained one of the more rigorous schedules of any of the candidates and will still appear at a breakfast in Charleston on Wednesday morning. Three of the events scheduled in South Florida were fundraisers, meaning the cancellation could be a costly one for Buttigieg. His campaign has been pushing to raise $13 million by Super Tuesday, and it sent a several-page memo to supporters outlining where and why it needs money for ad buys.”

The next debate will take place in Phoenix on March 15. The Sunday night battle will come before primaries that Tuesday in Arizona, Florida, Illinois and Ohio. By then, 47 percent of the delegates will have been pledged. The DNC still hasn’t announced the eligibility requirements for the debate, which will air on CNN and Univision. How much will the field have winnowed by then? Who will have emerged with the strongest chance of stopping Sanders?

Notable commentary

Politico’s John Harris argues that Democrats needed a good debate but got a bad one instead: “The evening offered limited opportunities—were these possibly enough?—for six Democrats not named Sanders to revive their candidacies with last-stand moments to emerge as the main alternative to the self-described democratic socialist.”

The Times’s Frank Bruni says the debate “felt like a genuine freakout”: Sanders’s competitors “seemed to be in the grip of some larger existential crisis, their understanding of their party’s dynamics challenged, their sense of its destiny upended and their dread of blowing an immeasurably consequential election profound.” Post columnist Dana Milbank says Sanders stirred up “a sickening sense of déjà vu” to the Republican debate in South Carolina four years ago, when the other candidates piled on Trump, but it was too little and too late to stop him from winning the nomination. “The winner of Tuesday night’s debate was Trump,” he concludes.

- The Fix’s Aaron Blake declares Warren and Biden the winners and Sanders and Bloomberg the losers.

- Post columnist Jen Rubin: “Biden needed the debate of his life. He delivered.”
- CNN’s Chris Cillizza says Buttigieg, Biden, Klobuchar, Sanders and Trump won, while Bloomberg and Warren lost.
- Vox’s team says Sanders won and Klobuchar lost.
- The Guardian’s Jessa Crispin says Warren dominated the mic but Sanders held his ground.
- FiveThirtyEight’s Nate Silver thinks Biden “pulled out his best debate with his back to the wall.”
- Democratic operative Mary Anne Marsh, writing for Fox News, calls Sanders, Warren and Biden winners, but she thinks the other four candidates onstage lost.
- The New Republic’s Walter Shapiro thinks Biden, Buttigieg and Klobuchar fared well, but Sanders and Bloomberg lost ground.
- Bloomberg Opinion’s Ramesh Ponnuru said Biden and Bloomberg performed better than they did at last week’s debate, but he argues that Sanders emerged victorious.
- Mother Jones’s Edwin Rios and Nathalie Baptiste said the debate was pretty much a pandering fest to South Carolina’s black voters.

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

---

The coronavirus

A man wearing a protective face mask watches the Nikkei index tank outside a brokerage house in Tokyo. (Athit Perawongmetha/Reuters)

The CDC warned the virus's spread in the United States is “inevitable.”

“The warnings from officials with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the National Institutes of Health and other agencies, contrasted sharply with assessments from President Trump and other White House officials, who have largely dismissed concerns about the virus,” Erica Werner, Yasmeen Abutaleb, Lena Sun and Lenny Bernstein report. “The mixed messages continued Tuesday as dire warnings issued to senators and reporters early in the day gave way to a more positive assessment, after the Dow Jones industrial average plunged 3.4 percent, bringing the two-day loss to more than 1,900 points — the worst in two years.”

- “We believe the immediate risk here in the United States remains low, and we’re working hard to keep that risk low,” Anne Schuchat, the CDC’s principal deputy director, said during a hastily convened afternoon news briefing.
- “Ultimately, we expect we will see community spread in the United States. It's not a question of if this will happen, but when this will happen, and how many people in this country will have severe illnesses," Nancy Messonnier, the director of the National Center for Immunization and Respiratory Diseases at the CDC, said during the morning briefing.

"The confused messaging threatened to obscure urgent public health advice coming from the CDC ... Businesses need to consider replacing in-person meetings with telework, Messonnier said. School authorities should consider ways to limit face-to-face contact, such as dividing students into smaller groups, using Internet-based learning or even closing schools. Local officials should consider modifying, postponing or canceling large gatherings. Hospitals should consider ways to triage patients who do not need urgent care and recommend that patients delay surgery that isn't absolutely necessary."

The White House seems mainly focused on reducing public alarm.

"Trump is highly concerned about the market and has encouraged aides not to give predictions that might cause further tremors," Jeff Stein and Josh Dawsey report. "Privately, Trump has become furious about the stock market's slide, according to two people familiar with the president's thinking ... Some White House officials have been unhappy with how Health and Human Services Secretary Alex Azar has handled the situation ... White House officials often face a tricky balance of trying to assure the public while also not dismissing threats that could become calamities. The Dow is still up markedly from 2017, when Trump took office, but it closed Tuesday at its lowest level since October." Global financial markets continued losing ground overnight.

The acting head of DHS was grilled by a GOP senator over the response.

"Appearing in front of a Senate appropriations subcommittee, [Chad] Wolf was on the receiving end of a brutal line of questioning from Sen. John Neely Kennedy (R-La.). Throughout the exchange, Wolf struggled to produce basic facts and projections about the disease,” Aaron Blake reports.

No major lockdown is planned in a South Korean region stricken with the virus.

“When a spokesman for South Korea's ruling party suggested Tuesday that the government would be rolling out a ‘maximum lockdown’ on the coronavirus-hit southern city of Daegu, the backlash was immediate and the political retreat swift,” Min Joo Kim and Simon Denyer report. “Hong Ihk-pyo soon clarified that he didn’t mean a ‘Wuhan-style lockdown’ or a blockade on travel into and out of the city — along the lines that China’s Communist Party has imposed on Wuhan and surrounding areas at the center of the covid-19 outbreak. President Moon Jae-in soon chimed in. There would be no regional blockade, he said, only a full-scale effort to contain the spread of the virus.” Infection numbers soared in South Korea to over 1,200.

France and Iran reported new deaths this morning.

“France reported the first death of a French citizen from the epidemic as cases spread rapidly across Europe, with Spain confirming eight new cases in the past 24 hours and new infections reported in France, Croatia, Austria and Switzerland,” according to our live blog. “Nineteen people have died in Iran from the novel coronavirus outbreak, Iranian Health Ministry spokesman Kianush Jahanpur told state television on Wednesday.”

The virus hits seniors the hardest. Italy’s elderly population is on the front line.

“That has set off a race in countries with significant older populations — like Italy — to figure out whether there are ways to protect their most vulnerable: those in hospitals, in nursing homes, and seniors in sealed-off hot-spot towns who are watching television and fearing the worst,” Chico Harlan and Stefano Pitrelli report. “But even as Italy works to contain what is the first major coronavirus outbreak in Europe, there is growing concern that the virus is outracing the health measures. New cases on Tuesday popped up farther from the original cluster, including in the southern island of Sicily and the tourist-heavy Tuscan capital, Florence. Italy has at least 322 confirmed cases and 11 deaths, all people who were elderly or already sick.”

The U.S. government can quarantine you. There’s almost nothing you can do about it.

“Regulations set forth by the [CDC] give health officials broad authority to quarantine or isolate anyone ‘reasonably believed’ to have been exposed to a range of highly infectious diseases. The list includes cholera, infectious tuberculosis and flus that can cause a pandemic,” Derek Hawkins reports. “The government’s powers to sequester people in the name of public health are rooted in the Constitution’s Commerce Clause, which allows Congress to regulate foreign and interstate commerce.”

---

The Trump presidency

President Trump and first lady Melania Trump attend a wreath-laying ceremony at Mohandas Gandhi's memorial in New Delhi on Tuesday. (Alexander Drago/Reuters)

Trump praised Modi's record on religious tolerance, as violence erupted over discrimination against Muslims.

“Trump avoided any public criticism of his host — whose political biography is also built partly on religious and cultural divisions — along with any comparison of [Prime Minister Narendra] Modi's policies with his own treatment of Muslim immigrants,” Anne Gearan, Joanna Slatter, Seung Min Kim and Niha Masih report. “We did talk about religious freedom, and I will say that the prime minister was incredible in what he told me. He wants people to have religious freedom and very strongly,” Trump said during a news conference that capped the public portion of his largely ceremonial visit. Modi, who leads the Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party, has insisted that the citizenship law aims to help persecuted religious minorities in three nearby countries. ... At least 17 people were killed, including a police officer, in clashes in the capital city during Trump's visit. The violence began when supporters of the citizenship law confronted opponents of the measure. ...

“The citizenship law, along with India's other actions, has drawn bipartisan criticism in Congress, but Trump tread lightly. The president said he had ‘asked that question’ during a closed-door meeting Tuesday, but he was vague about whether he criticized Modi for his decision. ‘I don’t want to discuss that,’ he said when asked for his opinion of the law. ‘I want to leave that to India, and hopefully they’re going to make the right decision for the people.’ ... Trump and Modi issued joint statements praising the growing defense cooperation between the two countries, but they did not field questions together. ... Although they spent much of the day together, including at a state banquet of salmon and grilled goat, Modi is known for not having held a news conference in his six years as prime minister.”

There’s a new senior leader at the White House personnel office. He’s a college senior.

Politico reports that James Bacon, 23, is acting as one of the right-hand men to new director of presidential personnel John McEntee, who is 29: "Bacon, a senior at George Washington University pursuing a bachelor’s degree, comes from the Department of Transportation, where he briefly worked in the policy shop. Bacon will be PPO’s director of operations overseeing paperwork and will assist on vetting. The role was previously filled by Katja Bullock, who is in her late 70s and was a veteran of the office in both Bush administrations, as well as the Reagan administration.”

A Trump judicial nominee once called for abolishing Social Security.

Stephen Schwartz, nominated to the U.S. Court of Federal Claims, argued 15 years ago “that several federal agencies should be eliminated and that Social Security should be abolished because economic disparity ‘is a natural aspect of the human condition,’” Robert O’Harrow Jr. reports. “Schwartz wrote that the departments of Transportation, Agriculture and Education lack a ‘constitutional basis,’ and that Social Security benefits were intended to prevent ‘outright starvation’ but had become a ‘standard component of most retirement programs.’”

Trump escalated his attacks on the judicial branch.

“In tweets and comments at a news conference in India — and just a month before the Supreme Court is to consider congressional and prosecutors’ requests for the president’s closely guarded financial records — Trump targeted Justices Sonia Sotomayor and Ruth Bader Ginsburg,” Robert Barnes and Ashley Parker report. “Trump interpreted as biased a dissent from Sotomayor about his administration’s tendency to seek emergency interventions from the Supreme Court. ... The president’s broadside breached what normally is an arm’s-length distance between the White House and the high court, and cast the disagreements into starkly personal terms. ... A court spokeswoman on Tuesday said that [John] Roberts, Sotomayor and Ginsburg had no comment ... Writing only for herself, Sotomayor complained that the federal government has been too quick to ask the Supreme Court for emergency relief from lower-court decisions that had not gone through the usual legal process. ... Neither opinion — the one written by Sotomayor or [the other by \[Justices Neil Gorsuch and \[Clarence\] Thomas](#) — specifically mentioned Trump or the administration.”

Trump also attacked a juror who voted to convict his confidant Roger Stone.

Trump “injected new political drama into the legal debate over whether [Stone] deserves a new trial, tweeting during a hearing in the matter that the jury forewoman who voted to convict his longtime friend and confidant was ‘totally biased’ and seeming to suggest the judge was, as well,” Spencer S. Hsu and Matt Zapotosky report. “Trump’s comments came just as U.S. District Judge Amy Berman Jackson had rebuked him and others over their attacks on the juror, and they seemed to put the president at odds with his own Justice Department, which argued against Stone’s bid for new legal proceedings. Jackson ultimately ended the hearing without a decision after taking testimony from three jurors on the panel — including the forewoman. The judge is expected to issue a ruling soon.”

Senate Republicans backed Bill Barr after his clash with

Trump.

“GOP lawmakers gave [the attorney general] a solid show of support in a private lunch meeting,” Mike DeBonis reports “Every sentence began with, “Keep up the good work,” said Sen. Kevin Cramer (R-N.D.), recalling senators’ remarks at the lunch, which began with a round of applause for Barr. ... [Mitch] McConnell told reporters afterward that Barr ‘enjoys overwhelming support’ in the Republican ranks: ‘We all think he’s doing an outstanding job.’ ... ‘He didn’t give any indication he’s going anywhere,’ said Senate Majority Whip John Thune (R-S.D.). ...

“Barr also finds himself in the middle of a thorny issue that has split Republican lawmakers — the pending expiration of key federal surveillance authorities. ... Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), among others, is pushing to take any future surveillance of political campaigns out of the secret foreign intelligence court entirely, among other changes to the existing law. ... But Barr, according to multiple senators, said he was not pressing for any specific statutory change to address the alleged Trump-related warrant abuses, which were detailed in a December report from Michael E. Horowitz, the Justice Department inspector general. Instead, he indicated that he would pursue administrative changes to remake how secret warrants are obtained and supervised.”

The NSA’s phone program cost $100 million but produced just two unique leads.

“A National Security Agency system that analyzed logs of Americans’ domestic phone calls and text messages cost $100 million from 2015 to 2019, but yielded only a single significant investigation, according to a newly declassified study,” the New York Times reports. “Moreover, only twice during that four-year period did the program generate unique information that the F.B.I. did not already possess, said the study, which was produced by the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board and briefed to Congress ... The report did not reveal the subject matter of the one significant F.B.I. investigation that was spurred by the Freedom Act program, and it did not divulge its outcome.”

Seventy former senators signed onto an op-ed saying the Senate isn't performing its constitutional duties.

In an open letter, a bipartisan group of former lawmakers said Congress isn't functioning as the Framers intended. "The Senate's abdication of its legislative and oversight responsibilities erodes the checks and balances of the separate powers that are designed to protect the liberties on which our democracy depends," they write.

Two antiabortion bills failed to advance in the Senate.

"All Republicans except Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) voted for a bill banning abortion after 20 weeks, while Democratic Sens. Bob Casey (D-Pa.) and Joe Manchin (D-W.V.) supported the measure," Politico reports. "All four lawmakers, meanwhile, voted for a bill requiring doctors to provide care to survivors of failed abortions. Sen. Doug Jones of Alabama, the most vulnerable Democrat facing reelection, opposed the 20-week ban but voted for the second measure."

The Supreme Court ruled that the family of a Mexican teen killed by the Border Patrol can't sue in U.S. courts.

"The court's conservatives prevailed in the 5 to 4 ruling, in which the court for the second time considered whether relatives of foreign victims injured on foreign soil can go to court without express authorization from Congress," Barnes reports. "The case began with the death of 15-year-old Sergio Adrián Hernández Güereca, who was fatally shot by a federal agent in 2010 on the Mexican side of the wide concrete culvert that separates El Paso from Juarez, Mexico. Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. wrote for his conservative colleagues, saying a respect for the separation of powers means that courts should be reluctant to allow lawsuits filed by foreign victims in U.S. courts without express congressional authorization."

---

More on 2020

A Sanders nomination would complicate the reelection campaigns of three Virginia congresswomen.

GOP candidates and groups are already targeting the once deep-red Virginia districts held by Democratic Reps. Elaine Luria, Abigail Spanberger and Jennifer Wexton, trying to link the freshman lawmakers to Sanders. Jenna Portnoy reports that Luria, who backs Biden, wasted no time in denouncing Sanders this week after he said he would skip the annual conference of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee: “Her swift reaction was an example of the tactics she and other centrist Democrats may use to try to steer clear of [Sanders] if he wins their party’s presidential nomination. ... Spanberger and Wexton have not made endorsements in the presidential contest and have no plans to at the moment. Spanberger, a former CIA officer, said she has already cast her absentee ballot; she declined to reveal her choice or rule anyone out. Rob Jones, one of several Republicans vying to challenge Wexton in November, suggested last week that because Wexton often votes the same way as Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-N.Y.), a top Sanders surrogate, Wexton must support Sanders. Wexton balked at that logic, and said: ‘I will not be supporting Bernie Sanders in this primary.’”

The Democratic establishment in Texas is freaking out about Sanders's rise.

“Rep. Marc Veasey is about as restrained as Texans come, but in recent days he has unloaded ... to practically any reporter he could find,” the Texas Tribune reports. “His message? [Sanders’s] march to the party’s nomination will jeopardize Texas Democrats’ efforts to capture the state House of Representatives and a slew of U.S. House seats across the state. ... While Sanders supporters proclaim a growing movement that will bring out new voters needed to flip the state, nearly two dozen Texas Democratic officeholders, candidates, activists and donors interviewed for this story expressed concern — sometimes bordering on despair — that a Sanders Democratic nomination is the difference between being on offense or in retreat in Texas this cycle.”

Mitch McConnell said Sanders may be more competitive than pundits think.

“I’m reminded of when the Democrats back in 1980 were all pulling for Ronald Reagan to be the nominee because they thought he’d be the easiest to beat,” McConnell told reporters, per Politico. “I think it’s going to be a contested general election with a lot of energy on both sides, and for myself I’ll leave it up to the Democrats to pick who they’d like to be their candidate.”

The Boston Globe endorsed Warren for president, a year after calling for her not to run.

This is significant because Sanders is making a play to win Massachusetts on Super Tuesday, scheduling rallies for later this week in Boston and Springfield. “In December 2018, this editorial board expressed doubt that Elizabeth Warren should run for president. She has proved us wrong and has shaped the course of the race for the better. The electorate, at least in recent polls and in the early states, is signaling its preference for the profound change that underpins Warren’s agenda. Sanders has been the main beneficiary, but is less likely to deliver; he has shown no ability over the course of his career to build broad legislative coalitions. Warren is uniquely poised to accomplish serious reform without sacrificing what’s working in our economy and innovation ecosystem. She would get under the hood to fix the engine — not drive off a cliff, but also not just kick the tires.”

9/11 was a turning point in Bloomberg's quest to become New York mayor.

“Bloomberg awoke early on that crisp and cloudless Tuesday and walked from his East Side mansion to his neighborhood polling place, where he saw his name on an election ballot for the first time, as a Republican candidate for mayor. It was Sept. 11, 2001, primary day, and Bloomberg was in the thick of trying to reinvent himself as the face of America’s largest city,” Paul Schwartzmann reports in the latest version of our Pursuits series. “Then someone told him that an airplane had slammed into the World Trade Center. ... What Bloomberg did not know in that moment — what no one could have known — is that the [attack] would fuel his unlikely rise as New York’s mayor and become a foundation for his race for the White House. ... ‘We began to write a comeback story,’ Bloomberg tells audiences, recalling that he took over a city ‘in tatters’ after winning an election that ‘almost no one’ — not even his mother, he often notes — ‘thought I had a chance.’ Bloomberg’s 12 years at City Hall lifted him to newfound prominence and spanned the rebirth of Lower Manhattan, the rise of the new World Trade Center and the opening of the 9/11 Memorial. Yet, in 2001, as he aspired to succeed Republican Mayor Rudy Giuliani, he was largely unknown beyond Wall Street and the exclusive dinner parties and charity galas he frequented.”

Hard work saved the Nevada caucuses, but it may not have been enough.

“[Harry] Reid, who helped move Nevada’s caucuses up in the calendar in 2008, establishing his state as the first in the West, said on Sunday that it was ‘time for the Democratic Party to move to primaries everywhere.’ That affirmation was echoed on Monday by the state party’s chairman, William McCurdy II, who said it was ‘time for our state party and elected leaders to look at shifting to a primary process moving forward.’ And it was reiterated on Tuesday by the Democratic governor, Steve Sisolak, who said he would help ‘review how we could switch to an early presidential primary,’” Isaac Stanley-Becker reports. “Similar sentiment has been voiced in Iowa, where the quadrennial institution had defined the political culture of the state since it inaugurated the modern caucuses in 1972, part of an effort to make the nominating process more inclusive.”

Democrats are desperately trying to recruit Steve Bullock to run for Senate.

“Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer met with [the former presidential candidate] in Montana last weekend as Democrats make a last-ditch effort to woo him to run for the Senate this year,” Politico reports. “Bullock, the two-term governor and former presidential candidate, has repeatedly said he has no plans to challenge Republican Sen. Steve Daines this year. But the state’s filing deadline is just over two weeks away, and Democrats have continued to pitch Bullock on seeking the Senate seat before the window closes.”

A veteran running for Congress in Arizona suspended his campaign after a heroin overdose.

“Chris Taylor, a 33-year-old Army veteran and city councilman in Safford, Ariz., told The Post that he was sober for ‘many solid years’ before the relapse. He was found unresponsive Wednesday night in his home, where paramedics revived him with naloxone,” Meryl Kornfield reports. The Republican said he’s “not going to hide from this.” He said he has battled with an opioid addiction since high school. He was seeking the GOP nomination to challenge Rep. Tom O’Halloran (D).

ABC News suspended veteran correspondent David Wright after a Project Veritas sting.

Network officials suspended Wright after reviewing footage gathered by the conservative group that records “undercover” footage of mainstream journalists to bolster its accusations of media bias, Paul Farhi reports. It isn’t clear yet what specifically prompted the network to take action against the reporter.

---

Social media speed read

Sanders dominated the Twitter conversation during last night's debate:

 #DemDebate

Tenth Debate: February 25, 2020

Jill Biden wished her husband luck on the debate stage:

Dr. Jill Biden ✓

@DrBiden

Tonight, ahead of the #DemDebate, I slipped this note into @JoeBiden's jacket pocket without him knowing. ❤️
Jill

♥️ 3,667 12:06 AM - Feb 26, 2020

🗨️ 679 people are talking about this

Klobuchar got caught in the middle of a Biden vs. Steyer shouting match:

A lot of pundits, including this former South Carolina state legislator, praised Biden's performance:

Bloomberg's one-liners were widely mocked:

A Post reporter had this interaction with a flack:

And two inspiring young activists hung out:

Malala ✓
@Malala

She's the only friend I'd skip school for.

♥ 555K 4:46 PM - Feb 25, 2020

💬 65.8K people are talking about this

Videos of the day

Stephen Colbert went live after his hometown's debate and joked that it would be great if Sanders and Trump are the nominees because those are the only two impressions he can do:

Trevor Noah joked about Sanders not being in any rush to see moderates drop out of the race:

Seth Meyers called out Bloomberg and his campaign for tweeting fake quotes they attributed to Sanders:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out The Trailer for news and insight on political campaigns around the country, from David Weigel. 435 districts. 50 states. Tuesday, Thursday and Sunday evenings. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: SEIU will spend $150 million on 2020 elections, focused on mobilizing infrequent voters
Date: Thursday, February 27, 2020 8:23:12 AM

Powered by LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Uber

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

SEIU will spend $150 million on 2020 elections, focused on mobilizing infrequent voters

The Service Employees International Union plans to spend $150 million this year to get out the vote for Democrats in November, its largest political investment ever.

The union will deploy canvassers across more than 40 states, but its efforts will mainly focus on turning out infrequent voters from the African American and Latino communities across the eight battleground states of

Colorado, Florida, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Wisconsin.

SEIU President Mary Kay Henry previewed the strategy to defeat President Trump during an extended interview in her office off Dupont Circle in Washington. The union, which represents 2 million members, has opted not to endorse in the presidential primary, at least for now, but to focus instead on building a massive field operation to help whoever emerges from the convention this summer, as well as Democrats down the ballot.

The decision to focus on low-propensity voters grew out of Trump's victory in the 2016 election. In urban centers like Milwaukee, Detroit and Philadelphia, many minorities who cast ballots for Barack Obama in 2008 and/or 2012 did not come out again for Hillary Clinton. In 2018, the SEIU spent tens of millions of dollars trying to convince these folks that it was worth their time to participate in the midterm elections. The success of that effort has shaped 2020 planning.

“People have to be persuaded that it matters. We’re up against a sense of either hopelessness or disillusionment,” said Henry. “Our experience in ‘18 was that we were able to take infrequent voters that most campaigns and parties never talk to and demonstrate, through data, that when you go early, and you communicate frequently, and you engage people on wages and health care and investment in their communities, they’re going to show up and vote.”

Service Employees International Union President Mary Kay Henry speaks to the audience before the Democratic presidential debate in Detroit last July. (Scott Olson/Getty Images)

By Election Day on Nov. 3, the SEIU's goal is to attempt face-to-face conversations with 6 million individuals, send text messages to 20 million people and reach another 1 million possible voters online through a digital ad program in the battleground states.

The SEIU plans targeted Latino outreach programs in Wisconsin, Colorado, Florida, Virginia, Pennsylvania and Nevada. The union is building out programs to mobilize Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders in Pennsylvania and Nevada. In Philadelphia, this will be concentrated in the Chinese community. In Las Vegas, it's more Filipinos. In Florida, the SEIU has partnered with the same four organizations it worked with in 2018 to expand turnout in black and Hispanic communities, including Puerto Ricans and others from the Caribbean. All told, canvassers are being hired to communicate at people's front doors in five different languages.

The SEIU will invest significant resources to turn out Somali and Hmong voters around the Twin Cities after Trump came within 1.5 percentage points of beating Clinton in Minnesota, a state no Republican presidential candidate has carried since Richard Nixon in 1972. “They're part of this infrequent voter pool, and we know they need to show up in order to win in Minnesota,” said Henry, who got her start in the labor movement as a field organizer in the state.

Outreach to black voters in Detroit and Milwaukee has been happening since the fall, building on the work that helped elect Democratic governors Gretchen Whitmer in Michigan and Tony Evers in Wisconsin. Canvassers have knocked on 251,000 doors in those two states since the beginning of January.

