250 Years of American Independence, 154 Years of "America's Best Idea"

As the United States observes the 250th anniversary of its independence, the nation finds itself looking both backward and forward—reflecting on the ideals declared in 1776 while reconsidering the shared inheritance those ideals imply. Few American institutions make that inheritance as tangible as the national parks, and no place makes the argument more powerfully than Yellowstone National Park, celebrating 154 years since its creation in 1872.

Yellowstone emerged from a country still defining its purpose. The ink on the Declaration of Independence was less than a century old when Congress decided that this astonishing landscape—its geysers, canyons, and wild expanses—should not be claimed or commercialized, but instead set aside “for the benefit and enjoyment of the people.” That choice was radical: a young nation, still unsure of its reach and identity, proclaimed that some of its greatest treasures would belong to everyone.

In that moment, national parks became a kind of second declaration—one not written on parchment, but on the land itself. Over time, this idea evolved into what filmmaker Ken Burns, borrowing from an essay by Wallace Stegner, later called “America’s Best Idea”: the belief that democracy is strengthened when people share access to wonder, beauty, and the lessons of the natural world.

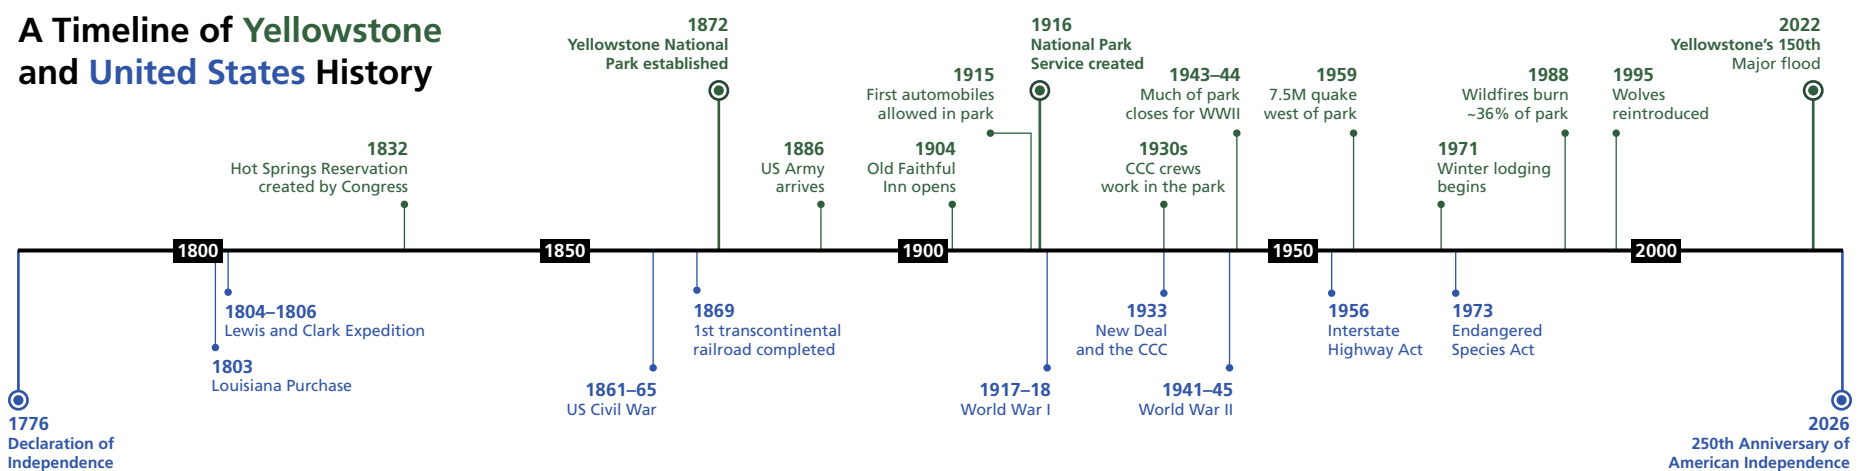

Yellowstone has long served as a proving ground for that belief. From the Army’s early stewardship to the creation of the National Park Service in 1916, from landmark wildlife policies to the park’s designation as a UNESCO World Heritage Site, Yellowstone reflects the country’s shifting understanding of nature, science, and responsibility.

As the United States enters its 250th year, Yellowstone offers a timely reminder that freedom is not only an individual right but a collective project. The park teaches that the landscapes we inherit require care, humility, and participation—that independence is made stronger when paired with stewardship.

In celebrating 250 years of American independence and 154 years of America’s Best Idea, Yellowstone invites us to imagine the next century: a nation committed not just to protecting its extraordinary places, but to ensuring that all people can experience and be inspired by them.

A Timeline of Yellowstone and United States History

Nearly 80 Years of Yellowstone Junior Rangers

In 1947, ranger-naturalist Mildred Ericson led a group of children out to the beaver dams near Mammoth Hot Springs, where, as she noted in her field journal, they “studied the habits of the beaver, hypnotized frogs, and observed a herd of antelope.”

That afternoon belonged to Yellowstone’s Junior Nature Explorers, a new program for children aged six to fourteen who spent their afternoons exploring, soaking up nature lore, and trying their hand at nature craft. It was the earliest children’s program in the world’s first national park, and the start of a now 79-year tradition.

Today the program is among the Service’s most beloved. Children four and older (and plenty of adults who are young at heart) complete an activity booklet built around the park’s geology, wildlife, and fire ecology; hike a trail or boardwalk; and interact with a ranger. A ranger then reviews the work, administers a pledge—“As a Junior Ranger, I promise to learn all I can to help preserve and protect Yellowstone’s wildlife, history, and natural features. When I return home, I will teach others how to protect the natural world.”—and swears in each new Junior Ranger.

In 2025 alone, roughly 100,000 people took part, and thanks to the park’s nonprofit partner, Yellowstone Forever, the program remains free to families.

From that 1947 afternoon of hypnotized frogs to the children sworn in this summer, the message hasn’t changed in 79 years: this place is worth knowing and protecting, now and for generations to come.
