

Civilian Conservation Corps Emergency Conservation Work

The decade of the 1930s dawned grey and dreary for Yellowstone. The “unsettled state of affairs throughout the country” quickly clouded the park’s future: a 12-percent decrease in visitors in 1931, followed by a 3-percent decrease the following year, and a 29-percent decrease in 1933, meant fewer Americans would benefit from the park’s instructive and recreational benefits and fewer dollars would arrive in concessioners’ and the NPS’s coffers. 12 Park funds, already severely reduced by forest fires in 1931, were hit hard by a considerable cut in appropriations. The effects on park improvement and protection were significant.

What the park needed to continue its improvement and protection schedule was a large infusion of money and manpower. It received both from the Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC), the force of unemployed men and youth put to work on resource-related public projects as part of President Franklin D. Roosevelt’s Emergency Conservation Work (ECW). The ECW program was enacted on March 31, 1933, just weeks after Roosevelt’s inauguration.

All CCC and ECW work was supervised by landscape architects working in each park. “The CCC technical staff—architects, landscape architects, and engineers—were actually employed by the National Park Service through ECW funds,” wrote historian Linda McClelland.