With limited resources, campaigns and outside groups usually reach out to people who are most likely to vote. The best predictor of whether someone is likely to vote has always been whether they voted in the previous election. But with tight races expected across the industrial Midwest, the SEIU decided in 2018 to focus on minorities who are registered but participated in one or none of the past four federal elections. The first pass that canvassers make will be aimed at cleaning up the union’s list of targeted voters. In a lot of cases, people have stopped voting because they passed away or moved away.

“Once you get to somebody, they’re like ‘Whoa, this is incredible. No one has knocked on my door before,’” said SEIU political director Maria Peralta. “A lot of groups thought we were crazy, but we were committed to engaging voters that really aren't talked to at all or contacted at all. We saw the impact when we looked at the voter turnout: Folks on the lowest end of the scale turned out at higher rates than those on the higher end after being contacted by us. That’s why we’re doubling down on that strategy this year.”

Members of the SEIU, which represents 6,500 Twin Cities janitors and security guards, vote earlier this month to authorize a strike at the SEIU Local 26 headquarters in Minneapolis. (Matt Sepic/Minnesota Public Radio/AP)

The SEIU has conducted and commissioned extensive research over the past several months to figure out what messages resonate with minorities who have not been voting. They've discovered a widespread perception that the economy is strong, even among blue-collar workers who haven't felt the benefits directly. They've also discovered that Latino and African American men are more likely to think favorably of both Trump and the economy than women in those communities. The SEIU has tested various messages to cut through this gender divide to persuade men and mobilize women to both vote and support Democrats when they do. At least until Labor Day, the field program will focus more on pocketbook issues than Trump himself.

The SEIU's broader goal is to couple the movements for racial justice and economic equality. Half the union's members are racial and ethnic minorities, and about 60 percent are women. "Race is being used by the right to divide and conquer," said Henry. "We don't think candidates ... can win without talking about how white, black [and] brown have to join together because we have another voice in the nation that is hammering on divide and conquer, saying that criminals are coming across our border and taking our jobs, which is his way of dividing the electorate based on race."

Research has also shown them that an especially effective way to reach these low-frequency voters is with peer-to-peer text messaging. In all 2018, SEIU organizers sent about 500,000 texts nationwide. They've already surpassed that number since January. In fact, nearly 500,000 texts have already been sent in Florida alone since the start of this year urging communities of color to register so they can vote.

To be sure, union leaders emphasize they are not writing off working-class white voters. Part of the $150 million effort this year will go toward supporting an initiative with other organized labor groups to appeal to former union members in Pennsylvania, Michigan, Minnesota and Wisconsin. "We have a million voters that used to be in unions in these states, but because of the right-wing attacks, people have fallen out," said Henry. "If people have been in a union, they're more likely to support who the union and economic issues tied to unionization."

SEIU leaders are also engaging their own members. By their estimates, about 20 percent of the 2 million dues-paying members are conservatives.

Union officials plan to contact all members about voting approximately five times. For those who lean to the right, there will be emphasis on where candidates stand on issues related to supporting unions. “Wages and health care are still the top two issues, no matter what community we're in,” said Henry.

Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) speaks at an SEIU forum on labor issues last April in Las Vegas. (John Locher/AP)

The SEIU has no current plans to endorse in the Democratic presidential contest, but this could change. Several of the candidates have joined picket lines, spent time with workers in their service industry jobs and spoke at one of the SEIU’s two cattle calls over the past year. At their January board meeting, Henry said the officers of the union – which endorsed Clinton in November 2015 – agreed they should stay neutral for now. “There’s no push inside our union for me to convene an in-person meeting to endorse,” Henry said. “The current understanding amongst the leadership of our union is that any leader can put their hand up and say to me or any of our officers, ‘I think it’s time for us to convene.’ The one commitment we’ve made to each other is that we’ll get in a room. It won’t be done on a phone call.”

The SEIU continues to push the candidates to commit to support

unionization efforts. “We think any plan to provide health care for all, college for all and child care for all ought to make it possible for workers to join unions,” said Henry. “The rules are rigged against us: The rules in the economy that block workers from joining unions and the rules in the democracy that don't allow everybody who should be able to vote to vote.”

Henry sits on the DNC’s platform committee. In 2016, she used that position to successfully push for the Democratic Party’s platform to endorse a $15-an-hour federal minimum wage. Asked whether she’s concerned about a contested convention, Henry said they’re “factoring it in,” but that her members are more concerned about issues than personalities. She also emphasized that down-ballot races will stay a major focus. In Pennsylvania, for example, they’re not just trying to help the Democratic presidential candidate win but also seeking to take control of the state’s legislature. “In some cases,” she said, “our members are telling us that the down-ballot races are far more motivational for them than the top of the ticket because they feel kind of flooded by the presidential in states where there's lots of TV advertising happening.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

The coronavirus

Travis Air Force base is one of the two California military installations accepting flights carrying U.S. citizens evacuated from China and serving as a quarantine center. (Pete Dasilva/EPA-EFE/Shutterstock)

The first sign the disease may be spreading within a U.S. community

The CDC reported last night that a person in Northern California has contracted the coronavirus without traveling to regions hit by the outbreak or coming in contact with anyone known to have the infection. “How the person acquired the virus is unknown,” Lenny Bernstein, Laurie McGinley and Lena Sun report. “The health agency left open the possibility ‘that the patient may have been exposed to a returned traveler who was infected.’ The state of California, however, called the case its first instance of community transmission. ... Community spread would represent a significant turn for the worse in the battle against the virus. To date, the United States has 60 known cases of the infection, with 59 among people who traveled to Asia or were close contacts of people who went there. The vast majority, 42, picked up the virus while quarantined on the Diamond Princess cruise ship off Japan. ...

“The individual is a resident of Solano County, according to the California Department of Public Health. The patient is being treated at UC Davis Medical Center. Two officials from that hospital sent an email to employees Wednesday that said the patient arrived at the medical center Feb. 19 but was not tested until Sunday, despite an immediate request to the CDC. The patient arrived from another hospital in Northern California ...

“There are indications that other hospitals could be involved in the case. Kris Concepcion, fire chief and acting public information officer in Vacaville, Calif., said county officials had issued a directive not to transport any new patients to two local hospitals — NorthBay VacaValley Hospital in Vacaville and NorthBay Medical Center in nearby Fairfield. ... The two hospitals are in Solano County, home to Travis Air Force Base, where hundreds of Americans repatriated from China and others brought home from the Diamond Princess cruise ship have been kept in quarantine. Many of them have been released. The health department said it has already begun tracing people who may have come in contact with the coronavirus-infected individual. ... The virus, which originated in Wuhan, China, has killed 2,801 people and sickened more than 82,000 as it has spread around the globe, reaching every continent except Antarctica.”

Key quote: If the infection is confirmed to be a case of “community spread,” “it would confirm what we have long suspected — that there is a good chance there already are people infected in this country and that the virus is circulating undetected,” said Jennifer Nuzzo, epidemiologist and senior scholar at the Johns Hopkins Center for Health Security.

Virginia officials are waiting for test results for two patients.

Nine possible coronavirus cases have been investigated in Virginia since Jan. 21, health officials said. No positive test results have been returned, per Justin Wm. Moyer.

Schools are also preparing for a possible contagion by canceling foreign trips.

For example, in Virginia, the Fairfax County school system – with 188,000 students, one of the largest – posted website updates with the same instructions it has offered since the virus surfaced – frequent hand-washing and disinfectant everywhere. The school system has canceled international field trips to countries where residents have fallen ill from the coronavirus. Class closures are unlikely in the near future, experts said, because relatively few cases have been diagnosed in the United States. (Hannah Natanson)

Officials revealed that more than 600 are being monitored for the virus in Massachusetts. All had recently traveled to China and voluntarily quarantined themselves at home while being monitored, health officials said. So far, 377 completed the quarantine without falling ill, while 231 are still being monitored. (Boston Globe)

Trump put Vice President Pence in charge of the coronavirus response.

The president's choice is "an attempt to reassure the public amid growing concerns of a global health crisis and criticism that the United States has been slow to respond to the fast-moving outbreak," Toluse Olorunnipa, Josh Dawsey and Yasmeen Abutaleb report. "We've had tremendous success, tremendous success beyond what many people would've thought," the president said during a White House news conference that followed days of mixed messages, tumbling stocks and rising death tolls abroad driven by the coronavirus. 'We're very, very ready for this.' The president declared that the risk to America was 'very low' and predicted a swift end to the outbreak. ...

"The president was contradicted almost in real time by some of the government experts who flanked him as he stood in the White House press briefing room. 'We could be just one or two people over the next short period of time,' Trump said of the virus's impact in the United States. Minutes later, Health and Human Services Secretary Alex Azar and CDC Principal Deputy Director Anne Schuchat warned Americans to prepare for the number of cases to grow. 'We can expect to see more cases in the United States,' Azar said. 'We do expect more cases,' Schuchat said. ...

“The president said he would be willing to accept more emergency funding than the $2.5 billion requested by his administration after lawmakers pushed for a more robust federal response. He also said he would consider new travel restrictions on other countries struggling to contain the outbreak, including South Korea and Italy. ... He partly blamed Democrats for the drop in the stock market and attacked House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) as ‘incompetent’ after she had made disparaging comments about his handling of the coronavirus outbreak ... Trump has made a direct connection between the virus and his political fortunes, accusing Democrats and the media of trying to harm his reelection chances by focusing on the outbreak. Trump took to Twitter early Wednesday to accuse cable news channels of ‘doing everything possible to make the Coronavirus look as bad as possible, including panicking markets, if possible.’ ...

“The White House considered appointing a ‘czar’ to oversee the government-wide response effort, a move that would essentially demote Azar from his role as the head of the coronavirus task force. ... Trump said his decision to put Pence in charge was not tantamount to appointing a czar, despite him taking a role that serves the same purpose. ‘Mike is not a czar, he’s vice president,’ the president said. ‘I’m having them report to Mike. Mike will report to me.’”

As Indiana's governor, Pence badly mishandled a 2016 HIV outbreak in his state.

“Pence came under fire for resisting the CDC's urging to allow clean needles to be distributed because of his conservative, religious beliefs. At the time, needle exchanges were illegal in Indiana. But after mounting pressure from health officials and praying on it, the Republican eventually lifted the ban,” BuzzFeed News reports.

---

Quote of the day

“We’re doing great. Other countries have not been doing”

great,” Trump said about the U.S. government's coronavirus response. (Aaron Blake)

The outbreak is flaring up around Asia, as it eases inside China.

“While China's official numbers continued to show a drop in new cases and deaths in the country, in other parts of the world the problem appeared to be getting worse. South Korea announced 505 new cases on Thursday, bringing its total to 1,766, including one U.S. soldier stationed on the peninsula,” Adam Taylor and Rick Noack report. “Elsewhere, officials canceled or postponed events including religious pilgrimages in Saudi Arabia, as doubts grow over Tokyo's plans to host the 2020 Olympics.”

A flight attendant diagnosed with coronavirus might have worked trips between Seoul and Los Angeles. South Korea's Center for Disease Control said the attendant, who had serviced a flight between Seoul and Tel Aviv, had tested positive. Neither Korean Air nor local officials immediately confirmed reports that she serviced two flights to L.A. (L.A. Times)

South Korea called off joint military exercises with U.S. troops because of the virus. (WSJ)

A Japanese woman who had recovered from the virus tested positive again.

The woman was one of the first cases of coronavirus in the country but was released from the hospital nearly four weeks ago, apparently cured. Now she's testing positive again. This is a bad sign for containment efforts. (Simon Denyer)

Iran is struggling to contain the disease, putting other Middle East nations at risk.

“In Iran, 139 people have contracted the virus, including the deputy health minister and a prominent member of parliament. Nineteen people have died, according to the Health Ministry,” Erin Cunningham and Louisa Loveluck report. “The virus has appeared in multiple Iranian cities, and infections in Bahrain, Iraq, Kuwait, Lebanon and Oman have been traced back to Iran. ... But even as regional governments moved to control the outbreak, Iranian authorities came under fire for what critics said is an inadequate response to the threat. Officials have rejected calls to quarantine major cities and have allowed communal prayer services to continue in places such as Qom, where the virus first emerged in Iran.”

Italy’s economy was already struggling. Then came the virus.

“Trams rattle by half-empty. Office buildings are vacant. Top-flight soccer matches are played in empty stadiums behind closed doors,” Loveday Morris and Chico Harlan report. “For Italy, the coronavirus could hardly have broken out in a more damaging economic area. The country’s two largest northern regions, Lombardy and Veneto, account for 30 percent of the employment and 40 percent of the exports. Milan is the economic hub, and to the east, Venice is a tourism mega-draw for a country that depends on visitors for 13 percent of its gross domestic product.”

The World Health Organization says China isn’t sharing enough data on infections.

“The WHO said it has repeatedly asked Chinese officials for ‘disaggregated’ data — meaning specific figures broken out from the overall numbers — that could shed light on hospital transmission and help assess the level of risk front-line workers face,” Emily Rauhala reports “It is not clear whether political sensitivities have shaped China’s reporting on sick doctors and other health-care professionals. It is possible that data gaps simply reflect the challenge of gathering information in the middle of a crisis, experts said. What is clear is that China is not sending details that WHO officials and other experts expect and need.”

Russia and China are taking different, but equally dangerous, approaches to the virus.

So says The Post's Editorial Board: “Open governments are struggling to encourage responsibility about a growing pandemic without inspiring panic. Russia appears to be trying to do just the opposite. Evidence suggests Moscow is spreading propaganda designed to stoke anxiety about the virus and distrust in authorities' efforts to fight it. Meanwhile, citizens in China are suffering not from a deluge of misleading material but from a dearth of open discussion. ... Either tactic, with stakes as high as they are today, could get people killed.”

The coronavirus has forced religious leaders to reconsider Lenten traditions.

“Ash Wednesday is a chance for clergy to remind Christians of their mortality, often with a swipe of thumb-to-forehead ashes,” Sarah Pulliam Bailey reports. “But this year, the holy day came one day after federal health officials said the country should brace for [the ‘inevitable’ spread of the virus]. Pastors and ministers ... found themselves asking: Should we tweak our rituals? ‘It’s a very intimate moment,’ said Teer Hardy, an associate pastor at Mount Olivet United Methodist Church in Arlington, Va. .... ‘You’re a couple of inches from someone’s face.’ ... Spokespeople for many of the largest Christian denominations in the U.S. said this week that they have not issued special directives for their churches but are closely monitoring guidance from government officials. The Episcopal Diocese of New Jersey told clergy and lay leaders Tuesday that anyone administering Communion should wash their hands, preferably with an alcohol-based hand sanitizer, and keep their distance during the greeting ritual known as the ‘passing of the peace.’”

You really don’t need to buy anything new or special to brace for the virus.

Doctors gave Reis Thebault and Alex Horton a few recommendations: “Don’t go crazy,” said Timothy Brewer, an epidemiologist at UCLA. “You don’t need to go out and stock up on lots of things.” If you’re not sick, you don’t need a surgical mask – and you don’t need to buy every box your pharmacy has in stock. “The main point of the mask is to keep someone who is infected with the virus from spreading it to others,” Brewer said.

- Wash your hands regularly. Cover your nose and mouth when you sneeze. And when you're sick, stay home from work or school and drink lots of fluids.
  - It's worth considering limiting exposure to large groups, said Stanley Perlman, an infectious-disease expert at the University of Iowa.
  - Avoid the middle of a packed train car, and turn away if someone is coughing nearby, said Saskia V. Popescu, a senior infection-prevention epidemiologist for a Phoenix-based hospital system.
-

2020 watch

Rep. Jim Clyburn (D-S.C.) endorses Joe Biden on Wednesday in North Charleston. (Gerald Herbert/AP)

Joe Biden had a good day in South Carolina, where he's favored to win.

“South Carolina chooses presidents,” Biden said as he accepted House Majority Whip Jim Clyburn’s endorsement. “You decided to launch Bill

Clinton to the White House, and up to that time, it didn't look like he was going very far — but you did. You launched my buddy Barack Obama to the White House. I firmly believe, once again on Saturday, you hold in your hands, in South Carolina, the power to choose the next president of the United States.”

“Even as he holds a small lead in polls, Biden is being vastly outspent on television and radio ads here,” Matt Viser and Cleve Wootson report from North Charleston, S.C. "While the Clyburn endorsement could prove influential, Biden also secured the top endorsements in Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada, and that helped little. And there is no certainty that even a convincing win could translate to victory when 14 other states and American Samoa vote on Super Tuesday three days later. Biden has laid little groundwork in the next states, forced to spend almost all of his time in South Carolina this week as other candidates scatter to the next set of states. Strapped for cash, he is only now starting to buy advertising in some Super Tuesday states — and is spending a fraction of what his rivals are. That puts even more pressure on South Carolina to give Biden a bounce. ... Rep. David E. Price (D-N.C.) had sat on the sidelines and watched the primary contest unfold. But after growing concerned about the unsettled field, he endorsed Biden this week.

Barack Obama demanded TV stations stop airing a misleading attack against Biden.

The ad from a pro-Trump super PAC, which has been running around South Carolina, uses the former president's words out of context in a misleading attack on Biden. Michael Scherer and Anu Narayanswamy report. “The Committee to Defend the President, a pro-Trump group, circulated an ad that falsely suggests that words Obama spoke in the narration of his own 1995 book were meant to describe Biden.” Katie Hill, Obama’s communications director, denounced the ad as being “straight out of the Republican disinformation playbook” and added that Obama has “no plans to endorse in the primary.”

Bernie Sanders is a challenge to Nancy Pelosi's majority that's beyond her control.

“While a cadre of lawmakers and strategists are sounding alarms about the risks the senator from Vermont and democratic socialist would pose to down-ballot candidates, Pelosi is moving carefully publicly and privately to avoid even the perception that she is putting her thumb on the presidential scales,” Mike DeBonis reports. “I think whoever our nominee is, we will enthusiastically embrace, and we will win the White House, the Senate and the House of Representatives,’ she told reporters ... It would be a mistake to expect Pelosi to follow Clyburn’s lead and insert herself into the presidential race. ... Asked Wednesday about whether she thought she had the power to help cull the field, Pelosi said, “The power is with the people.””

Warren said she'll stay in the race until the convention, even if Sanders has more delegates.

During a CNN town hall in South Carolina, Warren said “she would be willing to lobby superdelegates, who have votes on the second ballot if there's no outright winner, when asked if she would continue her candidacy even if she were trailing in the delegate count. Asked by an audience member why the person who gets the most votes shouldn't be awarded the nomination, Warren said the rules set a higher bar -- and that she intended to fight to the last. Warren also suggested that the argument by [Sanders] that a candidate with a plurality should be declared the nominee was disingenuous, noting that his 2016 campaign, despite losing to former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, publicly argued that convention superdelegates should consider swinging the contest in his favor.”

The Trump campaign plans to open community centers to woo black voters.

Campaign officials showed reporters posters featuring the glossy facades of their proposed “Black Voices for Trump community centers,” Ashley Parker reports. They described them as functioning as a cross between a traditional campaign field office and a sleek retail space in a heavily trafficked pedestrian area, such as a mall. “You’re never going to get the votes you don’t ask for,” the president’s son-in-law and adviser Jared Kushner said, describing the outreach as “more than a toe in the water. It’s a whole foot in the water.”

---

Domestic developments that shouldn't be overlooked

A shooting in Wisconsin left six dead.

“Wisconsin’s largest city is grieving after an employee at a historic brewery shot and killed five co-workers and then turned the gun on himself. Police say the 51-year-old assailant — who has not been publicly named by the authorities — opened fire on the sprawling Molson Coors campus Wednesday afternoon,” Dan Simmons, Hannah Knowles, Mark Berman and Reis Thebault report. They did not discuss a possible motive for the killings and did not name the victims. “The rampage is the first shooting to kill four or more people in 2020, according to a Post database.”

The House passed legislation that would finally make lynching a federal hate crime.

“H.R. 35, the Emmett Till Antilynching Act, was approved on a bipartisan 410-to-4 vote after a sometimes emotional debate in the House,” Felicia Sonmez reports. “Rep. Bobby L. Rush (D-Ill.), who sponsored the legislation, said the bill will ‘send a strong message that violence, and race-based violence in particular, has no place in American society.’ The measure’s passage comes after lawmakers tried, and failed, to pass anti-lynching bills nearly 200 times. The earliest such attempt came in 1900, when Rep. George Henry White (R-N.C.), then the country’s only black member of Congress, stood on the floor of the House and read the text of his unprecedented measure, which would have prosecuted lynchings at the federal level. The bill later died in committee. Years later, Rep. Leonidas C. Dyer (R-Mo.) introduced an anti-lynching measure that passed the House but was filibustered in the Senate by Southern Democrats ...

“At least 4,742 people, mostly African Americans, were reported lynched in the United States from 1882 to 1968 in all but four states ... Ninety-nine percent of perpetrators escaped state or local punishment ... A separate version of the measure, the Justice for Victims of Lynching Act, passed the Senate last year. It was introduced by the chamber’s three black senators: Kamala D. Harris (D-Calif.), Tim Scott (R-S.C.) and Cory Booker (D-N.J.). ... There are minor differences between the two measures, and House Democrats are optimistic the Senate will approve the House-passed version and send it to President Trump’s desk.”

Mexican reverse migration is shrinking the undocumented population.

“José cared for the bottle-fed babies, 700 of them in all. He knew a calf was healthy if her eyes were bright and her appetite hearty,” the Times reports. “His job was to do all things a mom would do to look after her young,’ said Mary Kraft, who employed José and his brother, Juan, both undocumented immigrants from Mexico, for a decade at her Quail Ridge Dairy in Colorado. Then about a year ago, the brothers informed Ms. Kraft that they were returning to Mexico. They had amassed enough savings in the land of opportunity to resume their lives back where they had started. The pair are among a growing number of Mexicans who have been departing the United States in recent years ... New data that was released on Wednesday by the Center for Migration Studies shows there were 10.6 million immigrants living unlawfully in the United States in 2018 compared with 11.75 million in 2010, a decline propelled primarily by Mexicans returning south.”

ICE ran facial-recognition searches on millions of Marylanders.

Agency officials “have been permitted to run facial-recognition searches on millions of Maryland driver’s license photos without first seeking state or court approval, state officials said — access that goes far beyond what other states allow and that alarms immigration activists in a state that grants special driver’s licenses to undocumented immigrants,” Drew Harwell and Erin Cox report. “The technology now under scrutiny could let an ICE official run a photograph of an unknown person through the system and see if any potentially undocumented immigrants are returned as a match.”

A facial-recognition company that works with law enforcement said its client list was stolen.

“The startup Clearview AI disclosed to its customers that an intruder ‘gained unauthorized access’ to its list of customers, to the number of user accounts those customers had set up, and to the number of searches its customers have conducted,” the Daily Beast reports. “The notification said the company’s servers were not breached and that there was ‘no compromise of Clearview’s systems or network.’”

Five were arrested for allegedly targeting reporters as part of a neo-Nazi group.

Federal officials “arrested several alleged members of a white-supremacist group called Atomwaffen Division, including its two leaders, accusing them of plotting to intimidate journalists by calling police to their homes and offices and dropping off threatening fliers,” Rachel Weiner and Matt

Zapotosky report. “John Cameron Denton, of Montgomery, Tex., is charged in U.S. District Court in Alexandria with conspiring to call in fake threats targeting a ProPublica reporter and his office. ... In federal court in Seattle, prosecutors say Kaleb Cole and three others hatched a different intimidation plan: finding out where journalists live and leaving posters at their homes with messages featuring swastikas, weapons and the vague threat that they were being watched.”

Giuliani wanted the 2001 mayoral election cancelled so he could stay on as mayor after 9/11.

“Rudy Giuliani secretly asked then-New York Gov. George Pataki to cancel New York City’s 2001 mayoral election so he could remain in office following the Sept. 11 terror attack,” the New York Post reports. “The bombshell disclosure is contained in Pataki’s upcoming memoir of 9/11, ‘Beyond the Great Divide: How A Nation Became A Neighborhood.’ ... Giuliani ‘dropped a bomb,’ Pataki writes. ‘Governor, you have extraordinary powers to extend my term in office,’ Giuliani said. Pataki’s ‘heart sank,’ he writes, noting that he initially backed the idea of repealing term limits so Giuliani, a fellow Republican, could seek a third term, but quickly realized it was a ‘bad idea both as a matter of principle and politically.’”

Giuliani complained about having “five friends left” after forgetting to hang up on a reporter.

Giuliani forgot to hang up on a New York Daily News reporter after being asked about Pataki’s claims. He started trash-talking Pataki while complaining that he only has “five friends left.” “There were people who wanted me to do it,” Giuliani told the News, when he was aware he was on the phone. “I thought about it for two days, but I never asked him to do it. I never made the decision to do it.”

---

Social media speed read

India's prime minister called for deescalation of riots that have left more than 30 dead in Delhi:

“Mobs of Hindus and Muslims had clashed on roads and alleyways in northeast Delhi, throwing stones and crude gasoline bombs. At least three mosques were torched, as were scores of homes and businesses. Witnesses said that instead of stopping the violence, police joined crowds shouting Hindu nationalist slogans and fired indiscriminately,” Joanna Slater and Niha Masih report.

Reuters reporters shared devastating images from the attacks:

 Reuters
@Reuters

This mid-afternoon attack in India's capital New Delhi, captured in a dramatic @Reuters photograph, came against a backdrop of tension and violence. More: reut.rs/32G8Vgd

 114 6:42 AM - Feb 27, 2020

 110 people are talking about this

 Simon Robinson  @iron_emu · 43m

Here's the aftermath for Mohammad Zubair: "They saw I was alone, they saw my cap, beard, shalwar kameez (clothes) and saw me as a Muslim. They just started attacking, shouting slogans. What kind of humanity is this?"

Pic by Danish Siddiqui for Reuters. #delhivoilence
#DelhiRiots twitter.com/iron\_emu/statu...

Simon Robinson  @iron_emu

Another conspiracy theory is circulating in the fever swamps of the fringe right, per a CNN reporter:

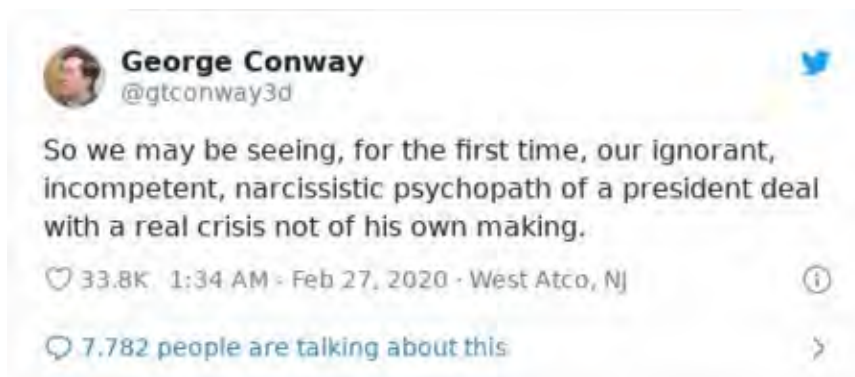

Once again, there's always a tweet:

A Hawaii Democratic senator expressed concern that Pence is taking point on the coronavirus:

The husband of one of Trump's top advisers noted that this is a rare crisis not of the president's own creation:

Biden shared a moving answer about his faith:

Videos of the day

Stephen Colbert doesn't feel very reassured by Trump's plan to fight the coronavirus:

Seth Meyers said Trump likes cozying up to authoritarian leaders:

In a break from politics, Trevor Noah took a look at other news, including how the heiress of the Hot Pockets fortune was sentenced to prison:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Book Club for our weekly selection of book reviews and recommendations from Book World editor Ron Charles. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: SEIU will spend $150 million on 2020 elections, focused on mobilizing infrequent voters
Date: Thursday, February 27, 2020 8:23:33 AM

Powered by LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Uber

By James Hohmann

with Mariana Alfaro

Email

SEIU will spend $150 million on 2020 elections, focused on mobilizing infrequent voters

The Service Employees International Union plans to spend $150 million this year to get out the vote for Democrats in November, its largest political investment ever.

The union will deploy canvassers across more than 40 states, but its efforts will mainly focus on turning out infrequent voters from the African American and Latino communities across the eight battleground states of

Colorado, Florida, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Wisconsin.

SEIU President Mary Kay Henry previewed the strategy to defeat President Trump during an extended interview in her office off Dupont Circle in Washington. The union, which represents 2 million members, has opted not to endorse in the presidential primary, at least for now, but to focus instead on building a massive field operation to help whoever emerges from the convention this summer, as well as Democrats down the ballot.

The decision to focus on low-propensity voters grew out of Trump's victory in the 2016 election. In urban centers like Milwaukee, Detroit and Philadelphia, many minorities who cast ballots for Barack Obama in 2008 and/or 2012 did not come out again for Hillary Clinton. In 2018, the SEIU spent tens of millions of dollars trying to convince these folks that it was worth their time to participate in the midterm elections. The success of that effort has shaped 2020 planning.

“People have to be persuaded that it matters. We’re up against a sense of either hopelessness or disillusionment,” said Henry. “Our experience in ‘18 was that we were able to take infrequent voters that most campaigns and parties never talk to and demonstrate, through data, that when you go early, and you communicate frequently, and you engage people on wages and health care and investment in their communities, they’re going to show up and vote.”

Service Employees International Union President Mary Kay Henry speaks to the audience before the Democratic presidential debate in Detroit last July. (Scott Olson/Getty Images)

By Election Day on Nov. 3, the SEIU's goal is to attempt face-to-face conversations with 6 million individuals, send text messages to 20 million people and reach another 1 million possible voters online through a digital ad program in the battleground states.

The SEIU plans targeted Latino outreach programs in Wisconsin, Colorado, Florida, Virginia, Pennsylvania and Nevada. The union is building out programs to mobilize Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders in Pennsylvania and Nevada. In Philadelphia, this will be concentrated in the Chinese community. In Las Vegas, it's more Filipinos. In Florida, the SEIU has partnered with the same four organizations it worked with in 2018 to expand turnout in black and Hispanic communities, including Puerto Ricans and others from the Caribbean. All told, canvassers are being hired to communicate at people's front doors in five different languages.

The SEIU will invest significant resources to turn out Somali and Hmong voters around the Twin Cities after Trump came within 1.5 percentage points of beating Clinton in Minnesota, a state no Republican presidential candidate has carried since Richard Nixon in 1972. “They're part of this infrequent voter pool, and we know they need to show up in order to win in Minnesota,” said Henry, who got her start in the labor movement as a field organizer in the state.

Outreach to black voters in Detroit and Milwaukee has been happening since the fall, building on the work that helped elect Democratic governors Gretchen Whitmer in Michigan and Tony Evers in Wisconsin. Canvassers have knocked on 251,000 doors in those two states since the beginning of January.

With limited resources, campaigns and outside groups usually reach out to people who are most likely to vote. The best predictor of whether someone is likely to vote has always been whether they voted in the previous election. But with tight races expected across the industrial Midwest, the SEIU decided in 2018 to focus on minorities who are registered but participated in one or none of the past four federal elections. The first pass that canvassers make will be aimed at cleaning up the union’s list of targeted voters. In a lot of cases, people have stopped voting because they passed away or moved away.

“Once you get to somebody, they’re like ‘Whoa, this is incredible. No one has knocked on my door before,’” said SEIU political director Maria Peralta. “A lot of groups thought we were crazy, but we were committed to engaging voters that really aren't talked to at all or contacted at all. We saw the impact when we looked at the voter turnout: Folks on the lowest end of the scale turned out at higher rates than those on the higher end after being contacted by us. That’s why we’re doubling down on that strategy this year.”

Members of the SEIU, which represents 6,500 Twin Cities janitors and security guards, vote earlier this month to authorize a strike at the SEIU Local 26 headquarters in Minneapolis. (Matt Sepic/Minnesota Public Radio/AP)

The SEIU has conducted and commissioned extensive research over the past several months to figure out what messages resonate with minorities who have not been voting. They've discovered a widespread perception that the economy is strong, even among blue-collar workers who haven't felt the benefits directly. They've also discovered that Latino and African American men are more likely to think favorably of both Trump and the economy than women in those communities. The SEIU has tested various messages to cut through this gender divide to persuade men and mobilize women to both vote and support Democrats when they do. At least until Labor Day, the field program will focus more on pocketbook issues than Trump himself.

The SEIU's broader goal is to couple the movements for racial justice and economic equality. Half the union's members are racial and ethnic minorities, and about 60 percent are women. "Race is being used by the right to divide and conquer," said Henry. "We don't think candidates ... can win without talking about how white, black [and] brown have to join together because we have another voice in the nation that is hammering on divide and conquer, saying that criminals are coming across our border and taking our jobs, which is his way of dividing the electorate based on race."

Research has also shown them that an especially effective way to reach these low-frequency voters is with peer-to-peer text messaging. In all 2018, SEIU organizers sent about 500,000 texts nationwide. They've already surpassed that number since January. In fact, nearly 500,000 texts have already been sent in Florida alone since the start of this year urging communities of color to register so they can vote.

To be sure, union leaders emphasize they are not writing off working-class white voters. Part of the $150 million effort this year will go toward supporting an initiative with other organized labor groups to appeal to former union members in Pennsylvania, Michigan, Minnesota and Wisconsin. "We have a million voters that used to be in unions in these states, but because of the right-wing attacks, people have fallen out," said Henry. "If people have been in a union, they're more likely to support who the union and economic issues tied to unionization."

SEIU leaders are also engaging their own members. By their estimates, about 20 percent of the 2 million dues-paying members are conservatives.

Union officials plan to contact all members about voting approximately five times. For those who lean to the right, there will be emphasis on where candidates stand on issues related to supporting unions. “Wages and health care are still the top two issues, no matter what community we're in,” said Henry.

Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) speaks at an SEIU forum on labor issues last April in Las Vegas. (John Locher/AP)

The SEIU has no current plans to endorse in the Democratic presidential contest, but this could change. Several of the candidates have joined picket lines, spent time with workers in their service industry jobs and spoke at one of the SEIU’s two cattle calls over the past year. At their January board meeting, Henry said the officers of the union – which endorsed Clinton in November 2015 – agreed they should stay neutral for now. “There’s no push inside our union for me to convene an in-person meeting to endorse,” Henry said. “The current understanding amongst the leadership of our union is that any leader can put their hand up and say to me or any of our officers, ‘I think it's time for us to convene.’ The one commitment we've made to each other is that we'll get in a room. It won't be done on a phone call.”

The SEIU continues to push the candidates to commit to support

unionization efforts. “We think any plan to provide health care for all, college for all and child care for all ought to make it possible for workers to join unions,” said Henry. “The rules are rigged against us: The rules in the economy that block workers from joining unions and the rules in the democracy that don't allow everybody who should be able to vote to vote.”

Henry sits on the DNC’s platform committee. In 2016, she used that position to successfully push for the Democratic Party’s platform to endorse a $15-an-hour federal minimum wage. Asked whether she’s concerned about a contested convention, Henry said they’re “factoring it in,” but that her members are more concerned about issues than personalities. She also emphasized that down-ballot races will stay a major focus. In Pennsylvania, for example, they’re not just trying to help the Democratic presidential candidate win but also seeking to take control of the state’s legislature. “In some cases,” she said, “our members are telling us that the down-ballot races are far more motivational for them than the top of the ticket because they feel kind of flooded by the presidential in states where there's lots of TV advertising happening.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

The coronavirus

Travis Air Force base is one of the two California military installations accepting flights carrying U.S. citizens evacuated from China and serving as a quarantine center. (Pete Dasilva/EPA-EFE/Shutterstock)

The first sign the disease may be spreading within a U.S. community

The CDC reported last night that a person in Northern California has contracted the coronavirus without traveling to regions hit by the outbreak or coming in contact with anyone known to have the infection. “How the person acquired the virus is unknown,” Lenny Bernstein, Laurie McGinley and Lena Sun report. “The health agency left open the possibility ‘that the patient may have been exposed to a returned traveler who was infected.’ The state of California, however, called the case its first instance of community transmission. ... Community spread would represent a significant turn for the worse in the battle against the virus. To date, the United States has 60 known cases of the infection, with 59 among people who traveled to Asia or were close contacts of people who went there. The vast majority, 42, picked up the virus while quarantined on the Diamond Princess cruise ship off Japan. ...

“The individual is a resident of Solano County, according to the California Department of Public Health. The patient is being treated at UC Davis Medical Center. Two officials from that hospital sent an email to employees Wednesday that said the patient arrived at the medical center Feb. 19 but was not tested until Sunday, despite an immediate request to the CDC. The patient arrived from another hospital in Northern California ...

“There are indications that other hospitals could be involved in the case. Kris Concepcion, fire chief and acting public information officer in Vacaville, Calif., said county officials had issued a directive not to transport any new patients to two local hospitals — NorthBay VacaValley Hospital in Vacaville and NorthBay Medical Center in nearby Fairfield. ... The two hospitals are in Solano County, home to Travis Air Force Base, where hundreds of Americans repatriated from China and others brought home from the Diamond Princess cruise ship have been kept in quarantine. Many of them have been released. The health department said it has already begun tracing people who may have come in contact with the coronavirus-infected individual. ... The virus, which originated in Wuhan, China, has killed 2,801 people and sickened more than 82,000 as it has spread around the globe, reaching every continent except Antarctica.”

Key quote: If the infection is confirmed to be a case of “community spread,” “it would confirm what we have long suspected — that there is a good chance there already are people infected in this country and that the virus is circulating undetected,” said Jennifer Nuzzo, epidemiologist and senior scholar at the Johns Hopkins Center for Health Security.

Virginia officials are waiting for test results for two patients.

Nine possible coronavirus cases have been investigated in Virginia since Jan. 21, health officials said. No positive test results have been returned, per Justin Wm. Moyer.

Schools are also preparing for a possible contagion by canceling foreign trips.

For example, in Virginia, the Fairfax County school system – with 188,000 students, one of the largest – posted website updates with the same instructions it has offered since the virus surfaced – frequent hand-washing and disinfectant everywhere. The school system has canceled international field trips to countries where residents have fallen ill from the coronavirus. Class closures are unlikely in the near future, experts said, because relatively few cases have been diagnosed in the United States. (Hannah Natanson)

Officials revealed that more than 600 are being monitored for the virus in Massachusetts. All had recently traveled to China and voluntarily quarantined themselves at home while being monitored, health officials said. So far, 377 completed the quarantine without falling ill, while 231 are still being monitored. (Boston Globe)

Trump put Vice President Pence in charge of the coronavirus response.

The president's choice is "an attempt to reassure the public amid growing concerns of a global health crisis and criticism that the United States has been slow to respond to the fast-moving outbreak," Toluse Olorunnipa, Josh Dawsey and Yasmeen Abutaleb report. "We've had tremendous success, tremendous success beyond what many people would've thought,' the president said during a White House news conference that followed days of mixed messages, tumbling stocks and rising death tolls abroad driven by the coronavirus. 'We're very, very ready for this.' The president declared that the risk to America was 'very low' and predicted a swift end to the outbreak. ...

"The president was contradicted almost in real time by some of the government experts who flanked him as he stood in the White House press briefing room. 'We could be just one or two people over the next short period of time,' Trump said of the virus's impact in the United States. Minutes later, Health and Human Services Secretary Alex Azar and CDC Principal Deputy Director Anne Schuchat warned Americans to prepare for the number of cases to grow. 'We can expect to see more cases in the United States,' Azar said. 'We do expect more cases,' Schuchat said. ...

“The president said he would be willing to accept more emergency funding than the $2.5 billion requested by his administration after lawmakers pushed for a more robust federal response. He also said he would consider new travel restrictions on other countries struggling to contain the outbreak, including South Korea and Italy. ... He partly blamed Democrats for the drop in the stock market and attacked House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) as ‘incompetent’ after she had made disparaging comments about his handling of the coronavirus outbreak ... Trump has made a direct connection between the virus and his political fortunes, accusing Democrats and the media of trying to harm his reelection chances by focusing on the outbreak. Trump took to Twitter early Wednesday to accuse cable news channels of ‘doing everything possible to make the Coronavirus look as bad as possible, including panicking markets, if possible.’ ...

“The White House considered appointing a ‘czar’ to oversee the government-wide response effort, a move that would essentially demote Azar from his role as the head of the coronavirus task force. ... Trump said his decision to put Pence in charge was not tantamount to appointing a czar, despite him taking a role that serves the same purpose. ‘Mike is not a czar, he’s vice president,’ the president said. ‘I’m having them report to Mike. Mike will report to me.’”

As Indiana's governor, Pence badly mishandled a 2016 HIV outbreak in his state.

“Pence came under fire for resisting the CDC's urging to allow clean needles to be distributed because of his conservative, religious beliefs. At the time, needle exchanges were illegal in Indiana. But after mounting pressure from health officials and praying on it, the Republican eventually lifted the ban,” BuzzFeed News reports.

---

Quote of the day

“We’re doing great. Other countries have not been doing”

great,” Trump said about the U.S. government's coronavirus response. (Aaron Blake)

The outbreak is flaring up around Asia, as it eases inside China.

“While China's official numbers continued to show a drop in new cases and deaths in the country, in other parts of the world the problem appeared to be getting worse. South Korea announced 505 new cases on Thursday, bringing its total to 1,766, including one U.S. soldier stationed on the peninsula,” Adam Taylor and Rick Noack report. “Elsewhere, officials canceled or postponed events including religious pilgrimages in Saudi Arabia, as doubts grow over Tokyo's plans to host the 2020 Olympics.”

A flight attendant diagnosed with coronavirus might have worked trips between Seoul and Los Angeles. South Korea's Center for Disease Control said the attendant, who had serviced a flight between Seoul and Tel Aviv, had tested positive. Neither Korean Air nor local officials immediately confirmed reports that she serviced two flights to L.A. (L.A. Times)

South Korea called off joint military exercises with U.S. troops because of the virus. (WSJ)

A Japanese woman who had recovered from the virus tested positive again.

The woman was one of the first cases of coronavirus in the country but was released from the hospital nearly four weeks ago, apparently cured. Now she's testing positive again. This is a bad sign for containment efforts. (Simon Denyer)

Iran is struggling to contain the disease, putting other Middle East nations at risk.

“In Iran, 139 people have contracted the virus, including the deputy health minister and a prominent member of parliament. Nineteen people have died, according to the Health Ministry,” Erin Cunningham and Louisa Loveluck report. “The virus has appeared in multiple Iranian cities, and infections in Bahrain, Iraq, Kuwait, Lebanon and Oman have been traced back to Iran. ... But even as regional governments moved to control the outbreak, Iranian authorities came under fire for what critics said is an inadequate response to the threat. Officials have rejected calls to quarantine major cities and have allowed communal prayer services to continue in places such as Qom, where the virus first emerged in Iran.”

Italy’s economy was already struggling. Then came the virus.

“Trams rattle by half-empty. Office buildings are vacant. Top-flight soccer matches are played in empty stadiums behind closed doors,” Loveday Morris and Chico Harlan report. “For Italy, the coronavirus could hardly have broken out in a more damaging economic area. The country’s two largest northern regions, Lombardy and Veneto, account for 30 percent of the employment and 40 percent of the exports. Milan is the economic hub, and to the east, Venice is a tourism mega-draw for a country that depends on visitors for 13 percent of its gross domestic product.”

The World Health Organization says China isn’t sharing enough data on infections.

“The WHO said it has repeatedly asked Chinese officials for ‘disaggregated’ data — meaning specific figures broken out from the overall numbers — that could shed light on hospital transmission and help assess the level of risk front-line workers face,” Emily Rauhala reports “It is not clear whether political sensitivities have shaped China’s reporting on sick doctors and other health-care professionals. It is possible that data gaps simply reflect the challenge of gathering information in the middle of a crisis, experts said. What is clear is that China is not sending details that WHO officials and other experts expect and need.”

Russia and China are taking different, but equally dangerous, approaches to the virus.

So says The Post's Editorial Board: “Open governments are struggling to encourage responsibility about a growing pandemic without inspiring panic. Russia appears to be trying to do just the opposite. Evidence suggests Moscow is spreading propaganda designed to stoke anxiety about the virus and distrust in authorities' efforts to fight it. Meanwhile, citizens in China are suffering not from a deluge of misleading material but from a dearth of open discussion. ... Either tactic, with stakes as high as they are today, could get people killed.”

The coronavirus has forced religious leaders to reconsider Lenten traditions.

“Ash Wednesday is a chance for clergy to remind Christians of their mortality, often with a swipe of thumb-to-forehead ashes,” Sarah Pulliam Bailey reports. “But this year, the holy day came one day after federal health officials said the country should brace for [the ‘inevitable’ spread of the virus]. Pastors and ministers ... found themselves asking: Should we tweak our rituals? ‘It’s a very intimate moment,’ said Teer Hardy, an associate pastor at Mount Olivet United Methodist Church in Arlington, Va. .... ‘You’re a couple of inches from someone’s face.’ ... Spokespeople for many of the largest Christian denominations in the U.S. said this week that they have not issued special directives for their churches but are closely monitoring guidance from government officials. The Episcopal Diocese of New Jersey told clergy and lay leaders Tuesday that anyone administering Communion should wash their hands, preferably with an alcohol-based hand sanitizer, and keep their distance during the greeting ritual known as the ‘passing of the peace.’”

You really don’t need to buy anything new or special to brace for the virus.

Doctors gave Reis Thebault and Alex Horton a few recommendations: “Don’t go crazy,” said Timothy Brewer, an epidemiologist at UCLA. “You don’t need to go out and stock up on lots of things.” If you’re not sick, you don’t need a surgical mask – and you don’t need to buy every box your pharmacy has in stock. “The main point of the mask is to keep someone who is infected with the virus from spreading it to others,” Brewer said.

- Wash your hands regularly. Cover your nose and mouth when you sneeze. And when you're sick, stay home from work or school and drink lots of fluids.
  - It's worth considering limiting exposure to large groups, said Stanley Perlman, an infectious-disease expert at the University of Iowa.
  - Avoid the middle of a packed train car, and turn away if someone is coughing nearby, said Saskia V. Popescu, a senior infection-prevention epidemiologist for a Phoenix-based hospital system.
-

2020 watch

Rep. Jim Clyburn (D-S.C.) endorses Joe Biden on Wednesday in North Charleston. (Gerald Herbert/AP)

Joe Biden had a good day in South Carolina, where he's favored to win.

“South Carolina chooses presidents,” Biden said as he accepted House Majority Whip Jim Clyburn’s endorsement. “You decided to launch Bill

Clinton to the White House, and up to that time, it didn't look like he was going very far — but you did. You launched my buddy Barack Obama to the White House. I firmly believe, once again on Saturday, you hold in your hands, in South Carolina, the power to choose the next president of the United States.”

“Even as he holds a small lead in polls, Biden is being vastly outspent on television and radio ads here,” Matt Viser and Cleve Wootson report from North Charleston, S.C. "While the Clyburn endorsement could prove influential, Biden also secured the top endorsements in Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada, and that helped little. And there is no certainty that even a convincing win could translate to victory when 14 other states and American Samoa vote on Super Tuesday three days later. Biden has laid little groundwork in the next states, forced to spend almost all of his time in South Carolina this week as other candidates scatter to the next set of states. Strapped for cash, he is only now starting to buy advertising in some Super Tuesday states — and is spending a fraction of what his rivals are. That puts even more pressure on South Carolina to give Biden a bounce. ... Rep. David E. Price (D-N.C.) had sat on the sidelines and watched the primary contest unfold. But after growing concerned about the unsettled field, he endorsed Biden this week.

Barack Obama demanded TV stations stop airing a misleading attack against Biden.

The ad from a pro-Trump super PAC, which has been running around South Carolina, uses the former president's words out of context in a misleading attack on Biden. Michael Scherer and Anu Narayanswamy report. “The Committee to Defend the President, a pro-Trump group, circulated an ad that falsely suggests that words Obama spoke in the narration of his own 1995 book were meant to describe Biden.” Katie Hill, Obama’s communications director, denounced the ad as being “straight out of the Republican disinformation playbook” and added that Obama has “no plans to endorse in the primary.”

Bernie Sanders is a challenge to Nancy Pelosi's majority that's beyond her control.

“While a cadre of lawmakers and strategists are sounding alarms about the risks the senator from Vermont and democratic socialist would pose to down-ballot candidates, Pelosi is moving carefully publicly and privately to avoid even the perception that she is putting her thumb on the presidential scales,” Mike DeBonis reports. “I think whoever our nominee is, we will enthusiastically embrace, and we will win the White House, the Senate and the House of Representatives,’ she told reporters ... It would be a mistake to expect Pelosi to follow Clyburn’s lead and insert herself into the presidential race. ... Asked Wednesday about whether she thought she had the power to help cull the field, Pelosi said, ‘The power is with the people.’”

Warren said she'll stay in the race until the convention, even if Sanders has more delegates.

During a CNN town hall in South Carolina, Warren said “she would be willing to lobby superdelegates, who have votes on the second ballot if there's no outright winner, when asked if she would continue her candidacy even if she were trailing in the delegate count. Asked by an audience member why the person who gets the most votes shouldn't be awarded the nomination, Warren said the rules set a higher bar -- and that she intended to fight to the last. Warren also suggested that the argument by [Sanders] that a candidate with a plurality should be declared the nominee was disingenuous, noting that his 2016 campaign, despite losing to former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, publicly argued that convention superdelegates should consider swinging the contest in his favor.”

The Trump campaign plans to open community centers to woo black voters.

Campaign officials showed reporters posters featuring the glossy facades of their proposed “Black Voices for Trump community centers,” Ashley Parker reports. They described them as functioning as a cross between a traditional campaign field office and a sleek retail space in a heavily trafficked pedestrian area, such as a mall. “You’re never going to get the votes you don’t ask for,” the president’s son-in-law and adviser Jared Kushner said, describing the outreach as “more than a toe in the water. It’s a whole foot in the water.”

---

Domestic developments that shouldn't be overlooked

A shooting in Wisconsin left six dead.

“Wisconsin’s largest city is grieving after an employee at a historic brewery shot and killed five co-workers and then turned the gun on himself. Police say the 51-year-old assailant — who has not been publicly named by the authorities — opened fire on the sprawling Molson Coors campus Wednesday afternoon,” Dan Simmons, Hannah Knowles, Mark Berman and Reis Thebault report. They did not discuss a possible motive for the killings and did not name the victims. “The rampage is the first shooting to kill four or more people in 2020, according to a Post database.”

The House passed legislation that would finally make lynching a federal hate crime.

“H.R. 35, the Emmett Till Antilynching Act, was approved on a bipartisan 410-to-4 vote after a sometimes emotional debate in the House,” Felicia Sonmez reports. “Rep. Bobby L. Rush (D-Ill.), who sponsored the legislation, said the bill will ‘send a strong message that violence, and race-based violence in particular, has no place in American society.’ The measure’s passage comes after lawmakers tried, and failed, to pass anti-lynching bills nearly 200 times. The earliest such attempt came in 1900, when Rep. George Henry White (R-N.C.), then the country’s only black member of Congress, stood on the floor of the House and read the text of his unprecedented measure, which would have prosecuted lynchings at the federal level. The bill later died in committee. Years later, Rep. Leonidas C. Dyer (R-Mo.) introduced an anti-lynching measure that passed the House but was filibustered in the Senate by Southern Democrats ...

“At least 4,742 people, mostly African Americans, were reported lynched in the United States from 1882 to 1968 in all but four states ... Ninety-nine percent of perpetrators escaped state or local punishment ... A separate version of the measure, the Justice for Victims of Lynching Act, passed the Senate last year. It was introduced by the chamber’s three black senators: Kamala D. Harris (D-Calif.), Tim Scott (R-S.C.) and Cory Booker (D-N.J.). ... There are minor differences between the two measures, and House Democrats are optimistic the Senate will approve the House-passed version and send it to President Trump’s desk.”

Mexican reverse migration is shrinking the undocumented population.

“José cared for the bottle-fed babies, 700 of them in all. He knew a calf was healthy if her eyes were bright and her appetite hearty,” the Times reports. “‘His job was to do all things a mom would do to look after her young,’ said Mary Kraft, who employed José and his brother, Juan, both undocumented immigrants from Mexico, for a decade at her Quail Ridge Dairy in Colorado. Then about a year ago, the brothers informed Ms. Kraft that they were returning to Mexico. They had amassed enough savings in the land of opportunity to resume their lives back where they had started.

The pair are among a growing number of Mexicans who have been departing the United States in recent years ... New data that was released on Wednesday by the Center for Migration Studies shows there were 10.6 million immigrants living unlawfully in the United States in 2018 compared with 11.75 million in 2010, a decline propelled primarily by Mexicans returning south.”

ICE ran facial-recognition searches on millions of Marylanders.

Agency officials “have been permitted to run facial-recognition searches on millions of Maryland driver’s license photos without first seeking state or court approval, state officials said — access that goes far beyond what other states allow and that alarms immigration activists in a state that grants special driver’s licenses to undocumented immigrants,” Drew Harwell and Erin Cox report. “The technology now under scrutiny could let an ICE official run a photograph of an unknown person through the system and see if any potentially undocumented immigrants are returned as a match.”

A facial-recognition company that works with law enforcement said its client list was stolen.

“The startup Clearview AI disclosed to its customers that an intruder ‘gained unauthorized access’ to its list of customers, to the number of user accounts those customers had set up, and to the number of searches its customers have conducted,” the Daily Beast reports. “The notification said the company’s servers were not breached and that there was ‘no compromise of Clearview’s systems or network.’”

Five were arrested for allegedly targeting reporters as part of a neo-Nazi group.

Federal officials “arrested several alleged members of a white-supremacist group called Atomwaffen Division, including its two leaders, accusing them of plotting to intimidate journalists by calling police to their homes and offices and dropping off threatening fliers,” Rachel Weiner and Matt Zapposky report. “John Cameron Denton, of Montgomery, Tex., is charged in U.S. District Court in Alexandria with conspiring to call in fake threats targeting a ProPublica reporter and his office. ... In federal court in Seattle, prosecutors say Kaleb Cole and three others hatched a different intimidation plan: finding out where journalists live and leaving posters at their homes with messages featuring swastikas, weapons and the vague threat that they were being watched.”

Giuliani wanted the 2001 mayoral election cancelled so he could stay on as mayor after 9/11.

“Rudy Giuliani secretly asked then-New York Gov. George Pataki to cancel New York City’s 2001 mayoral election so he could remain in office following the Sept. 11 terror attack,” the New York Post reports. “The bombshell disclosure is contained in Pataki’s upcoming memoir of 9/11, ‘Beyond the Great Divide: How A Nation Became A Neighborhood.’ ... Giuliani ‘dropped a bomb,’ Pataki writes. ‘Governor, you have extraordinary powers to extend my term in office,’ Giuliani said. Pataki’s ‘heart sank,’ he writes, noting that he initially backed the idea of repealing term limits so Giuliani, a fellow Republican, could seek a third term, but quickly realized it was a ‘bad idea both as a matter of principle and politically.’”

Giuliani complained about having “five friends left” after forgetting to hang up on a reporter.

Giuliani forgot to hang up on a New York Daily News reporter after being asked about Pataki’s claims. He started trash-talking Pataki while complaining that he only has “five friends left.” “There were people who wanted me to do it,” Giuliani told the News, when he was aware he was on the phone. “I thought about it for two days, but I never asked him to do it. I never made the decision to do it.”

---

Social media speed read

India's prime minister called for deescalation of riots that have left more than 30 dead in Delhi:

“Mobs of Hindus and Muslims had clashed on roads and alleyways in northeast Delhi, throwing stones and crude gasoline bombs. At least three mosques were torched, as were scores of homes and businesses. Witnesses said that instead of stopping the violence, police joined crowds shouting Hindu nationalist slogans and fired indiscriminately," Joanna Slater and Niha Masih report.

Reuters reporters shared devastating images from the attacks:

Simon Robinson ✓ @iron_emu · 43m

Here's the aftermath for Mohammad Zubair: "They saw I was alone, they saw my cap, beard, shalwar kameez (clothes) and saw me as a Muslim. They just started attacking, shouting slogans. What kind of humanity is this?"

Pic by Danish Siddiqui for Reuters. #delhivoilence
#DelhiRiots twitter.com/iron\_emu/statu...

Simon Robinson ✓ @iron_emu

A mob out for blood: India's protests pit Hindus against Muslims reut.rs/2VkJIC

Simon Robinson ✓

@iron_emu

More from Delhi: Policemen move through a riot-affected area after clashes between people demonstrating for and against India's new citizenship law. REUTERS/Adnan Abidi

8:57 AM - Feb 27, 2020

See Simon Robinson's other Tweets

Another conspiracy theory is circulating in the fever swamps of the fringe right, per a CNN reporter:

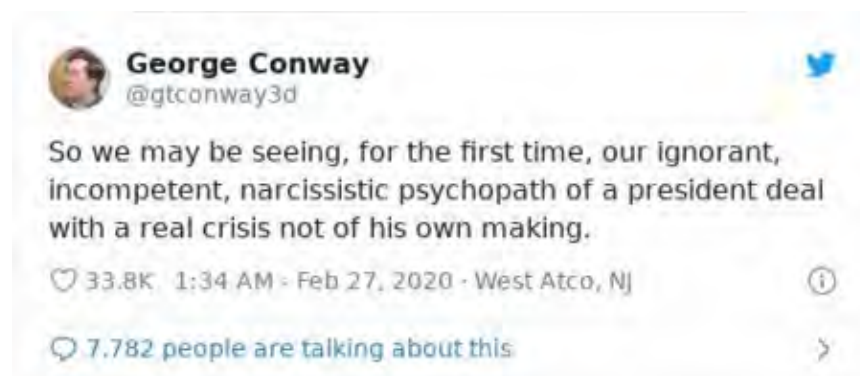

Once again, there's always a tweet:

A Hawaii Democratic senator expressed concern that Pence is taking point on the coronavirus:

The husband of one of Trump's top advisers noted that this is a rare crisis not of the president's own creation:

Biden shared a moving answer about his faith:

CNN Politics
@CNNPolitics

Joe Biden on his faith: "For me, it's important because it gives me some reason to have hope. And purpose. ... It took a long time for me to get to the point to realize that that purpose is the thing that would save me. And it has" #CNNTownHall cnn.it/2PtWnTv

 11.9K 1:33 AM - Feb 27, 2020

 3,692 people are talking about this

Videos of the day

Stephen Colbert doesn't feel very reassured by Trump's plan to fight the coronavirus:

Seth Meyers said Trump likes cozying up to authoritarian leaders:

In a break from politics, Trevor Noah took a look at other news, including how the heiress of the Hot Pockets fortune was sentenced to prison:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Book Club for our weekly selection of book reviews and recommendations from Book World editor Ron Charles. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: SEIU will spend $150 million on 2020 elections, focused on mobilizing infrequent voters
Date: Thursday, February 27, 2020 8:23:45 AM

Powered by LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Uber

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

SEIU will spend $150 million on 2020 elections, focused on mobilizing infrequent voters

The Service Employees International Union plans to spend $150 million this year to get out the vote for Democrats in November, its largest political investment ever.

The union will deploy canvassers across more than 40 states, but its efforts will mainly focus on turning out infrequent voters from the African American and Latino communities across the eight battleground states of

Colorado, Florida, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Wisconsin.

SEIU President Mary Kay Henry previewed the strategy to defeat President Trump during an extended interview in her office off Dupont Circle in Washington. The union, which represents 2 million members, has opted not to endorse in the presidential primary, at least for now, but to focus instead on building a massive field operation to help whoever emerges from the convention this summer, as well as Democrats down the ballot.

The decision to focus on low-propensity voters grew out of Trump's victory in the 2016 election. In urban centers like Milwaukee, Detroit and Philadelphia, many minorities who cast ballots for Barack Obama in 2008 and/or 2012 did not come out again for Hillary Clinton. In 2018, the SEIU spent tens of millions of dollars trying to convince these folks that it was worth their time to participate in the midterm elections. The success of that effort has shaped 2020 planning.

“People have to be persuaded that it matters. We’re up against a sense of either hopelessness or disillusionment,” said Henry. “Our experience in ‘18 was that we were able to take infrequent voters that most campaigns and parties never talk to and demonstrate, through data, that when you go early, and you communicate frequently, and you engage people on wages and health care and investment in their communities, they’re going to show up and vote.”

Service Employees International Union President Mary Kay Henry speaks to the audience before the Democratic presidential debate in Detroit last July. (Scott Olson/Getty Images)

By Election Day on Nov. 3, the SEIU's goal is to attempt face-to-face conversations with 6 million individuals, send text messages to 20 million people and reach another 1 million possible voters online through a digital ad program in the battleground states.

The SEIU plans targeted Latino outreach programs in Wisconsin, Colorado, Florida, Virginia, Pennsylvania and Nevada. The union is building out programs to mobilize Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders in Pennsylvania and Nevada. In Philadelphia, this will be concentrated in the Chinese community. In Las Vegas, it's more Filipinos. In Florida, the SEIU has partnered with the same four organizations it worked with in 2018 to expand turnout in black and Hispanic communities, including Puerto Ricans and others from the Caribbean. All told, canvassers are being hired to communicate at people's front doors in five different languages.

The SEIU will invest significant resources to turn out Somali and Hmong voters around the Twin Cities after Trump came within 1.5 percentage points of beating Clinton in Minnesota, a state no Republican presidential candidate has carried since Richard Nixon in 1972. “They're part of this infrequent voter pool, and we know they need to show up in order to win in Minnesota,” said Henry, who got her start in the labor movement as a field organizer in the state.

Outreach to black voters in Detroit and Milwaukee has been happening since the fall, building on the work that helped elect Democratic governors Gretchen Whitmer in Michigan and Tony Evers in Wisconsin. Canvassers have knocked on 251,000 doors in those two states since the beginning of January.

With limited resources, campaigns and outside groups usually reach out to people who are most likely to vote. The best predictor of whether someone is likely to vote has always been whether they voted in the previous election. But with tight races expected across the industrial Midwest, the SEIU decided in 2018 to focus on minorities who are registered but participated in one or none of the past four federal elections. The first pass that canvassers make will be aimed at cleaning up the union's list of targeted voters. In a lot of cases, people have stopped voting because they passed away or moved away.

“Once you get to somebody, they're like ‘Whoa, this is incredible. No one has knocked on my door before,’” said SEIU political director Maria Peralta. “A lot of groups thought we were crazy, but we were committed to engaging voters that really aren't talked to at all or contacted at all. We saw the impact when we looked at the voter turnout: Folks on the lowest end of the scale turned out at higher rates than those on the higher end after being contacted by us. That's why we're doubling down on that strategy this year.”

Members of the SEIU, which represents 6,500 Twin Cities janitors and security guards, vote earlier this month to authorize a strike at the SEIU Local 26 headquarters in Minneapolis. (Matt Sepic/Minnesota Public Radio/AP)

The SEIU has conducted and commissioned extensive research over the past several months to figure out what messages resonate with minorities who have not been voting. They've discovered a widespread perception that the economy is strong, even among blue-collar workers who haven't felt the benefits directly. They've also discovered that Latino and African American men are more likely to think favorably of both Trump and the economy than women in those communities. The SEIU has tested various messages to cut through this gender divide to persuade men and mobilize women to both vote and support Democrats when they do. At least until Labor Day, the field program will focus more on pocketbook issues than Trump himself.

The SEIU's broader goal is to couple the movements for racial justice and economic equality. Half the union's members are racial and ethnic minorities, and about 60 percent are women. "Race is being used by the right to divide and conquer," said Henry. "We don't think candidates ... can win without talking about how white, black [and] brown have to join together because we have another voice in the nation that is hammering on divide and conquer, saying that criminals are coming across our border and taking our jobs, which is his way of dividing the electorate based on race."

Research has also shown them that an especially effective way to reach these low-frequency voters is with peer-to-peer text messaging. In all 2018, SEIU organizers sent about 500,000 texts nationwide. They've already surpassed that number since January. In fact, nearly 500,000 texts have already been sent in Florida alone since the start of this year urging communities of color to register so they can vote.

To be sure, union leaders emphasize they are not writing off working-class white voters. Part of the $150 million effort this year will go toward supporting an initiative with other organized labor groups to appeal to former union members in Pennsylvania, Michigan, Minnesota and Wisconsin. "We have a million voters that used to be in unions in these states, but because of the right-wing attacks, people have fallen out," said Henry. "If people have been in a union, they're more likely to support who the union and economic issues tied to unionization."

SEIU leaders are also engaging their own members. By their estimates, about 20 percent of the 2 million dues-paying members are conservatives.

Union officials plan to contact all members about voting approximately five times. For those who lean to the right, there will be emphasis on where candidates stand on issues related to supporting unions. “Wages and health care are still the top two issues, no matter what community we're in,” said Henry.

Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) speaks at an SEIU forum on labor issues last April in Las Vegas. (John Locher/AP)

The SEIU has no current plans to endorse in the Democratic presidential contest, but this could change. Several of the candidates have joined picket lines, spent time with workers in their service industry jobs and spoke at one of the SEIU’s two cattle calls over the past year. At their January board meeting, Henry said the officers of the union – which endorsed Clinton in November 2015 – agreed they should stay neutral for now. “There’s no push inside our union for me to convene an in-person meeting to endorse,” Henry said. “The current understanding amongst the leadership of our union is that any leader can put their hand up and say to me or any of our officers, ‘I think it's time for us to convene.’ The one commitment we've made to each other is that we'll get in a room. It won't be done on a phone call.”

The SEIU continues to push the candidates to commit to support

unionization efforts. “We think any plan to provide health care for all, college for all and child care for all ought to make it possible for workers to join unions,” said Henry. “The rules are rigged against us: The rules in the economy that block workers from joining unions and the rules in the democracy that don't allow everybody who should be able to vote to vote.”

Henry sits on the DNC’s platform committee. In 2016, she used that position to successfully push for the Democratic Party’s platform to endorse a $15-an-hour federal minimum wage. Asked whether she’s concerned about a contested convention, Henry said they’re “factoring it in,” but that her members are more concerned about issues than personalities. She also emphasized that down-ballot races will stay a major focus. In Pennsylvania, for example, they’re not just trying to help the Democratic presidential candidate win but also seeking to take control of the state’s legislature. “In some cases,” she said, “our members are telling us that the down-ballot races are far more motivational for them than the top of the ticket because they feel kind of flooded by the presidential in states where there's lots of TV advertising happening.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

BUILDING A MORE EQUITABLE HEALTH CARE SYSTEM

BlueCross BlueShield Association

PASS THE MOMNIBUS >

Powered by LiveIntent

The coronavirus

Travis Air Force base is one of the two California military installations accepting flights carrying U.S. citizens evacuated from China and serving as a quarantine center. (Pete Dasilva/EPA-EFE/Shutterstock)

The first sign the disease may be spreading within a U.S. community

The CDC reported last night that a person in Northern California has contracted the coronavirus without traveling to regions hit by the outbreak or coming in contact with anyone known to have the infection. “How the person acquired the virus is unknown,” Lenny Bernstein, Laurie McGinley and Lena Sun report. “The health agency left open the possibility ‘that the patient may have been exposed to a returned traveler who was infected.’ The state of California, however, called the case its first instance of community transmission. ... Community spread would represent a significant turn for the worse in the battle against the virus. To date, the United States has 60 known cases of the infection, with 59 among people who traveled to Asia or were close contacts of people who went there. The vast majority, 42, picked up the virus while quarantined on the Diamond Princess cruise ship off Japan. ...

“The individual is a resident of Solano County, according to the California Department of Public Health. The patient is being treated at UC Davis Medical Center. Two officials from that hospital sent an email to employees Wednesday that said the patient arrived at the medical center Feb. 19 but was not tested until Sunday, despite an immediate request to the CDC. The patient arrived from another hospital in Northern California ...

“There are indications that other hospitals could be involved in the case. Kris Concepcion, fire chief and acting public information officer in Vacaville, Calif., said county officials had issued a directive not to transport any new patients to two local hospitals — NorthBay VacaValley Hospital in Vacaville and NorthBay Medical Center in nearby Fairfield. ... The two hospitals are in Solano County, home to Travis Air Force Base, where hundreds of Americans repatriated from China and others brought home from the Diamond Princess cruise ship have been kept in quarantine. Many of them have been released. The health department said it has already begun tracing people who may have come in contact with the coronavirus-infected individual. ... The virus, which originated in Wuhan, China, has killed 2,801 people and sickened more than 82,000 as it has spread around the globe, reaching every continent except Antarctica.”

Key quote: If the infection is confirmed to be a case of “community spread,” “it would confirm what we have long suspected — that there is a good chance there already are people infected in this country and that the virus is circulating undetected,” said Jennifer Nuzzo, epidemiologist and senior scholar at the Johns Hopkins Center for Health Security.

Virginia officials are waiting for test results for two patients.

Nine possible coronavirus cases have been investigated in Virginia since Jan. 21, health officials said. No positive test results have been returned, per Justin Wm. Moyer.

Schools are also preparing for a possible contagion by canceling foreign trips.

For example, in Virginia, the Fairfax County school system – with 188,000 students, one of the largest – posted website updates with the same instructions it has offered since the virus surfaced – frequent hand-washing and disinfectant everywhere. The school system has canceled international field trips to countries where residents have fallen ill from the coronavirus. Class closures are unlikely in the near future, experts said, because relatively few cases have been diagnosed in the United States. (Hannah Natanson)

Officials revealed that more than 600 are being monitored for the virus in Massachusetts. All had recently traveled to China and voluntarily quarantined themselves at home while being monitored, health officials said. So far, 377 completed the quarantine without falling ill, while 231 are still being monitored. (Boston Globe)

Trump put Vice President Pence in charge of the coronavirus response.

The president's choice is "an attempt to reassure the public amid growing concerns of a global health crisis and criticism that the United States has been slow to respond to the fast-moving outbreak," Toluse Olorunnipa, Josh Dawsey and Yasmeen Abutaleb report. "We've had tremendous success, tremendous success beyond what many people would've thought," the president said during a White House news conference that followed days of mixed messages, tumbling stocks and rising death tolls abroad driven by the coronavirus. 'We're very, very ready for this.' The president declared that the risk to America was 'very low' and predicted a swift end to the outbreak. ...

"The president was contradicted almost in real time by some of the government experts who flanked him as he stood in the White House press briefing room. 'We could be just one or two people over the next short period of time,' Trump said of the virus's impact in the United States. Minutes later, Health and Human Services Secretary Alex Azar and CDC Principal Deputy Director Anne Schuchat warned Americans to prepare for the number of cases to grow. 'We can expect to see more cases in the United States,' Azar said. 'We do expect more cases,' Schuchat said. ...

“The president said he would be willing to accept more emergency funding than the $2.5 billion requested by his administration after lawmakers pushed for a more robust federal response. He also said he would consider new travel restrictions on other countries struggling to contain the outbreak, including South Korea and Italy. ... He partly blamed Democrats for the drop in the stock market and attacked House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) as ‘incompetent’ after she had made disparaging comments about his handling of the coronavirus outbreak ... Trump has made a direct connection between the virus and his political fortunes, accusing Democrats and the media of trying to harm his reelection chances by focusing on the outbreak. Trump took to Twitter early Wednesday to accuse cable news channels of ‘doing everything possible to make the Coronavirus look as bad as possible, including panicking markets, if possible.’ ...

“The White House considered appointing a ‘czar’ to oversee the government-wide response effort, a move that would essentially demote Azar from his role as the head of the coronavirus task force. ... Trump said his decision to put Pence in charge was not tantamount to appointing a czar, despite him taking a role that serves the same purpose. ‘Mike is not a czar, he’s vice president,’ the president said. ‘I’m having them report to Mike. Mike will report to me.’”

As Indiana's governor, Pence badly mishandled a 2016 HIV outbreak in his state.

“Pence came under fire for resisting the CDC's urging to allow clean needles to be distributed because of his conservative, religious beliefs. At the time, needle exchanges were illegal in Indiana. But after mounting pressure from health officials and praying on it, the Republican eventually lifted the ban,” BuzzFeed News reports.

---

Quote of the day

“We’re doing great. Other countries have not been doing”

great,” Trump said about the U.S. government's coronavirus response. (Aaron Blake)

The outbreak is flaring up around Asia, as it eases inside China.

“While China's official numbers continued to show a drop in new cases and deaths in the country, in other parts of the world the problem appeared to be getting worse. South Korea announced 505 new cases on Thursday, bringing its total to 1,766, including one U.S. soldier stationed on the peninsula,” Adam Taylor and Rick Noack report. “Elsewhere, officials canceled or postponed events including religious pilgrimages in Saudi Arabia, as doubts grow over Tokyo's plans to host the 2020 Olympics.”

A flight attendant diagnosed with coronavirus might have worked trips between Seoul and Los Angeles. South Korea's Center for Disease Control said the attendant, who had serviced a flight between Seoul and Tel Aviv, had tested positive. Neither Korean Air nor local officials immediately confirmed reports that she serviced two flights to L.A. (L.A. Times)

South Korea called off joint military exercises with U.S. troops because of the virus. (WSJ)

A Japanese woman who had recovered from the virus tested positive again.

The woman was one of the first cases of coronavirus in the country but was released from the hospital nearly four weeks ago, apparently cured. Now she's testing positive again. This is a bad sign for containment efforts. (Simon Denyer)

Iran is struggling to contain the disease, putting other Middle East nations at risk.

“In Iran, 139 people have contracted the virus, including the deputy health minister and a prominent member of parliament. Nineteen people have died, according to the Health Ministry,” Erin Cunningham and Louisa Loveluck report. “The virus has appeared in multiple Iranian cities, and infections in Bahrain, Iraq, Kuwait, Lebanon and Oman have been traced back to Iran. ... But even as regional governments moved to control the outbreak, Iranian authorities came under fire for what critics said is an inadequate response to the threat. Officials have rejected calls to quarantine major cities and have allowed communal prayer services to continue in places such as Qom, where the virus first emerged in Iran.”

Italy’s economy was already struggling. Then came the virus.

“Trams rattle by half-empty. Office buildings are vacant. Top-flight soccer matches are played in empty stadiums behind closed doors,” Loveday Morris and Chico Harlan report. “For Italy, the coronavirus could hardly have broken out in a more damaging economic area. The country’s two largest northern regions, Lombardy and Veneto, account for 30 percent of the employment and 40 percent of the exports. Milan is the economic hub, and to the east, Venice is a tourism mega-draw for a country that depends on visitors for 13 percent of its gross domestic product.”

The World Health Organization says China isn’t sharing enough data on infections.

“The WHO said it has repeatedly asked Chinese officials for ‘disaggregated’ data — meaning specific figures broken out from the overall numbers — that could shed light on hospital transmission and help assess the level of risk front-line workers face,” Emily Rauhala reports “It is not clear whether political sensitivities have shaped China’s reporting on sick doctors and other health-care professionals. It is possible that data gaps simply reflect the challenge of gathering information in the middle of a crisis, experts said. What is clear is that China is not sending details that WHO officials and other experts expect and need.”

Russia and China are taking different, but equally dangerous, approaches to the virus.

So says The Post's Editorial Board: “Open governments are struggling to encourage responsibility about a growing pandemic without inspiring panic. Russia appears to be trying to do just the opposite. Evidence suggests Moscow is spreading propaganda designed to stoke anxiety about the virus and distrust in authorities' efforts to fight it. Meanwhile, citizens in China are suffering not from a deluge of misleading material but from a dearth of open discussion. ... Either tactic, with stakes as high as they are today, could get people killed.”

The coronavirus has forced religious leaders to reconsider Lenten traditions.

“Ash Wednesday is a chance for clergy to remind Christians of their mortality, often with a swipe of thumb-to-forehead ashes,” Sarah Pulliam Bailey reports. “But this year, the holy day came one day after federal health officials said the country should brace for [the ‘inevitable’ spread of the virus]. Pastors and ministers ... found themselves asking: Should we tweak our rituals? ‘It’s a very intimate moment,’ said Teer Hardy, an associate pastor at Mount Olivet United Methodist Church in Arlington, Va. .... ‘You’re a couple of inches from someone’s face.’ ... Spokespeople for many of the largest Christian denominations in the U.S. said this week that they have not issued special directives for their churches but are closely monitoring guidance from government officials. The Episcopal Diocese of New Jersey told clergy and lay leaders Tuesday that anyone administering Communion should wash their hands, preferably with an alcohol-based hand sanitizer, and keep their distance during the greeting ritual known as the ‘passing of the peace.’”

You really don’t need to buy anything new or special to brace for the virus.

Doctors gave Reis Thebault and Alex Horton a few recommendations: “Don’t go crazy,” said Timothy Brewer, an epidemiologist at UCLA. “You don’t need to go out and stock up on lots of things.” If you’re not sick, you don’t need a surgical mask – and you don’t need to buy every box your pharmacy has in stock. “The main point of the mask is to keep someone who is infected with the virus from spreading it to others,” Brewer said.

- Wash your hands regularly. Cover your nose and mouth when you sneeze. And when you're sick, stay home from work or school and drink lots of fluids.
  - It's worth considering limiting exposure to large groups, said Stanley Perlman, an infectious-disease expert at the University of Iowa.
  - Avoid the middle of a packed train car, and turn away if someone is coughing nearby, said Saskia V. Popescu, a senior infection-prevention epidemiologist for a Phoenix-based hospital system.
-

2020 watch

Rep. Jim Clyburn (D-S.C.) endorses Joe Biden on Wednesday in North Charleston. (Gerald Herbert/AP)

Joe Biden had a good day in South Carolina, where he's favored to win.

“South Carolina chooses presidents,” Biden said as he accepted House Majority Whip Jim Clyburn’s endorsement. “You decided to launch Bill

Clinton to the White House, and up to that time, it didn't look like he was going very far — but you did. You launched my buddy Barack Obama to the White House. I firmly believe, once again on Saturday, you hold in your hands, in South Carolina, the power to choose the next president of the United States.”

“Even as he holds a small lead in polls, Biden is being vastly outspent on television and radio ads here,” Matt Viser and Cleve Wootson report from North Charleston, S.C. "While the Clyburn endorsement could prove influential, Biden also secured the top endorsements in Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada, and that helped little. And there is no certainty that even a convincing win could translate to victory when 14 other states and American Samoa vote on Super Tuesday three days later. Biden has laid little groundwork in the next states, forced to spend almost all of his time in South Carolina this week as other candidates scatter to the next set of states. Strapped for cash, he is only now starting to buy advertising in some Super Tuesday states — and is spending a fraction of what his rivals are. That puts even more pressure on South Carolina to give Biden a bounce. ... Rep. David E. Price (D-N.C.) had sat on the sidelines and watched the primary contest unfold. But after growing concerned about the unsettled field, he endorsed Biden this week.

Barack Obama demanded TV stations stop airing a misleading attack against Biden.

The ad from a pro-Trump super PAC, which has been running around South Carolina, uses the former president's words out of context in a misleading attack on Biden. Michael Scherer and Anu Narayanswamy report. “The Committee to Defend the President, a pro-Trump group, circulated an ad that falsely suggests that words Obama spoke in the narration of his own 1995 book were meant to describe Biden.” Katie Hill, Obama’s communications director, denounced the ad as being “straight out of the Republican disinformation playbook” and added that Obama has “no plans to endorse in the primary.”

Bernie Sanders is a challenge to Nancy Pelosi's majority that's beyond her control.

“While a cadre of lawmakers and strategists are sounding alarms about the risks the senator from Vermont and democratic socialist would pose to down-ballot candidates, Pelosi is moving carefully publicly and privately to avoid even the perception that she is putting her thumb on the presidential scales,” Mike DeBonis reports. “I think whoever our nominee is, we will enthusiastically embrace, and we will win the White House, the Senate and the House of Representatives,’ she told reporters ... It would be a mistake to expect Pelosi to follow Clyburn’s lead and insert herself into the presidential race. ... Asked Wednesday about whether she thought she had the power to help cull the field, Pelosi said, “The power is with the people.”

Warren said she'll stay in the race until the convention, even if Sanders has more delegates.

During a CNN town hall in South Carolina, Warren said “she would be willing to lobby superdelegates, who have votes on the second ballot if there's no outright winner, when asked if she would continue her candidacy even if she were trailing in the delegate count. Asked by an audience member why the person who gets the most votes shouldn't be awarded the nomination, Warren said the rules set a higher bar -- and that she intended to fight to the last. Warren also suggested that the argument by [Sanders] that a candidate with a plurality should be declared the nominee was disingenuous, noting that his 2016 campaign, despite losing to former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, publicly argued that convention superdelegates should consider swinging the contest in his favor.”

The Trump campaign plans to open community centers to woo black voters.

Campaign officials showed reporters posters featuring the glossy facades of their proposed “Black Voices for Trump community centers,” Ashley Parker reports. They described them as functioning as a cross between a traditional campaign field office and a sleek retail space in a heavily trafficked pedestrian area, such as a mall. “You’re never going to get the votes you don’t ask for,” the president’s son-in-law and adviser Jared Kushner said, describing the outreach as “more than a toe in the water. It’s a whole foot in the water.”

---

Domestic developments that shouldn't be overlooked

A shooting in Wisconsin left six dead.

“Wisconsin’s largest city is grieving after an employee at a historic brewery shot and killed five co-workers and then turned the gun on himself. Police say the 51-year-old assailant — who has not been publicly named by the authorities — opened fire on the sprawling Molson Coors campus Wednesday afternoon,” Dan Simmons, Hannah Knowles, Mark Berman and Reis Thebault report. They did not discuss a possible motive for the killings and did not name the victims. “The rampage is the first shooting to kill four or more people in 2020, according to a Post database.”

The House passed legislation that would finally make lynching a federal hate crime.

“H.R. 35, the Emmett Till Antilynching Act, was approved on a bipartisan 410-to-4 vote after a sometimes emotional debate in the House,” Felicia Sonmez reports. “Rep. Bobby L. Rush (D-Ill.), who sponsored the legislation, said the bill will ‘send a strong message that violence, and race-based violence in particular, has no place in American society.’ The measure’s passage comes after lawmakers tried, and failed, to pass anti-lynching bills nearly 200 times. The earliest such attempt came in 1900, when Rep. George Henry White (R-N.C.), then the country’s only black member of Congress, stood on the floor of the House and read the text of his unprecedented measure, which would have prosecuted lynchings at the federal level. The bill later died in committee. Years later, Rep. Leonidas C. Dyer (R-Mo.) introduced an anti-lynching measure that passed the House but was filibustered in the Senate by Southern Democrats ...

“At least 4,742 people, mostly African Americans, were reported lynched in the United States from 1882 to 1968 in all but four states ... Ninety-nine percent of perpetrators escaped state or local punishment ... A separate version of the measure, the Justice for Victims of Lynching Act, passed the Senate last year. It was introduced by the chamber’s three black senators: Kamala D. Harris (D-Calif.), Tim Scott (R-S.C.) and Cory Booker (D-N.J.). ... There are minor differences between the two measures, and House Democrats are optimistic the Senate will approve the House-passed version and send it to President Trump’s desk.”

Mexican reverse migration is shrinking the undocumented population.

“José cared for the bottle-fed babies, 700 of them in all. He knew a calf was healthy if her eyes were bright and her appetite hearty,” the Times reports. “His job was to do all things a mom would do to look after her young,’ said Mary Kraft, who employed José and his brother, Juan, both undocumented immigrants from Mexico, for a decade at her Quail Ridge Dairy in Colorado. Then about a year ago, the brothers informed Ms. Kraft that they were returning to Mexico. They had amassed enough savings in the land of opportunity to resume their lives back where they had started. The pair are among a growing number of Mexicans who have been departing the United States in recent years ... New data that was released on Wednesday by the Center for Migration Studies shows there were 10.6 million immigrants living unlawfully in the United States in 2018 compared with 11.75 million in 2010, a decline propelled primarily by Mexicans returning south.”

ICE ran facial-recognition searches on millions of Marylanders.

Agency officials “have been permitted to run facial-recognition searches on millions of Maryland driver’s license photos without first seeking state or court approval, state officials said — access that goes far beyond what other states allow and that alarms immigration activists in a state that grants special driver’s licenses to undocumented immigrants,” Drew Harwell and Erin Cox report. “The technology now under scrutiny could let an ICE official run a photograph of an unknown person through the system and see if any potentially undocumented immigrants are returned as a match.”

A facial-recognition company that works with law enforcement said its client list was stolen.

“The startup Clearview AI disclosed to its customers that an intruder ‘gained unauthorized access’ to its list of customers, to the number of user accounts those customers had set up, and to the number of searches its customers have conducted,” the Daily Beast reports. “The notification said the company’s servers were not breached and that there was ‘no compromise of Clearview’s systems or network.’”

Five were arrested for allegedly targeting reporters as part of a neo-Nazi group.

Federal officials “arrested several alleged members of a white-supremacist group called Atomwaffen Division, including its two leaders, accusing them of plotting to intimidate journalists by calling police to their homes and offices and dropping off threatening fliers,” Rachel Weiner and Matt

Zapotosky report. “John Cameron Denton, of Montgomery, Tex., is charged in U.S. District Court in Alexandria with conspiring to call in fake threats targeting a ProPublica reporter and his office. ... In federal court in Seattle, prosecutors say Kaleb Cole and three others hatched a different intimidation plan: finding out where journalists live and leaving posters at their homes with messages featuring swastikas, weapons and the vague threat that they were being watched.”

Giuliani wanted the 2001 mayoral election cancelled so he could stay on as mayor after 9/11.

“Rudy Giuliani secretly asked then-New York Gov. George Pataki to cancel New York City’s 2001 mayoral election so he could remain in office following the Sept. 11 terror attack,” the New York Post reports. “The bombshell disclosure is contained in Pataki’s upcoming memoir of 9/11, ‘Beyond the Great Divide: How A Nation Became A Neighborhood.’ ... Giuliani ‘dropped a bomb,’ Pataki writes. ‘Governor, you have extraordinary powers to extend my term in office,’ Giuliani said. Pataki’s ‘heart sank,’ he writes, noting that he initially backed the idea of repealing term limits so Giuliani, a fellow Republican, could seek a third term, but quickly realized it was a ‘bad idea both as a matter of principle and politically.’”

Giuliani complained about having “five friends left” after forgetting to hang up on a reporter.

Giuliani forgot to hang up on a New York Daily News reporter after being asked about Pataki’s claims. He started trash-talking Pataki while complaining that he only has “five friends left.” “There were people who wanted me to do it,” Giuliani told the News, when he was aware he was on the phone. “I thought about it for two days, but I never asked him to do it. I never made the decision to do it.”

---

Social media speed read

India's prime minister called for deescalation of riots that have left more than 30 dead in Delhi:

“Mobs of Hindus and Muslims had clashed on roads and alleyways in northeast Delhi, throwing stones and crude gasoline bombs. At least three mosques were torched, as were scores of homes and businesses. Witnesses said that instead of stopping the violence, police joined crowds shouting Hindu nationalist slogans and fired indiscriminately,” Joanna Slater and Niha Masih report.

Reuters reporters shared devastating images from the attacks:

Reuters
@Reuters

This mid-afternoon attack in India's capital New Delhi, captured in a dramatic @Reuters photograph, came against a backdrop of tension and violence. More: reut.rs/32G8Vgd

114 6:42 AM - Feb 27, 2020

110 people are talking about this

Simon Robinson  @iron_emu · 43m

Here's the aftermath for Mohammad Zubair: "They saw I was alone, they saw my cap, beard, shalwar kameez (clothes) and saw me as a Muslim. They just started attacking, shouting slogans. What kind of humanity is this?"

Pic by Danish Siddiqui for Reuters. #delhivoilence
#DelhiRiots twitter.com/iron\_emu/statu...

Simon Robinson  @iron_emu

Another conspiracy theory is circulating in the fever swamps of the fringe right, per a CNN reporter:

Once again, there's always a tweet:

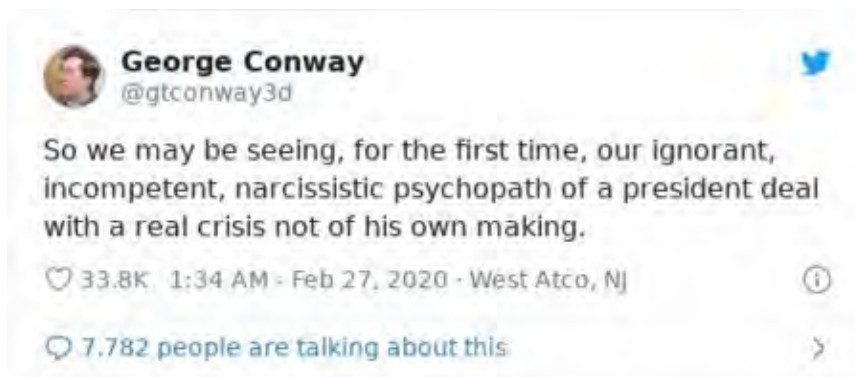

A Hawaii Democratic senator expressed concern that Pence is taking point on the coronavirus:

The husband of one of Trump's top advisers noted that this is a rare crisis not of the president's own creation:

Biden shared a moving answer about his faith:

Videos of the day

Stephen Colbert doesn't feel very reassured by Trump's plan to fight the coronavirus:

Seth Meyers said Trump likes cozying up to authoritarian leaders:

In a break from politics, Trevor Noah took a look at other news, including how the heiress of the Hot Pockets fortune was sentenced to prison:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Book Club for our weekly selection of book reviews and recommendations from Book World editor Ron Charles. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: pat\_kenney@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: SEIU will spend $150 million on 2020 elections, focused on mobilizing infrequent voters
Date: Thursday, February 27, 2020 8:24:09 AM

COMMITTED TO
AFFORDABLE CARE
FOR THE HEALTH OF AMERICA<sup>SM</sup>

BlueCross
BlueShield
Association

Powered by  LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by

By James Hohmann

with Mariana Alfaro

 Email

SEIU will spend $150 million on 2020 elections, focused on mobilizing infrequent voters

The Service Employees International Union plans to spend $150 million this year to get out the vote for Democrats in November, its largest political investment ever.

The union will deploy canvassers across more than 40 states, but its efforts will mainly focus on turning out infrequent voters from the African American and Latino communities across the eight battleground states of

Colorado, Florida, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Wisconsin.

SEIU President Mary Kay Henry previewed the strategy to defeat President Trump during an extended interview in her office off Dupont Circle in Washington. The union, which represents 2 million members, has opted not to endorse in the presidential primary, at least for now, but to focus instead on building a massive field operation to help whoever emerges from the convention this summer, as well as Democrats down the ballot.

The decision to focus on low-propensity voters grew out of Trump's victory in the 2016 election. In urban centers like Milwaukee, Detroit and Philadelphia, many minorities who cast ballots for Barack Obama in 2008 and/or 2012 did not come out again for Hillary Clinton. In 2018, the SEIU spent tens of millions of dollars trying to convince these folks that it was worth their time to participate in the midterm elections. The success of that effort has shaped 2020 planning.

“People have to be persuaded that it matters. We’re up against a sense of either hopelessness or disillusionment,” said Henry. “Our experience in ‘18 was that we were able to take infrequent voters that most campaigns and parties never talk to and demonstrate, through data, that when you go early, and you communicate frequently, and you engage people on wages and health care and investment in their communities, they’re going to show up and vote.”

Service Employees International Union President Mary Kay Henry speaks to the audience before the Democratic presidential debate in Detroit last July. (Scott Olson/Getty Images)

By Election Day on Nov. 3, the SEIU's goal is to attempt face-to-face conversations with 6 million individuals, send text messages to 20 million people and reach another 1 million possible voters online through a digital ad program in the battleground states.

The SEIU plans targeted Latino outreach programs in Wisconsin, Colorado, Florida, Virginia, Pennsylvania and Nevada. The union is building out programs to mobilize Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders in Pennsylvania and Nevada. In Philadelphia, this will be concentrated in the Chinese community. In Las Vegas, it's more Filipinos. In Florida, the SEIU has partnered with the same four organizations it worked with in 2018 to expand turnout in black and Hispanic communities, including Puerto Ricans and others from the Caribbean. All told, canvassers are being hired to communicate at people's front doors in five different languages.

The SEIU will invest significant resources to turn out Somali and Hmong voters around the Twin Cities after Trump came within 1.5 percentage points of beating Clinton in Minnesota, a state no Republican presidential candidate has carried since Richard Nixon in 1972. “They're part of this infrequent voter pool, and we know they need to show up in order to win in Minnesota,” said Henry, who got her start in the labor movement as a field organizer in the state.

Outreach to black voters in Detroit and Milwaukee has been happening since the fall, building on the work that helped elect Democratic governors Gretchen Whitmer in Michigan and Tony Evers in Wisconsin. Canvassers have knocked on 251,000 doors in those two states since the beginning of January.

With limited resources, campaigns and outside groups usually reach out to people who are most likely to vote. The best predictor of whether someone is likely to vote has always been whether they voted in the previous election. But with tight races expected across the industrial Midwest, the SEIU decided in 2018 to focus on minorities who are registered but participated in one or none of the past four federal elections. The first pass that canvassers make will be aimed at cleaning up the union's list of targeted voters. In a lot of cases, people have stopped voting because they passed away or moved away.

“Once you get to somebody, they're like ‘Whoa, this is incredible. No one has knocked on my door before,’” said SEIU political director Maria Peralta. “A lot of groups thought we were crazy, but we were committed to engaging voters that really aren't talked to at all or contacted at all. We saw the impact when we looked at the voter turnout: Folks on the lowest end of the scale turned out at higher rates than those on the higher end after being contacted by us. That's why we're doubling down on that strategy this year.”

Members of the SEIU, which represents 6,500 Twin Cities janitors and security guards, vote earlier this month to authorize a strike at the SEIU Local 26 headquarters in Minneapolis. (Matt Sepic/Minnesota Public Radio/AP)

The SEIU has conducted and commissioned extensive research over the past several months to figure out what messages resonate with minorities who have not been voting. They've discovered a widespread perception that the economy is strong, even among blue-collar workers who haven't felt the benefits directly. They've also discovered that Latino and African American men are more likely to think favorably of both Trump and the economy than women in those communities. The SEIU has tested various messages to cut through this gender divide to persuade men and mobilize women to both vote and support Democrats when they do. At least until Labor Day, the field program will focus more on pocketbook issues than Trump himself.

The SEIU's broader goal is to couple the movements for racial justice and economic equality. Half the union's members are racial and ethnic minorities, and about 60 percent are women. "Race is being used by the right to divide and conquer," said Henry. "We don't think candidates ... can win without talking about how white, black [and] brown have to join together because we have another voice in the nation that is hammering on divide and conquer, saying that criminals are coming across our border and taking our jobs, which is his way of dividing the electorate based on race."

Research has also shown them that an especially effective way to reach these low-frequency voters is with peer-to-peer text messaging. In all 2018, SEIU organizers sent about 500,000 texts nationwide. They've already surpassed that number since January. In fact, nearly 500,000 texts have already been sent in Florida alone since the start of this year urging communities of color to register so they can vote.

To be sure, union leaders emphasize they are not writing off working-class white voters. Part of the $150 million effort this year will go toward supporting an initiative with other organized labor groups to appeal to former union members in Pennsylvania, Michigan, Minnesota and Wisconsin. "We have a million voters that used to be in unions in these states, but because of the right-wing attacks, people have fallen out," said Henry. "If people have been in a union, they're more likely to support who the union and economic issues tied to unionization."

SEIU leaders are also engaging their own members. By their estimates, about 20 percent of the 2 million dues-paying members are conservatives.

Union officials plan to contact all members about voting approximately five times. For those who lean to the right, there will be emphasis on where candidates stand on issues related to supporting unions. “Wages and health care are still the top two issues, no matter what community we're in,” said Henry.

Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) speaks at an SEIU forum on labor issues last April in Las Vegas. (John Locher/AP)

The SEIU has no current plans to endorse in the Democratic presidential contest, but this could change. Several of the candidates have joined picket lines, spent time with workers in their service industry jobs and spoke at one of the SEIU’s two cattle calls over the past year. At their January board meeting, Henry said the officers of the union – which endorsed Clinton in November 2015 – agreed they should stay neutral for now. “There’s no push inside our union for me to convene an in-person meeting to endorse,” Henry said. “The current understanding amongst the leadership of our union is that any leader can put their hand up and say to me or any of our officers, ‘I think it's time for us to convene.’ The one commitment we've made to each other is that we'll get in a room. It won't be done on a phone call.”

The SEIU continues to push the candidates to commit to support

unionization efforts. “We think any plan to provide health care for all, college for all and child care for all ought to make it possible for workers to join unions,” said Henry. “The rules are rigged against us: The rules in the economy that block workers from joining unions and the rules in the democracy that don't allow everybody who should be able to vote to vote.”

Henry sits on the DNC’s platform committee. In 2016, she used that position to successfully push for the Democratic Party’s platform to endorse a $15-an-hour federal minimum wage. Asked whether she’s concerned about a contested convention, Henry said they’re “factoring it in,” but that her members are more concerned about issues than personalities. She also emphasized that down-ballot races will stay a major focus. In Pennsylvania, for example, they’re not just trying to help the Democratic presidential candidate win but also seeking to take control of the state’s legislature. “In some cases,” she said, “our members are telling us that the down-ballot races are far more motivational for them than the top of the ticket because they feel kind of flooded by the presidential in states where there's lots of TV advertising happening.”

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost’s essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

The coronavirus

Travis Air Force base is one of the two California military installations accepting flights carrying U.S. citizens evacuated from China and serving as a quarantine center. (Pete Dasilva/EPA-EFE/Shutterstock)

The first sign the disease may be spreading within a U.S. community

The CDC reported last night that a person in Northern California has contracted the coronavirus without traveling to regions hit by the outbreak or coming in contact with anyone known to have the infection. “How the person acquired the virus is unknown,” Lenny Bernstein, Laurie McGinley and Lena Sun report. “The health agency left open the possibility ‘that the patient may have been exposed to a returned traveler who was infected.’ The state of California, however, called the case its first instance of community transmission. ... Community spread would represent a significant turn for the worse in the battle against the virus. To date, the United States has 60 known cases of the infection, with 59 among people who traveled to Asia or were close contacts of people who went there. The vast majority, 42, picked up the virus while quarantined on the Diamond Princess cruise ship off Japan. ...

“The individual is a resident of Solano County, according to the California Department of Public Health. The patient is being treated at UC Davis Medical Center. Two officials from that hospital sent an email to employees Wednesday that said the patient arrived at the medical center Feb. 19 but was not tested until Sunday, despite an immediate request to the CDC. The patient arrived from another hospital in Northern California ...

“There are indications that other hospitals could be involved in the case. Kris Concepcion, fire chief and acting public information officer in Vacaville, Calif., said county officials had issued a directive not to transport any new patients to two local hospitals — NorthBay VacaValley Hospital in Vacaville and NorthBay Medical Center in nearby Fairfield. ... The two hospitals are in Solano County, home to Travis Air Force Base, where hundreds of Americans repatriated from China and others brought home from the Diamond Princess cruise ship have been kept in quarantine. Many of them have been released. The health department said it has already begun tracing people who may have come in contact with the coronavirus-infected individual. ... The virus, which originated in Wuhan, China, has killed 2,801 people and sickened more than 82,000 as it has spread around the globe, reaching every continent except Antarctica.”

Key quote: If the infection is confirmed to be a case of “community spread,” “it would confirm what we have long suspected — that there is a good chance there already are people infected in this country and that the virus is circulating undetected,” said Jennifer Nuzzo, epidemiologist and senior scholar at the Johns Hopkins Center for Health Security.

Virginia officials are waiting for test results for two patients.

Nine possible coronavirus cases have been investigated in Virginia since Jan. 21, health officials said. No positive test results have been returned, per Justin Wm. Moyer.

Schools are also preparing for a possible contagion by canceling foreign trips.

For example, in Virginia, the Fairfax County school system – with 188,000 students, one of the largest – posted website updates with the same instructions it has offered since the virus surfaced – frequent hand-washing and disinfectant everywhere. The school system has canceled international field trips to countries where residents have fallen ill from the coronavirus. Class closures are unlikely in the near future, experts said, because relatively few cases have been diagnosed in the United States. (Hannah Natanson)

Officials revealed that more than 600 are being monitored for the virus in Massachusetts. All had recently traveled to China and voluntarily quarantined themselves at home while being monitored, health officials said. So far, 377 completed the quarantine without falling ill, while 231 are still being monitored. (Boston Globe)

Trump put Vice President Pence in charge of the coronavirus response.

The president's choice is "an attempt to reassure the public amid growing concerns of a global health crisis and criticism that the United States has been slow to respond to the fast-moving outbreak," Toluse Olorunnipa, Josh Dawsey and Yasmeen Abutaleb report. "We've had tremendous success, tremendous success beyond what many people would've thought," the president said during a White House news conference that followed days of mixed messages, tumbling stocks and rising death tolls abroad driven by the coronavirus. 'We're very, very ready for this.' The president declared that the risk to America was 'very low' and predicted a swift end to the outbreak. ...

"The president was contradicted almost in real time by some of the government experts who flanked him as he stood in the White House press briefing room. 'We could be just one or two people over the next short period of time,' Trump said of the virus's impact in the United States. Minutes later, Health and Human Services Secretary Alex Azar and CDC Principal Deputy Director Anne Schuchat warned Americans to prepare for the number of cases to grow. 'We can expect to see more cases in the United States,' Azar said. 'We do expect more cases,' Schuchat said. ...

“The president said he would be willing to accept more emergency funding than the $2.5 billion requested by his administration after lawmakers pushed for a more robust federal response. He also said he would consider new travel restrictions on other countries struggling to contain the outbreak, including South Korea and Italy. ... He partly blamed Democrats for the drop in the stock market and attacked House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) as ‘incompetent’ after she had made disparaging comments about his handling of the coronavirus outbreak ... Trump has made a direct connection between the virus and his political fortunes, accusing Democrats and the media of trying to harm his reelection chances by focusing on the outbreak. Trump took to Twitter early Wednesday to accuse cable news channels of ‘doing everything possible to make the Coronavirus look as bad as possible, including panicking markets, if possible.’ ...

“The White House considered appointing a ‘czar’ to oversee the government-wide response effort, a move that would essentially demote Azar from his role as the head of the coronavirus task force. ... Trump said his decision to put Pence in charge was not tantamount to appointing a czar, despite him taking a role that serves the same purpose. ‘Mike is not a czar, he’s vice president,’ the president said. ‘I’m having them report to Mike. Mike will report to me.’”

As Indiana's governor, Pence badly mishandled a 2016 HIV outbreak in his state.

“Pence came under fire for resisting the CDC's urging to allow clean needles to be distributed because of his conservative, religious beliefs. At the time, needle exchanges were illegal in Indiana. But after mounting pressure from health officials and praying on it, the Republican eventually lifted the ban,” BuzzFeed News reports.

---

Quote of the day

“We’re doing great. Other countries have not been doing”

great,” Trump said about the U.S. government's coronavirus response. (Aaron Blake)

The outbreak is flaring up around Asia, as it eases inside China.

“While China's official numbers continued to show a drop in new cases and deaths in the country, in other parts of the world the problem appeared to be getting worse. South Korea announced 505 new cases on Thursday, bringing its total to 1,766, including one U.S. soldier stationed on the peninsula,” Adam Taylor and Rick Noack report. “Elsewhere, officials canceled or postponed events including religious pilgrimages in Saudi Arabia, as doubts grow over Tokyo's plans to host the 2020 Olympics.”

A flight attendant diagnosed with coronavirus might have worked trips between Seoul and Los Angeles. South Korea's Center for Disease Control said the attendant, who had serviced a flight between Seoul and Tel Aviv, had tested positive. Neither Korean Air nor local officials immediately confirmed reports that she serviced two flights to L.A. (L.A. Times)

South Korea called off joint military exercises with U.S. troops because of the virus. (WSJ)

A Japanese woman who had recovered from the virus tested positive again.

The woman was one of the first cases of coronavirus in the country but was released from the hospital nearly four weeks ago, apparently cured. Now she's testing positive again. This is a bad sign for containment efforts. (Simon Denyer)

Iran is struggling to contain the disease, putting other Middle East nations at risk.

“In Iran, 139 people have contracted the virus, including the deputy health minister and a prominent member of parliament. Nineteen people have died, according to the Health Ministry,” Erin Cunningham and Louisa Loveluck report. “The virus has appeared in multiple Iranian cities, and infections in Bahrain, Iraq, Kuwait, Lebanon and Oman have been traced back to Iran. ... But even as regional governments moved to control the outbreak, Iranian authorities came under fire for what critics said is an inadequate response to the threat. Officials have rejected calls to quarantine major cities and have allowed communal prayer services to continue in places such as Qom, where the virus first emerged in Iran.”

Italy’s economy was already struggling. Then came the virus.

“Trams rattle by half-empty. Office buildings are vacant. Top-flight soccer matches are played in empty stadiums behind closed doors,” Loveday Morris and Chico Harlan report. “For Italy, the coronavirus could hardly have broken out in a more damaging economic area. The country’s two largest northern regions, Lombardy and Veneto, account for 30 percent of the employment and 40 percent of the exports. Milan is the economic hub, and to the east, Venice is a tourism mega-draw for a country that depends on visitors for 13 percent of its gross domestic product.”

The World Health Organization says China isn’t sharing enough data on infections.

“The WHO said it has repeatedly asked Chinese officials for ‘disaggregated’ data — meaning specific figures broken out from the overall numbers — that could shed light on hospital transmission and help assess the level of risk front-line workers face,” Emily Rauhala reports “It is not clear whether political sensitivities have shaped China’s reporting on sick doctors and other health-care professionals. It is possible that data gaps simply reflect the challenge of gathering information in the middle of a crisis, experts said. What is clear is that China is not sending details that WHO officials and other experts expect and need.”

Russia and China are taking different, but equally dangerous, approaches to the virus.

So says The Post's Editorial Board: “Open governments are struggling to encourage responsibility about a growing pandemic without inspiring panic. Russia appears to be trying to do just the opposite. Evidence suggests Moscow is spreading propaganda designed to stoke anxiety about the virus and distrust in authorities' efforts to fight it. Meanwhile, citizens in China are suffering not from a deluge of misleading material but from a dearth of open discussion. ... Either tactic, with stakes as high as they are today, could get people killed.”

The coronavirus has forced religious leaders to reconsider Lenten traditions.

“Ash Wednesday is a chance for clergy to remind Christians of their mortality, often with a swipe of thumb-to-forehead ashes,” Sarah Pulliam Bailey reports. “But this year, the holy day came one day after federal health officials said the country should brace for [the ‘inevitable’ spread of the virus]. Pastors and ministers ... found themselves asking: Should we tweak our rituals? ‘It’s a very intimate moment,’ said Teer Hardy, an associate pastor at Mount Olivet United Methodist Church in Arlington, Va. .... ‘You’re a couple of inches from someone’s face.’ ... Spokespeople for many of the largest Christian denominations in the U.S. said this week that they have not issued special directives for their churches but are closely monitoring guidance from government officials. The Episcopal Diocese of New Jersey told clergy and lay leaders Tuesday that anyone administering Communion should wash their hands, preferably with an alcohol-based hand sanitizer, and keep their distance during the greeting ritual known as the ‘passing of the peace.’”

You really don’t need to buy anything new or special to brace for the virus.

Doctors gave Reis Thebault and Alex Horton a few recommendations: “Don’t go crazy,” said Timothy Brewer, an epidemiologist at UCLA. “You don’t need to go out and stock up on lots of things.” If you’re not sick, you don’t need a surgical mask – and you don’t need to buy every box your pharmacy has in stock. “The main point of the mask is to keep someone who is infected with the virus from spreading it to others,” Brewer said.

- Wash your hands regularly. Cover your nose and mouth when you sneeze. And when you're sick, stay home from work or school and drink lots of fluids.
  - It's worth considering limiting exposure to large groups, said Stanley Perlman, an infectious-disease expert at the University of Iowa.
  - Avoid the middle of a packed train car, and turn away if someone is coughing nearby, said Saskia V. Popescu, a senior infection-prevention epidemiologist for a Phoenix-based hospital system.
-

2020 watch

Rep. Jim Clyburn (D-S.C.) endorses Joe Biden on Wednesday in North Charleston. (Gerald Herbert/AP)

Joe Biden had a good day in South Carolina, where he's favored to win.

“South Carolina chooses presidents,” Biden said as he accepted House Majority Whip Jim Clyburn’s endorsement. “You decided to launch Bill

Clinton to the White House, and up to that time, it didn't look like he was going very far — but you did. You launched my buddy Barack Obama to the White House. I firmly believe, once again on Saturday, you hold in your hands, in South Carolina, the power to choose the next president of the United States.”

“Even as he holds a small lead in polls, Biden is being vastly outspent on television and radio ads here,” Matt Viser and Cleve Wootson report from North Charleston, S.C. "While the Clyburn endorsement could prove influential, Biden also secured the top endorsements in Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada, and that helped little. And there is no certainty that even a convincing win could translate to victory when 14 other states and American Samoa vote on Super Tuesday three days later. Biden has laid little groundwork in the next states, forced to spend almost all of his time in South Carolina this week as other candidates scatter to the next set of states. Strapped for cash, he is only now starting to buy advertising in some Super Tuesday states — and is spending a fraction of what his rivals are. That puts even more pressure on South Carolina to give Biden a bounce. ... Rep. David E. Price (D-N.C.) had sat on the sidelines and watched the primary contest unfold. But after growing concerned about the unsettled field, he endorsed Biden this week.

Barack Obama demanded TV stations stop airing a misleading attack against Biden.

The ad from a pro-Trump super PAC, which has been running around South Carolina, uses the former president's words out of context in a misleading attack on Biden. Michael Scherer and Anu Narayanswamy report. “The Committee to Defend the President, a pro-Trump group, circulated an ad that falsely suggests that words Obama spoke in the narration of his own 1995 book were meant to describe Biden.” Katie Hill, Obama’s communications director, denounced the ad as being “straight out of the Republican disinformation playbook” and added that Obama has “no plans to endorse in the primary.”

Bernie Sanders is a challenge to Nancy Pelosi's majority that's beyond her control.

“While a cadre of lawmakers and strategists are sounding alarms about the risks the senator from Vermont and democratic socialist would pose to down-ballot candidates, Pelosi is moving carefully publicly and privately to avoid even the perception that she is putting her thumb on the presidential scales,” Mike DeBonis reports. “I think whoever our nominee is, we will enthusiastically embrace, and we will win the White House, the Senate and the House of Representatives,’ she told reporters ... It would be a mistake to expect Pelosi to follow Clyburn’s lead and insert herself into the presidential race. ... Asked Wednesday about whether she thought she had the power to help cull the field, Pelosi said, ‘The power is with the people.’”

Warren said she'll stay in the race until the convention, even if Sanders has more delegates.

During a CNN town hall in South Carolina, Warren said “she would be willing to lobby superdelegates, who have votes on the second ballot if there's no outright winner, when asked if she would continue her candidacy even if she were trailing in the delegate count. Asked by an audience member why the person who gets the most votes shouldn't be awarded the nomination, Warren said the rules set a higher bar -- and that she intended to fight to the last. Warren also suggested that the argument by [Sanders] that a candidate with a plurality should be declared the nominee was disingenuous, noting that his 2016 campaign, despite losing to former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, publicly argued that convention superdelegates should consider swinging the contest in his favor.”

The Trump campaign plans to open community centers to woo black voters.

Campaign officials showed reporters posters featuring the glossy facades of their proposed “Black Voices for Trump community centers,” Ashley Parker reports. They described them as functioning as a cross between a traditional campaign field office and a sleek retail space in a heavily trafficked pedestrian area, such as a mall. “You’re never going to get the votes you don’t ask for,” the president’s son-in-law and adviser Jared Kushner said, describing the outreach as “more than a toe in the water. It’s a whole foot in the water.”

---

Domestic developments that shouldn't be overlooked

A shooting in Wisconsin left six dead.

“Wisconsin’s largest city is grieving after an employee at a historic brewery shot and killed five co-workers and then turned the gun on himself. Police say the 51-year-old assailant — who has not been publicly named by the authorities — opened fire on the sprawling Molson Coors campus Wednesday afternoon,” Dan Simmons, Hannah Knowles, Mark Berman and Reis Thebault report. They did not discuss a possible motive for the killings and did not name the victims. “The rampage is the first shooting to kill four or more people in 2020, according to a Post database.”

The House passed legislation that would finally make lynching a federal hate crime.

“H.R. 35, the Emmett Till Antilynching Act, was approved on a bipartisan 410-to-4 vote after a sometimes emotional debate in the House,” Felicia Sonmez reports. “Rep. Bobby L. Rush (D-Ill.), who sponsored the legislation, said the bill will ‘send a strong message that violence, and race-based violence in particular, has no place in American society.’ The measure’s passage comes after lawmakers tried, and failed, to pass anti-lynching bills nearly 200 times. The earliest such attempt came in 1900, when Rep. George Henry White (R-N.C.), then the country’s only black member of Congress, stood on the floor of the House and read the text of his unprecedented measure, which would have prosecuted lynchings at the federal level. The bill later died in committee. Years later, Rep. Leonidas C. Dyer (R-Mo.) introduced an anti-lynching measure that passed the House but was filibustered in the Senate by Southern Democrats ...

“At least 4,742 people, mostly African Americans, were reported lynched in the United States from 1882 to 1968 in all but four states ... Ninety-nine percent of perpetrators escaped state or local punishment ... A separate version of the measure, the Justice for Victims of Lynching Act, passed the Senate last year. It was introduced by the chamber’s three black senators: Kamala D. Harris (D-Calif.), Tim Scott (R-S.C.) and Cory Booker (D-N.J.). ... There are minor differences between the two measures, and House Democrats are optimistic the Senate will approve the House-passed version and send it to President Trump’s desk.”

Mexican reverse migration is shrinking the undocumented population.

“José cared for the bottle-fed babies, 700 of them in all. He knew a calf was healthy if her eyes were bright and her appetite hearty,” the Times reports. “‘His job was to do all things a mom would do to look after her young,’ said Mary Kraft, who employed José and his brother, Juan, both undocumented immigrants from Mexico, for a decade at her Quail Ridge Dairy in Colorado. Then about a year ago, the brothers informed Ms. Kraft that they were returning to Mexico. They had amassed enough savings in the land of opportunity to resume their lives back where they had started.

The pair are among a growing number of Mexicans who have been departing the United States in recent years ... New data that was released on Wednesday by the Center for Migration Studies shows there were 10.6 million immigrants living unlawfully in the United States in 2018 compared with 11.75 million in 2010, a decline propelled primarily by Mexicans returning south.”

ICE ran facial-recognition searches on millions of Marylanders.

Agency officials “have been permitted to run facial-recognition searches on millions of Maryland driver’s license photos without first seeking state or court approval, state officials said — access that goes far beyond what other states allow and that alarms immigration activists in a state that grants special driver’s licenses to undocumented immigrants,” Drew Harwell and Erin Cox report. “The technology now under scrutiny could let an ICE official run a photograph of an unknown person through the system and see if any potentially undocumented immigrants are returned as a match.”

A facial-recognition company that works with law enforcement said its client list was stolen.

“The startup Clearview AI disclosed to its customers that an intruder ‘gained unauthorized access’ to its list of customers, to the number of user accounts those customers had set up, and to the number of searches its customers have conducted,” the Daily Beast reports. “The notification said the company’s servers were not breached and that there was ‘no compromise of Clearview’s systems or network.’”

Five were arrested for allegedly targeting reporters as part of a neo-Nazi group.

Federal officials “arrested several alleged members of a white-supremacist group called Atomwaffen Division, including its two leaders, accusing them of plotting to intimidate journalists by calling police to their homes and offices and dropping off threatening fliers,” Rachel Weiner and Matt Zapposky report. “John Cameron Denton, of Montgomery, Tex., is charged in U.S. District Court in Alexandria with conspiring to call in fake threats targeting a ProPublica reporter and his office. ... In federal court in Seattle, prosecutors say Kaleb Cole and three others hatched a different intimidation plan: finding out where journalists live and leaving posters at their homes with messages featuring swastikas, weapons and the vague threat that they were being watched.”

Giuliani wanted the 2001 mayoral election cancelled so he could stay on as mayor after 9/11.

“Rudy Giuliani secretly asked then-New York Gov. George Pataki to cancel New York City’s 2001 mayoral election so he could remain in office following the Sept. 11 terror attack,” the New York Post reports. “The bombshell disclosure is contained in Pataki’s upcoming memoir of 9/11, ‘Beyond the Great Divide: How A Nation Became A Neighborhood.’ ... Giuliani ‘dropped a bomb,’ Pataki writes. ‘Governor, you have extraordinary powers to extend my term in office,’ Giuliani said. Pataki’s ‘heart sank,’ he writes, noting that he initially backed the idea of repealing term limits so Giuliani, a fellow Republican, could seek a third term, but quickly realized it was a ‘bad idea both as a matter of principle and politically.’”

Giuliani complained about having “five friends left” after forgetting to hang up on a reporter.

Giuliani forgot to hang up on a New York Daily News reporter after being asked about Pataki’s claims. He started trash-talking Pataki while complaining that he only has “five friends left.” “There were people who wanted me to do it,” Giuliani told the News, when he was aware he was on the phone. “I thought about it for two days, but I never asked him to do it. I never made the decision to do it.”

---

Social media speed read

India's prime minister called for deescalation of riots that have left more than 30 dead in Delhi:

“Mobs of Hindus and Muslims had clashed on roads and alleyways in northeast Delhi, throwing stones and crude gasoline bombs. At least three mosques were torched, as were scores of homes and businesses. Witnesses said that instead of stopping the violence, police joined crowds shouting Hindu nationalist slogans and fired indiscriminately," Joanna Slater and Niha Masih report.

Reuters reporters shared devastating images from the attacks:

Simon Robinson ✓ @iron_emu · 43m

Here's the aftermath for Mohammad Zubair: "They saw I was alone, they saw my cap, beard, shalwar kameez (clothes) and saw me as a Muslim. They just started attacking, shouting slogans. What kind of humanity is this?"

Pic by Danish Siddiqui for Reuters. #delhivoilence
#DelhiRiots twitter.com/iron\_emu/statu...

Simon Robinson ✓ @iron_emu

A mob out for blood: India's protests pit Hindus against Muslims reut.rs/2VkJIC

Simon Robinson ✓

@iron_emu

More from Delhi: Policemen move through a riot-affected area after clashes between people demonstrating for and against India's new citizenship law. REUTERS/Adnan Abidi

8:57 AM - Feb 27, 2020

See Simon Robinson's other Tweets

Another conspiracy theory is circulating in the fever swamps of the fringe right, per a CNN reporter:

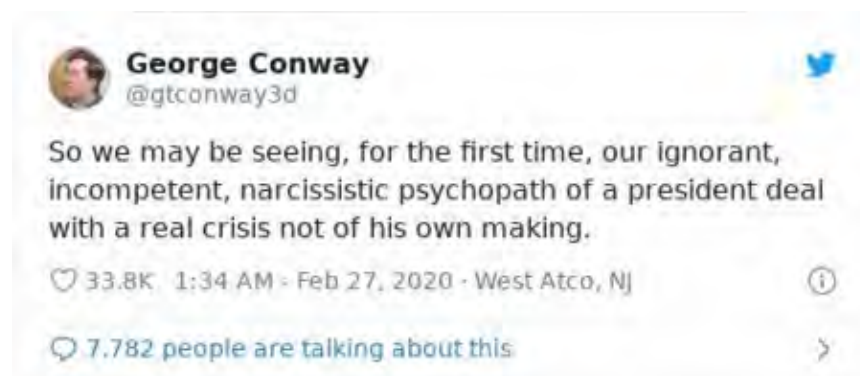

Once again, there's always a tweet:

A Hawaii Democratic senator expressed concern that Pence is taking point on the coronavirus:

The husband of one of Trump's top advisers noted that this is a rare crisis not of the president's own creation:

Biden shared a moving answer about his faith:

CNN Politics
@CNNPolitics

Joe Biden on his faith: "For me, it's important because it gives me some reason to have hope. And purpose. ... It took a long time for me to get to the point to realize that that purpose is the thing that would save me. And it has" #CNNTownHall cnn.it/2PtWnTv

 11.9K 1:33 AM - Feb 27, 2020

 3,692 people are talking about this

Videos of the day

Stephen Colbert doesn't feel very reassured by Trump's plan to fight the coronavirus:

Seth Meyers said Trump likes cozying up to authoritarian leaders:

In a break from politics, Trevor Noah took a look at other news, including how the heiress of the Hot Pockets fortune was sentenced to prison:

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out Book Club for our weekly selection of book reviews and recommendations from Book World editor Ron Charles. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from The Daily 202 | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for The Daily 202 or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] Book Club: Bernie Sanders praises Fidel Castro's literacy programs, and "The Autobiography of Malcolm X" finally gets an audiobook
Date: Friday, February 28, 2020 8:10:33 AM

2020
THE CLIMATE
FROM The Washington Post

Inside the politics of climate change
This daily newsletter from reporter Maxine Joselow is a must-read for environmental decisionmakers, energy executives and the climate-curious alike.

Sign up

Powered by  LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

The Washington Post

Book Club

Reviews and recommendations from critic Ron Charles.

By Ron Charles

 Email

Twice this week, presidential candidate Bernie Sanders praised Cuba's 1961 literacy initiative. On "Sixty Minutes," Sen. Sanders said, "We're very opposed to the authoritarian nature of Cuba. But you know, it's unfair to simply say, 'Everything is bad.' When Fidel Castro came into office, you know what he did? He had a massive literacy program. Is that a bad thing, even though Fidel Castro did it?" The next day at a CNN town hall, Sanders was asked about that bit of historical cherry-picking. He picked harder: "When Fidel Castro first came to power . . . there was a lot of folks in Cuba at that point who were illiterate, and he formed a literacy brigade. They went out and they helped people learn to read and write. You know what? I think teaching people to read and write is a good thing." You know what? I think making the trains run on time is a good thing, too, but context is everything. Yes, soon after the revolution, the Cuban government did virtually eradicate illiteracy using about 250,000 teachers and volunteers. But that program was clearly part political indoctrination. The teaching manual included lessons such as "Fidel Is Our Leader," "The Land Is Ours" and "The Revolution Wins All the Battles." Sanders should stop digging this hole with his Havana-issued shovel. True literacy isn't merely the ability to decode words on a page; it's the liberty to read and write freely.

Then-national security adviser John Bolton in the Oval Office in 2019. (Photo by Jabin Botsford/The Washington Post). Former ambassador to Ukraine Marie Yovanovitch during an impeachment hearing in November. (Photo by Matt McClain/The Washington Post)

Washington is watching a piece of absurdist theater called "Waiting for Bolton." President Trump reportedly thinks former national security adviser John Bolton is a "traitor" whose forthcoming

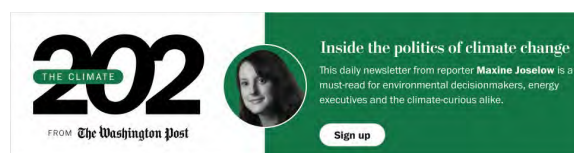

memoir, “The Room Where It Happened,” should not be published — or at least not before the next compromised election. During the impeachment trial, Senate Republicans refused to subpoena Bolton or the manuscript lest his knowledge of presidential corruption prejudice their immaculate acquittal. Even as the security review process drags on, Simon & Schuster continues to say that “The Room Where It Happened” will be released on March 17. But with Trump dead set against that and less than three weeks remaining till St. Patrick’s Day, it would take an army of leprechauns farting four-leaf clovers across the National Mall to meet that deadline.

Meanwhile, Marie Yovanovitch, the former U.S. ambassador to Ukraine, has announced plans to publish her memoir.

Yovanovitch was recalled in May after President Trump and Chief Henchman Rudy Giuliani decided she was impeding their efforts to get Ukrainian officials to smear Joe Biden. Two months later, doing his best imitation of Tony Soprano, Trump told Ukrainian President Zelensky during that perfect phone call, “She’s going to go through some things.” Presumably, she’s now going through some memories. Houghton Mifflin Harcourt editor Alexander Littlefield tells me, “Most Americans only came to know Ambassador Yovanovitch because of the impeachment drama, but that was just one chapter in an accomplished and storied life. In this book, she will confront the shocking abuse she endured in the final year of her diplomatic career, while also taking control of her own narrative and sharing tales and hard-won insights from her many years of public service and postings overseas — especially about the preciousness of democracy and the dangers of corruption. Her memoir will aim to inspire and empower readers as we move together into our post-election future.” Her book will be published in Spring 2021.

---

ADVERTISEMENT

The advertisement features a white background on the left with the text '202 THE CLIMATE' in large, bold, black letters, and 'FROM The Washington Post' in smaller text below. On the right, there is a green background with a circular portrait of Maxine Joselow. Text on the green background reads: 'Inside the politics of climate change', 'This daily newsletter from reporter Maxine Joselow is a must-read for environmental decisionmakers, energy executives and the climate-curious alike.', and a 'Sign up' button.

Ballantine Books; temporary cover art from Audible; actor Laurence Fishburne (Photo by Art Streiber).

EXCLUSIVE: For the first time since “The Autobiography of Malcolm X” was published in 1965, an unabridged audiobook version will soon be available. The recording of the activist’s life story, “as told to Alex Haley,” will be narrated by Oscar nominee and Tony winner Laurence Fishburne. It will be released by Audible on May 19, the 95th anniversary of Malcolm X’s birth. (Audible is a subsidiary of Amazon, whose CEO, Jeff Bezos, owns The Washington Post.) “It’s a great honor to have the opportunity to tell Malcolm X’s story,” Fishburne said in a statement from Audible. “This is a man who lived multiple lifetimes in the span of 40 years. An inspiration, ‘The Autobiography of Malcolm X’ remains a definitive statement within an ever-evolving civil rights and human rights movement.” Haley, a freelance journalist at the time, conducted dozens of interviews with Malcolm X as part of their complex collaboration. He knew the book would be extraordinarily popular — he promised his editor “millions or more sales potential” — but after Malcolm X was assassinated on Feb. 21, 1965, Doubleday, fearing more violence, canceled the contract. Grove Press boldly offered to publish the book instead. As Haley predicted, it has since sold millions. This May, we’ll finally get to hear those words aloud.

---

An Underwood typewriter c. 1950. (Collection of the Smithsonian National Museum of African American History and Culture, Gift of Suzanne Dundee Bonner)

Mammas, don't let your babies grow up to be writers. That's the grim take-away from a report issued by the Authors Guild.

Incomes earned by writing have dropped 24 percent since 2013, and half of all full-time authors earn less than the federal poverty level of $12,488. “The days of authors supporting themselves from writing may be coming to an end,” says Christine Larson, an assistant professor of journalism at the University of Colorado who wrote the study. She contends that the 20th century was a rare historical era in which a relatively large number of people — including women and people of color — enjoyed success as writers. Those halcyon days are over. The closure of thousands of newspapers, magazines and websites leaves fewer places for writers to place their work. And ebooks — sold mostly by Amazon — earn less revenue than print books. Bestselling writers are surviving fine, but the real victims in this new economy are midlist literary authors, who are seeing their livelihoods evaporate. For instance, Katharine Weber, the author of seven well-received books, speaks candidly in the report about what that means. Back in the day, Weber used to earn six-figure advances; her most recent novel brought $2,000. “I feel I’m at the end of a tradition, the last of my kind,” she says. To slow or even reverse this trend, Larson recommends:

- publishers support physical bookstores more aggressively.
- legislators rein in Amazon’s dominance.
- authors work together to ensure fairer contracts.

- foundations fund serious literature that the free market won't.

Sandra Oh at the Oscars in Los Angeles on Feb. 9. (AP Photo/John Locher)

ADVERTISEMENT

An advertisement for a newsletter titled "202 THE CLIMATE". The text "202" is large and bold, with "THE CLIMATE" in smaller letters below it. To the right is a circular portrait of Maxine Joselow. Text next to the portrait says "Inside the politics of climate change" and "This daily newsletter from reporter Maxine Joselow is a must-read for environmental decisionmakers, energy executives and the climate-curious alike." Below the portrait is a "Sign up" button. At the bottom left, it says "FROM The Washington Post" and "Powered by LiveIntent". At the bottom right is a small blue play button icon.

Sandra Oh will star in a dramedy called “The Chair” about a university English department. The upcoming six-part series ordered by Netflix comes from Amanda Peet, last seen in “The Romanoffs,” and David Benioff and D.B. Weiss, co-creators of “Game of Thrones.” Considering my own stint in a college English department, I think Russian revolution and medieval fantasy are perfect preparation. Feminist scholar Elaine Showalter tweeted, “New Netflix series about woman chair of a major university English department. Where the real action is, and I can only wonder it took them so long to figure it out.” Showalter’s friend and former colleague Joyce Carol Oates tweeted back, “No matter what happens in this ‘dramedy’ it will scarcely approach the scandalous/ludicrous melodrama of the Princeton English Dept. in the late 1980s.” I’m not so sure. Annie Julia Wyman, one of the co-writers of “The Chair,” earned a Ph.D. from the Harvard English department, so she probably has a long shelf of scandalous/ludicrous melodrama to draw on.

"Mystery Bag" from SEKRÈ ($3,612) contains a tiny fragment of a letter written by Charles Dickens in 1851 (Courtesy of SEKRÈ)

This week's worst idea comes from a German luxury brand called SEKRÈ, which sells "distinctive handbags that hold a genuine piece of world history." The company buys rare letters by such figures as Napoleon, Queen Victoria and Charles Dickens, cuts them up and then embeds the little scraps in expensive purses. This April, SEKRÈ plans to release a handbag carrying a bit of Alexandre Dumas fils for $1,825. Leon Litvack, a Dickens scholar at Queen's University in Belfast, tells me these purses represent "cultural vandalism of the worst kind." Litvack was appalled to discover that some SEKRÈ handbags contain fragments of an 1851 letter by Dickens that Litvack himself had once helped authenticate. "I don't think we can stop this practice," he laments, but he makes a strong historical argument: "The information in each and every letter is precious and potentially revealing; the physical documents provide a tangible connection to the man, and their preservation is important, because they communicate to present and future generations important lessons about the verifiability of the past." Simon Beattie, an antiquarian bookseller in England, tells me, "Dismembering manuscripts for commercial purposes is morally wrong. It strikes one with horror, just as much as the wilful destruction of any cultural artefact would.”

Spokesperson Anja von Bentheim assures me that SEKRÈ only cuts up papers “not included in the UNESCO list of cultural assets worthy of protection, nor in the EU list or any other national lists of cultural assets worthy of protection.” She says the company avoids “documents representing creative accomplishments” or “letters with literary content,” focusing instead on “everyday topics such as thank-you letters, private appointments, chats or other mainly private aspects.” (That sound you hear is the world’s biographers screaming into a pillow.) Remarkably, von Bentheim goes on to argue that putting bits of rare letters in purses gives these precious documents “a broader audience” than they would find if they were locked up in private collections. “By the way,” she adds, “cutting up originals is not an invention of SEKRÈ. For hundreds of years, the Roman Catholic Church has been selling relics to faithful followers allowing them to get in close touch with their adored idols.” Yes, that worked out well. . . .

Story Prize finalists Zadie Smith and Kali Fajardo-Anstine, and Story Prize winner Edwidge Danticat in New York, Feb. 26. (Courtesy of the Story Prize).

Haitian-American writer Edwidge Danticat won the $20,000 Story Prize on Wednesday night for her collection “Everything Inside.” Danticat is the first person ever to win the Story Prize twice. She took home the contest’s inaugural award in 2005 for “The Dew Breaker.”

In a statement, the judges said, “These stories zoom from the globality of immigration and natural disaster to see the human being beneath the news stories and the humanity within each tragedy. Death is a major theme of these stories, and hope does not always prevail, but there remains a belief in human dignity and the importance of acknowledging the humanity in others.” Almost 100 short story collections were submitted for this year’s Story Prize. At the ceremony in New York, two finalists, Kali Fajardo-Anstine, author of “Sabrina & Corina,” and Zadie Smith, author of “Grand Union,” each received $5,000.

Rosa Parks c. 1975 (Photo by F. Williams/Rosa Parks Papers, Prints and Photographs Division in the Library of Congress); “Rosa Parks: In Her Own Words” is a current exhibit at the Library of Congress. (Photo by Shawn Miller/Library of Congress)

If you visit Washington this year, make sure you see the Rosa Parks exhibit in the Library of Congress. I confess I knew little about Parks except that she refused to give up her seat to a white man on a bus. But this beautifully designed exhibit is a revelation. With documents, photographs and artifacts, it leads viewers through Parks’s life as an activist in the cause for civil rights. Letters and photos highlight the influences on her childhood and periods of real struggle and poverty even after she sparked the Montgomery Bus Boycott. There’s something incredibly powerful about seeing the actual police report, her handwritten notes, a photo of her practicing yoga. (Even the subtlest details are perfect — like the wallpaper in the exhibit that was inspired by the design of one of Parks’s dresses.) Near the end, you can see her Congressional Gold Medal, her Presidential Medal of Freedom and letters from such fans as Deepak Chopra. There’s an illuminating video based on the exhibit (watch here) and a fully illustrated companion book called “Rosa Parks: In Her Own Words,” by Susan Reyburn (Univ. of Georgia Press). This free exhibit will be open through September 2020.

Poet Ariana Reines (Photo and book cover courtesy of Tin House Books)

Ariana Reines won the Kingsley Tufts Poetry Award for “A Sand Book” on Tuesday. It's a big, bold collection – more than 300 pages – that ranges across feminist and environmental themes in a variety of forms. At $100,000, the Kingsley Tufts Award, administered by Claremont Graduate University, is the world's largest cash prize for a single book of poetry. Reines, a playwright, performing artist and translator, is currently a divinity student at Harvard University.

WOMEN SEEM LIKE A LABOR

He was doing that diet where you eat a brick
Of Irish butter. Women seem like a labor
To convince someone anyone of something
At all times. A kind of dusty tawny dried
And greenish pelt. Looking at the small
Colors starting to emerge

From under the surface of your arms
You would have gone somewhere but
In those days there was no escape rounding
The bend of the globe—you could maybe
Say something—or sustain a kind of Alkalinity eating whatever it was you were Supposed to be eating. You could have Sex if you still wanted to. You could even Romanticize it. The tools were still freely
Available. You could do things to your
Appearance and get to work on weaponizing
Any aspect of your experience you could rouse
Yourself to witness. Oh and you were free
You were absolutely free to have Experiences
Of Art

From "A Sand Book," by Ariana Reines (Tin House). Reprinted by permission of the publisher.

---

Happy Leap Day! If you have any questions or comments about The Post's book coverage, contact me at ron.charles@washpost.com. And if you know someone who would enjoy this newsletter, please forward it to them. To subscribe, click here.

---

Ten books to read in March

Review • By Bethanne Patrick • Read more »

---

In 'Disfigured,' a writer explores the damaging ways fairy tales shape our view of the world — and ourselves

Review • By Ron Charles • Read more »

---

In Jenny Offill's 'Weather,' the end of the world is only part of the problem

Review • By Jake Cline • Read more »

---

'The Professor and the Parson' tries to make sense of a narcissistic con man who fooled nearly everyone

Review • By Michael Dirda • Read more »

---

Don't be afraid to let children read graphic novels. They're real books.

Review • By Karen MacPherson • Read more »

---

Anne Enright is the real star of her brilliant new novel 'Actress'

Review • By Ron Charles • Read more »

---

R. Eric Thomas talks Internet fame, comments sections and his fear of suburbia

By Rachel Rosenblit • Read more »

---

'Dead to Her' may not be the most important novel you'll read, but it is delicious

Review • By Carol Memmott • Read more »

---

For years, Jeffrey Lendrum was at once an avid outdoorsman

and merciless thief. Then he got caught.

Review • By Dennis Drabelle • Read more »

---

All the presidents' books

Review • By James T. Kloppenberg • Read more »

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out By The Way for tips and guides that will help you travel better and make you feel like a local wherever you go. Delivered every Thursday. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from Book Club | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for Book Club or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] Book Club: Bernie Sanders praises Fidel Castro's literacy programs, and "The Autobiography of Malcolm X" finally gets an audiobook
Date: Friday, February 28, 2020 8:10:47 AM

2020
THE CLIMATE
FROM The Washington Post

Inside the politics of climate change
This daily newsletter from reporter Maxine Joselow is a must-read for environmental decisionmakers, energy executives and the climate-curious alike.

Sign up

Powered by  LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

The Washington Post

Book Club

Reviews and recommendations from critic Ron Charles.

By Ron Charles

 Email

Twice this week, presidential candidate Bernie Sanders praised Cuba's 1961 literacy initiative. On "Sixty Minutes," Sen. Sanders said, "We're very opposed to the authoritarian nature of Cuba. But you know, it's unfair to simply say, 'Everything is bad.' When Fidel Castro came into office, you know what he did? He had a massive literacy program. Is that a bad thing, even though Fidel Castro did it?" The next day at a CNN town hall, Sanders was asked about that bit of historical cherry-picking. He picked harder: "When Fidel Castro first came to power . . . there was a lot of folks in Cuba at that point who were illiterate, and he formed a literacy brigade. They went out and they helped people learn to read and write. You know what? I think teaching people to read and write is a good thing." You know what? I think making the trains run on time is a good thing, too, but context is everything. Yes, soon after the revolution, the Cuban government did virtually eradicate illiteracy using about 250,000 teachers and volunteers. But that program was clearly part political indoctrination. The teaching manual included lessons such as "Fidel Is Our Leader," "The Land Is Ours" and "The Revolution Wins All the Battles." Sanders should stop digging this hole with his Havana-issued shovel. True literacy isn't merely the ability to decode words on a page; it's the liberty to read and write freely.

Then-national security adviser John Bolton in the Oval Office in 2019. (Photo by Jabin Botsford/The Washington Post). Former ambassador to Ukraine Marie Yovanovitch during an impeachment hearing in November. (Photo by Matt McClain/The Washington Post)

Washington is watching a piece of absurdist theater called "Waiting for Bolton." President Trump reportedly thinks former national security adviser John Bolton is a "traitor" whose forthcoming

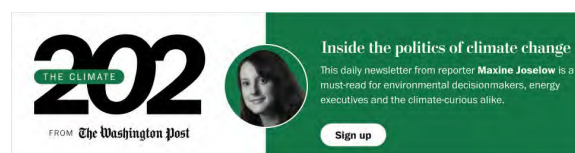

memoir, “The Room Where It Happened,” should not be published — or at least not before the next compromised election. During the impeachment trial, Senate Republicans refused to subpoena Bolton or the manuscript lest his knowledge of presidential corruption prejudice their immaculate acquittal. Even as the security review process drags on, Simon & Schuster continues to say that “The Room Where It Happened” will be released on March 17. But with Trump dead set against that and less than three weeks remaining till St. Patrick’s Day, it would take an army of leprechauns farting four-leaf clovers across the National Mall to meet that deadline.

Meanwhile, Marie Yovanovitch, the former U.S. ambassador to Ukraine, has announced plans to publish her memoir.

Yovanovitch was recalled in May after President Trump and Chief Henchman Rudy Giuliani decided she was impeding their efforts to get Ukrainian officials to smear Joe Biden. Two months later, doing his best imitation of Tony Soprano, Trump told Ukrainian President Zelensky during that perfect phone call, “She’s going to go through some things.” Presumably, she’s now going through some memories. Houghton Mifflin Harcourt editor Alexander Littlefield tells me, “Most Americans only came to know Ambassador Yovanovitch because of the impeachment drama, but that was just one chapter in an accomplished and storied life. In this book, she will confront the shocking abuse she endured in the final year of her diplomatic career, while also taking control of her own narrative and sharing tales and hard-won insights from her many years of public service and postings overseas — especially about the preciousness of democracy and the dangers of corruption. Her memoir will aim to inspire and empower readers as we move together into our post-election future.” Her book will be published in Spring 2021.

---

ADVERTISEMENT

202
THE CLIMATE
FROM The Washington Post

Inside the politics of climate change
This daily newsletter from reporter Maxine Joselow is a must-read for environmental decisionmakers, energy executives and the climate-curious alike.

Sign up

Ballantine Books; temporary cover art from Audible; actor Laurence Fishburne (Photo by Art Streiber).

EXCLUSIVE: For the first time since “The Autobiography of Malcolm X” was published in 1965, an unabridged audiobook version will soon be available. The recording of the activist’s life story, “as told to Alex Haley,” will be narrated by Oscar nominee and Tony winner Laurence Fishburne. It will be released by Audible on May 19, the 95th anniversary of Malcolm X’s birth. (Audible is a subsidiary of Amazon, whose CEO, Jeff Bezos, owns The Washington Post.) “It’s a great honor to have the opportunity to tell Malcolm X’s story,” Fishburne said in a statement from Audible. “This is a man who lived multiple lifetimes in the span of 40 years. An inspiration, ‘The Autobiography of Malcolm X’ remains a definitive statement within an ever-evolving civil rights and human rights movement.” Haley, a freelance journalist at the time, conducted dozens of interviews with Malcolm X as part of their complex collaboration. He knew the book would be extraordinarily popular — he promised his editor “millions or more sales potential” — but after Malcolm X was assassinated on Feb. 21, 1965, Doubleday, fearing more violence, canceled the contract. Grove Press boldly offered to publish the book instead. As Haley predicted, it has since sold millions. This May, we’ll finally get to hear those words aloud.

---

An Underwood typewriter c. 1950. (Collection of the Smithsonian National Museum of African American History and Culture, Gift of Suzanne Dundee Bonner)

Mammas, don't let your babies grow up to be writers. That's the grim take-away from a report issued by the Authors Guild.

Incomes earned by writing have dropped 24 percent since 2013, and half of all full-time authors earn less than the federal poverty level of $12,488. “The days of authors supporting themselves from writing may be coming to an end,” says Christine Larson, an assistant professor of journalism at the University of Colorado who wrote the study. She contends that the 20th century was a rare historical era in which a relatively large number of people — including women and people of color — enjoyed success as writers. Those halcyon days are over. The closure of thousands of newspapers, magazines and websites leaves fewer places for writers to place their work. And ebooks — sold mostly by Amazon — earn less revenue than print books. Bestselling writers are surviving fine, but the real victims in this new economy are midlist literary authors, who are seeing their livelihoods evaporate. For instance, Katharine Weber, the author of seven well-received books, speaks candidly in the report about what that means. Back in the day, Weber used to earn six-figure advances; her most recent novel brought $2,000. “I feel I’m at the end of a tradition, the last of my kind,” she says. To slow or even reverse this trend, Larson recommends:

- publishers support physical bookstores more aggressively.
- legislators rein in Amazon’s dominance.
- authors work together to ensure fairer contracts.

- foundations fund serious literature that the free market won't.

Sandra Oh at the Oscars in Los Angeles on Feb. 9. (AP Photo/John Locher)

ADVERTISEMENT

An advertisement for a newsletter titled "202 THE CLIMATE". The text "202" is large and bold, with "THE CLIMATE" in smaller letters below it. To the right is a circular portrait of Maxine Joselow. Text to the right of the portrait says "Inside the politics of climate change" and "This daily newsletter from reporter Maxine Joselow is a must-read for environmental decisionmakers, energy executives and the climate-curious alike." Below this is a "Sign up" button. At the bottom left, it says "FROM The Washington Post" and "Powered by LiveIntent". At the bottom right is a small blue play button icon.

Sandra Oh will star in a dramedy called “The Chair” about a university English department. The upcoming six-part series ordered by Netflix comes from Amanda Peet, last seen in “The Romanoffs,” and David Benioff and D.B. Weiss, co-creators of “Game of Thrones.” Considering my own stint in a college English department, I think Russian revolution and medieval fantasy are perfect preparation. Feminist scholar Elaine Showalter tweeted, “New Netflix series about woman chair of a major university English department. Where the real action is, and I can only wonder it took them so long to figure it out.” Showalter’s friend and former colleague Joyce Carol Oates tweeted back, “No matter what happens in this ‘dramedy’ it will scarcely approach the scandalous/ludicrous melodrama of the Princeton English Dept. in the late 1980s.” I’m not so sure. Annie Julia Wyman, one of the co-writers of “The Chair,” earned a Ph.D. from the Harvard English department, so she probably has a long shelf of scandalous/ludicrous melodrama to draw on.

"Mystery Bag" from SEKRÈ ($3,612) contains a tiny fragment of a letter written by Charles Dickens in 1851 (Courtesy of SEKRÈ)

This week's worst idea comes from a German luxury brand called SEKRÈ, which sells "distinctive handbags that hold a genuine piece of world history." The company buys rare letters by such figures as Napoleon, Queen Victoria and Charles Dickens, cuts them up and then embeds the little scraps in expensive purses. This April, SEKRÈ plans to release a handbag carrying a bit of Alexandre Dumas fils for $1,825. Leon Litvack, a Dickens scholar at Queen's University in Belfast, tells me these purses represent "cultural vandalism of the worst kind." Litvack was appalled to discover that some SEKRÈ handbags contain fragments of an 1851 letter by Dickens that Litvack himself had once helped authenticate. "I don't think we can stop this practice," he laments, but he makes a strong historical argument: "The information in each and every letter is precious and potentially revealing; the physical documents provide a tangible connection to the man, and their preservation is important, because they communicate to present and future generations important lessons about the verifiability of the past." Simon Beattie, an antiquarian bookseller in England, tells me, "Dismembering manuscripts for commercial purposes is morally wrong. It strikes one with horror, just as much as the wilful destruction of any cultural artefact would.”

Spokesperson Anja von Bentheim assures me that SEKRÈ only cuts up papers “not included in the UNESCO list of cultural assets worthy of protection, nor in the EU list or any other national lists of cultural assets worthy of protection.” She says the company avoids “documents representing creative accomplishments” or “letters with literary content,” focusing instead on “everyday topics such as thank-you letters, private appointments, chats or other mainly private aspects.” (That sound you hear is the world’s biographers screaming into a pillow.) Remarkably, von Bentheim goes on to argue that putting bits of rare letters in purses gives these precious documents “a broader audience” than they would find if they were locked up in private collections. “By the way,” she adds, “cutting up originals is not an invention of SEKRÈ. For hundreds of years, the Roman Catholic Church has been selling relics to faithful followers allowing them to get in close touch with their adored idols.” Yes, that worked out well. . . .

Story Prize finalists Zadie Smith and Kali Fajardo-Anstine, and Story Prize winner Edwidge Danticat in New York, Feb. 26. (Courtesy of the Story Prize).

Haitian-American writer Edwidge Danticat won the $20,000 Story Prize on Wednesday night for her collection “Everything Inside.” Danticat is the first person ever to win the Story Prize twice. She took home the contest’s inaugural award in 2005 for “The Dew Breaker.”

In a statement, the judges said, “These stories zoom from the globality of immigration and natural disaster to see the human being beneath the news stories and the humanity within each tragedy. Death is a major theme of these stories, and hope does not always prevail, but there remains a belief in human dignity and the importance of acknowledging the humanity in others.” Almost 100 short story collections were submitted for this year’s Story Prize. At the ceremony in New York, two finalists, Kali Fajardo-Anstine, author of “Sabrina & Corina,” and Zadie Smith, author of “Grand Union,” each received $5,000.

Rosa Parks c. 1975 (Photo by F. Williams/Rosa Parks Papers, Prints and Photographs Division in the Library of Congress); “Rosa Parks: In Her Own Words” is a current exhibit at the Library of Congress. (Photo by Shawn Miller/Library of Congress)

If you visit Washington this year, make sure you see the Rosa Parks exhibit in the Library of Congress. I confess I knew little about Parks except that she refused to give up her seat to a white man on a bus. But this beautifully designed exhibit is a revelation. With documents, photographs and artifacts, it leads viewers through Parks’s life as an activist in the cause for civil rights. Letters and photos highlight the influences on her childhood and periods of real struggle and poverty even after she sparked the Montgomery Bus Boycott. There’s something incredibly powerful about seeing the actual police report, her handwritten notes, a photo of her practicing yoga. (Even the subtlest details are perfect — like the wallpaper in the exhibit that was inspired by the design of one of Parks’s dresses.) Near the end, you can see her Congressional Gold Medal, her Presidential Medal of Freedom and letters from such fans as Deepak Chopra. There’s an illuminating video based on the exhibit

(watch here) and a fully illustrated companion book called “Rosa Parks: In Her Own Words,” by Susan Reyburn (Univ. of Georgia Press). This free exhibit will be open through September 2020.

Poet Ariana Reines (Photo and book cover courtesy of Tin House Books)

Ariana Reines won the Kingsley Tufts Poetry Award for “A Sand Book” on Tuesday. It's a big, bold collection – more than 300 pages – that ranges across feminist and environmental themes in a variety of forms. At $100,000, the Kingsley Tufts Award, administered by Claremont Graduate University, is the world's largest cash prize for a single book of poetry. Reines, a playwright, performing artist and translator, is currently a divinity student at Harvard University.

WOMEN SEEM LIKE A LABOR

He was doing that diet where you eat a brick
Of Irish butter. Women seem like a labor
To convince someone anyone of something
At all times. A kind of dusty tawny dried
And greenish pelt. Looking at the small
Colors starting to emerge

From under the surface of your arms
You would have gone somewhere but
In those days there was no escape rounding
The bend of the globe—you could maybe
Say something—or sustain a kind of
Alkalinity eating whatever it was you were Supposed to be eating. You could have
Sex if you still wanted to. You could even Romanticize it. The tools were still freely
Available. You could do things to your
Appearance and get to work on weaponizing
Any aspect of your experience you could rouse
Yourself to witness. Oh and you were free
You were absolutely free to have Experiences
Of Art

From "A Sand Book," by Ariana Reines (Tin House). Reprinted by permission of the publisher.

---

Happy Leap Day! If you have any questions or comments about The Post's book coverage, contact me at ron.charles@washpost.com. And if you know someone who would enjoy this newsletter, please forward it to them. To subscribe, click here.

---

Ten books to read in March

Review • By Bethanne Patrick • Read more »

---

In 'Disfigured,' a writer explores the damaging ways fairy tales shape our view of the world — and ourselves

Review • By Ron Charles • Read more »

---

In Jenny Offill's 'Weather,' the end of the world is only part of the problem

Review • By Jake Cline • Read more »

---

‘The Professor and the Parson’ tries to make sense of a narcissistic con man who fooled nearly everyone

Review • By Michael Dirda • Read more »

---

Don’t be afraid to let children read graphic novels. They’re real books.

Review • By Karen MacPherson • Read more »

---

Anne Enright is the real star of her brilliant new novel ‘Actress’

Review • By Ron Charles • Read more »

---

R. Eric Thomas talks Internet fame, comments sections and his fear of suburbia

By Rachel Rosenblit • Read more »

---

‘Dead to Her’ may not be the most important novel you’ll read, but it is delicious

Review • By Carol Memmott • Read more »

---

For years, Jeffrey Lendrum was at once an avid outdoorsman

and merciless thief. Then he got caught.

Review • By Dennis Drabelle • Read more »

---

All the presidents' books

Review • By James T. Kloppenberg • Read more »

We think you'll like this newsletter

Check out By The Way for tips and guides that will help you travel better and make you feel like a local wherever you go. Delivered every Thursday. Sign up »

The Washington Post

Manage my email newsletters and alerts | Unsubscribe from Book Club | Privacy Policy | Help

You received this email because you signed up for Book Club or because it is included in your subscription.

©2020 The Washington Post | 1301 K St NW, Washington DC 20071

From: The Washington Post
To: jeff\_mow@nps.gov
Subject: [EXTERNAL] The Daily 202: Why Bernie Sanders, the oldest presidential candidate, struggles so much with older voters
Date: Friday, February 28, 2020 10:30:19 AM

Powered by LivIntent

Sign up for this newsletter

Read online

PowerPost from The Washington Post

The Daily 202

Intelligence for leaders.

Presented by Uber

By James Hohmann
with Mariana Alfaro
 Email

Why Bernie Sanders, the oldest presidential candidate, struggles so much with older voters

CHARLESTON, S.C. – Throughout world history, seniors have rarely led revolutions. It's often younger idealists who storm barricades, draft declarations and topple established orders. Until Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.).

The 78-year-old front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination is an unlikely figurehead for a movement that advocates political revolution. The self-described democratic socialist captivates millennials, but he has largely failed to inspire voters in his own generation. At least so far.

Older people tend to be more settled in their political beliefs. They're more affluent than their younger counterparts, a factor that might make them warier of big structural changes. They tend to worry more about Sanders's age – and his heart attack – than younger voters who mostly haven't faced their own serious health struggles yet.

Mostly, though, elderly Democratic voters fear Sanders is too far to the left to defeat President Trump. Unlike the young whippersnappers who flock to Sanders's rallies, older folks remember the blowouts of 1988 and 1972 when their party nominated candidates who were more liberal than the country was ready to accept. In scores of interviews, they've expressed worry about repeating the mistakes of the past.

"I like Bernie, but I'm just afraid him tooting his socialist horn so much is going to hurt him," said Karen Griffin, 66, a volunteer for the local Democratic Party here who remains undecided about which alternative to Sanders she will vote for in Saturday's South Carolina primary. "A lot of the people that are my age vote. Growing up, we always heard socialism was scary, scary, scary. When my generation hears that term, it's scary!"

Bernie Sanders campaigns on Wednesday at Greenleaf Christian Church in Goldsboro, N.C. (Salwan Georges/The Washington Post)

While Sanders won big in the Nevada caucuses last Saturday, the entrance polls highlighted a striking age gap. The septuagenarian won 65 percent of voters under the age of 30, 49 percent of 30- to 44-year-olds, 27 percent among 45- to 64-year-olds and just 12 percent among voters over 65. In that oldest cohort, which accounted for 28 percent of those voting, Sanders finished fourth – behind former vice president Joe Biden, Sen. Amy Klobuchar (D-Minn.) and Pete Buttigieg, the former mayor of South Bend, Ind.

Sanders similarly underperformed among seniors in the New Hampshire primary. And in the Iowa caucuses, which remain too close for the Associated Press to call even after the state Democratic Party completed a partial recount, the entrance polls show that Sanders received only 4 percent among Hawkeye State Democrats over the age of 65, compared to 48 percent of those under 30.

A new Monmouth University poll shows Biden leading in South Carolina among likely Democratic primary voters, with 36 percent, and a neck-and-neck contest for second place between

Sanders (16 percent) and billionaire environmentalist Tom Steyer (15 percent). Sanders received 10 percent support among voters over 65 in the Palmetto State, per Monmouth, compared to 18 percent among those under 50.

During a rally on Thursday afternoon, Sanders declared that “we will beat Trump in a landslide” and “we will transform America” – if younger people vote at the same level as those 65 and older. “So I say to young people here, don’t complain about your student debt, don’t complain about climate change, don’t complain about racism or sexism or homophobia. Your complaints don’t mean anything. What means something is standing up and fighting,” the senator told a crowd of 4,700 in Richmond. Virginia is one of 14 states, plus the territory of American Samoa, that vote next Tuesday.

George McGovern, right, holds a snowball he made while campaigning as the Democratic nominee for president in September 1972 in Billings, Mont. (Bob Daugherty/AP)

George McGovern’s 1972 presidential campaign got Bruce Cunningham engaged in politics for the first time. He grew up in a Republican family in a conservative part of New York state, but the massacre of anti-war protesters at Kent State University in 1970 pushed Cunningham hard to the left. Now 65, he and his wife moved a few years ago to this affordable and adorable port city, where they dote on their four grandchildren who live nearby and plan to vote together for Biden in Saturday’s primary.

“McGovern was the Bernie Sanders of his day,” said Cunningham, a retired higher education administrator. “Bernie has also captivated the young folks, too, but I can’t really figure out how. McGovern was a steady guy. He had a real sense of dignity. To me, Bernie seems like a crotchety old man who is just shouting all the time.”

Cunningham remembers his family telling him, as he volunteered for McGovern almost half a century ago, that he’d become less liberal as he aged. He now sees truth in that old cliché, except when it comes to Sanders. “Bernie’s got some interesting ideas. I think they’re very unrealistic, though,” said Cunningham. “Like McGovern, I’m not sure Bernie can win. And, to me, the highest priority has got to be getting rid of the clown in the White House.”

His wife, Carol Cunningham, 62, suffers from multiple myeloma, an incurable but treatable form of blood cancer. The retired real estate agent worries that Sanders's Medicare-for-all proposal could push her off her private insurance plan and jeopardize her access to the doctors who she thinks do a great job taking care of her. "I'm just not sure Medicare-for-all is the right answer to the problems in health care," she said. "It's certainly not going to be great for everybody." The couple considered voting for Cory Booker until the senator from New Jersey dropped out. Now they both believe the former vice president has the best chance to topple Trump.

McGovern's name has been coming up a lot lately on the campaign trail, as Sanders's opponents across the Democratic establishment raise the specter that he's so liberal that he could get wiped out in a 1972-style landslide. McGovern lost 49 states that year, including his home state of South Dakota, which he represented in the Senate. Massachusetts was the only state Richard Nixon lost as he cruised to reelection for a second term, which he'd serve only 19 months of before resigning in disgrace.

Biden brings the 1972 election up in his stump speech. That's the year he got elected to the Senate as a 29-year-old. He likes to note that he toppled a GOP incumbent, even as Nixon carried his home state of Delaware with 60 percent. Making the case for his electability, Sanders has taken to reciting polls that show him leading the president in head-to-head matchups across Midwestern battleground states that flipped from backing Barack Obama in 2012 to Trump in 2016.

Check out how young the crowd was at Sanders's rally on Thursday in Spartanburg, S.C. (Matt Rourke/AP)

The Sanders campaign has stepped up efforts to make inroads with older voters. As he discusses Medicare-for-all, for example, Sanders has tweaked his pitch somewhat to emphasize ways that it would help older people. In Richmond, for example, he talked about how the government would now cover hearing aids, eyeglasses and home health care. Sanders's emphasis on his plan to expand Social Security in digital ads a few weeks ago was aimed at improving his standing with the 65-plus crowd. While Sanders once talked about socialist Eugene Debs as his political hero, now he praises mainstream Democrats like Franklin Roosevelt and his campaign has run commercials suggesting that his bold proposals follow in the footsteps of John F. Kennedy, someone Sanders ridiculed in decades past.

Before Thanksgiving and Christmas, the campaign even blasted out messaging advice to thousands of student supporters on how to persuade their parents and grandparents that they should vote for Sanders. "It's up to us as ... young people to make the moral appeal to our older relatives to join us in voting for Bernie," the document said, "because let's face it: they won't be around for as long to deal with the consequences of this election, but we will be.”

More recent polling, however, shows how much work Sanders still has his cut out for himself as he tries to expand his ceiling of support inside the Democratic Party. Last week's Washington Post-ABC News poll showed Sanders leading nationally among Democrats and Democratic-leaning voters – with twice as much support (at 32 percent) as second-place Biden (16 percent). The survey found Sanders winning 50 percent of those under 50 years old. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) was in second place with this under-50 cohort, with only 15 percent. But Sanders got just 14 percent of support from those over 50, putting him in third place behind former New York mayor Mike Bloomberg and Biden.

These are warning flags for Sanders because older voters tend to turn out at higher rates. For example, in the 2016 general election, the Pew Research Center calculated that baby boomers, and those in older generations, together accounted for 43 percent of eligible voters but cast 49 percent of the votes.

Sanders's theory of the case, which he outlines in every speech, is that he would be able to activate millions of young people to vote for the first time and therefore reduce the average age of the electorate. He struggled to do this in Iowa or New Hampshire but showed some evidence of success in Nevada. South Carolina, where most voters in the primary are expected to be African American, will be a tougher test.

The crowds at Pete Buttigieg's events, such as this one in North Charleston on Monday, tend to be much older. (Matt Rourke/AP)

South Carolina doesn't have partisan voter registration, which means Saturday's Democratic primary is open to everyone. A sizable swath of the electorate will therefore be moderate-minded independents who are uncomfortable with Sanders's revolutionary rhetoric.

Max McDuffie, 78, voted for Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) in the GOP primary four years ago but didn't vote in the general election because he disliked Trump and Hillary Clinton. "I thought I was a Republican – until Trump," said the retired military officer, who now considers himself an independent and lives in Goose Creek, which is home to a naval installation. He's voting for Buttigieg because he thinks the 38-year-old former mayor remains "uncorrupted."

The two issues McDuffie cares about the most are tackling climate change and reducing the national debt. On the hustings, you often meet highly informed voters like McDuffie who don't fit neatly in traditional boxes that pundits like to force voters into. Student loan debt isn't a top-of-mind concern for seniors. They're not agitating for tuition-free college, universal pre-K or anything that would change how they get their health care.

The trillions in new spending proposed by Sanders makes McDuffie and many other older voters I've spoken with here this week deeply uncomfortable. “All they do in Washington is spend money and money and money, and now he wants to spend more money,” he said. “It'll catch up with us eventually. I feel so sorry for our children and grandchildren.”

McDuffie's wife, Kathy, 75, remains undecided. She said she's interested in Buttigieg, Klobuchar and Steyer. “There's three people I don't want: Trump, Sanders or Warren,” said the retired postal worker. “All the others I'm pretty open to. But Trump, Sanders and Warren are too far out there. They're too divisive.”

Biden, 77, has been trying to reach voters like the McDuffies by emphasizing his desire to restore America to what it was like before Trump. When he was asked Thursday on NBC's “Today” show what it will mean if he doesn't win the nomination, Biden replied: “It says to me that we have moved away from our roots.” Speaking with a tone of disbelief, he added: “The idea that there's going to be this revolution? Americans aren't looking for a revolution. They're looking for progress.”

Coming Sunday: We will publish a special edition of The Daily 202, with insight and analysis on South Carolina's primary results and what they mean for Super Tuesday.

---

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost's essential briefing for decision makers.

Sign up to receive the newsletter

---

Share The Daily 202:

Listen to the podcast:

---

More from South Carolina

Trevor, Mattie, Shawn and Julian Mitchell pose for a portrait on Wadmalaw Island, S.C., where a predominantly black population is weighing the best way forward from a past filled with migration and inequality. (Melina Mara/The Washington Post)

Black voters here aren't particularly enthused about their options.

“Wadmalaw Island, about 23 miles south of Charleston, has roughly 5,000 residents, more than half of whom are black. After the Union Army seized South Carolina in the Civil War, white plantation owners fled the islands, leaving behind their lucrative rice fields and enslaved African Americans, many of whom were given plots of land,” Vanessa Williams reports.

“Presidential candidates rarely venture out to Wadmalaw or neighboring islands. Voters who want to see the candidates in person usually have to go to Charleston. That’s where Mildred Mitchell first saw Barack Obama ... She thought Obama’s policies ... were good for the country, and she hates that Trump seems intent on undoing his legacy. That was why she was leaning toward Biden, even though she was concerned about his age. ... ‘I want somebody that can beat Donald Trump,’ she said. Right now, she is not sure who that is. ... The Wadmalaw families have one thing in common: None expressed excitement about their choices, even as all vow to vote. They said they were frustrated by the large, chaotic field of candidates ... Mostly, they said, they felt a duty to participate in the election and a desire to defeat Trump. But there is no swooning like they all recalled from 2008, when they helped boost Obama’s candidacy at a critical moment.”

And they are worried about racism.

“Here in my hometown, voters I’ve talked to are worried and conflicted — and see the stakes in November as going far beyond ideology to involve history, legacy and the return of a kind of frank racism that many hoped was dead and buried,” columnist Eugene Robinson writes from Orangeburg, S.C. “It’s like racism is just coming out of the woodwork,’ said Bill Hamilton, 70, the retired sports information director at South Carolina State University, one of two historically black colleges in Orangeburg. ... ‘I just have a lot of disdain for Donald Trump,’ Hamilton said. ... Across town at the Kuckery — a popular lunch spot where the fried chicken is, well, just as fried chicken should be — I heard much the same thing from Juan L. Maulsby: ‘This election is a referendum on Trump. Trying to get him out.’ ... Maulsby said he believed ‘Biden has it in the bag here.’ ... The little I’ve heard about Bloomberg will not gladden the hearts of his campaign advisers. His debate performances discouraged a few voters I talked to and even left an impression of Trump-ishness among a couple of others.”

Miss Black America is trying to help Buttigieg gain support among black voters.

Ryann Richardson has been canvassing for Buttigieg in Charleston. “This was a packed 68 hours for the pageant queen, including a speech at a Mexican restaurant, two galas, three canvassing launches, a church service and roundtables with black female voters,” Jada Yuan reports. “The folks here take the reigning Miss Black America seriously. ... After South Carolina, she will head to Alabama for Super Tuesday. She was also stiletto-boots-on-the-ground for Buttigieg in Iowa, where she appeared at his victory party alongside other black women in the row behind him, cheering him on — which led Twitter critics and media outlets to accuse the campaign of using black women as political props. ... ‘It’s rather offensive,’ Richardson says, ‘this notion that adult black women lack the agency to decide where they stand and for whom they stand — and that when they stand there, they must only be stage scenery.’ ... She grilled Buttigieg about the shooting of Eric Logan, a black man in South Bend, by a white police officer. ‘I’ve never heard a politician accept accountability for a mistake ever, for a failure ever,’ she says. But Buttigieg did.”

Steyer has bet his campaign in this state on climate change.

“His argument that global warming will be felt most bluntly by black and brown communities is meant to resonate in a state where residents are already feeling its effects and where about 60 percent of voters in Saturday’s Democratic primary are African American,” Dino Grandoni reports. “Steyer may be making his last stand here, where polls show him running third ... Steyer’s strong showing in South Carolina is not just because of his message. He spent $52.9 million nationwide on his presidential campaign in January alone. ... Elsie Graves, a retired real estate agent who lives in Myrtle Beach, appreciates how she is not pestered with requests for donations when she visits Steyer’s website. ‘So I kind of like rich people in the race,’ she joked. Her bigger concern was depriving Biden of a vote in his bid to beat Sanders. But Graves, whose home suffered more than $20,000 in damage during Hurricane Matthew in 2016, said she was reassured by Steyer’s commitment to act immediately on climate change. She said she will vote for him.”

---

Looking to Super Tuesday and beyond

Joe Biden takes a selfie after a rally on Thursday in Conway, S.C. (Scott Olson/Getty Images)

Sen. Tim Kaine (D-Va.) endorsed Biden this morning.

The 2016 vice presidential nominee hopes to give him a boost before Virginia’s primary on Super Tuesday. “He reminds me of Harry S. Truman, an outwardly ordinary man whose work ethic, faith in the goodness of everyday Americans, and love of country made him a great President,” Kaine said in a statement. A Wason Center poll of likely Democratic voters in Virginia released Friday shows Biden with a modest lead in the state, with Sanders in second and Bloomberg in third. (Jenna Portnoy)

Most Virginia moderates are not gravitating toward any particular Sanders alternative.

“In the affluent Northern Virginia suburbs that will be ground zero for Democratic turnout in November, an ‘anybody but Bernie’ movement is struggling to take hold,” Antonio Olivo reports. “Moderate Virginia voters have turned out in droves for Democratic candidates since [Trump’s] election. ... Now, those same voters are bouncing between presidential candidates, hoping that someone — anyone — can generate enough excitement to foil a November matchup between Sanders and Trump that they believe would be disastrous. ... Outside a Warren rally in Arlington ... Marguerite Metzler said that ‘it’s disturbing’ to think of Bloomberg, a former Republican, as the only viable alternative to Sanders. ... [She said Warren] may have blown her chances of winning in Virginia ... ‘by building such a strong association with free college and Medicare-for-all.’ After ticking off a list of misgivings over the other Democratic candidates — Biden lacks energy, Buttigieg is inexperienced — Metzler, who lives in Springfield, landed on a possible choice: ‘Maybe Amy?’”

Sanders shows few signs of making nice with fellow Democrats.

The front-runner this week has angered Florida Democrats with praise for Fidel Castro, upset some Jewish leaders with sharp criticism of the pro-Israel group AIPAC and preemptively spurned Bloomberg’s offer to help fund his campaign in the general election. “These disputes with other Democrats, even as he cements a position atop the presidential primary field, are prompting nervousness and alarm among many of them over whether Sanders can set aside decades-old habits of combativeness and confrontation and bring the party together to take on a president they revile,” Sean Sullivan and Michael Scherer report. “Adding to the Democratic anxiety, some are concerned about the small number of black voters among his audiences in South Carolina this week, suggesting he still may be struggling to attract that pillar of the Democratic coalition. ...

“In a recognition of these fractures, Democratic leaders have begun saying openly that some down-ballot party candidates may run on non-Sanders positions if he is the nominee. ‘It is not unusual for a party platform, or candidates for president, to have their own agenda they would put forth,' House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) told reporters Thursday. 'And it is not unusual for the House of Representatives to have its agenda to win as well.' Minutes earlier, Rep. Donna Shalala (D-Fla.) spoke on the House floor in support of a bill condemning Sanders's comments praising Castro's literacy program, which she called 'misguided, ill-informed, hurtful and unacceptable.'"

Democratic leaders are willing to risk damage to the party to stop Sanders.

The New York Times interviewed 93 of the 771 superdelegates and reports that the "vast majority" predicted no candidate would clinch the nomination during the primaries, which could result in a brokered convention. Only nine of those interviewed said Sanders should become the nominee purely on the basis of arriving at the convention with a plurality of pledged delegates. "House members share their Sanders fears on text-messaging chains. Bill Clinton, in calls with old friends, vents about the party getting wiped out in the general election. And officials in the national and state parties are increasingly anxious about splintered primaries on Super Tuesday and beyond," per the Times. Obama said he will "wholeheartedly support" the eventual nominee in a new fundraising pitch for the Democratic National Committee, per John Wagner.

Warren is in real danger of losing her home state.

"Sanders is outpacing Warren in polls across the Super Tuesday map. But one state stings more than the others: Massachusetts," Politico reports. "As recently as October, the two-term senator held a 20-percentage point lead over Sanders, according to a WBUR poll. In the latest version of the poll, released Friday, she trailed him by 8 points. Now, in the run-up to the March 3 primary, Sanders is going all in on his bid to pick off Massachusetts, culminating in a four-day music and canvassing festival in Worcester that begins Friday. ... It's not clear whether Warren will campaign in Massachusetts in the run-up to the primary."

A Ukrainian court has forced a probe into Biden.

"A court ruling in Ukraine has forced state investigators to open a probe into alleged pressure by then-vice president Joe Biden that led to the 2016 dismissal of Viktor Shokin as the country's prosecutor general," David Stern and Robyn Dixon report from Kyiv. "Trump last year pressed Ukraine President Volodymyr Zelensky for an investigation of this kind, leading to Trump's impeachment ... Shokin's firing, however, was not a unilateral action directed by Biden. It was prompted by a push for anti-corruption reforms developed at the State Department and coordinated with the European Union and the International Monetary Fund. Shokin's lawyer, Oleksandr Teleshetsky, said the probe was launched in response to a court order, after an appeal for action by Shokin. The State Bureau of Investigations confirmed a case was opened. ... Shokin has long been angered by what he sees as an unfair dismissal following foreign pressure."

Bloomberg released information about his heart health.

According to Bloomberg's doctor, Stephen Sisson at Johns Hopkins, "Bloomberg's left ventricular ejection fraction was 'normal' at 60-65%; his left ventricular cavity size and left ventricular function were also deemed 'normal.'" Bloomberg's campaign said Sanders should release the same left ventricular ejection fraction data. (CNN)

Bloomberg's campaign dangled the vice presidency in pursuit of Andrew Yang's endorsement.

Yang "didn't commit to join forces, as he considers his own political future," the Wall Street Journal reports. "A senior Bloomberg aide said Mr. Yang wasn't being seriously considered to be the former mayor's running mate if he secured the nomination."

Bloomberg says "stop and frisk" decreased crime. Data suggests it wasn't a major factor.

"A Washington Post analysis of crime patterns and other academic research found that major felonies declined during Bloomberg's three terms from 2002 through 2013, but the reduction did not correspond to the increase in stops by police," Dan Keating and Harry Stevens report.

“Crime has continued to fall since a federal judge deemed the practice an unconstitutional violation of civil rights in 2013. The disconnect suggests that an increase or decrease in crime happened largely for reasons independent of the aggressive expansion of the policy.”

As the opioid crisis grew, Bloomberg helped the Sackler family with some PR advice.

“The billionaire family whose company created and pushed the addictive painkiller OxyContin had managed to escape connection with the opioid crisis for years, but now two magazine pieces were portraying them as pain profiteers. ... Mortimer D.A. Sackler ... was openly furious. And so he turned to a person he knew and admired in the media industry,” writes Hannah Dreier for ProPublica. “I am meeting with Michael Bloomberg tomorrow morning at 10 am to seek his help and guidance on the current issues we are facing,’ Sackler wrote to Purdue’s top executives in December 2017. ‘I plan to discuss the following with him: 1. Current narrative vs the truth. 2. What advice does he have on how best to deal with it? 3. Does he have a journalist that he would recommend who could get the FULL story out there?’ ... Bloomberg advised Mortimer Sackler on how to handle negative coverage in 2017, and steered the family to a crisis communications specialist who had been his mayoral press secretary. In 2018, Bloomberg Philanthropies staff met with Sackler to discuss launching a joint initiative to combat the opioid crisis.”

An SEC coach became a Trump-loving Senate hopeful. His players no longer recognize him.

Former Auburn University coach Tommy Tuberville is competing with Jeff Sessions and others ahead of the GOP primary in Alabama next Tuesday to take on Sen. Doug Jones (D). At Auburn, Tuberville established a reputation as a mild-mannered coach and charming recruiter who led the Tigers to an undefeated record in 2004. But he's transformed himself, adopting some of the president's favorite language and Trump's propensity for exaggerations and falsehoods. "Perhaps more notably, Tuberville, who sold football recruits and built the Auburn program on a foundation of unity, has now taken on many of the president's more hard-line — and, often, xenophobic — talking points,” Kent Babb reports. “Some of Tuberville’s former Auburn players have noticed, pointing out that his persona on the campaign trail is strikingly different than the man who recruited and coached them. ‘That doesn’t reflect the person that I knew,’ said Devin Aromashodu, a former Auburn wide receiver who usually votes Democrat. ‘It sounds like two different people.’”

---

The coronavirus

Federal workers allegedly assisted evacuees without protective gear.

“Officials at the Department of Health and Human Services sent more than a dozen workers to receive the first Americans evacuated from Wuhan, China, the epicenter of the coronavirus outbreak, without proper training for infection control or appropriate protective gear, according to a whistleblower complaint,” Lena Sun and Yasmeen Abutaleb report. “The workers did not show symptoms of infection and were not tested for the virus, according to lawyers for the whistleblower, a senior HHS official based in Washington who oversees workers at the Administration for Children and Families, a unit within HHS. The whistleblower is seeking federal protection, alleging she was unfairly and improperly reassigned after raising concerns about the safety of these workers to HHS officials, including those within the office of Health and Human Services Secretary Alex Azar. She was told Feb. 19 that if she does not accept the new position in 15 days, which is March 5, she would be terminated. ...

“The complaint alleges HHS staffers were ‘improperly deployed’ and were ‘not properly trained or equipped to operate in a public health emergency situation.’ The complaint also alleges the workers were potentially exposed to coronavirus because appropriate steps were not taken to protect them and staffers were not trained in wearing personal protective equipment, even though they had face-to-face contact with returning passengers. ... In some instances, the teams were working alongside personnel from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in ‘full gown, gloves and hazmat attire,’ the complaint said. ... Several people within HHS voiced objections to sending the ACF personnel to receive passengers, according to a person familiar with the conversations ... A second person familiar with the situation said the workers were not tested for coronavirus because none of them met the criteria, which was restricted at that time to people with symptoms and either a recent trip to China or close contact with a person confirmed to be infected with covid19. If the workers had exhibited symptoms, appropriate protocol would have been followed.”

Vice President Pence took control of messaging amid criticism of his qualifications.

“Pence tried to project a sense of steady control over the government’s response to the coronavirus,” Toluse Olorunnipa, Josh Dawsey and Yasmeen Abutaleb report. “Pence appointed a doctor, Ambassador Debbie Birx, to serve as White House response coordinator for the virus, enforced tight control of the government’s public communications and added new members to a task force aimed at containing the spread of the outbreak. ... Trump on Thursday continued to downplay the threat, blaming the media and Democrats for creating a panic over the virus. ... In an effort to combat further fragmented messaging, Pence moved to seize control of all federal communications on the virus, requiring Cabinet officials and government experts to get clearance from his office before making public remarks, according to two senior administration officials.

“The move came after Trump grew frustrated about some of the public statements made by government officials warning the public, which the president viewed as overly alarmist ... The move drew immediate criticism from Democrats, who warned that Pence’s attempt at message control could quickly turn into an effort to suppress critical health information that the public needs. ... Adding economy-focused figures to the task force, Pence appointed Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and top White House economic adviser Larry Kudlow ... Pence suggested ... that both he and Azar would lead the government’s effort ... A former senior HHS official ... said Azar, public health officials and department employees have been ‘doing the measured playbook response’ to the coronavirus, while the White House has been obsessed with a ‘communications problem.’ For Azar, this created ‘a sense of irritation,’ the official said. ...

“One senior administration official involved in the response said many people were confused about how the response will be run. The official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, used a combination of expletives to describe the situation. The official said problems with a government-created coronavirus test have limited the United States’ capacity to rapidly increase testing.”

Trump said he put Pence in charge because he didn’t “have anything else to do.”

